

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

THE MILLER OF MOHILL.

A TALE IN THREE CHAPTERS.

BY WILLIAM CARLETON.

CHAP. I.—THE MILLER AND HIS DAUGHTER—THE TWO BROTHERS AND THE THREE TIPPERRARY MEN.

AMONG the Irish peasantry there is no trade or calling so popular, and, indeed, so inoffensive, as that of a miller. His business is always associated with a merry and festive spirit. The conveyance of a meldre or kilncast of grain to be ground, is among the people a kind of holiday labour, inasmuch as it is always accompanied with more or less of conviviality. The man of meal is generally a droll good-natured individual, full of anecdote and rough humour, always ready either to give or take a treat, as the case may be, but still shrewd enough to make his jokes and treats subservient to his own interests. This in some degree is necessary. There is no parish without at least three or four mills within its limits, and the spirit, consequently, by which their proprietors are animated, is one of strong competition for public favour.

This principle is looked upon with so much importance, even by the landlords of the country, that it was usual some time ago, whenever a man possessed an estate on which a mill stood, to insert a clause in his leases, by which his tenantry were bound to get their grain ground in that particular mill, and no other. We believe there never was a penalty attached to this clause; but, be that as it may, it was looked upon and treated as a dead letter, the principal motive for supporting any particular mill being the popularity of the miller, and his power of conciliating good will. Formerly a great degree of bodily strength was an essential and in dispensable quality in a miller, especially in remote districts, where improved habits of agriculture and the more civilized usages of life had not reached. We remember, ourselves, when even the common, low-backed car, with solid wheels of wood, could be seen only with a few of the wealthiest farmers of the parish. At that time oats and other grain were carried in large sacks, thrown across the naked backs of the horses, as they were conveyed either to the mill or the market, and the usual seat of the individuals who conveyed them was on the top of the sacks, for the purpose, they said, of keeping them balanced, so as that they might not pitch to one side and fall off. Now, when the grain was turned into meal, it was the duty of the miller, as soon as it was put into the sacks once more, in cases where the owner of it was a weak and feeble man, to "back the sack," and throw it across the horse in order to be carried home. All these old usages, however, have nearly disappeared—the slide car is gone, except in mountain districts, where no other can be used; the wooden-wheeled car too is gone, and in its place has been substituted the more convenient common cart. A country mill in Ireland—and we presume everywhere else—was always the scene of much fun, bustle, and drollery. All the news and scandal of the parish were generally discussed in it—the miller himself, however, for prudent purposes, always making it a point to defend the absent, whenever they happened to be illspoken of. This was his invariable rule, because he took it very correctly for granted that his defence would reach their ears, and that, as a natural consequence, he was certain to secure their custom, if he chanced not to have had it already.

No man ever thought of going to the mill without money in his pocket. It was a central point, where neighbours and acquaintances met, and it is not to be supposed that they could swallow so much dust without something to wash it down. Many a bottle of whiskey and many a huge can of ale and porter were discussed, amid the laugh, the song, and the jest; and it was always during these friendly computations that the jolly miller shone to most advantage. His stock of songs and anecdotes was always at the service of his customers, his laugh a ready chorus to their humour, and, to crown all, his treat always closed the convivialities, when he was sure to give them the old song of “Tarry hi ho the grinder,” or “Merry may the maid be that marries the miller.”

In general there was a string or two of small huts or cabins in the immediate vicinity of the mill, which went by the name of Milltown, and which were inhabited by the very poorest wretches of the community. Some of them were day-labourers, but the greater portion of them lived upon scraps and fragments, and eleemosynary portions of meal given them by those who were grinding their corn in the mill, in recompense for their services in doing odd jobs for them, in carrying about winnow-cloths, sacks, and riddles, while the shelled grain was bolted and winnowed upon what was called the shelling-hill, an elevated spot near the mill, where they could get a fair blast of wind, for at that time such a thing as a winnowing machine was scarcely known. These wretched creatures never used any other fuel to dress their victuals, but what was termed the “shelling seeds,” which they got in sacks full from the good-natured miller, who always treated them with great kindness and indulgence.

The name of the miller, of whom we are about to speak, was Frank Kennedy, a man of powerful strength and great size; but like most of his class, kind-hearted and jovial. He was, however, though of a peaceable disposition, a man of the most determined courage and resolution. He had never entered into a quarrel more than once or twice during his life, and on those occasions the quarrels were none of his own seeking. He saw a weaker party assailed by one that was stronger and more numerous, and immediately threw himself into the ranks of those who felt themselves overpowered more by numbers than by courage. His prowess and popularity, aided as he was by many friends, soon turned the scale, and the ungenerous ruffians, who were three to one, found themselves, in a short time, obliged to retreat.

Frank's mill, however, was a lonely and solitary building, which from its position, could not be surrounded with anything like the Milltown population we have described. It stood upon the only spot where a dam could be secured from the little river which fed it, and from its remote and isolated position there existed no temptation for the miserable class alluded to to squat in its vicinity. His own dwelling-house was consequently the only habitation within a mile of the mill. Up about half a mile above it was a deep and precipitous valley that lay between two sharp, wild, and bleak mountainous hills, which terminated a range on each side, that stretched away into a high sweep of barren moor in which the river had its source. To the left of the mill, as you looked towards the north, lay a low level bog, which was generally

Frank Kennedy was a widower, and had but one child, a daughter, of exceeding grace and beauty, considering her situation in life. At the period of our story she was only nineteen, a tall, fair girl of slender make but naturally elegant, and giving evident promise of that fulness of outline, which, taken in connexion with her present symmetry of figure, constitutes, when associated with beautiful features, all that the heart of a fond parent could desire. To say that he loved her with surpassing tenderness and affection is only to tell a tale that has been told a thousand times—a tale which every person possessing a heart must at once understand. She was, however, worthy of all his affection, and returned it in a spirit which was perfectly congenial with his own. They were, in fact, all in all to each other. The kind-hearted father looked upon Anne as the principal solace of his life, and Anne loved him with an affection which was only next to that which she bore to God himself. The miller was a wealthy man, and bestowed upon her as good an education as his position and the remote situation in which they lived could enable him to do. Music, French, and other accomplishments were out of the question, because there existed no means of procuring them for her. So far as a plain English education however went, she had been admirably instructed, and in general conversation the want of the “accomplishments” could scarcely, if at all, be noticed.

It is not to be supposed that a country girl so amiable, so beautiful, and every way so interesting, could be without a variety of suitors, and neither was she. Many of those, it is true, loved her with a generous and independent passion, whilst the attachment of others was mixed up with a sordid and selfish love of the wealth which they knew she would possess. One of the former class was a young man who lived about a mile-and-a-half from Mohill, the name of the townland in which the mill stood. He was the son of a wealthy and respectable farmer named Cavanagh, and as stout and handsome a young fellow as ever attended the chapel of Rathcullen, in addition to which he was the accepted lover of the fair Anne Kennedy. Indeed their attachment and the future relation which they would soon bear to each other were generally known throughout the parish, and their expected marriage was hailed with universal goodwill and approbation, with one exception only. Young Tom Cavanagh, who, although he lived in his father's house, held a good farm at a moderate rent adjoining Lark Hill, which was the name of his father's place, was there preparing to build a becoming residence for his future wife. The foundations of the house were laid; the situation of the garden and out-offices marked out, and it was arranged that the marriage should take place as soon as those necessary projects should be completed, and the new house furnished and made fit for her reception. The miller would have been doubly delighted at the contemplation of this union, if he could have prevailed upon Cavanagh and his daughter to live with himself. His heart had been so completely habituated to his affectionate child, that the very idea of her departure from him, and the solitude of spirit in which he felt he must spend the remainder of his life, depressed him deeply. Many a time, when thinking of this and looking on his daughter, his affectionate breast would heave with emotion, and the tears would rush to his eyes.

“Anne,” he would say, “what will I do, or what will become of me when you're gone? who will be here to take care of me? No hand but that of the stranger will be about me. I'll miss your voice, my darlin' child, and I'll miss your step, and I'll go to bed wid a lonely heart, and rise in the mornin' wid a heavy one."

"Indeed, father dear, it's not my wish to leave you, and I have repeatedly urged Tom to give up all notion of building on his farm, and live here with us. For your sake I wish he would do it, for indeed it will be a sore trial to my heart to leave you in such a solitary state."

"Why," replied the miller, "I might pass the day well enough among the pleasantries of the neighbours that attend the mill, but it's at night when I come in that I'll feel what it is not to have you before me."

"Well, but as we cannot get Tom to comply," she said, "sure you ought to reflect that I will be almost your next neighbour; wout we see each other nearly every day. Wouldn't it be a different case if I were to go to America with him, or to die, for instance. Come, dear father, keep up your spirits, and don't fret; sure, after all, I can scarcely be said to leave you."

In this manner she would soothe and comfort the good man, until she succeeded, to a certain extent, in reconciling him to a separation from her.

We have said that the expected marriage between her and Cavanagh was hailed with universal satisfaction, if we make allowance for one exception—perhaps two. There lived in the neighbourhood, about three miles from them towards the north, a family consisting only of two brothers, both unmarried, and supposed to possess considerable wealth as farmers. The elder of those brothers, a man of about thirty-five, had been firmly, but with great civility, rejected as a suitor by Miss Kennedy. He was, however, a respectable man, well conducted, and exceedingly civil and obliging to his neighbours, by whom both he and his brother were extremely well liked and respected. Their names were Sullivan. Both brothers were powerful men, and the attachment which the elder, whose name was Michael, bore to the younger, seemed to resemble the affection which an indulgent father feels for a well-beloved son, rather than that which usually subsists between brother and brother. James, in fact, was Michael's idol, and nothing recommended them so much to the good-will and esteem of the neighbourhood, as the warm affection which they were known to bear each other. Michael though civil, was firm, if not obstinate in his usual intercourse with the people around him, but with his brother James, he was a piece of softened wax, ready to receive whatsoever impression the young man wished to make upon him. He had, however, two faults; he was vindictive, and loved money, neither of which propensities were in general known to his acquaintances; for in truth he was one of those men who contrive to veil their feelings from the world. In other words, he was much of a hypocrite, and assumed the appearance of many good qualities, which he most certainly did not possess. So far, however, he imposed upon his neighbours with complete success, and the affection which he sincerely bore his brother, rendered him, in their ignorance of his real character, extremely popular among his acquaintances. He and James managed a large farm, and had consequently a numerous establishment, both male and female. Among the former, were three house-servants from Tipperary, who had been living with them for more than twelve months, but about whom the two brothers thought they could discover an appearance of mystery. It was evident, for instance, that the men in question had assumed fictitious names, because it sometimes happened that they forgot to address each other by those under which they had appeared in the neighbourhood. The inference naturally drawn from this by the two brothers was, that the men in question had been concerned in some of those desperate and criminal outrages, which were then peculiar to that unhappy county, and that they were, in fact, obliged to fly from the hue and cry of justice.

In the meantime the rumour of Anne Kennedy's approaching marriage with young Cavanagh was in every body's mouth, and it sometimes happened that Michael Sullivan was bantered upon his want of success with her, as one of her admirers. This, however, was a liberty which at heart he did not relish; he was too cautious and politic, however, to allow any person except his brother to discover the secret impression which his rejection by Miss Kennedy had left upon his mind. To James he was less reserved, and one evening as they sat together in the parlour over a tumbler of punch, he addressed him as follows:—

"James," said he, "I fear this match between young Cavanagh and Anne Kennedy is likely to go on."

"You fear it, Michael," replied the other; "where's the use of fearing it? don't you know it well?"

"No," replied Michael; "I know no such thing; I have been thinking over it a good deal."

"And what have you been thinking?" said James; "in my opinion the less you think of it, the better. I never thought a man of your turn of mind could be so much in love."

"In love! you don't know me, boy, and yet I was a good deal in love wid the girl herself; but not so much as to prevent me from marrying any other girl, although maybe not half so handsome, if I got a better fortune with her. I liked the girl, for she's very purty, but I liked her fortune a great deal better, and to tell you the truth, James, it's the fortune I am sorry for. There's another thing, too, that I may as well mention. I hate Cavanagh as I do the flames of perdition, because he has stepped in between me and the money. I remember the time, and it's not long since, when after hintin my wishes to her father, he gave me a kind of encouragement. Cavanagh, however, had not then spoken to his daughter, but he did soon, and that put my nose out o' joint. Well, I say, I have been thinking over it, and do you know that I have a great notion of puttin his nose out o' joint."

"Ay, but how will you do it?" asked his brother, "I can't see exactly how that is to be managed. The girl dotes on him, and upon my conscience, I don't much wonder at it, for a handsomer and finer young fellow isn't in the barony."

"That's just one of the reasons why I don't like him," replied Michael—"but still, handsome as he is, I think his nose could be put out o' joint."

"Ah, but how, man? Don't keep beatin' about the bush, Michael—let us know how, I say."

"What if we took her off to the mountains? and then——"

"And then you get yourself hanged or transported."

"I didn't much care, provided I prevented the marriage."

"Michael," replied his brother, startled, "I didn't think you were such a man—put this nonsense out o' your head—you can get wives enough; there's as good fish in the sea as ever was caught."

"It could be done," proceeded Michael, "without any difficulty. Their house is in a lonely place, and nobody sleeps in it but her father, herself, and the servant-girl. The two men-servants that mind the farm sleep in the mill."

"I know they do—but in the name of goodness put the thing out o' your head, Michael. What good will it do you to prevent a decent young man and a purty girl that loves one another from bein' happy? If Anne refused you, why, she refused you civilly, and said she was obliged to you for the good opinion you had of her, but that you couldn't expect she would marry you when she was engaged to another that she loved, and with her father's consent too."

"Well, no matter," said Michael, "I am thinkin' of it—and I will think of it ; but we will talk more about it soon. I'm not a man that's apt to give up a thing that I once fasten my mind and heart upon."

O'Keefe, in one of his farces, makes two servants who had been each forty years in the same family, when discussing a tankard of ale, drink "to their better acquaintance"—a piece of civility which discloses a closer knowledge of life and character than one might be apt at first sight to imagine. James Sullivan, for instance, had known his brother since he himself was a child, but never until this occasion suspected for a moment that his character contained anything so deadly and implacably vindictive. Michael, perceiving at once that the project of vengeance over which he was brooding stood no chance of encouragement from him, resolved to lay his plans in secret and without his knowledge, and by no means to take him into partnership until the plot should be ripe for execution, when he calculated that the reluctance of the other to participate in it would be too late, and that he could secure his co-operation by a coup de main. He accordingly contrived, one evening during his brother's absence at a neighbouring fair, to occasion the three Tipperary servants to drop in one by one, so as to exclude all notion of premeditated design. When they were assembled, and after some chat, he went to a cupboard and produced a bottle of spirits and drinking-glasses, after which, with great skill he opened the subject, and conducted it in such a manner as to cause the conception and proposal of the enterprise to proceed from them.

"Well, boys," said he, "how do you like your liquor?"

"Ah ha!" said one of them, winking with a knowing air,— "the cow was worth feeding that gave that drop—pale in the face and clear as crystal, begorra!"

"It's from the same *ruazin that young Tom Cavanagh got his wedding whiskey from," said Sullivan—"the pure bog and barley, and no doubt of it—here's his health, and a happy marriage to him!"

"And here's wishin' him the same?" they replied—but added one of them, a stout, dark, beetle-browed fellow named Houlaghan—"it's very ginorous in you, Mither Sullivan, to driuk his health, by all accounts—that is, if it's true that he tack Miss Kennedy from you."

"I'd never believe a word of it," replied another, named Aherne; "I'll go bail if the mather wished to have her, it wasn't Tom Cavanagh nor any one else that was to prevent him."

"He did prevent me, then," replied Sullivan, "and I as good as had her father's consent. Faith, boys, he did so."

"It wasn't he but herself that did it," observed Aherne; "and the blame's more her's than his—and I hope she'll live to repent it, that's the best I wish her, the thief. Peery Hannigan, what do you say?" he added, turning to the third, who had not yet spoken—"what'ud you do, Peery, if your sweetheart was taken from you before the world?"

"Faix, its more than I know," replied Peery, who was a short active fellow, with a rather good-looking face, but a wild and bitter eye. "I think I could guess, though."

"Tut, never mind, boys; it doesn't signify—take off your liquor. To the ould boy I pitch both o' them. It wasn't to talk about them I brought you into the parlour here; seein' that I had the three o' ye together in the kitchen I thought I'd just give ye a taste o' the new poteen to know how you liked it. Do you brew as good as that in Tipperary?"

"Ay, as good, sir," replied Aherne; "but sorra a dhrop better. That's prime stuff any how—God bless it!"

During these few words Hannigan kept his fiery but piercing eye fixed upon Sullivan with a steady and penetrating gaze that seemed to read the very soul and purpose within him.

"Mather," said he, "you're not aisy at this marriage; and indeed that is no wondher—to see such a purty girl, ay, and so rich a girl, whipped like a ripe pear out o' your mouth. Faith, I know how we'd prevent that in Tipperary."

"Why," said Sullivan, with a grim laugh, "how would you prevent it in Tipperary? But come, boys, take off your liquor, I say. You're wrong, however, Peery; I don't care a curse whether they're married or not—why should I?"

"At any rate, there are hedges enough in the neighbourhood," replied Hannigan, not exactly addressing himself to Sullivan, but rather looking into the table—"Ay, and plenty o' them upon his own farm too."

"Come, come, Peery," replied Sullivan, "none of your Tipperary justice for me. The girl preferred him, and you know she had a right to do so!"

"She had," observed Aherne; "but still—oh, no, Peery—no hedge work; but, if I was in the mather's coat, devil a ring ever I'd allow her to put on him—no, no, there has been enough of blood-shed—hem—in the counthry—enough, and too much—but still, I say, the mather, if he had spunk, might secure her, or, at all events, prevent the marriage."

"Come, boys," said Sullivan, "dang it, take your drink while it's before you, and don't be afraid that there's not plenty where that was;" he accordingly made them fill their glasses once more.

"Boys," said he, laughing again, "I see you're on for some fun—but, upon my word, I'm not; at least I'd have no blood-shed—no hedge firing."

"Neither would I," said Houlaghan; "still it wouldn't be a bad joke to prevent the marriage for all that. He has the laugh against you now, and I think it would be only fair that you should have it against him in your turn."

"Why, as far as a laugh goes," replied Sullivan, with a great deal of good humour, "if we could have that against him I didn't care."

"Faith, and I see nothing to prevent it," replied Hannigan; "it's as easy as blowing your breath."

"Well," said Sullivan, "if it was only for the joke's sake, Peery, let us hear your opinion; sure we may as well amuse ourselves wid that subject as any other. How could I have the laugh against Cavanagh, for, in troth, if it could be done in a harmless way, and as a good piece of fun, I'd like it?"

"Why, to walk up wid the girl one o' these nights into the mountains. Here are three of us, wid yourself and Mither James, all stout men, and who's to defend her? Why, no one but her father? Troth you might as easily take away a child."

"They'd know us," observed Sullivan, "and that would play the devil."

"Lave the disguises to me," replied Hannigan, "and if you wish to keep ont o' the clutches of the law, why, hould her a couple o' days and nights in a place that I'll show you—trate her well, don't spake an offensive word to her, and afterwards lave her safely widin a short distance of her father's house, and after that let me see the Irishman that 'ud marry her."

Sullivan knew the force and influence of this prejudice among the Irish people as well as Hannigan did, and it struck him as an excellent way of throwing such a blight upon the innocent and beautiful girl's character, as nothing but death itself could remove.

"Well, sure enough," said he, "that 'ud be doin' the girl no harm; but I'm afeared my brother James wouldn't come into it."

"Lave that to me," replied Hannigan; "if I don't soften him down, there's no heather on Slievenamon—that's all I say."

"In that case, then," observed Sullivan, "we'll let the subject rest till we hear how he'll take it, because if he sets his face against it we wont go on wid it, let what will may happen; come now, we'll finish this bottle, and when we talk over the business again we'll have another."

A CHAT CONCERNING OYSTERS.

ARE we presume to remind our readers that oysters are not considered in due season during the four months of the year from which the canine letter, as it is called, is absent—in other words, in May, June, July, and August? As the present month, then, inaugurates the career of the ILLUSTRATED DUBLIN JOURNAL, as well as the annual term during which these delicious and notable bivalves will be transported from their "beds" on the "Red Bank" of Clare, and the coasts of Howth, Malahide, and Wexford, to be "tucked in" by and what the appetites of the worthy citizens of the metropolis of the "Green Isle," a little of the varied and curious literary gossip connected with them will not be without attraction. On the natural history of this grateful crustacean it is not our purpose to descant, the phases of an individual oyster, from the moment of its earliest embryo life, independent of maternal ties, to the consummation of its destiny, when the knife of fate shall sever its muscular chorda, and doom it to entombment in a living sepulchre, having been repeatedly illustrated by the pens of some of the most eminent litterateurs. We may say, however, that if an oyster is examined through a microscope, it will be found that its shells are peopled with an innumerable swarm of animals. The liquid contained within them is also alive with a multitude of embryos, covered with transparent scales, and so diminutive that one hundred and twenty of them, placed side by side, would not make an inch in breadth. They likewise contain a great variety of animalcules, five hundred times less in size, which emit a phosphoric light.

The poet Gray has sung, that he must have been a daring person who first swallowed an oyster:—

"The man had sure a palate cover'd o'er
With steel or brass, that on the rocky shore
First op'd the oozy oyster's pearly coat,
And risked the living morsel down his throat."

There is a mediæval and rather apocryphal legend to the effect that, "once upon a time," a man—his name and nationality unfortunately have not been handed down to an admiring posterity—was rambling by the sea-shore, and picked up one of these fish, just when it was in the act of yawning at the monotonous tenor of its existence. Struck with the remarkable contrast between the polished internal surface and the rough, unprepossessing external, and being of an inquisitive turn of mind, he inserted a finger between the shells, which immediately imprisoned the intruder as in a vice. At the expense of sundry contusions and abrasions, he at length succeeded in extricating the digit, and, as any of us would have been tempted to do upon a similar occasion, put it in his mouth. Oyster juice was thus, for the first time, brought in contact with the human palate. The deliciousness of the flavour at once assuaged the poignant feelings of the experimentalist, and convinced him that he had made an important discovery. Then and there he feasted to repletion on the novel and tempting fare, and from that day to this oyster-eating has been a universal fashion, appealing with equally pleasurable results to the appetites of king, philosopher, statesman, warrior, and "black-diamond."

According to Pliny, Sergius Orata was the first to conceive and practically form oyster beds. He made extensive reservoirs at Baie, in which he deposited innumerable thousands of these shell-fish. The same distinguished philosopher further enlightens us on the social habits of oysters. He gravely assures us that they have a king, and that their form of government is somewhat of a patriarchal monarchy. In his day, the diver made it his first business to catch the royal oyster, after which the others were entrapped without difficulty, just the same way in which a swarm of bees may be secured when the queen is captured. On this subject Southey, in the "Doctor," remarks: "Seeing, however, that his oyster majesty is not to be heard of now at any of the oyster-shops in London, nor known at Colchester or Milton, it may be that liberal opinions have, in the march of intellect, extended to the race of oysters; and that republicanism prevails at this day throughout all oysterdom, or at least in those parts of it which lie near the British shores." Seneca informs us that he was accustomed to eat some hundreds of oysters weekly, and thus apostrophises them: "Oyster, dear to gourmand, which excites instead of satiating the appetite; which never causes illness, even when eaten to excess, so easy art thou of digestion!" We find it mentioned in the annals of Roman gastronomy, that some of the most celebrated Romans could consume at a single meal hundreds of oysters. The Roman ladies in particular, were so partial to oysters that they ate them to an extent one is amazed there is no record of any of them having died from sheer repletion. If the sex now-a-days were similarly epicurean and insatiable, how ecstatic would be the feelings of Burton Rindon! Callisthenes, the philosopher, a disciple of Aristotle, and the companion of Alexander the Great in his expedition to Persia, was a devoted worshipper at the shrine of oysterdom. It is related that it was after an oyster supper he delivered the offensive speech to his royal master—who, by the way, regarded the world as his oyster, to be opened in much the same fashion in which he dismembered the Gordian knot,—which induced the latter to put him to death. The Roman tyrant, Caligula, was also passionately fond of this fish. Horace held the belief that the "increasing moon plumps up the slippery oyster"—"lubrica nascentes implent conchyli luncs"—an opinion also shared by the facetious Melton, who says: "By the increase and decrease of the moone, some creatures are augmented and diminished, as oysters and other shell-fish." Oysters were also anciently much esteemed for their medicinal virtues. Hippocrates highly extols them, and Crato and Zeno, two medical authors who flourished in the time of Plutarch, commend them above all other kinds of fish to their patients, as having less acidity, and more nutritious particles. They add: "Some oysters are better than others, their relative goodness depending upon the locality where they are bred." Geropius, who wrote on the "Loves of the Fishes," maintained, and by actual experiment proved his point, that oysters are susceptible of the tender passion; and the writer attributes to them still more marvellous qualities, since he affirms that they can distinguish sounds, and have a positive musical ear!

Peter the Great was immoderately fond of oysters, and never sat down to a dinner at which they were not served up in two or three different modes. He was in the habit of calling oyster-dealers his "life-preservers." Napoleon I. also seems to have been exceedingly partial to these shell-fish. The night preceding the memorable battle of Austerlitz, he supped heartily of them. Cervantes, the author of "Don Quixote," wrote a very sarcastic drama on the oyster-mongers of Spain, although he was so partial to their wares that his enemies accused him of squandering all his substance in riotous feasts on them. An idiosyncrasy of the celebrated Erasmus was, that he was unable to bear the smell of oysters, or indeed of any shell-fish. Alexander Pope was proverbial for his love for stewed oysters; on one occasion he wrote to Lord Bolingbroke to say that he would, with pleasure, wait upon him at dinner if his lordship would indulge him with his favourite dish. Thomson, the author of the "Seasons" died at Richmond of a fever brought on by a surfeit of oysters, although some aver his malady was to be attributed to the effects of a sail in an open boat. Dr. Richard Bentley, the famous classical critic, was so fond of oysters that it is said he could never pass a place where they were exposed for sale without stopping and conversing about, if he could not then eat them. In one of his letters he says: "My great relief and amusement here is my regular supply of oysters. These things must have been made in heaven. They are delectable, satisfying, and mu-tally stimulating, in a high degree. I can indite matter by the yard when I have had a good meal of them. I get them done in all manner of ways, and it is difficult to say which is the best, such are the intrinsic excellencies of the raw material. I have, however, a secret relish for the scalloped fashion above every other." This was written in 1740; exactly two years before his death. A surfeit of oysters, however, does not agree with every constitution. Paracelsus was inordinately addicted to them, but he averred that when he confined himself to a moderate quantity, he beheld the most delectable visions, but an excess, on the contrary, showed him the entire host of the infernal regions.

There is an American story in connection with these exhilarating bivalves, which is too good to be lost. Not many years since there flourished in one of the southern cities of the American coast, a certain original, eccentric individual, whose sole occupation was the pursuit of the oyster trade, of course under difficulties. It was on a grand scale, and "Old Shell," as he was nicknamed, was a prime favourite with all the young bucks, roystering blades, and fast men about town. He was a passionate admirer of oysters in every shape. His food was almost exclusively oysters. He bet oysters. He studied oysters. In fine, he was emphatically an oyster-man. "Old Shell," one summer, took it into his head that a trip to the North would be of advantage to his health, moral and physical. To resolve to do anything, and to do it, were with him one and the same thing. He went. On arriving at New York, he put up at a fashionable hotel; and as he was a tall, fine-looking man, dressed well, and spent his money freely, he soon became almost as much a favourite in the North as he was in the South.

There was one thing about him, however, that puzzled every one. On the hotel book of arrivals his name was entered in full, with the following capital letters, in a large sprawling hand, attached—F.R.S. On his cards the same mysterious letters appeared. "Mr. So and So, of such a city, F.R.S." He never would explain their meaning, and great, of course, was the small-talk and chit-chat about it. The "gossip-market" rose above par in the course of three days.

One morning a newly-come English gentleman, of middle age and grave aspect, was looking over the list of arrivals. He was struck by the mysterious letters, as every one else had been.

"F.R.S.," muttered he; "it can't be! yet there the letters are! Who would have thought it?"

The clerk was called up, and requested to explain. He knew nothing more than that one of the boarders and lodgers had put his name down with that handle attached.

"Show him to me!" said the Englishman eagerly.

"There he goes now, sir," said the clerk, pointing to our hero.

The next moment "Old Shell" felt his hand grasped by another hand, whilst his arm went through a rapid and vigorous motion, familiarly known as the "pump-handle action." It was the Englishman, his face beaming with cordiality.

"Delighted to meet you, sir! Had not the slightest idea of seeing one of our Society on this side of the water! When were you a member? My memory is so defective——"

"Member of what?" said "Old Shell," half surprised, half angry.

"Oh, don't be so modest, my dear sir!"

"Modest! the deuce! What society?"

"No bashfulness now! You are a Fellow, I know."

"Dash my buttons, stranger!" exclaimed "Shell," thoroughly indignant; "do you call me a fellow?"

"Fellow of the Royal Society, sir. You mistake my meaning. Fellow of the Royal Society of London."

"I am no Londoner, man; I come from down South, I do. I am an oysterman, I am."

"Why, what on earth does F.R.S. mean, then, attached to your name?" said the astonished Englishman, science and surprise beaming from his countenance.

"Well, stranger, I don't care if I do tell you! You see I like oysters, I do; and F.R.S. means adzakly nothing more nor less than Fried, Roasted, and Stewed!"

In conclusion, recommending to the reader's attention a proverb, "don't blunt your razor with opening another man's oysters," the moral of which is obvious, we subjoin, for the benefit of such amateur oyster anatomists who find a difficulty in arriving at the succulent contents, a receipt "How to open an oyster." Take a feather and tickle the oyster on the shell until you have caused it to laugh, when you can insert a stick, or your toe, or finger, or anything to prevent its closing, until you can get a knife. This requires considerable dexterity, but it is considered a very neat way where it is practised.

NEEDLES AND NEEDLEWORK.

THAT tiny and delicate piece of polished steel yclept the needle, the importance of which, as an implement of feminine industry, is every day yielding to the magic influence of the sewing machine, was first manufactured in England in the year 1540, in the reign of Elizabeth. Little attention, however, appears to have been then paid to its introduction, and it was long before it came into general use. The manufacture was revived by a Mr. Greeing, who established himself at Long Hendon, in Buckinghamshire, in which town the factory is carried on by his descendants to this day—although now only one out of hundreds, especially in the neighbourhood of Birmingham and Sheffield. The process of manufacture is as follows:—The steel (German and Hungarian, is chiefly used, as being susceptible of the highest polish,) is first passed through a coal fire, and under a hammer, to convert its square form into a cylindrical one. After being drawn through a large hole of a wire-drawing iron, it is returned to the fire, and again passed through a second hole, smaller than the first, and so on from hole to hole, until it attains the degree of fineness necessary for the kind of needle for which it is intended; each time being greased with lard to render it more pliable. When reduced to this fine wire, it is cut into the lengths required, which lengths are flattened at one end, in order to make heads and eyes. Further softened by fire, they are then pierced at each extreme of the flat part, on an anvil, by force of a puncheon, of well-tempered steel, and laid on a block of lead, to bring out with another puncheon the particles of steel remaining in the eye. The corners are then rounded off, a little cavity filed on each side of the head, the point formed with a file, and the whole smoothed with the same instrument. They are then tempered, by being placed over a charcoal fire, and, when red hot, plunged into cold water, to harden them. This is a very delicate part of the process, since too much or too little heat is equally undesirable. When they are sufficiently tempered, they are laid on an iron shovel, on a fire more or less hot, according to the thickness of the needle, moved from time to time, and when thoroughly hot, straightened, one after another, with a hammer, the coldness of the water having, in many instances, twisted them. The needles are now formed, and the remaining process is the polishing. Twelve or fifteen thousand needles are arranged in little heaps, against each other, on a piece of new buckram, sprinkled with emery, which is also thrown over them, and sprinkled with oil of olives. The whole is finally made into a roll, well secured at each end. This roll is then laid on the polishing table; over it is placed a thick plank loaded with stones, which is worked backwards and forwards, incessantly, for a couple of days, by which means the needles are polished. In Germany this process is performed by water-mills, instead of manual labour. From the effects of this operation the needles are then cleansed with soap and water, and placed with hot bran, a little moistened, in a wooden box, suspended in the air with a cord, which is kept swinging until both bran and needles are dry. This is repeated with two or three different brans, the needles then examined to separate the perfect from those whose eyes or points have sustained injury; finally polished with an emery stone, turned by a wheel, sorted, and made up into packets. There is great mortality among the workmen employed in needle manufactories, in consequence of the minute particles of steel and dust which they are continually inhaling. These produce constitutional irritation, sure to terminate in pulmonary consumption, inasmuch, that persons engaged in this kind of work scarcely ever attain the age of forty years. Many attempts were made to purify the air, before its entry into the lungs, by gauze or linen guards; but the dust was too fine and penetrating to be obstructed by such coarse expedients, until—within the present year, we believe—some ingenious person, struck by the motions and arrangements of a few steel filings on a sheet of paper held over a magnet, introduced masks of magnetised steel, adapted to the faces of the workmen, by means of which the air is not only strained, but each obnoxious atom of steel is arrested in its progress.

So highly was the art of needle-work esteemed among the ancients, that the Greeks ascribed its invention to their favourite goddess, Minerva, patroness of the arts and sciences. The fair patri- cians of those days, in the absence of operas, concerts, horticultural fêtes, art-exhibitions, and illustrated or unillustrated journals, had little to occupy their time and attention save needlework, and hence we find that Homer constantly represents his heroines as engaged in this manner. Andromache, he tells us, employed the weary hours of Hector's absence in embroidering

"A splendid texture, wrought on either side,
All dazzling bright with flowers of various hues."

The completion of a piece of needlework for the shroud of Ulysses was deemed sufficient cause for a long delay, even by the impatient suitors of Penelope. The story of the deception she practised is too well known to be more than alluded to here. Each night, we are told, she unravelled the labours of the day,

"Unheard, unseen, three years her arts prevail;
The fourth, her maid unfolds the wondrous tale."

It was likewise the custom among the illustrious dames of those classical times to have a rich store of garments, embroidered by their own fair hands, in readiness for any emergency, or for gifts to distinguished visitors. When Telemachus leaves Menelaus, we find that

"His beauteous queen revolved with careful eyes
Her various textures, of unnumber'd dyes,
And chose the largest,"

as a gift to her departing guest. This kind of needlework was, how- ever, also practised among other nations, as we may gather from holy writ. It is a matter of uncertainty whether the garments of the priests were woven or embroidered, but we find Hannah, the mother of Samuel, taking him each year a little coat of her own work. Again, the mother of Sisera says to her maidens: "To Sisera, a prey of divers colours of needlework, of divers colours of needlework on both sides, fit for the necks of them that take the spoil." The middle ages were also celebrated for splendid embroi- dery and tapestry work, for which convents were admirable schools, and which, in those times, was much devoted to the use of the Church. Popes Leo III. and IV., and Pope Paschal, had magnifi- cent garments worked by the needle, for their personal use, and also various beautiful pieces of work, as ornaments for the Vatican, and the chapels at Rome. In addition to these ecclesiastical pieces of work, the ladies of those days were much occupied in the embroi- dery of banners, of green scarfs, and other garments worn by the most illustrious personages. The four daughters of Edward the Elder, though carefully educated in the literature of the age, were accomplished needlewomen; and (whether from that excellence we presume not to say) were eagerly sought in marriage by the most powerful princes of that era. The garments worn by Edward the Confessor, on state occasions, were embroidered by his queen, Elgitha. The renowned "Bayeux Tapestry" was worked by Ma- tilda of Flanders, Queen of William the Conqueror, and not, as thought by some, by the Empress Maud, daughter of Henry II. It represents the career of the unfortunate Harold, the last of the Saxon kings, and, apart from being a wonderful achievement in itself, is deeply interesting in a historical point of view. Commenc- ing with that interview with Edward the Confessor, in which he, with some difficulty, obtained permission for his ill-fated visit to Normandy, it next represents him entering a church to implore a blessing on his expedition. Then we find him at a banquet with his compagnons de voyage, on the eve of embarking. It proceeds to illustrate his embarkation, capture by Count Guy of Ponthieu; the embassy sent by William to demand his release, and, on that failing, the arrival of the Norman duke at the head of his troops. Then we are taken to Normandy, and see Harold swearing the fatal oath of fealty to William, and betrothment to his daughter—an oath made so much more tremendous by its being taken on a box, covered with a pall, containing (unknown to Harold) the bones of the saints and other holy relics. The scene then changes to England, where Harold finds Edward on his death-bed, and we have depicted his death and funeral, with the offer of the crown to Harold. After that comes the arrival of William in England, with the banquet given him on landing; the headlong mission of a knightly courier to Harold with the news; and, finally, the battle of Hastings, with the death of the last sceptred Saxon, who "foremost fighting fell."

All the figures in this chef-d'œuvres of embroidery are executed with singular power and strength of expression, though the fair semp- stresses show a noble indifference to nature in the colour of their horses, which are, from lack of choice, perhaps, indifferently blue, green, red, or yellow. It was worked on white cloth, and where the flesh is represented, a space was left by the needle; it is now preserved at Caen, in Normandy. Romances, lives of the saints, and various other subjects—some very beautiful, others very ab- surd—were commonly represented in tapestry during the Elizabethan era. At this time, also, most exquisite embroidery was profusely bestowed upon coverlets, as, indeed, upon every article of dress, handkerchiefs, bags, etc. Mary Queen of Scots amused her hours of captivity with works of tapestry, some of which are still shown at Hardwicke Hall. In Queen Anne's time the art appears to have fallen into disuse, if we may judge from the humorous remarks in the "Spectator;" who, after commenting on the idleness of the young damsels of that day, (would that he had lived in the pre- sent!) proposes the following rules to amend it:—

"1st—That no young virgin shall be allowed to receive the addresses of her first lover, but in a suit of her own embroidery.

"2nd—That before every fresh humble servant, she should appear in a fresh stomacher at least.

"3dly—It is suggested that no girls should be permitted to marry until they had exercised their needles in preparation for the advent of little stran- gers."

Much carpet and tapestry work, however, continued to be done by our ancestresses. Berlin patterns, and work properly so called, were not known till 1804, when the first pattern, on checked paper, was published by a printseller in Berlin. In the year 1810, Madame Wittich, wife of a printseller in the same city, and herself a famous needlewoman, urged her husband to engage in that branch of his business with more spirit; and since his time the number of Berlin patterns published, and of people engaged in colouring and prepar- ing them, is somewhat marvellous. They were first introduced into England and Ireland in 1831.

The sewing machine is, as we have already mentioned, rapidly superseding the works of the needle, and the fact must be hailed with unalloyed satisfaction, seeing that by inaugurating a new source of remunerative female industry, it will undoubtedly ulti- mately tend to ameliorate the moral and social conditions of the many thousands who heroically brave temptation in the naked gar- rets of our most flourishing cities, and

"With fingers weary and worn,
With eyelids heavy and red," in unwomanly rags and dreary poverty, ply their needles and thread. In this hope turn we, in conclusion, to a pleasant little picture drawn by William Allingham, one of the few true poets of whom Ireland can now boast, and whose only fault is that his graceful pencil is not more frequently employed. It is entitled the VENUS OF THE NEEDLE.

O Maryanne, you pretty girl,
Intent on silken labour,
Of sempstresses the pink and pearl,
Excuse a peeping neighbour!

Those eyes, for ever drooping, give
The long brown lashes rarely;
But violets in the shadows live—
For once unveil them fairly!

Hast thou not lent that flounce enough
Of looks so long and earnest?
Lo, here's more 'penetrable stuff,'
To which thou never turnest!

Ye graceful fingers, deftly sped!
How slender and how nimble!
O, might I wind their skeins of thread,
Or but pick up their thimble!

How blessed the youth whom love shall bring,
And happy stars embolden,
To change the dome into a ring,
The silver into golden!

Who'll steal some morning to her side,
To take her finger's measure,
While Maryanne pretends to chide,
And blushes deep with pleasure?

Who'll watch her sew her wedding-gown,
Well conscious that it is hers;
Who'll glean a tress, without a frown,
With those so ready scissors?

Who'll taste the ripenings of the south,
The fragrant and delicious—
Don't put the pins into your mouth,
O, Maryanne, my precious!

I almost wish it was my trust
To teach how shocking that is;
I wish I had not, as I must,
To quit this tempting lattice.

Sure aim takes Cupid, fluttering foe,
Across a street so narrow;
A thread of silk to string his bow,
A needle for his arrow!

GRA GAL MACHREE!

IRISH BALLAD.*

BY JAMES CASSIDY.

I.

My Mary dear, those ruby lips
That cover teeth of orient pearl,
Outvie the rose the wild bee sips
On summer's eve, my own dear girl!
Your modest brow, and mild, blue eyes
Would win a peer of high degree,
From courtly halls, with softest sighs
To worship you, Gra Gal Machree!

II.

If Adam in his Eden bowers,
'Mid peace and joy, was fain to grieve,
'Till heaven, to bless his lonely hours,
Presented him with mother Eve,—
O may not I, my Mary dear,
For praying heaven pardoned be,
To form for me an Eden here,
And grant me you, Gra Gal Machree!

III.

As well might infant's fragile arm
Attempt to stem the torrent's fall,
As well might man essay to harm
The sun that shines above us all.
As well might mortal chain the winds,
Or walk upon the rolling sea,
As break the hallowed spell that binds
My heart to you, Gra Gal Machree!

IV.

No prince am I, no lordly peer,
No spreading lands have I, 'tis true,
But had I worlds, my Mary dear,
Those worlds I'd freely give to you.
An honest heart's unchanging love
Is all that I can offer thee,
Accept it, and kind heaven above
Will bless us both—Gra Gal Machree!

The Illustrated Dublin Journal,

GREETING!

I.

GREET YOU KINDLY! Give you welcome,
Welcome as the flowers in May;
Some such word of kindly greeting,
Gladly we would hear to-day.
Gladly mark approval smiling—
Mantling o'er each reader's face;
As with youth's first flush upon us,
Take we thus our lowly place.

II.

GREET YOU KINDLY! Crowding round us,
Elders many a one we see;
From the conflict, young and fearful,
Half inclined to turn and flee.
What shall check us, but conviction
That we claim a sacred right,
Whilst to aid our kind advancing,
Arm we for the coming fight.

III.

GREET YOU KINDLY! Wand'ring faces
May perchance our advent hail,
And there may be cynic voices
To predict that we shall fail.
But the ancient proverb telleth,
"Nothing venture, nothing win;"
Then, with such a field before us,
What shall stay us entering in?

IV.

GREET YOU KINDLY! From our garner
Spread we out our varied store;
Art and science, fact and fiction,
Poesy and classic lore;
Food for every taste to feed on,
Solace for each weary hour,
With the heart's best wishes season'd,
With a willing hand we pour.

V.

GREET YOU KINDLY! Smile upon us,
Bid us kindly welcome here;
Smile upon and hail our advent,
'Twill our onward efforts cheer.
For as brother help'd by brother,
Hath a force that none may stay;
So, the smile of kind approval,
Hath a charm that none may say.

VI.

GREET YOU KINDLY! Arm we, brothers,
Strong and hearty to our toil;
Nought of discord, full of love all,
Pure, and racy of the soil.
Ours a field where all may labour,
Welcome warm for every friend,
And the aid of God to guide us
Surely to our common end.

GREET YOU KINDLY! Give you welcome,
Welcome as the flowers in May,
Many a welcome, doubt not, brothers,
Greeteth thus our op'ning day.

THE FAIR MAID OF KILLARNEY.

A TALE OF ROSS CASTLE.

THE exact date of the erection of Ross Castle has not been ascertained, but, from the peculiar style of the architecture, it may be ascribed to the close of the fourteenth or the early portion of the fifteenth centuries. It was for ages the ancestral residence of the Lords of the Lakes of Killarney, whose martial achievements are still the fertile source of many a popular local tradition. The castle consisted of a lofty square keep, with embattled parapets, based upon a rock of limestone. It was defended on the land side by a massive, unornamental buttress, while each corner of the portion directly facing the lake was enflanked by two machiolated defences; the domestic divisions of the fortress were attached to the square tower, and were surrounded by extensive outworks. The interior of the castle evidently contained many well-proportioned apartments, and a spiral stone cut staircase still exists, which leads to the summit of the tower, from which many beautiful views of the surrounding scenery may be obtained. Ross Castle was originally a place of great strength, and underwent numerous sieges, the principal of which was the celebrated attack upon it in 1652, by General Ludlow, at the head of the Parliamentary forces. Upon the defeat of the Irish troops, in that year, under Lord Muskerry, at the battle of Knocknecashy, in the county of Cork, by Lord Broghill, the English General, the former withdrew to Ross Castle, where he entrenched himself, and whither he was promptly followed by Ludlow. There was an ancient prophecy existing among the peasantry, that the castle was impregnable, and could never be taken until a vessel of war was seen to float upon the lake. Whether Ludlow had heard of the tradition does not appear, certain it is, however, that, considering the natural advantages of the place, and the length of time he might be compelled to remain before it, he resolved to attack it simultaneously by land and water. The English fleet was just then anchored in the Bay of Castlemaine, or Dingle, and, four days after arrival, with incredible energy and perseverance he successfully transported some of the smaller vessels, by mere manual labour, through a country nearly impassable from bogs and woods, and brought them up the intricate and difficult river Laune. The garrison was electrified and intimidated, and immediately capitulated on honourable terms.

Smith, in his "History of Kerry," relates that at the time he wrote there was an old man named Hopkins, then sexton of Swords, in the vicinity of Dublin, who was amongst those engaged in drawing Ludlow's vessels into the lake. This Ludlow is said to have lived to the patriarchal age of one hundred and fifteen years. At the commencement of the last century a barrack was erected in connection with Ross Castle, but has long been dismantled, and its walls are now as ivy-mantled as those of the castle itself. Immediately beneath the castle several fine echoes are very distinctly heard; amongst them the famous one of "Paddy Blake," who, when an inquiry is made after his health, is said to answer, "Pretty well, I thank ye!"

The warden of the castle, towards the termination of the war in 1652, was a distant relation of Sir Valentine Browne's—to whom the surrounding territory belonged, and who was then a minor—named Richard Browne, a captain in the confederate army. Captain Richard Browne had an only child, a daughter named Mabel, who lived with him in the castle. Mabel, at the time, was just verging into womanhood, and was a lovely girl, so beautiful, indeed, that she was called by the surrounding people of every degree, the "Fair Maid of Killarney." It will not be at all wondered at, therefore, that the young officers who commanded under her father in the garrison should have been smitten by her beauty. Foremost among those who paid her homage was a young man named Raymond Villiers, a lieutenant of musqueteers, and a descendant of a stout English settler who had come into that country about a century before.

Raymond Villiers was the possessor of a small, but good estate, lying upon the shore of the Main, a river that empties its waters into Dingle Bay. The veteran warden of the castle was well acquainted with the circumstances of the young lieutenant of musqueteers, and looked favourably upon his attentions to Mabel, but the latter persisted in receiving the homage of her suitor with no small amount of coldness, the reason of which will be understood presently. Thus matters stood between the young pair until the day of the battle of Knocknecashy, in which, as was seen above, the forces of Lord Muskerry were defeated by the troops of the Parliament, under Ludlow.

The sun of that disastrous day was setting beyond the wild mountains of Dingle, as Captain Browne was standing upon the battlements of the castle, taking a survey of the warders beneath as they walked to and fro, in their monotonous avocation, behind the breastworks of the massive bawn-wall beneath. After taking a quick survey of the sentinels below, he sat himself upon a small brass falconet, that commanded the draw-bridge, and mused silently for some moments.

"By my faith!" said he at last, "but I wish this war was ended, and my daughter married to young Raymond Villiers. I could then sit down quietly for the remainder of my days, and turn my thoughts to another world, which, alas, I have little time to think of in this time of foraying and slaying. Rory," continued he aloud, to a wiry little sunburnt boy, who usually attended him on his rounds, "go and tell Mistress Mabel that I am here, and that I want to speak to her for a few moments."

Rory disappeared in an instant down the winding stairway, and after a little time Mabel appeared, and sat down beside her father.

"Mabel," said the latter, looking affectionately upon his daughter, "I have been thinking that this wooing of Raymond Villiers has gone far enough, and that you ought to give him a favourable reply."

"I cannot tell, father," she answered, "why it is that you are so eager to get rid of me in these troublous times. As for myself, I would rather stay with you, and you know also very well that you cannot do without me."

"No matter," replied her father, "times are changing now. Mabel, I am growing old and infirm, and there is no knowing the day that I may fall in battle. If it should come to that, who will you have to protect you during the troubles?" and he looked earnestly into his daughter's face.

"Oh! as for that, father," answered Mabel, "I trust in God there is but little fear of it."

"I tell you, Mabel," rejoined he, "no matter how affairs go with me, it has come to this, that I have set my heart upon your marrying Raymond Villiers, and marry him you shall, for he is in every way worthy of you."

"I am sure he is," returned Mabel, "and deserving of a far better wife than I could make him, but—"

"What but?" interrupted her father, "that's the way you are always putting me off. I hope," he continued in a yet more energetic tone, "that you are not still thinking of that wild spendthrift, Donogh of Glenmourne!"

A bright blush overspread the features of Mabel Browne at the sound of that name. She looked upon her father reproachfully, her eyes all the while gradually filling with tears.

"If I am, father," she said mournfully, "I cannot help it now and then. You know there was once a time when you did not forbid me to do so. However," she continued with a sigh, "I will try to forget him since you wish it, but I cannot—I cannot give my heart to Raymond Villiers, because—"

"Because he is not worthy of it, I suppose you will say," said her father, somewhat bitterly. "But know, Mabel, that Donogh MacCarthy of Glenmourne is now landless, and has nought save his sword to depend on, and, by our Lady! but that's but a weak prop to depend on in these dangerous times!"

"I know it," returned Mabel, her eyes brightening as she thought of her absent lover, "I know that he was robbed of his estate by Cromwell, but that is no reason why I should play him false!"

"I guessed that was the answer you would make," said her father, "but notwithstanding, you must wed and that soon with Raymond Villiers—ha! what is that I see? Look, Mabel, look! I trust in God, whoever it is, that he brings us good news!" And he pointed towards a slope at the eastern side of the castle, down which a horseman was riding towards them in furious haste.

"There must have been a battle fought," exclaimed Mabel, looking eagerly upon the approaching courier as he still rode on, his helmet and trappings glittering in the red beams of the setting sun. "See! he is facing directly for the draw-bridge—my God! it is Donogh of Glenmourne!"

"I know him now," said her father, "Look at his horse all covered with foam and mire. Look at his plume shorn off, and the sad plight he is in. He is the bearer of bad news!" and with that the old veteran left his seat upon the cannon, and hurried down the stair, followed by his daughter.

With a hasty step he strode to the draw-bridge, which by his orders was immediately let down to give ingress to Donogh of Glenmourne, who in a few moments afterwards rode inwards, and dismounted in the courtyard, where he was soon surrounded by an eager throng, all burning to hear the news with which he was sent thither. The tidings he brought were sorrowful enough, and shouts of anger and execrations deep and fierce were muttered by his hearers, as he told them how that morning Lord Muskerry was vanquished in the battle of Knocknicalashy. After giving this disagreeable bit of information with a soldier's brevity, he followed the warden of the castle to a private room, in order to deliver some further instructions with which he had been charged by his general after the battle.

Donogh of Glenmourne was as good a specimen of the young Irish officer of the time as could well be seen. He was about twenty-five years of age, strikingly handsome, tall of stature, and had that bold, frank bearing that so well became his degree, which was that of a captain of cavalry.

About the noon of the following day Lord Muskerry arrived with his forces and a great prey of cattle which they had taken during their retreat from the bloody field of Knocknicalashy. The ramparts of Ross Castle were now crowded with men, and all was busy preparation for the expected siege. The outworks at the land side were strengthened, additional provisions were gathered hastily but abundantly in from the surrounding country, guns were placed commanding every available approach, and at length the castle seemed capable of holding out stoutly against the well-appointed forces of the enemy. Some of the broken Irish regiments were also encamped in the surrounding woods, so that General Ludlow, when he invested the castle with an army of about six thousand men, had a game to play as difficult as it was dangerous.

Matters were in this condition, when one evening the Fair Maid of Killarney stole up to the battlements of the castle in order to obtain a view of the hostile camp. Plainly enough it lay almost beneath her towards the east, the arms of its occupants all flashing and glittering in the sun, and the painted banners flaunting proudly in the evening breeze. As she stood gazing with curious eye upon that martial scene, she heard a light step behind her, and turning round beheld Raymond Villiers approaching from the stairway with a somewhat troubled look upon his dark and handsome features. He sat himself upon the battlement beside her, and for some time neither spoke.

"I have sought you, Mabel," he at length said, "for many reasons. This siege must soon be ended. You will see then why I am anxious to understand your sentiments towards me. I am here to decide my fate with regard to you, and thus I ask you, for the last time, will you become my wife?"

"Nay," ironically returned Mabel; "it would be indelicate of me to consent so hastily, seeing that the siege, as you say, is to come to so speedy a termination. So," she continued in the same tone, "I cannot grant your request!"

"I have dallied long enough," muttered Villiers, a frown in spite of himself darkening his features. "This is to be my final answer then I know the reason. He is here and you love him. But we will see to it—by the breath of my body but we will see to it!" and he stood up, and bowing coldly to Mabel, took his way down the stairway with a black and revengeful frown upon his swarthy brow.

Mabel Browne, with the sharpness of a woman, noticed the look, and partly guessed its meaning. Coupling it with his demeanour for a long time previous, from which she judged that he would think little of changing sides in the war, she determined for her own sake, and for the sake of the castle of which her father was warden, to watch his motions narrowly for the future. But for several days afterwards, during which the siege began to grow somewhat hotter, she saw nothing in the conduct of Raymond Villiers to confirm the secret suspicion she had formed of his fidelity to the Irish cause.

A week had now passed away. It was midnight. Beneath the black gloom that shrouded lake, and castle, and giant mountain, a tall figure, muffled in a long military cloak, glided along the rampart and thence down to the water's edge, and stepping cautiously into one of the three small boats that were moored beneath the shadow of the tower, took the oars and shoved it silently out into the lake. By and by another muffled figure stole silently beneath the rampart, and stepping into one of the remaining boats, put it off in a similar manner. The first boat glided noiselessly across the lake, and at last landed its occupant upon the shore, above which was situated the camp of the Parliamentarians. The second also followed stealthily in its wake, but stopping some distance from the shore, turned back again after a short time towards the castle. As it glided in beneath the shadows of the western tower, the figure which it bore left it and soon gained the court-yard unobserved. Stealing up a stairway of the castle, and entering a little chamber, the long cloak that muffled it was cast upon the floor, and the lovely face of the Fair Maid of Killarney was revealed in the light of a small taper that was burning upon the table near the fireplace.

"Whoever he is," she said, as she sat herself beside the table, "he is a traitor. But I will wait and watch."

Meanwhile let us follow Raymond Villiers, for he it was that had gone upon his dark midnight mission across the lake. After narrowly escaping being shot by the enemy, he contrived to make his purpose known, and was soon conducted into the presence of General Ludlow.

"What dost thou want?" said the stern Puritan general, in a surly tone at being awaked from his first slumber.

"You will never take Ross Castle by your present tactics," answered Villiers, "for the garrison is well manned, and they have abundance of provisions, besides the natural strength of the place. I am a lieutenant of musqueteers. If I succeed in gaining you a passage across the draw-bridge, or point out another method by which you can take the castle, will you give me the same rank in your army?"

"Gladly! gladly!" answered Ludlow, who knew but too well the strength of the garrison. "And now in case thou canst not betray the draw-bridge to us—obtain passage over it for us I mean—what is thine other method?"

"There is a prophecy regarding Ross Castle," answered Villiers, "which the majority of those who now defend the castle believe in with their hearts and souls, and which, when they see accomplished, I will stake my life they will yield the castle to you on the easiest terms. It is this, that Ross Castle can never be taken till the enemy sail in a fleet of ships upon the lake! Can you not accomplish the prophecy?"

"I think so!" answered the Puritan general, after a long pause, during which he sat thinking intently. "Ho, there!" continued he to the grim orderly who stood guard at the door of his tent. "Summon here scout-master-general Jones, and say that I want to consult with him on a most important matter!"

In a short time the scout-master-general made his appearance, and, after a brief consultation, undertook to procure and transport from Kinsale to Castlemaine Bay, and thence overland to the Parliamentary camp, the materials ready made of a fleet of heavy gun-boats with which they could attack the castle from the lake.

Two days passed away, during which Villiers found that there was but small chance of betraying the draw-bridge of the castle to the enemy. He therefore finally resolved to leave the place, and go over as secretly as he could to the hostile camp. It was then that about midnight, he contrived to procure a boat as before, and make his way across the lake. This time, however, Mabel Browne, who constantly watched his motions, and who now sat concealed beneath the dark shade of the wall, knew his features as he glided past, and followed him as she did the other night over the water. As he stepped upon the land, an unlucky splash of Mabel's ear caught his ear. He stood up, and peering outward through the darkness that overhung the water, caught sight of the boat, and the figure that sat therein, which he, of course, thought was that of a man. A fierce frown of vengeance contracted his dark brow, and drawing a long pistol from his belt, he fired at the indistinct figure. The next moment, a wild shriek of agony and terror rang over the dark lake, and Mabel Browne, with her arm broken between the elbow and shoulder, dropped like a wounded bird into the bottom of the boat. Fortunately a smart breeze was blowing at the time from the eastward, and floated the boat towards the opposite shore of the lake, else Mabel would have fallen into the ruthless hands of the Parliamentary soldiers.

The report of the pistol, and the wild shriek of Mabel, were followed by loud confusion in castle and hostile camp. Each side thought that the pistol-shot was a signal for an attack of some kind. Men hurried to and fro by rampart and trench. The cannon at both sides opened fire for a short interval, but at length all settled down quietly again, and the night passed away. Little did they know that night in the castle of Ross, of the terrible agony their warden's daughter endured beside the solitary shore of the lake to which the boat was driven by the breeze.

The dawn was faintly tinging the eastern sky, when the Fair Maid of Killarney awoke from one of the long swoons into which she had fallen, after receiving the treacherous shot of Raymond Villiers. She had now light, but scarcely sense enough left, to look around her. Her arm was lying helplessly by her side; her dress and the bottom of the boat were all stained with blood, and as she endeavoured to move herself, so as to get a view of where she was, a sharp pang shot through the wounded limb, and with a faint scream of anguish she dropped back again into her former posture in the boat. Then the precipitous, forest-girded shore above her seemed to whirl in a wild and terrible dance before her eyes, and another swoon relieved her for a time from the torture of the wound.

When she next awoke to consciousness, it was with a cooling and somewhat pleasant sensation. She opened her eyes, and the first object they fell upon, was the welcome and pitying face of Donogh of Glenmourne. He was standing over her in the little boat, washing the blood from her neck and arm, and sprinkling the cool water gently over her face. All was soon explained. Donogh, who commanded a party of horse amid the wood, was returning from a reconnoitering excursion by the shore, and thus found her whom he little expected to see in such a woeful state, that breezeless summer morning. When she told him, as well as her weakness would permit her, of the treachery of Raymond Villiers, and how it was from his murderous shot she had received her wound, Donogh swore a stern oath that ere many days would elapse, he would avenge the deed, surely and suddenly, upon the head of his perjured rival. Before another hour was over, Mabel Browne, to the surprise and consternation of her stout old father, was lying in her little chamber in Ross castle, awaiting the coming of the surgeon who attended Lord Muskerry's army. Under the care of that scientific worthy, her fractured arm was bound up, and in a few days the fever that followed her mishap passed away, and she was pronounced out of danger.

Meanwhile the siege went on. The Parliamentary general pushed his approaches nearer and nearer to the castle, and the cannons and small arms at both sides rattled away most industriously every day from morning until night. About ten or a dozen days after the occurrence of the foregoing events, two horsemen might have been seen riding in wild haste over the mountains, and approaching the north-western shore of the lake. It was Donogh of Glenmourne, and one of the dragoons belonging to his troop. Leaving his horse to the care of his orderly, Donogh descended into a secret nook by the water-side, and was soon rowing a little boat he had taken therefrom across the lake to the castle of Ross. The news he brought was that scout-master-general Jones, with a skillful engineer named Chudleigh, was after landing in Castlemaine Bay with a vast quantity of timber ready hewn for large boats, and was now on his way across the country to the camp, escorted by a strong convoy of the Parliamentarians, horse and foot. After giving this news, he again crossed the lake, and soon joined his troop, with which he hovered upon the track of the approaching convoy. As the latter passed through a narrow defile, he fell upon it, sword in hand, with his men, and had a sharp skirmish. He was, however, finally repulsed, but not till he had the satisfaction of knocking with his own hand Raymond Villiers on the head, and thus ending the new career that gentleman of an easy conscience intended running under favour of parliament.

The convoy arrived safely at Ludlow's camp, and the boats under the superintendence of Chudleigh, of Kinsale, were soon put together and fit to be launched. One fine morning when the garrison of Ross awoke, they were not a little astonished to see a fleet of ships, or in other words large gun-boats, floating upon the lake, with cannon ready pointed at their bows, and colours flying jauntily overhead. All cried with one voice that the fatal prophecy was fulfilled, and that the castle could hold out no longer. Lord Muskerry, seeing the despondent spirit that pervaded his little army, demanded a parley with his enemy. The end of it was that, after a long debate, a capitulation was drawn up, and Lord Muskerry yielded the castle of Ross, on very honourable terms, however, to the Parliamentary general. This put an end to that terrible war which had devastated the country for so many years.

Immediately afterwards, Donogh Mac Carthy rode over the mountains with a score of his bold horsemen, and dispossessed the puritan undertaker who held his house of Glenmourne. Some months after the yielding of the castle, he was made doubly happy by his marriage with the "fair maid of Killarney;" and with the light-hearted pair it is said that the stout old warden, Captain Richard Browne, lived afterwards for the rest of his days a life of jovial ease and contentment.

A RETROSPECT OF THE DUBLIN STAGE.

FROM all we have been able to glean the first place where plays were represented in Dublin was Hoggins-green, the present College-green, and afterwards at the Castle, during the Viceroyship of Lord Mountjoy, towards the close of the reign of Queen Elizabeth. There is no record of any established theatre in the Irish metropolis until the time of Charles I., 35, during the administration of the Earl of Strafford. The direction of John Ter of the Revels to his Werburgh-street, and until the commencement of the civil war, when it was the theatre of the Lords, or this we find no theatre until the year 1732, when it was built in Smockalley, now West Essex-street, on the site at present occupied by the Catholic Church of St. Michael and St. John. This edifice appears to have been very hastily constructed, and ten years afterwards, during the performance, the upper gallery of it fell, by which three of the audience were killed and many more severely hurt, an accident which prevented dramatic entertainments in Dublin for a considerable period; in fact, there is but scant account of the theatre from this time until after the accession of William III., when the Smock-alley building was re-opened under the management of Mr. Joseph Ashbury, who conducted it for thirty years, and during his lifetime was "Master of the Revels" to no less than five English sovereigns. During his leasehold, the celebrated Quin made his first appearance on the Dublin boards, in 1715. At his decease, in 1720, the management of the theatre devolved to his son-in-law, Mr. Thomas Elrington, one of whose descendants was Provost of Trinity College, and afterwards (in 1821) Bishop of Limerick. In the year 1727, a Madame Violante engaged an extensive building, formerly occupied by Lord Chief Justice Whitekel, in Fownes's-court, where Fownes's-street now stands, which she opened with a company of acrobats and ropedancers. After a time, these amusements ceased to attract, and she converted the building into a theatre, for the representation of plays and farces. Among other pieces performed here was the "Beggars' Opera," for the first time in Ireland, and in which, moreover, all the characters were sustained by children, the afterwards celebrated Peg Woffington (of whom more anon) playing "Polly Peachum." This still popular satiric opera was written, as most of our readers are probably aware, by Gay. It was first acted at Lincoln's Inn-fields, London, in the year 1727. The original representative of "Polly" was a Miss Lavinia Beswick, daughter of a lieutenant in the royal navy, after whose decease her mother married a Mr. Fenton, in consequence of which Miss Beswick thenceforward became known only by that name. Her unrivalled fascinations as an actress and a singer captivated the Duke of Bolton, who elevated her to the dignity of his duchess about the year 1750. Very different was the fate of the original "Captain Machoath," Mr. Thomas Walker, a man of rare talents, but who destroyed his constitution by continued dissipation, and died in Dublin, in very great distress, in 1744. We may here mention that Lavinia Beswick was not the only actress ennobled by marriage. Anastasia Robinson was married to Lord Peterborough, in 1735; the Earl of Derby espoused Elizabeth Farren; Louisa Brunton, in 1807, became Lady Mary Catherine Bolton (another "Polly Peachum"), in Thurlow, in 1813; Miss O'Neill married Sir W. Bee the Earls of Harrington and Essex, "for better for their titles to the Misses Foote and Stephens; Miss Mrs. Corbett) became Duchess of St. Alban's; and, Nisbett married Sir William Boothby, Bart.

From Fownes's-court Madame Violante removed to George's-lane (as George's-street was then called), and was immediately secured by some members of the theatre, who opened in opposition to Mr. Elrington's continue their rivalry for more than a few months. period, likewise, a Music Hall was erected in Crow-street, the management of Messrs. Griffith and Whyte, attained success. The Duke of Dorset, then Lord Lieutenant, was ably partial to the drama, and a munificent patron of it, so, indeed, that he frequently gave bi-weekly "command nights." Mr. Elrington, lessee of the Smock-alley Theatre, died in 1732, at a time when he had it in contemplation to erect another and more stately edifice, in Aungier-street. He was succeeded in the management by a sort of "limited liability" company, of which his brother was the principal. Under their directory, Smock-alley was renovated and decorated at a considerable outlay, and opened in the October of 1732. At this period it would appear that theatrical wardrobes were frequently repaired by presents from the nobility. In "Faulkner's Journal," of this date, we read the following paragraph:—"The Right Hon. Lord Mountcashel has made a present to some of our managers, of five suits of the finest laced and embroidered clothes that were ever seen on any stage;" and again:—"The fine clothes lately given by the Right Hon. Lord Viscount Mountcashel, were for the use of the whole company, and it is hoped our nobility and gentry will follow that noble and generous example." About this time Madame Violante let her booth in George's-street to a new company, who seem to have been so successful in their speculation that the Smock-alley managers became jealous, and, on application to the lord mayor, compelled them, on his authority, to close the booth. This exercise of municipal power was highly resented by the public, and occasioned the erection of a new theatre in Rainford-street, in the Liberties. Strange as the site may now appear, this locality at that time was inhabited by a very influential and wealthy class of citizens, in addition to which it was beyond the jurisdiction of the lord mayor, the company playing under a licence granted by the Earl of Meath. This was about the latter end of 1732, or early in 1733. We have already said that previous to the death of Mr. Elrington, lessee of the Smock-alley house, he had projected the building of a new theatre in Aungier-street. His decease retarded, but did not prevent the ultimate execution of the design. The first stone of the new building was laid, with great public pomp and ceremony, on May 8th, 1733, by the Right Hon. Richard Tighe, assisted by General Napper, William Tighe, Esq.; and the Hon. Sir Edward Lovett Pearce, Knt., Surveyor-General of Works in Ireland. During the remainder of this year three theatres were open in Dublin; Smock-alley, Rainford-street, and Madame Violante's booth in George's-lane, where plays, however, were only occasionally performed. In addition to these was the celebrated Tony Ashton's "Medley," in Patrick's-close. A new Music Hall was also erected this year in Crow-street, by a Mr. Johnson, on the ruins of which the "Theatre Royal" afterwards arose. The entertainments here were conducted by a Signor Arrigoni, a very celebrated Italian composer and violinist.

Such was the expedition employed in the erection of Aungier-street theatre that it was entirely completed in exactly ten months from the laying of the first stone, and was opened on March 19th, 1734, with Farquhar's comedy of "The Recruiting Officer," the Duke and Duchess of Dorset honouring the occasion with their presence. After this a lengthened rivalry commenced between this establishment and that in Rainford-street, which was attended by alternate successes. At last, however, just as both began to feel the ebb of popular favour, the proprietors of the old theatre in Smock-alley resolved once more to try their fortune. The old edifice was pulled down, and the first stone of a new theatre laid on May 19th, 1735, which, in less than seven months from that day, was finished and played in, having been opened on December 11th, with the comedy of "Love Makes a Man; or, the Fop's Fortune." The fortunes of the Rainford-street house had long been on the decline, account of its remote situation; and the contest now between Aungier-street and Smock-alley Theatres, the former its patent as a "Royal" establishment, while the latter a licence granted to Mr. Lewis Duval, the manager, action it was rebuilt, by the lord mayor. However, decline of the drama at this time in Dublin, that at the metropolitan season, the respective companies of attending the races at Mullingar, Carlow, Clonovon, November, 1737, both theatres were closed for six weeks. In June, 1739, the celebrated Mr. Quin, then at his fame, played several nights at Smock-alley, and houses. The ensuing winter brought Peg Woffington to the stage. This lady had for some years quitted Madame de la Motte, and been engaged at Aungier-street, where she danced the entr'acte ballets. On February 12th, 1736-7, she appeared as "Ophelia," in "Hamlet," being her first appearance in a speaking character on the stage.

The unprecedentedly severe winter of 1739-40 caused an entire cessation of all public amusements, the theatres remaining entirely closed for nearly three months. In June, 1741, the after-season of the Aungier-street theatre commenced with a brilliancy never before known in the Irish dramatic annals. This was the engagement of Mr. Quin and Mrs. Cibber, both then in the meridian of their eminence, and their exertions soon turned the scale in favour of the Aungier-street house. But Mr. Duval, the lessee of Smock-alley, was by no means idle. He secured the services of several eminent artists, amongst others Mr. Chetwood, who for upwards of twenty years had been prompter at Drury-lane, and to whose experience the Dublin stage was indebted for many improvements. Under his direction the "wings" were first moved simultaneously with the scenes, by means of a barrel underneath, an achievement which was publicly boasted of as a masterpiece of mechanism. In the winter of this year (1741) a new Music Hall was built in Fishamble-street, the first concert in which was given on October 2nd. Shortly after its erection Handel came over to Dublin, and his immortal oratorio of the "Messiah" was performed in it in the December following, Mrs. Cibber singing several of the songs. The extraordinary success of this lady and Quin, at Aungier-street, put Duval on his mettle, and Smock-alley, in turn, reigned triumphant. For his season he engaged Giffard, Peg Woffington, and David Garrick—"Little Davie," as he was familiarly called by Dr. Johnson. Such combined powers had never before graced the Irish stage. Though great had been Garrick's name, and much expected from him, yet his success was beyond all belief. In the role of "Richard III.," especially, the character in which he had first appeared in London, at a small theatre in Goodman's-fields, in 1741, he was without a peer. So crowded was the theatre each night during the summer months that an epidemic distemper, induced by the excessive heat, proved fatal to numbers, and was known as the "Garrick Fever." But, if this enterprise of Duval's raised the Dublin stage to a degree never known before, by a subsequent single stroke he equally debased it. This was by the engagement of a company of acrobats and rope-dancers, who after all had not sufficient merit to attract, but whose performances desecrated the boards which but a few months before had been trod by the first actors of the age. About this time Dr. Arne, so eminent for his musical abilities, visited Dublin, and, by the merits of his operatic troupe, succeeded in attracting large audiences to the Music Hall, in Fishamble-street. His services were afterwards secured for the Aungier-street theatre, where Milton's "Masque of Comus" was revived on January 10th, 1743, with considerable effect. Towards the close of the month the character of "Richard III." was attempted by a young gentleman amateur, at Smock-alley theatre, who succeeded in impersonating this difficult rôle beyond the most sanguine expectations of his friends. He subsequently undertook the part of "Mithridates," in Nathaniel Lee's tragedy of that name, in which he so amply confirmed public opinion, that he threw off all disguise, and was for the future announced as "Mr. Sheridan." The lessees of the rival theatres, at this time, were convinced by experience that for many years each had been playing a losing game, and concluded that it would be mutually advantageous to unite interests, and perform in Aungier-street theatre only. But this salutary expedient did not answer the end proposed. In amalgamating the companies it became necessary to reject many members, and these thinking themselves aggrieved, had the address to obtain the lease of Smock-alley from Duval, the principal proprietor, and to form an opposition. After his successful debut, Sheridan had not acceded to the terms offered him by the Aungier-street management, and espoused their cause; but so destitute of merit were they, that his utmost abilities were insufficient to support them, and he at length seceded, leaving Dublin for London, in January, 1744, to accept a capital engagement at Drury-lane. On his withdrawal the rivalry terminated for a time. Shortly after this, Mr. Barry made his debut, on the boards of the Aungier-street theatre. This gentleman was born at Skin-row, Dublin, in 1717, and was descended from a very good family, being a near relative of Barry, the last Lord Santry. The character of "Othello" was selected for his first appearance, and most admirably did he support it. Foote, the celebrated comedian, at this time first visited Dublin, and played in conjunction with Barry. In the meantime the members who had been excluded from the new company, unable to obtain Smock-alley a second time, hastily erected a little theatre in Capel-street, styling themselves the "City Company of Comedians," in which, having obtained the lord mayor's sanction, they opened, in January, 1744-5, with the play of the "Merchant of Venice." Towards the close of this winter the managers of the Aungier-street and Smock-alley houses, finding their affairs beyond their power to retrieve, as a dernier resort solicited Sheridan to return from London, and undertake the sole direction and management. To this request he acceded, and in May, played for a few nights in conjunction with Barry. Early the next season, in the October of 1744, he opened the theatrical campaign, at the Smock-alley Theatre, with such a company as Dublin had till then never beheld. Amongst the members were Miss Bellamy, an actress of extraordinary abilities, Garrick, and Barry. With such a galaxy of talent it is not to be wondered at that when the season terminated, in May, 1746, Sheridan found the result, both in fame and profit, to have infinitely exceeded his expectations, while, as far as the public were concerned, it was universally admitted to have been the most honourable and brilliant that had ever marked the Irish dramatic annals.

About this period the theatre was the scene of many outrages on the part of the students of Trinity College. One of the most remarkable of these affairs occurred during Sheridan's management, and although ultimately it proved of advantage to the interest of the drama, involved that gentleman for a time in much litigation. At the representation of the comedy of "Æsop," (written by Sir John Vanbrugh) on the evening of the 19th of January, 1746, a student of the university, named Kelly, entered the pit, much intoxicated, and climbing over the spikes of the orchestra, gained the stage, from whence he made his way to the green-room, where he addressed Mrs. Dyer, an actress of unblemished reputation, in such gross terms, that all the ladies of the company were compelled to retire to their dressing-rooms. Thither he pursued them, and on being refused admittance, made such a noise as completely disturbed the business of the stage. Miss Bellamy, to whom we have already adverted, played one of the principal characters in the piece, and was afraid to venture out until Sheridan had the offender removed and civilly re-conducted to the pit, where he seized a basket of oranges, and amused himself with pelting the performers. When the curtain finally fell, Kelly forced his way in at the stage-door, and up to the manager's dressing-room, where he used such opprobrious epithets, that Sheridan was naturally provoked to strike him several times. A few nights after Sheridan, being advertised for "Horatio" in the "Fair Penitent," at the particular request of his friends, did not attend the theatre that evening, in consequence of the threats of vengeance which had been uttered against him, but deputed Mr. Dyer, the husband of the lady who had been insulted, to acquaint the audience with the cause of his absence, and to apologise for him. This was no sooner done than Kelly, accompanied by about fifty of his associates, collegians and others, rose en masse in the pit, and making across the lights and through the orchestra upon the stage, proceeded directly to the green-room, and thence to all the dressing-rooms, in quest of Sheridan, to sacrifice him to their resentment. Not finding him, they thrust their swords through wardrobes and every place where he might be likely to be concealed, by way of feeling for him, as they facetiously called it, but finding their search to be in vain, they went off to his house in Dorset-street, from whence, however, they withdrew, upon discovering that the intended victim had provided for their reception. This transaction was on a Thursday night, and the next day it was the general topic of conversation throughout the city. Parties soon ran high, and while the dispute lasted (nearly a month,) there were as many pamphlets published as would make an octavo volume. In fact, the whole kingdom became involved in this quarrel; but while the manager was opposed by a large clique, chiefly of the students, who from a strong esprit de corps were always ready to avenge any real or fancied insult to a member of their body, and those who through family connection, or a spirit of reckless lawlessness, espoused their cause, he was supported by all persons of worth and honour, as well as by the laws. A noble spirit was raised and diffused throughout the city with great rapidity, and soon had an opportunity of being publicly and unmistakably evidenced. "Richard III." was announced for performance, and when Sheridan appeared in the leading character, he was greeted with loud cries of: "A submission, a submission, a submission, off, off, off!" met with counter demonstrations, and shouts of: "No submission, no submission, go on with the play." To do this amid the turmoil which ensued, and which baffles description, would have been simply impossible, but at this critical juncture the celebrated Charles Lucas, then well-known for his glorious struggles in the cause of liberty, rose up in the pit, and asserted the rights of the audience, and the freedom of the stage. He expressed his astonishment and detestation of men bringing their private quarrels with managers or players into the theatre, and such he apprehended the present case to be; but since the dispute was introduced, it must, like other disputes there, be determined by the majority. The actors, he observed, were the servants of the audience, and under their protection during the performance, to receive which they paid at the door, and he looked upon every insult or interruption given to them, in the discharge of their duty, as offered to the audience. He was heard with great respect, and rapturously applauded, and on a division, the numbers were so great against the rioters, that afraid of the consequences they suddenly left the theatre, and the performance of that evening proceeded in peace. However, scenes of a similar kind continued to be enacted, until at length the patience of the manager and the public was exhausted, and he then, with spirit and determination, proceeded legally against them. Such was the ascendancy of rank at this period, that every one thought it would be impossible that any jury could convict a gentleman for an assault upon a scoundrel player. In fact, a barrister in court sneeringly remarked that he had never seen a gentleman player. "Then, Sir," said Sheridan, "I hope you see one now!" The result disproved the general impression. Kelly, the ringleader, was found guilty of a violent assault, mulcted in a fine of £500, and to the surprise and dismay of his gentlemen associates, committed to Newgate.

In 1776, the first masquerade ball in Dublin was held at the Music Hall, in Fishamble-street, where likewise the first Irish State Lottery was drawn in 1780. The flooring of a room in this building gave way, during a public meeting, in 1782, by which some lives were lost, and many persons severely injured. The Irish Parliament passed an Act to regulate the Dublin Theatre Royal in 1788. Astley's Amphitheatre for the display of horsemanship, etc., was opened in 1789, in Peter-street, in the edifice now known as the Molyneux Asylum for Blind Females, to the service of which institution it was converted in 1815. In this year, also, the Catholic Church of Sts. Michael and John was erected on the site of the old Smock-alley theatre.

In here terminating our theatrical retrospect, we have not been influenced to do so through any paucity of materials. The annals of the Crow-street establishment, which was opened in 1758, are, however, too voluminous and interesting to be noticed in a hurried manner, and we therefore reserve them for a future paper, in the compilation of which we shall have frequent opportunities of referring to a work which, for its masterly scholarship, and genial gossiping style, has never been excelled by any emanation from the Irish press; we allude to Gilbert's "History of the City of Dublin." The present Theatre-Royal, in Hawkins-street, was erected by Samuel Beazley, Esq., in 1820, and the first performance took place on Thursday, January 18th, 1821, the pieces selected for the occasion being Shakspeare's "Comedy of Errors," and the farce of "The Sleep-walker." Previous to the commencement of the comedy an address from the pen of George Colman was delivered by Mr. Farren, then stage-manager, from which, as an historic outline of the site of the theatre, we quote the following lines:—

"Here once a market reared its busy head,
Where sheep, instead of tragic heroes, bled;
Bright cleavers formed a band to charm the ears,
Joints dangled in the place of chandeliers;
Stout butchers, stern as critics, had their day,
And cut up oxen, like a modern play—
Soon Science came; his steel the butcher drops,
Removes with awe the shambles and the shops,
And learning triumphed over mutton chops!"

Then in the School, by patriotism reared,
Arts, Agriculture, Chemistry appeared,
Botanic lore—and studies all too great
For our inferior powers to emulate;
No merit we in Agriculture claim—
To cultivate your favour is our aim—
Which gained, by learned chemists we are told
It turns by playhouse alchemy to gold;
While all the Botany we dare to boast,
Lies in those plants your breath may cherish most.

Again the scene was changed, by wisdom's rule;
Want's refuge then succeeded Learning's school;
No more in streets the shiv'ring beggar stood;
Vice found correction here, and faunne food;
Morality rejoiced at Sloth's defeat,
And Pity smil'd to see the hungry eat.

At length, and following these wretched elves,
Behold another race!—we mean ourselves,
Who, leaning to our predecessors' laws,
Now beg most heartily for your applause—
Beg you, brave Erin's sons, and Erin's fair,
To make your Nation's Theatre your care."

E. M. M.

A REAL GRIEVANCE.

I, THE writer of these lines, am, I think I may venture to say, a man of a decidedly contemplative turn of mind. Now, I know very well that, at first sight, this remark may appear very egotistical and perhaps even vain. But, dear reader, or, courteous reader, or whichever title may please you best, don't be in a hurry to jump at any such conclusion. "Siste paulisper," which in plain English means, wait awhile. I may be of a contemplative turn of mind. I don't deny that I am of a contemplative turn of mind; but then, you see, it is natural that I should be so. You will understand this better when I tell you that I am a single gentleman of a certain age. My friends say that I am considerably on the wrong side of thirty, but what do they know about it, I should very much like to know? I am not aware that the certificate of my birth is in the possession of any one of them, and I must say, that I consider some very free remarks which were made on the fact that six-and-twenty was given as my age in the late census, very uncalled for. My hair may be a little grey, I don't deny; and it may be a little thin on the top too; but is that any proof of their reckless assertions? Why, there is my friend Jones, and he declares that he is only four-and-twenty, and I know that he wears a wig; for he and I were taking a stroll in the Phoenix a few weeks ago, and two ladies of our acquaintance happening to pass at the moment, of course we both raised our hats. By some strange accident, Jones not only raised his hat, but also his beautiful head of hair too (curly black); and, although I promise you that his salute was of the shortest, and that he replaced his hat a good deal more quickly than he had removed it, still I had sufficient time to see that his skull was as bare as a deal board. I turned at once and became suddenly absorbed in the contemplation of the "overgrown milestone" which embellishes our beautiful park, and when I again addressed myself to Jones, it was with a smiling and unconscious face, as if I were totally ignorant of his unlucky accident. But, as I have said, I saw his skull, nevertheless, and I merely mention the fact here to show that because a man happens to be bald it does not necessarily follow that he is over thirty years of age.

But to return to my object, which is, to show how natural it is that I should be of a contemplative turn of mind. As I have already said, I am a single gentleman, of a certain age. (My friends say that I am a confirmed bachelor, but that is neither here nor there, only it is wonderful how one's friends will talk.) Being a single gentleman, as aforesaid, it is, perhaps, not very surprising that I am a literary character. My first essays in this line took the form of poetry, and for several years I was a regular contributor to the "Luminary," "Comet," and other publications. I must confess that this was before I got the few silver threads (you see I am rather poetical even yet) interwoven in my raven locks. My poetical efforts were decidedly unprofitable in a pecuniary point of view. The notices (I have them all in my scrap-book) which appeared in the various papers for which I wrote, spoke of me as "our gifted contributor," "our truly talented friend, whose gifted effusions shed a halo of glory around our columns," etc., etc. In fact, my modesty won't allow me to repeat half the compliments which were passed upon my effusions. I was very proud of them at the time, and, even yet, I am quite conscious that I wrote some very pretty things; but, at the same time, with that candour which is a distinguishing trait in my character, I am quite ready to admit that I was rather too much inclined to apostrophise "the silver orb of night," or, as Mr. Snagsby remarks, not to put too strong a point upon it, that I was rather "spoony." However, as I have said, this was before I had attained a "certain age," and before my few grey hairs had made their appearance. With their advent I am inclined to believe that a good deal of the poetry of my nature evaporated, for I remember, about that time, beginning to think that a few pounds in my pocket would be a good deal more profitable than the flattering notices (and I never wrote one of them myself) which were heaped upon me in the "Luminary" and the "Comet." At all events, I turned my attention and my efforts in another direction, which I have found much more profitable, and I think I may venture to say that my last book has made a considerable noise in the world. In fact, the other day, as I was taking a walk on the pier of a certain watering-place, where I happened to be staying for a few days, I heard one young lady pointing me out to another as the author of that "love of a book, ————"; and, although I passed on as if I had not heard the remark, it was but natural, you know, that I should feel somewhat flattered by it.

But, to come to the point once more. Being a literary man, I am, naturally enough, a contemplative man; for how could we write except we were great observers of men and manners; and I have in my possession at this moment, a letter which I have lately received from an eminent literary man, whom I never saw, declaring that my last book bears evidence of the most profound and sagacious observation. From all this it must follow plainly enough, to every unprejudiced mind, that when I commenced this paper, by remarking that I was a man of a decidedly contemplative turn of mind, I was neither guilty of egotism nor of vanity. I merely made the remark to show how it is that I have come to write upon the subject which stands at the head of this paper. I confess that I may have taken up a good deal of paper in proving this, but I do not see how, with due regard to my own character, I could have done so more concisely; and, if any one should be base enough to insinuate that because the literary gentlemen attached to this journal are remunerated at so much a page, I have therefore been "spinning it out," I have only to answer with the venerable Mrs. Gamp, so well known in the classic literature of our empire, that I "despise" all such base insinuations.

But, to come to the point now in good earnest. Being, as I have just shown, of a decidedly contemplative turn of mind, when I was a short time ago politely invited by the spirited conductors of this journal to contribute something or other to its pages, I determined to commit to paper some few ideas on a subject about which I have been thinking a good deal of late. You will understand that I allude to the subject of grievances.

I wonder very much whether every man and woman has his or her own peculiar grievance. I can't say yet, I am sorry to say, quite make up my mind on this point; and, consequently, I am not able to speak with so much precision as I could wish. I have never as yet, and my circle of acquaintance is somewhat extensive, been fortunate enough to meet with a person who did not say that he was labouring under some grievance or other. I am sure that I have plenty of them. But the point which I am not able to settle with satisfaction to myself is this, viz., whether every person who scolds and grumbles, and talks about his or her grievance, may be safely reckoned as labouring under the aforesaid misfortune. I have often heard it said that there are some people, and especially among the gentler sex, who could not live without they had a grievance; but I do not attach much importance to this observation. What I want to know is, whether every person must be supposed to be labouring under a real bonâ fide grievance or not?

For example, there is my friend Scroggins of the Inner Temple. Scroggins, you must know, is heir to a clear £2,000 a year; and, being a man of very quiet and retiring habits, he will, no doubt, be able to live very comfortably upon it. (I should be very glad to live upon a great deal less.) Scroggins is reading a course of law, to enable him, I suppose, hereafter to discharge efficiently the duty of a country magistrate; for I am sure that he never intends to practise at the bar. The present allowance of Scroggins is £800 a year, and being, as I have just said, a very steady and excellent young man, he lives very handsomely upon it. I believe that he does not owe a penny to any one. So far as my knowledge goes, he has not an anxiety in the world, except, perhaps, about his dinner; and yet, I never drop in to see the old fellow, and I do drop in pretty often about luncheon time, for he keeps an uncommonly good tap of claret, but he spends half the time we are together, grumbling about some fellow who lives in the chambers over his head, and who spends a considerable portion of each day playing the nigger melodies on a German flute. Scroggins declared to me solemnly, the very last time that ever I called, that the gentleman overhead had spent a full two hours that morning, in warbling on his flute that he was leaving in sorrow some lady of the name of Annie, to whom he seemed to be attached; and, grasping my hand, Scroggins pathetically declared that he could stand it no longer; and must leave his pleasant and commodious chambers. Of course, I inquired of Scroggins whether he had never made a representation of the nuisance to the gentleman overhead. "Often, my friend," answered Scroggins, "often, very often, have I sent up my servant with the most polite messages, to say that I was rather unwell, and should deem it a great favour if the gentleman would kindly discontinue for a little time his musical performances, but the only notice he has taken of my message has been immediately to strike up, 'There was an old nigger,' or 'Old Bob Ridley,' or some such objectionable air." And, even as Scroggins spoke, the gentleman upstairs, having taken a little breath, I suppose, recommenced his pathetic leave-taking of the lady of the name of Annie, and judging of the ceremony by his performance, I should imagine that it must have been a very melancholy piece of business. As the gentleman struck up, Scroggins squeezed my hand very hard, and looked unutterable things.

Now, what I want to know is this: viz., whether, all things considered, present and future, Scroggins may be fairly set down as having a grievance or not?

One of the latest cases which has come before me is that of my friend Jenkins, for I reserve my own peculiar grievances for a separate paper. The case of Jenkins has cost me a good deal of thought, and even yet I have not made my way clearly through it; I will state it as briefly as possible.

Jenkins and I are very old friends. In fact, we were at school together, and later on, we occupied the same lodgings for several years. Some time ago, the very day indeed when poor Jones had the sad accident in the Park with his head of hair, I was walking down Sackville-street after parting from Jones, when whom should I meet but my dear old friend, Jenkins. We shook hands very cordially, and immediately linked arm in arm. We don't often meet now-a-days, for I must tell you, that some time ago Jenkins took unto himself a helpmate, or better half, or whatever name you may wish to give the lady, and since that time the visits of Jenkins to his old haunts and his old friends have been, to use an expression which I am afraid has lost the charm of novelty, "like angel's visits, few and far between." As I have said, Jenkins greeted me very cordially, and at once insisted upon my accompanying him home to dine; and, as I really love poor old Jenkins, and as I had nothing but cold mutton at home, I very willingly consented. We chatted very pleasantly about old times until we reached Jenkins's house in — Square, (never mind the name.) A beautiful house, and everything in first-rate style. After a while, Jenkins left me in the drawing-room whilst he went to seek Mrs. J.; and here, I may remark, that I had dined with them several times soon after their marriage, but had found Mrs. J. so decidedly stiff and cold, that I had rather shirked a repetition of the ceremony. I have been told that, as a general rule, married ladies have a considerable antipathy to the bachelor friends of their husband's; and although I feel certain that Mrs. J. need not have entertained any such sentiment towards me, still I could not help feeling that some such prejudice did exist in the mind of Mrs. J. against me.

But to return to my story. Jenkins left me alone, and I heard him enter an adjoining room. The partition wall was very thin, and I soon heard voices which I recognized as those of Jenkins and his amiable and accomplished lady in very animated conversation. Although I give my word of honour that I did not listen, still, I could not help hearing disjointed words; and whilst what I heard from Jenkins, poor old fellow, was principally such expressions as, "own house"—"old friend"—"confounded shame"—I am bound to admit, that Mrs. J.'s exclamations were by no means of such a pleasant nature; and "dissipated fellows"—"cold mutton"—"I can't and I won't, won't, won't, won't," certainly occupied an unpleasant prominence in her share of the conversation. This went on for some time, and I was, naturally enough, becoming uneasy, when again hearing "I won't, I won't, no, that I won't," repeated so loudly that I thought Mrs. J. must be going off into hysterics, a door was hastily banged, and old Jenkins re-entered the drawing-room. He certainly did look very cross, as he muttered some excuse about Mrs. J.'s not being very well, and that he was afraid we should not be able to dine at his house, but must go to his club. Before leaving his house he rang the bell for a glass of wine, but the smart parlour maid soon returned to say, that Mrs. Jenkins could not find the keys; and Jenkins, springing to his feet, with something which, I am sorry to say, sounded very like an oath in his mouth, we started for the club.

Jenkins took the charge of the dinner upon himself, and I must say that an uncommonly good dinner it was. The wines were of the choicest description, and we had a very pleasant evening together, I admit. Of course, I several times reminded Jenkins that, as Mrs. J. was only poorly, he had better be looking homewards, but, indeed, he seemed to treat Mrs. J.'s indisposition very lightly, and we sat together till considerably after midnight; and, when at last we parted, at Jenkins' door, he was, I must say, in a considerably "elevated" state; and I can only hope that Mrs. J. was not sitting up for him, for Jenkins confidently informed me, as we shook hands on his steps, that he would stand no more nonsense. I ought, perhaps, to have called next morning to inquire after Mrs. J.'s health, but I dispensed with that ceremony, and have not seen that estimable lady since.

Now, this case of Jenkins set me thinking a good deal. I take it that Jenkins had a perfect right to ask an old friend home to dinner. I didn't object to cold mutton, especially if served with that best of all seasonings, a warm welcome, for I had nothing but cold mutton at home. Besides, how easy it would have been to have sent out to the butcher for a few chops, and the cold mutton, the chops served a la Française, and a tart from the confectioner's, would have made a very nice little dinner. Then, what right had Mrs. J. to object to me, or call me a dissipated fellow? I never borrowed money of Jenkins. I never took him to any place where it was not fit and proper for him to go. Dissipated fellow, indeed! why, I was never tipsy in my life. I don't deny that I may sometimes have been a little "elevated," but I was never taken home in a cab, or put to bed with my boots on. I pay all my bills, and attend my own place of worship regularly; and again I ask, and ask emphatically, why should Mrs. J. object to me, or class me amongst those whom she designates "dissipated fellows?" And, waxing eloquent on the theme, I demand to know what right had Mrs. J. say that she had lost the keys, and refuse to give Jenkins a glass of wine in his own house? Britons, married and single, I put it to you, whether Jenkins may be fairly held to be labouring under bona fide grievance or not?

On the other hand, however, I am perfectly aware that Mrs. J. under an impression that she can make out a very strong case in her own favour. Mrs. J. indignantly asks what right Jenkins has in bringing one of his dissipated friends (how she does harp upon the string, but I treat her insinuations with the silent contempt which they merit,) to dinner, without giving her due notice, and when there was nothing but cold mutton in the house; and, still more, what right had he to bounce out in such a fury, and go off to his club, and remain there until day light? Pretty conduct, indeed, for a married man, and the father of a family! And then, Mrs. J. begins to pout and cry, and declare that if it were not for her babies, she would go back to her father, that she would, and leave Jenkins to his dissipated friends, and then let him see how he would manage; and, perhaps when she was gone, perhaps when he had killed her with his vile conduct, he will understand her value better, and a great deal more to the same effect, a la Mrs. Caudle. And Mrs. Jenkins, unfeeling brute that he is, (the words are Mrs. J.'s, I beg to say,) only sneers and laughs, and says that he hopes he shall be able to understand her value then, as he does not see much prospect of doing so at an earlier period. And when Jenkins is off to his club again, and Mrs. J. and some of her intimate friends (and she never objects to their company) are at the tea table in the drawing-room, they comfort her with their declarations, that she is a poor dear, a poor martyr, and they only wish that Jenkins would treat them so, and they should like to see their husbands bringing a nasty fellows home to dinner without their permission, etc., etc., until, by the time they have finished their quantum of tea, Mrs. J. is perfectly convinced that she is a martyr, and that she is labouring under the burden of a very heavy grievance.

As I have already remarked, this case of poor Jenkins has occupied my thoughts a good deal, and I am trying to see my way through it philosophically, and with relation to the subject of grievance. What I want to settle is, whether the grievance in this case must be said to be on the side of Jenkins, or on the side of Mrs. J.; and whether either of them can be truly said to be labouring under the aforesaid infliction. My opinion stands very much in this way. I think that Jenkins ought not to have taken me home to dine without having been much more certain of Mrs. J.'s acquiescence in the step; and, so far, it appears to me, that Jenkins was wrong in spite of Mrs. J.'s friends and their declarations, I appeal to the confidence to the kindly matrons and mothers of this land, what, under the circumstances, and considering that Jenkins did take me home with him; it would not have been a great deal more becoming in Mrs. J. to have come down to the drawing-room, with a cheerful smile upon her face, and a hearty welcome for her husband's old friend. I shouldn't have cared about the cold mutton then—Jenkins wouldn't have gone off to his club, and stayed till two o'clock in the morning, and every thing would have been a great deal more satisfactory for all parties concerned.

My own opinion is, that neither Jenkins nor his wife can be said to be suffering under a real grievance, inasmuch as their annoyances arise from themselves, and are altogether unnecessary. But, as I have said, I have not quite made up my mind on the matter, and I throw out these ideas, that the readers of this journal may turn their thoughts to a subject so well worthy their attentive consideration.

My own grievances, and they are grievances and no mistake, shall form the subject of a future paper. INCOGNITO.

THE MILLER OF MOHILL.

A TALE IN THREE CHAPTERS.

BY WILLIAM CARLETON.

CHAP. II.—THE PLOT—A CHARACTER—THE ABDUCTION FOILED.

BY the time they had finished the bottle the three Tipperary boys were verging upon intoxication, not so much so, however, as that the drink they had taken deprived them of the use of their reason. When the conversation was concluded they retired to the barn, which was their usual sleeping-place. Having gone to bed

Hannigan, who was the soberest of the three, addressed them as follows:—

"That man," said he, "is bent on mischief. As I am a living sinner, I can read it in his face, but let him go on with it, I have my plans as well as he has; if he brings her to the mountains I know what'll happen. 'Twould be far safer to shoot Cavanagh from behind a hedge than to take away the girl. But then, again, if Cavanagh was to be shot he'd get us to do it, and maybe he would give us but a very triffin payment for it, for you both know he's a grub—very well—let him take away the girl, and sure enough we can and will help him to do so, and then when the prosecution comes, we can very easily turn king's evidence. We're not known here, and any way we go under false names, and then if anything of what you know comes against us we'll maybe be let down easy."

"We'll talk of it to-morrow," said Honlaghan; "let me alone now, I want to go sleep."

In a few minutes these three mysterious men were sunk into that dreamless and heavy torpor which intoxication so frequently superinduces upon guilt itself.

Michael Sullivan and his three confrères found the proposal of this atrocious outrage anything but acceptable to James Sullivan.

The boy's heart was full of a generous and humane spirit, and in the first instance, revolted at the cowardly guilt of such an act. His brother, however, possessed great influence over him, and in connection with the three servants, he left nothing undone to mitigate his hostility to the project. Every evening, or rather at a late hour at night, the bottle was produced and he was plied with liquor, and such plausible arguments as they could advance, until at length they found him beginning to give way. What, indeed, will not the influence of liquor and the corruption of evil communication ultimately effect in any mind, much less in one like his, which, though generous and affectionate, was never remarkable for firmness. The period appointed for the marriage of Miss Kennedy and Cavanagh was fast approaching; his dwelling house and out-offices were already built, and nothing remained but to furnish the former. At length, though with great reluctance, he acquiesced, and the plan was not only laid, but the very night of its execution appointed.

It is a well-known fact, that before the appointment of District Lunatic Asylums, there was in every parish a neglected being deprived of reason, called a fool, who went about from village to village, living and sleeping no one knew how or where. These creatures were frequently great drudges at work, but only when they could be induced to labour by hunger and the temptation of what is called a fogmeal, that is to say, such a complement of coarse victuals as would satisfy three healthy men even to repletion. In general, however, they were lazy, crafty, and though apparently negligent of every thing that occurred about them, yet often remarkable for considerable powers of observation and a prying curiosity of such families as harboured them on their rounds and treated them with kindness. Curiosity with respect to those, however, resulted simply from gratitude and a disposition to serve them in a practicable manner. Against those, however, who neglected them, or treated them with harshness or ridicule, they entertained a bitter and vindictive feeling, which often prompted them to watch such persons with all the vigilance and cunning of a spy or detective. Gratitude and revenge, in fact, were the predominant features of their character, and these they carried out to the utmost extent of their ability.

In this parish there was a fool of the class we have described named "Jemmy," but as to what his surname was nobody could tell, nor we believe was it ever known: at least when questioned on the subject he always declared that he was ignorant of it himself. He was a rough hairy tyke, bandy and broad-shouldered, and possessed, in fact, of the strength of two ordinary men. His weather-beaten features were of course remarkable for that vacant expression which is occasioned by the want of reflection and reason; his forehead was low but rather broad, and from his unsettled eye shot forth occasional glimpses of cunning, good-humour, or resentment as the case might be; but their expression lasted not long, for in a short time the wild, rambling, and unsettled look returned once more. Jemmy, however, was possessed of one bad quality by which such persons are not unusually characterized. He was a notorious thief, and stole every thing almost on which he could with safety lay his hands. He had been in the habit of lounging and skulking about the Mill of Mohill until his thievish pranks became so notorious that the honest miller found it necessary to get a horsewhip in order to correct him, which he would have done were it not for the interference of James Sullivan, who happened to be present at the time and saved him from a severe castigation.

"Begone, you lazy, thievish glutton," said the miller, shaking the whip at him; "by the contents of the gudgeon, if ever I catch you sneaking in or about this mill again, I'll throw you head foremost into the hopper, grind you into sparables, and nail my brogues wid you afterwards. Begone, you thief!"

Jemmy, though strong, was an arrant coward, but as vindictive as he was cowardly, and as secret as he was vindictive. In fact he never broke trust, however, with those who were kind to him when running of errands and messages; and as to his theft it was, after all, only a one-sided theft, for he was never known to steal unless from his enemies, that is to say, from those who treated him badly. James Sullivan, long before the day on which he saved him from the flogging, had been a kind of friend and patron to him; and if there existed an individual to whom Jemmy was attached more than another, it was he. His resentment, however, against the miller was black and bitter, and scarcely a day passed whilst in the neighbourhood that he did not brood over some project of revenge; but still he was kept aloof from his house and premises by his cowardice. Sullivan's kitchen, on the contrary, was always open to him, as was the barn, where he had a shake-down of straw, with sacks and a winnow-cloth to cover him whenever he wanted a bed. Indeed, from the day on which Kennedy banished him from the mill, he became almost domesticated with his protector, and took a peculiar fancy to work with the men, where he certainly displayed prodigious powers of labour.

One night about this time Michael Sullivan was returning from the wake of a relation, when he had on his way home occasion to pass the mill. The hour was about three o'clock in the morning, but our readers may judge of his surprise when he heard the mill hard at work, and perceived a strong smell of fire. He went to the door and found it locked, and, aware that some untoward, accident or some act of deliberate mischief had occurred, with ready presence of mind, he immediately let down the sluice and stopped the mill. His next course was to knock the miller up and inform him of what had happened, requesting him to dress and come out, for that he feared the wood works of the mill had caught fire, and that if he did not hurry the loss of the mill and all the property that was in it might be the consequence. In a few minutes the miller was dressed, and on perceiving Sullivan said:—

"Good God! how can this be?—Michael, don't the two boys sleep in the mill?"

"Not this night certainly," replied Sullivan, "for I left them both behind me at my cousin's wake. The mill door is locked too, and, if you have not the key, it may be a bad business."

"Thank God!" replied the miller, "I have another—the key of my own door opens the lock of the mill;" and as he spake he went into the house, and returned with the key. On entering, they found the boards which cover the outer circumference of the mill-stones partially ignited, but not so much as to occasion any serious apprehension. They were immediately removed and turned up, and, by the aid of sacks dipped in the mill-pond, the burning parts were extinguished.

"In the name of goodness!" exclaimed the miller, "who could have done this? Why, I didn't think I had an enemy in the world; but, thank God! and under Him, you, Michael Sullivan, all is safe. On thing is clear, and that is, that the mill couldn't have been set agoin' more than twenty-five minutes or half an hour at all events. But come in, man; we must have a glass or two on the head of it; for, upon my conscience, I wouldn't be a honest man if I did not drink your health for the service you done me this night."

"I would rather not to-night," replied Michael; "wouldn't be disturbin' the family?"

"Nonsense, man," replied the miller, "sure they can't be me disturbed than they are already; and besides, there's nobody be disturbed but Anne and the girl, and, dang my buttons, be here they come!"

Such was the fact. As he spoke his daughter and the servant maid entered in a state of great alarm, but on perceiving that no serious mischief had been done, Anne, after shaking hands with Sullivan, joined her father in asking him in to partake of some refreshment after their labour. They accordingly returned to the miller's house, where they had a glass or two of spirits and water, enlivened with a good deal of friendly conversation on both sides. The miller thanked Sullivan, and shook him by the hand again and again; and Sullivan on his part drank the health of his old sweetheart—for the father would not allow her to leave them—and "a happy marriage to her and Tom Cavanagh!"

"I once had some hopes myself," said he laughing, "but begad my nose was put out o' joint by a purtier man; but no matter Anne, when you and he are married, here's God bless and prosper you both!"

"Troth, Michael," replied her father, "and only that Tu Cavanagh came in the way, the sorra better son-in-law ever I'd ax than yourself; but what can we do man? these girls must have their way—'must follow their own figary,' as the song says."

"Well, indeed Michael," said Anne, "although I couldn't love you when my heart was set upon another, I must say that there's not a man in the parish I respect more highly, and ever will."

Whilst this conversation went on, Sullivan was making the strictest scrutiny into the relative position of the rooms in the house, and the strength and condition of the door and windows. Having satisfied himself upon those points, he shook hands with the worthy miller and his daughter, and having finished his tumbler, he kindly wished them good night.

The next morning at breakfast it was mentioned that Jemmy had been out in the course of the night, and that he kept chuckling to himself for a considerable time after he had returned and gone to bed, like a man who had performed some act that had very much gratified or amused himself. Upon being cross-questioned upon the subject of the mill by Michael Sullivan, he denied it stoutly in the first place, and upon being pressed still more home as to his guilt, he became silent and inscrutable. James, however, took him out to the barn and asked him privately why he set the mill agoing, to which he made no reply unless a significant wink of the eyes, and the utterance of peal after peal of wild and uncouth laughter could be termed such. That he was the individual who had set the mill to work, he admitted however, to James in the course of the day, and it would, indeed, have been well if the vindictive idiot had contented himself with that exploit.

In the meantime they had arrived within a fortnight of the intended marriage, and if the abduction were to be accomplished at all it was felt that the time had come when they should set about it. Hannigan undertook the conduct and management of the whole adventure, and in order that they might the more thoroughly disguise themselves, he induced them to adopt the midnight costume of the old Whiteboy system, which consisted in a shirt worn over their dress, with straw or a handkerchief tied round their hats, so as to conceal their faces. All these were accordingly adopted, and the night arrived on which they were to make the nefarious attempt.

Now, Frank Kennedy, the miller, was a man of considerable wealth, but at the same time, of very simple and primitive notions of business. He never thought for a moment of putting his money out to interest, or of vesting it in any way that might cause it to fructify day by day. On the contrary, he clung to the old and absurd custom of keeping it lying useless, both to himself and others, in a small painted deal chest in his bed-room. On the other hand, he kept himself well provided with arms, in order to its defence. A night never passed during the year on which he did not, before going to bed, put fresh priming in two cases of pistols and a carbine, a precaution which was only known to himself and his daughter. His house, too, stood about a hundred and fifty yards from the mill.

At length the appointed night arrived, and about the hour of two o'clock the five individuals, urged on in point of fact by Michael Sullivan, who gave himself credit for the adroitness of making the three Tipperary men imagine that he was in truth only their agent in the whole design and execution of the outrage;—the five individuals, we say, arrived close to the miller's house, two of them on horseback, and one of the latter actually bearing a pillion behind him for the accommodation of Miss Kennedy. Such was the force of that jealous vengeance by which the elder Sullivan was actuated, that he suffered himself and others to enter upon the perpetration of this stupid and besotted outrage, without once giving himself time to reflect upon its hideous character, and the awful consequences which might result from it. At all events they arrived at the miller's door, when Michael Sullivan, who was a daring and intrepid man—as many a villain has been—repeated to them once more a plan of the rooms, after which, with the exception of him who held the horses, they assembled about the window, and having broken three or four panes as quietly as they could, attempted to raise the sash and enter. There is nothing, however, which in the stillness of night comes more sharply upon the ear than the sound of breaking glass. Anne, who slept in the room into which the window, if opened, would have led them, was instantly alarmed, and immediately asked in a frightened voice, who was there? To this they made no reply, but with a simultaneous rush at the window succeeded in bursting it in. With singular presence of mind she locked her own apartment after she had left it, and immediately flew to her father's bedroom. This puzzled the assailants for some time, but as quickness in their proceedings was every thing, they drove their united force against it, when it, like the window, gave way. In fact the house had been built for more than a century, and all the doors, window frames, and other wood work belonging to it, were crazed and rotten with age. Anne found her father up, and in the act of dressing himself. The servant-maid, a stout young woman, having also been alarmed, had lighted a candle, which enabled him to dress without a moment's delay. As yet he had not had time to procure his firearms.

"Anne," said he, "be quiet; don't either you or Peggy be alarmed; but above all things, if we come to short grips, don't hould me, but hould them—of course they're robbers."

Neither his daughter nor servant had time to reply to him, when the four men, disguised as we have described them, rushed into the room. A glance was sufficient, and in a twinkling Miss Kennedy, who was only partially dressed, was in the arms of Michael Sullivan, and in another moment Michael Sullivan lay prostrate on the floor by a vigorous blow from the powerful miller. A conflict now took place which was deadly, desperate, and terrible. The courageous miller, who now perceived that it was his daughter, and not his money, that they wanted, fought with the ferocity of a lion, but the numbers were against him, for Michael, who had once more got to his legs, came behind him, and with a blow equally treacherous and powerful, prostrated him in return. Peggy Devlin, which was the name of the servant, kept one of them engaged, but the moment the miller was knocked down, his daughter was once more seized and carried out of the room. The ruffians in the mean time were not aware that he had any arms in the house, whilst he, during the conflict saw that they had three pistols among them, with the butts of which they had frequently struck him. In the mean time on reaching the hall, Michael Sullivan took the key out of the hall-door, lest some of them might open it, in order to get out and alarm the servants who slept in the mill—a necessary precaution, as Peggy ran down for the express purpose, but found herself locked in. In the mean time Anne was hauled out of the window, but not without making the most violent and desperate struggles. A new auxiliary now, however, appeared on her behalf. Michael had once more got her in his arms, when a powerful and ferocious bulldog leaped at his throat, which fortunately was protected by his neckerchief, or he might have paid his life as the forfeit of his violence. As it was, the noble and faithful animal brought him to the ground, where he kept tugging at his neckerchief, in order to reach his naked throat. One of the horses was now brought over to the window beside which Michael lay, the dog still tugging at him, as we have said, and two others endeavouring to extricate him from his grip, when James Sullivan mounting the horse, said to Hannigan—

"Here, bring her over, and we'll hoist her into the pillion."

The words were hardly uttered when the report of either a gun or pistol was heard, and at the same moment James Sullivan dropped off the horse. This caused Hannigan, who was struggling with Anne, to let her go. He ran to young Sullivan, and the moment Anne found herself free, she rushed in through the window to her father. This occasioned a pause, and a fearful pause.

"Here," said Hannigan, "is one of us a corpse—there is nothing now for it but blood for blood—let us shoot the father and then carry her off, that's my advice—blood for blood, I say, and disgrace in its worst sense to the daughter."

"Take your time, gentlemen," said the miller; "let me tell you that I've firearms enough to shoot every man of you as dead as him that dropped off the horse—and as the Lord is to judge me, the first man of you that attempts to cut this window will be before his judgment-seat in less than one minute's time. Man by man I'll drop you stone dead, or two by two, if you prefer it. And what is more, I'll give yez three minutes to take that carrion lyin' there and yourselves away out of this, or I swear that I'll drop you one after another where you stand—and what is more, I'll have neither judge nor jury to call me to an account for it."

There was a tone of determined energy and truth in his words that made them quail before him; and they accordingly consulted for a moment, after which they placed the fallen man across the horse, whilst another sat behind him to prevent him from falling off, and in this manner they took their departure from the miller's house. The dog, having seen that Miss Kennedy had escaped, let go his hold of Sullivan, so that there was no further obstruction to their retreat.

About a quarter of a mile below the miller's house, a small rude stone bridge crossed the mill-race, and from this bridge ran a broad and open way, which cannot be well described unless as one of those paths that lead through a common. At a short distance it gained an imperfect bridle road that led up into the recesses of the mountains. On arriving at this they held a consultation as to what was best to be done under circumstances so unexpected and disastrous; and here again Hannigan, who seemed to be well versed in all the practical resources connected with crime, became the leading spirit. As for Michael Sullivan he could not speak a word; a deep silence resulting from grief for the brother whom he loved so well, and vengeance against the man who had shed his blood, completely sealed his lips, from which nothing issued but groans of agony and rage.

"Now," said Hannigan, "what's to be done? I'm afraid there's one life lost in this business. Can you spake, Mistor James?"

"Hardly—oh!"

"James," at length said his brother, "it was I that murdered you. We all know you had neither heart nor will for this business until I tempted you to it. If any one here had a right to escape it was you, and now death has come upon the innocent—but no matter—if I was to be hanged for it the next minute, he won't live twenty-four hours after you!"

"We can talk about that again," said Houlaghan; "in the meantime, what's to be done wid Masther James?"

"That's the question," said Hannigan; "to bring him home would be to destroy ourselves—to put a rope about our necks; we must only bring him to some lonely cabin in the mountains where he can get some sort of a bed; there will be a search and pursuit to-morrow or the day after, and if he was found in this state, if he was found either livin' or dead, it was enough for us."

This was felt to be truth, and they were about to deliberate as to where they should bring him, when the figure of a man was seen creeping cautiously and timidly towards them. Hannigan immediately cocked his pistol and sprang towards him like a tiger. The night could be termed neither dark nor light; but at all events, ere he had got within a perch of the individual who was approaching, he recognized Jemmy the fool.

"What divil drove you here, you idiot? Go back, or I'll shoot you."

"Oh, dont," exclaimed Jemmy. "Masther James is shotted, and dats enough, an' too many; the miller shotted him, didn't I see him fwhawlin' from the cappul; she did bedaddda."

"You'll be tellin' about this," said Hannigan; "come go to your knees till I shoot you."

"Fwhat fwhy 'ud you shoot poor Jemmy fwhor? Didn't he love Masther James who was aoulways gud to him, and 'udn't let Bodagh the Grinder lash him wid his whip; and sure he shotted Master James 'kaise he wouldn't let him do it. Well, behoky, I'll come up wid Bodagh the Grinder yet. Now!"

"Jemmy, wouldn't you like to do anything that 'ud please Masther James?"

"Ah, behoky, it's me dat would."

"And if we let you come wid us, will you promise never to mention a syllable of what you seen to-night?"

"Behoky, I'll never tell it."

"Bekaise, if you breathe a syllable of it to man, woman, or child, we'll shoot you."

"No; never to man, woman, or child, but don't shoot me."

"Folly me, then; you know every perch of the county, let alone the parish, and you may be of use to us."

There then lived in the very recesses of those bleak mountains an old man and his wife, who had a cottage in a green valley, covered here and there on the sides with mountain shrubs and wildwood, and a bit of land, which, in addition to the cottage, they were allowed by the landlord, a good and pious clergyman, to hold rent free. This man had been famous, and still was, as a country doctor and herbalist, and was celebrated for the remarkable cures he had performed both on men and cattle. To the cottage of this man, whose name was Peter Tully, Jemmy directed them to proceed; and indeed the suggestion was hailed by them all as a most fortunate one, provided there remained any hopes of the wounded man's recovery.

"Peter cure him," said Jemmy, "and Jemmy knows de way to him's house. Come; Peter cure him; him cure every body, sure: mans, and horses, and cows, and sheeps, and every body. Come!"

THE OLD BRIDGE BY THE MILL.

Oh! tarry yet a moment on the old Bridge by the Mill,
The sunset glows—the water flows—the noisy wheel is still.
In twilight's thoughtful hour, old memories cluster fast,
Which the ripple of the streamlet sets to music of the past
They flow around my bosom, and all my senses thrill,
As the water-rushes quiver 'neath the old Bridge by the Mill.

A gay May Queen, I've held my state—the old Bridge for a throne,
And many a tear has fallen here, when I was left alone:
'Twas here, from those true lips of thine, love's first avowal came,
And here our first-born darling learnt to lisp a mother's name,
Thus ever through life's flowery dale, flows memory's golden rill,
As the streamlet through the meadows, 'neath the old Bridge by the Mill.

Now gleaming on the ripple, the Evening-star I see,
Reflected, as on my blessed life comes Heaven's light to me.
The waters flow—they onward go—but still the star shines clear,
Like Hope, that steadfast beacon-light, of every changing year, Whilst to the Eternal ocean flows our life-stream calm and still,
Like the deep and glowing water 'neath the old Bridge by the Mill.

ALBANY FORBLANQUE.

DUCK-SHOOTING AND DIVER-CHASING;

OR, HOURS WITH THE STUDENTS.

STUDENT'S life is the pleasantest in the world if he belong to a good 'set.' I belonged to the liveliest 'set' in college. The members of it, one and all, were possessed of an infinite amount of animal spirits, and were endowed also with that sanguine mental temperament that enabled them to see a silver lining to every cloud that gathered over their path during the college session. These clouds were numerous enough, heaven knows, for between the reprimands and cautions of professors and deans of faculty on one side, and the grave verdicts of president, vice-president, and council in judgment assembled on the other, scarcely a day passed over our heads that some individual amongst us was not in trouble. It is wonderful what slight things will bring students to grief, and medical students in particular. Everybody seems down upon them. With one, the poor disciples of Æsculapius are mad; with another, they are worse than mad, they are wicked; with a third, they are idle, dissipated, and quarrelsome; and a fourth wisacre warns his acquaintances to avoid them as they would the fabled upas-tree, because they are going straight to—well, we shall not, in our indignant denial of his assertion, mention where, but a pair of tightly-pursed lips, a hypocritical sigh, and an ominous shake of the head from the wise propounder of the opinion, will sufficiently indicate the locality. But if their faults and virtues were put on opposite sides of the scale, it is our opinion, both private and public, and one which we would cheerfully put our "four bones" in jeopardy to uphold, that the good would weigh down the balance at a glorious rate.

But be the above as it may, it is wonderfully easy, nevertheless, to get a student into trouble. The slightest infringement of his college rules will bring upon him the frowns and reprimands of those in authority. One day, during a deep snow, about five score of us waylaid two mail-coaches that passed every afternoon by the college. Well, our ringleaders were forthwith called before the council and severely admonished. And for what, think you? We stopped the coaches, sure enough, and on examination found that all the passengers were men, save one. Dick Sommerville, the dandy of the college, immediately handed down the individual of the gentler sex, and politely led her to a safe distance. We then, taking pity upon the half-frozen looks of the remaining passengers, namely, twelve upon one vehicle and fourteen upon the other, in order to warm them, commenced a cannonade of snow-balls, which we never ceased for an instant until every living man of them, drivers and all, had been brought to the ground. One of the passengers, in his rage, discharged an old cavalry pistol amongst us. But his hand was so unsteady that the bullet only passed through the mortar-board, i.e., the college cap, of dandy Sommerville, and then lodged victoriously in the haunch of a huge donkey who was contemplating our onslaught from a field hard by, and which, the moment it felt the leaden messenger, immediately went prancing in terror round the field, his agonizing hee-haws at the same time echoing in startling tones through the halls and corridors of our neighbouring Alma Mater! The remaining passengers, seeing the determination of their companion, showed fight, but we soon buried them in the snow, and then bundling them upon their seats once more, set the coaches in motion, and sent them off under a farewell discharge of snow-balls, and with a shout whose hilarious cadences brought a dozen or so of police upon us from an adjacent barrack. Then followed a new cannonade and a second victory, which resulted in the severe reprimand aforesaid from the college council,

But what has all this, you will say, to do with diver-chasing and duck-shooting? You will soon come to it, gentle reader. I only want to show you how the jovial spirits of my 'set' usually passed their time in college till the final examination of the session approached. Then it was that, like the young foxes who, after disporting themselves merrily in the noontide-ray, seek their silent burrows on the approach of the storm, the jolly spirits of my 'set,' one and all, betook themselves to their rooms, trimmed their midnight lamps, and studied away incessantly to retrieve their lost time. This was not a good plan you will say. It was not, I admit. But there was good stuff in some of us nevertheless; and this the bookworms of the college often found out to their cost, for when the examinations came on, the coveted prizes were almost in every case borne off by the wild ones, who, if they had not the "genius for work"—at least for incessant work—had usually a plentiful store of brains and intellect that carried them through victoriously when the tug of war came on in the shape of the prize examinations.

Have any of you, dear readers, competed for a scholarship? If you have not, I have; and I should know what it is. The sessional examinations are over, and the prizes in the different departments are awarded, generally to the great dismay of the bookworms, and to the surprise and delight of some of the wild ones. We are all scattered at our several homes in the country to spend the summer vacation. The bookworms scarcely ever see a good gleam of sunlight. They are hard at work for the October trial which is to decide the various scholarships. The wild spirits are away over mountain and moor, in deep valley, by rushing stream or margin of lonely lake, fishing or shooting, according to time and season, little thinking on their hour of trial in their luxurious enjoyment of breeze and shower, and golden flood of sunlight flashing over hill, and plain, and joyous river. The golden trout and silver-scaled salmon are captured, the wary spaniel points on the heathery moorland, and the whizzing partridge or the brown grouse falls beneath the unerring gun, and so the hours glide on.

Thus I spent my time during a certain summer vacation. The partridge season soon came on, and every morning as it shone saw me out in the breezy woodlands, gun in hand, and spaniel busily employed before me on the track of the wary birds. One morning it struck me that the time of the examinations was drawing alarmingly nigh. There was a scholarship to be competed for, the attainment of which would materially aid my success in college. So I threw by my gun, placed the dogs in durance vile, and commenced to study at the usual mad rate. The examination at length came off, but it was a sealed mystery to us all, the result—the names of the successful candidates for the several scholarships—nothing could be known until after the eagerly-expected meeting of the college council. Oh! that weary time of incertitude and burning expectancy. Day after day flew by, and the members of my 'set,' many of whom, like myself, were in for scholarships, tried every plan to pass away the time till the sitting of the council. Our debating club, in which Ned Rivers held forth a shining light, every evening was experimented on, and found wanting. Billiards, bagatelle, cards, football, and every species of game imaginable were tried, but all proved unsuccessful in calming our troubled minds. Spite of everything, the approaching council and its awards loomed up incessantly before our minds like a black cloud, and we were miserable.

In my despondency, the day before that on which the council was to sit, I strolled into the rooms of Ned Danvers, where there was always sure to be a good number of our 'set' sitting in conference upon some question or other. The physiognomies of the company were almost black with despair as I entered and sat myself upon a vacant chair by the fireside.

"What shall we do to please all?" exclaimed Ned Danvers, excitedly, "I am sure if you all wish to stay here, I shall be delighted to do the honors of my rooms. But what do you say to a night's duck-shooting in the marshes by the river?"

"The very thing! the very thing!" we all shouted.

"Well, then," rejoined Ned, "let all meet here by eight o'clock to-night, fully equipped, and I promise you we will have some sport, for the weather will be favourable, and the ducks are numerous upon the marshes."

"And to-morrow," said Joe Dolphin, who had a passion for aquatic sports, "we will go down in my boat and have a diver-chase upon the river!"

The programme of operations was a good one. And so that night we all met according to our agreement in Ned Danvers' rooms. There were ten of us, Six were to proceed up the river banks to the shore of a little marshy lake; a favourite feeding-place of the birds during the night. The remaining four, of whom I made one, were to remain beside a solitary marsh about a mile nearer than the former. Together we proceeded up the shore, and I will venture to say that a more jovial company could not be seen that night from the Giant's Causeway to the Skellig Rocks.

It was a fine night. A strong breeze seemed to be blowing through the upper regions of the sky, for the light volumes of cloud flitted briskly across the moon, which at intervals shone down with pale radiance on hill, and moorland, and river. But all was calm beneath, and on we marched with our guns resting quietly under our arms, and our flasks of the native in our pockets, till we reached a solitary path that led across a wet moorland towards the marsh. Four of us immediately filed off, while the remaining six proceeded further up the river in order to reach the lake which was to be the scene of their night's sport.

At last, after sinking several times to our knees in the succession of little quagmires that obstructed our path, we reached the marsh. At its southern side rose a low ridgy hill, some distance up which was a ruined hovel, the desolate outlines of which we could see in the occasional glimpses of moonlight. Taking our course round the eastern boundary of the marsh, we ascended the hill towards the hovel, in which we intended to bivouac for some time, for we found that we had arrived upon the spot about an hour or so before that part of the night the ducks usually chose for visiting their banquetting ground beneath. Part of the hovel still remained entire, namely, its single sleeping-room, and in this we were soon ensconced before a blazing fire of brambles and dry ferns we had gathered upon the hill outside. This dry fuel made but little smoke, and as we had taken the precaution of stopping the single and diminutive window of the ruined chamber with a bundle of grass and fern, there was but little fear of our fire-light disturbing the ducks, should they visit the marsh sooner than we expected.

After a few applications to the flask, the spirits of my companions began to ascend to a rather high degree of hilarity. Ned Danvers sang a song which set us all in a roar. Bill Shirket repeated the third act of a tragedy, which immortal production was to make its debut during our usual winter theatricals. Unfortunately, however, it was never represented on any stage; and all I remember of it is a scene in which Solymán the Magnificent is represented in the act of relating to his queen, how a Genius had given him a glimpse of the pre-Adamite world, from the summit of the Pyramid of Choeps. It was a grand scene, that in which Solymán, describing what he saw, stretches forth his hand majestically towards his consort, and says—

"There lay Mylodon like a shattered hulk,
And Megalox—the magnific might
Of Megatherium, and the fleshless bulk
Of Mammoth, like a ribbed sea-rock, and white
Skulls of Mastodon; but the horrid light
From their fierce eye-balls, and the rolling breath
Of their wide throats, were quenched and stilled in death!"

Why our poet had chosen the above measure for the greater part of his tragedy I know not, and very likely never will, for Bill Shirket is not the man to be questioned profanely on such subjects. Another song was sung, and at last it came to Tom O'Mahony's turn.

"Now," said Tom, "I will give you a fragment which I contrived to purloin one evening from the papers of a friend, which he evidently intended as a rival to Millikin's immortal 'Groves of Blarney;' and in the mellowest of mellow voices he rolled forth the following, stretching out the notes occasionally to a tremendous length, in order to imitate the singing of the country people:—

"One morning sweet and glorious, when the wild birds sung their chorus,

And all nature was uproarious in the charming month o' May;
And the lambs and trouts and horses, that knew not what remorse is,
And the shark and whale and porpus they gamboled in the bay;
'Twas then I left Cork city, and sung a roaring ditty,
And all in praise o' Kitty that I left in Cork behind—
'Twas then my manes were squandered, and I in sadness pondered,
While far in grief I waned towards Leinster like the wind!

While I in grief relinted, a public-house I inthered,

Where my heart was circumvented by a charmin' bloomin' maid.
Her form was stout and stately, and she smiled on me so nately,

That she broke my heart completely, and left Kitty in the shade.
Her hair like gold or brass-sticks, her limbs were most elastic,
And fit for all gymnastics, and for makin' punch and tay;
And 'twould be a crime most hainous, her comparison with Vainus,
Or Proserpine the ganius, that Plutarch stole away!"

Just as Tom had ended this fragment from the papers of his witty and erudite friend, the faint reports of several double-barrels smote upon our ears from some distance up the river, and away we started, for we knew our comrades were at their work by the lake. The marsh, silent and desolate, lay spread beneath us in the moonlight. It was a broad network of sedgy banks, between which lay a number of muddy pools with margents surrounded by belts of tall reeds. After descending the hill our stations were soon taken amid these reeds, each having a broad pool to himself. After lying crouched amid the reeds for about ten minutes, we suddenly heard a loud "quack! quack! quack!" from the direction of the lake further up the river. Then followed a whir and whistle of wings, and we soon had the satisfaction of seeing a large flock of ducks wheeling over our head. Round and round they hovered warily, for the guns of our companions had made them suspicious of alighting. At length they seemed to think all safe beneath, and broke into several small flocks, which wheeled and whirled hither and thither, and at last went down with a sudden dash into the several pools, about a dozen or more alighting upon that on whose margin I was eagerly awaiting their arrival. I gave them no time to scatter, but fired the contents of my right barrel right into the midst of them. A splashing and a quacking followed, as the affrighted flock rose, that beggars description. Up they whirled, however, and through them went the contents of my left barrel, its report being followed by an almost simultaneous discharge from the guns of my companions. With eager eyes I gazed out upon the pool to see the result of my two shots, and had the satisfaction of seeing three birds floating helplessly on the water in their death-struggles. A peculiar rustling and trembling of the reeds at the other side told me that one or two others at least were wounded, and with this prospect before me I quickly reloaded, and crouched down carefully in my place again. I knew by the satisfied sotto voce remarks of my companions that they too were successful.

A deep silence once more fell upon the broad marsh, broken occasionally by the booming voice of the goureen-roe, or snipe, as it wheeled round and round in airy spirals through the moonlight sky overhead. As I lay snugly contemplating the dead birds which the night-breeze was gradually floating towards the margin of the pool, I heard a shrill and unearthly scream from the eastern border of the marsh. I knew it, although it floated through the air like the shriek of some lonely spirit of the hill. Again it was repeated, and, in a few moments afterwards, I saw a heron floating upwards, with its long legs hanging down, and head stretched forward, as if it came upon a reconnoitering excursion to the marsh.

"Don't fire!" exclaimed the voice of Ned Danvers, in a general admonition—"on your lives don't fire, for I hear another flock of duck coming over the hill!"

At the sound of his voice the heron emitted another unearthly and defiant scream, and flew directly over the pool where I was stationed. The temptation was too much for me, so I sat up, and suddenly let fly the contents of one barrel after him as he went. A scream, a flapping of wings helplessly, and down poor long-neck dropped dead into a bank of reeds hard by.

"You have spoiled our sport for two hours to come!" roared the enraged Ned Danvers across the marsh; and sure enough, the next instant we heard a distant "quack! quack!" from over the hill, and then the faint whizzing of wings, and at last a splendid flock of duck passed high over our heads without deigning to pay us the shortest visit, and then faded away beyond our ken, through the dim distant sky, to some unknown and more solitary region by river shore or ocean strand.

What a long penance we had to perform for that single shot! Not a duck, teal, or widgeon came near us for the next two hours, although we heard shots several times during the interim from the distant lake. How eagerly we crouched down in our damp hiding-places, after each of these shots, expecting some scattered flock to pay us a visit. But none such came, and we were forced to content ourselves with our own thoughts as the moments wore on. Ned Danvers and my other companions were, however, not disposed to remain always silent, for now and then they expressed their disapproval of the offender's conduct in deep and surly growls that echoed with wierd effect across the still pools of the ghostly marsh.

At length a cannonade more prolonged than usual told us that our comrades were enjoying themselves to their hearts' content by the distant lake; and eagerly listening for the coming of the expected flock, we heard a sharper and more confused whirring and whistling of wings than before, and presently a numerous flight of mingled duck and widgeon passed high over our heads towards the east through the shadowy sky. Just as we expected that they would fade from our sorrowful gaze, they wheeled sharply round and retraced their course again, this time somewhat nearer to the earth. On they came, wheeling in circles occasionally, and quacking with loud and eager voices as if engaged in holding a consultation as to the whereabouts of their next banqueting place. The gylttons! Despite the fright they had got at the lake, they now seemed disposed to try a meal upon the marsh, and with that intent wheeled round and round it a dozen times overhead with an incessant "quack! quack!" and a loud whistling of wings. Just as they were preparing to alight something beneath aroused their suspicions, and away they went again in a straight and onward course through the blue. Again they stopped and seemed deliberating, while we from our hiding-places held our breath, fearing to make the slightest noise. At length a single mallard, separating from the flock, flew back directly over the marsh, inspecting every part of it minutely as he circled overhead on his strong pinions. A satisfactory call from this fine bird announced to the flock that he imagined all safe, and back they came again over our heads, making the same manoeuvres as before. At last they separated and came down, some in pairs and some in small flocks, with a dash upon the smooth surface of the pools. No sooner were they down when bang! bang! went the fatal barrels right and left, and with resounding screams and flutterings, the affrighted flock arose and darted confusedly away through the far sky, leaving several of their companions killed and wounded behind them. It was an exciting scene. Eagerly I peered forth over the surface of the pool, and found an addition to my trophies in the shape of a widgeon and a fine mallard, both of which lay in their last throes upon the water.

Thus the night passed. A few hours sleep and we were up again, guns ready and shot pouches on shoulders, and planning our course of action for the day. That evening at six o'clock, the council were to meet to award the scholarships, and of course we were all in a high fever of excitement. Joe Dolphin had a large four-oared boat, and in this sturdy vessel eight of us were soon sweeping down the river. The day came on dry and windy, the white breakers broke in foam over the bows of our swift boat as we swept downwards. At length we reached a broad expanse of the river half a dozen miles below the city. This was to be our hunting-field. Here the surface of the water was unbroken, save by the light waves that coursed each other from shore to shore, making the whole expanse of the broad lake like a green meadow swaying before the light winds of an April day.

Several black objects might be seen dotting the surface of the windy lake; they were divers seeking their voracious meals of small fish. Occasionally we could see one of them, after capturing its prey, raise itself half out of the water with erected head and flapping wings, and swallowing the luckless inhabitant of the water it had taken. Now and then, also, one of them would rise and fly windward some distance, then drop down upon the water and float before the wind, diving and fluttering its black wings as the fish passed in its way. Our object was to wound a bird, and then have a chase upon the lake, but for a long time we were unsuccessful. At length, one fellow that had floated to the far shore, arose and took its course windward, directly in a line for our boat. On it came close overhead, seemingly reckless of our proximity. As it passed, Joe Dolphin took up his gun and prepared to fire.

"Don't shoot him through the head, Joe!" cried we, "Wing him, and then he will give us a glorious chase!"

Bang went the gun, but, unfortunately the aim was too true, and down came the bird with a whack upon the surface of the water—dead. A storm of execrations saluted poor Joe, as he recovered his gun, but there was no help for it, and so we allowed the dead bird to float by, and rowed hither and thither, awaiting another opportunity. Not a bird was now to be seen over the broad expanse. At the report of the gun they all dived, and for a long time scarcely showed one of their black bills above the water. But new arrivals at length began to appear from the windings of the river farther down. Again a bird came in a straight course for our boat, this time so high that he was out of the range of a common fowling-piece. We had taken the precaution of bringing a long duck-gun with us. This I took possession of, and awaited the coming of the diver in the bow of the boat. I allowed him to pass several lengths overhead, and then fired. The smoke cleared away instantly, and I had the satisfaction of seeing the bird hover confusedly for a time in the air, and then drop down wounded into the water. The moment he reached the surface he disappeared, and then the sport commenced. On went the boat propelled by the sturdy oars towards the spot where the bird had dived. When we reached it we saw his black bill appearing above the water about thirty yards distant. Bang! bang! went the guns, and down again popped the black-bill. Now it rose at a considerable distance away, and again it would appear sometimes within a few arms' length of the boat, in which case it was saluted by the contents of a few barrels, or by a slash from one of the oars, for the rowers were determined to have their share of the sport, and I believe in my heart it was the best.

After about an hour's chase, during which, notwithstanding the coldness of the season, we had all got into a glow of heat, the black bill and nearly half the body of the diver appeared almost at the side of the boat. A shout, and a slashing of oars followed, and down went the unfortunate bird again. In the last evolution Joe Dolphin, who had put by his gun and taken a spare oar in hand, in his eagerness to salute the bird with a finishing blow, overstretched himself, and out he went over the side of the boat with a splash into the water. Joe Dolphin, however, like his aquatic namesake, was quite at home in the watery element, and by means of the oar which he had kept in his hand, kept himself gallantly above the surface. He was two boats' length behind us before we could turn to his rescue. As we did so, the diver happened to rise within two feet of his chin. It was amusing to see the vengeful grab he made at the bird, which, however, dived again and eluded him.

"Don't mind me, boys!" called out Joe gallantly at this. "The bird is getting weary. Follow him, and leave me to shift for myself a few moments!"

We knew Joe would have his way, so we rested on our oars for a minute or so, waiting for the bird to appear. The poor diver was evidently getting weak, and about to give in, for he now popped up his bill right in front of us about two or three yards away. This time we did not dare to fire, for Joe was only about a perch beyond the bird, but the oars went down plash! plash! at the poor black-bill, Joe at the same time striking out with the celerity of a practised swimmer for the spot. Down went the bird, but he was no sooner down than up again right opposite Joe Dolphin's face. A quick dart of the nervous arm, and the fluttering bird was instantly held over the surface of the water by the bold swimmer. A loud shout welcomed the deft feat, and the next moment the dying bird and its exultant captor were pulled safely into the boat. Knowing that some such accident was likely to occur, we had stowed away a spare suit of clothes in our provision hamper. In these Joe Dolphin was soon arrayed, and after a few applications to the brandy-flask, was as merry as the best of us.

Three other hunts followed. They were all something like the first, but they were not the less exciting to us at the same time. After dining like true sportsmen in our boat, we left the lake, and proceeding up the river, reached the city about half-past five o'clock. We hid our guns, loaded as they were, under one of the dark porches of the college, and literally frying with impatience, awaited the news. At last it came. Hurra! The wild spirits had beaten the book-worms. I was a scholar, Ned Danvers was a scholar, and others of our 'set' too numerous to mention were equally fortunate.

GREEK ART.

HERE is not a heart that pays loving homage to Art, whether she be found among the ancients or the moderns, whether she greet us from the easel of Apelles or Lawrence, or from the atelier of Praxiteles or Canova, in which that noble epigrammatic dictum of Dr. Johnson, that "a room hung with pictures, is a room hit," will fail to find its historical facts in painting, and of the art have arisen from can easily acquire a volume, but it is seldom that facts are minds in a distinct manner. In most countries seem to have been nothing in origin; in other words, they were indebted to religion for their development. Vague attempts at outline and the use of colours are found in the idolatry of all nations, as exemplified in the "monochrome" in India, and the "polychrome" on the sepulchres at Thebes, the latter being the earliest specimens of painting extant. The symbolical figures on the monuments of Nineveh prove that the Assyrian artists were by no means deficient in chromatic knowledge. The great difference, however, in ancient and modern pictures is this, that in the former there was no attempt at chiaroscuro, the practice of the ancients as to light and shade being only that of contrasting colours, in which, it must be conceded, they arrived at great perfection. Moreover, their imperfect acquaintance with the rules of perspective debarred them from executing any complicated groups, and their figures, like the profiles of their statues, appear unconnected with each other. Pliny affects to discredit the statement of the Egyptians, that they were the inventors of painting; but it is by no means improbable that the hieroglyphics of Egypt have been the origin of sculpture. At any rate it is in that country that we first recognise its existence in anything like an advanced state. Although the earlier statues of Egyptian art exhibit an absence of all symmetry and all expression, an air of imposing grandeur and majesty is communicated to them by the colossal breadth and severe simplicity of their proportions. The Athenians were the first nation in the world that appreciated the idea of beautiful form, and cultivated all those resources by which the art was finally perfected. The name of Daedalus carries us back to the very infancy of Greek art, to an epoch, in fact, nearly one thousand years anterior to the Christian era. He was an Athenian by birth, and a contemporary of Theseus and Hercules. In consequence of his marvellous ability as a sculptor, all statues were named after him, Daedala. He is thus alluded to by Ovid:—

"Daedalus ingenio fabrum celeberrimus artis."

Pausanias mentions nine of his works as being extant in Greece when he wrote, in the second century; "rude and uncouth in aspect," he adds, "but yet having an air of divinity." Nearly two centuries later—776 B.C.—Diponius and Scyllis, the Cretan, were likewise famous for their statues. Catagraphy, or the oblique representation of figures, to give different views of the countenance, as looking upward, or downward, or backward, as well as depicting the veins, and the folds and plaits in drapery and accessories, would not appear to have been attempted before the time of Phidias, who flourished about five hundred years before Christ. His genius, aided by a knowledge of painting, gave a majesty and grace to his compositions,

"Oft thought before, but ne'er so well express'd."

From his era the total want of anatomical and the great deficiency of mechanical knowledge ceased to be the characteristics of sculpture. Flowing outlines thenceforward supplanted the archaic stiffness of the old school, and gave dignity to the character of the human figure, by harmonising in its sentiments and actions. But, although Grecian sculpture was undoubtedly the most perfect production of ancient imitative art, Grecian painting was unable to boast of a proportionate development. In early times it was not connected with the worship of the gods in Greece, and hence its culture was, for many centuries, less than that of the sister arts of sculpture and architecture. The first notable improvements in Greek painting were made in the schools of Corinth and Sicily, the most ancient examples of the art which have come down to us being found upon the Corinthian vases, which may be assigned to the beginning of the sixth century of the Christian era. The only painter, however, of this period, of any repute, whose name has been preserved, is Cimon of Cleonæ, whose date is uncertain, but who probably flourished not later than 560-510 B.C. These vases were of two kinds, the "monochrome," on which the figures were only of one colour, and the "polychrome," upon which they were of many. Indeed, the styles of painting upon the Corinthian vases vary so considerably that they serve to illustrate nearly every branch of the art with which the Greeks were familiar. Some of them were of the most graceful outline and exquisite workmanship, and were invariably adorned with subjects from that weird but beautiful mythology which filled with divine imagery the minds of their poets and sculptors. The ancient Greek paintings were either in water colours or in wax; oil colours remained undeveloped until the fifteenth century, when Jan Van Eyck was the reputed discoverer. Pausanias, a painter of Sicily, was the first who understood how to apply colours to ivory or wood by vitrification. The first Greek painter of any great renown was Polygnotus, the Thasian, who flourished about four hundred and twenty years before Christ, and was contemporary with Phidias. His paintings were essentially statuesque—the representation by means of colours, on a flat surface, of figures identical with those of the sculptor. The improvements which he introduced on the works of his predecessors were very marked, and form an epoch in the art. He first represented women with a lucid and perhaps transparent vest, like that of the Venus of Cos, and adorned them with vari-coloured mitres. Painting reached a still more advanced stage of excellence in the hands of Apollodorus, Zeuxis, and Parrhasius. The first named was an Athenian, and first directed attention to the effects of chiaroscuro, thus creating another epoch in the art. Zeuxis was a great master of colour, and his paintings were sometimes so accurate and true to nature as to amount to illusion. This is exemplified in the story related of a contest of skill between him and Parrhasius, for which both artists painted special subjects. That of Zeuxis represented a cluster of grapes, and the vraisemblance was such that the birds came and pecked at it with avidity. Confident of success after this, the artist arrogantly challenged his rival to draw aside the curtain which concealed his picture. The painting of Parrhasius was simply the curtain itself! Zeuxis acknowledged his defeat with the remark, that although he had succeeded in deceiving the birds, he had in turn been deceived by Parrhasius. He was accustomed to work very slowly and carefully, and is said to have once replied to a friend who chided him upon his dilatoriness, "I take, it is true, a long time to paint, but then I paint works to last a long time." Not a vestige of his compositions now remain. Parrhasius particularly excelled in strongly expressing the violent passions, and is even said to have had a criminal tortured to death that he might "paint a dying groan." This will remind the reader of the incident related of the late eminent French tragedienne, Mlle. Molesville Rachel, who was in the habit of attending an hospital to study all the contortions which the human frame and facial muscles are capable of expressing when writhing under the keenest agonies. The school of this artist was succeeded by the Sicilian, of which Eupomachus may be considered the founder. The culmination of Grecian art was attained by Apelles, about 368 B.C., who, by universal consent, was the first of ancient painters. Some of the Latin poets employ his name as a synonyme for the art itself.

AN IRISH SEA-QUEEN.

SOME INCIDENTS IN THE CAREER OF GRAINNE O'MAILLEY.

THE early history of the peninsular Hill of Howth, which sentinels the northern entrance to the Bay of Dublin, and one of the most striking features of which we engrave, is nearly altogether dependant on the Bardic creations of enchantment and glamourie associated with the deeds of Fionn-mac-Cumhaill and the Fenians. But there is a story in connection with the hill which from its singular and romantic character is especially note-worthy. We allude to the incident which occurred in the year 1593, which has identified the name of Grana Uille, or Grainne O'Mailley, commonly known as Grace O'Malley, with its history. This famous sea-queen was the daughter of Dubhdara O'Mailley (O'Mailley of the Black Oak) lord of the Isles of Arran and the territory of Ui-na-haille, or O'Mailley's land, a district comprising the present baronies of Murreak and Borrischoole, county of Mayo, and who, according to tradition, for many years in addition to not a little smuggling added other speculations to his connection with the sea; in short, like Lantbro, Haidee's parent, he was noted for his bold and successful practise as a marine attorney. At his decease Grainne succeeded to the command of his piratic squadron, and soon surpassed him in plunderings by the extent and magnitude of hers, the natives along the entire western coast trembling at her very name. This life, however, did not prevent her twice yielding to the influence of that alcyonophilic deity who "rules the camp, the court, the grove," and who for her spread his wings to the blasts that swept the dark and stern cliffs of Ui-na-haille. Her first husband was Donnell O'Flaherty, a distinguished chief of the sept of that surname, who formerly possessed all Western Connaught, and whose character about this period may be recognised from the inscription which the terror-stricken burghers of Galway are said to have placed above the western gate of that city: "From the ferocious O'Flaherties good Lord deliver us!" After his death her second spouse was Sir Richard Bourke, head of the Mayo sept of that Norman-Irish clan, whom he governed under the title of "Mac William Eighter," i. e. the lower, the Earl of Clanricarde being chief of the upper or senior sept. Sir Richard died in 1583. Grainne's piracies became so frequent and notorious, before and after her first marriage, that at length, in 1579, she was proclaimed as an outlaw, a reward of £500 was offered for her apprehension, and troops were sent from Galway to take the castle of Carrick-a-Uille, in the Bay of Newport, which was her chief stronghold, and her defence of which was so spirited that the beleaguers were compelled to ignominiously retreat, after a siege of more than a fortnight. However, the extension of English influence in Connaught ultimately induced her to come to terms with the Government, and in the summer of the year 1593 she sailed for England, and obtained an interview with Queen Elizabeth at Westminster, to the astonishment of her majesty's farthingaled and ruffed dames d'honneur, who appear to have been considerably struck with the mien and appearance of this marine Amazon.

"As a book,
That sunburnt brow did fearless thoughts reveal;
And in her girll was a sheen of steel,
Her crimson mantle her gold brooch did bind;
Her flowing garments reached unto her heel;
Her hair, part fell in tresses unconfined,
And part a silver bodkin fastened up behind."

The queen consented to pardon her transgressions upon a promise of future amendment, which Grainne rather reluctantly gave, and, after a short sojourn, returned to Ireland, debarking at a little creek near Howth Castle, to which she proceeded, but the gates of which, as it was customary at dinner time, she found closed. Indignant at such a dereliction of national hospitality, she seized the infant heir to the title, who chanced to be rambling with his attendants along the beach, and conveyed him to the castle of Carrick-a-Uille, nor would she consent to restore him until she had exacted a heavy ransom, and an express stipulation that the gates of Howth Castle should never again be closed at dinner time, and that a cover should always be in readiness for any stranger that might arrive—a custom scrupulously observed through many generations. Grainne reached a very advanced age, and at her death, which occurred early in the seventeenth century, was interred in the monastery of Clare Island, which she had endowed, and where some remains of her tomb are still visible. Her celebrity was long the subject of bardic song, and yet forms the theme of ballads and the subject of legends among the peasantry. There is a noble march called "Graine Mael, or Ma, Ma, Ma," preserved in Bunting's "Ancient Music of Ireland," the author and date of which are uncertain, but it is probably as old as the corsairs herself. When played on the pipes the time at intervals is denoted by a peculiar sound, which has procured for it the additional name of "Ma, Ma, Ma." During the political contests that marked the Duke of Dorset's administration of Ireland, in 1753, an air, partly Irish and partly English, founded on this melody, was very popular. In the dining-hall of Howth Castle there is a painting which is locally believed to represent her abducting escapade. A lady mounted on a white steed is in the act of receiving an infant from a peasant: from an opening in the sky above a figure gazes downward on the group. Where Grace obtained her white charger tradition does not say, but perhaps she had on board her fleet a division of that famous corps known as the "horse-marines."

On the loftiest headland of Howth, at its extreme south, and by the marge of pleasant grassy slopes, stands the snowy Lighthouse of the Bailey. The historic recollections which crowd around the site of this picturesque pharos are of much interest. Contemporarily with the synarchy of Eremhon and Emhear in Ireland, in the year of the world 3501, a fortalice called "Dun Etar," the Fort of Etar—or Fort of Howth, the ancient appellation of this locality being "Beann Etar," that is Beann-o-tir, the hill from (or off) the land, an expressive allusion to its almost insulated position—was erected here by a chieftain named Suirge, as thus recorded in an ancient historical poem, preserved in the "Book of Ballymote," descriptive of the nomadic adventures of the Milesians, and of the various palaces and fortresses constructed by them:—

"Dun Sobhairce was afterwards erected
By the gallant Sobhairce, of the fair side;
Deilg-inis, by Segda, the cheerful;
Dun Etar, by Suirge the slender."

Duns Sobhairce and Deilg-inis were forts on Dunseverick, an isolated rock in the vicinity of the Giant's Causeway, county of Antrim, and Dalkey Island. Naturally impregnable at that time, on the extern or sea-side, the precipitous cliff the apex of which it encircled rendering any artificial protection unnecessary, while its intern defensibility was secured by a deep fosse, which completely cut it off from the hill, in addition to formidable lines of circumvallation, the fastness of Etar for centuries may be said to have formed the keystone of power on the peninsula, in the history of which it is a solid landmark, as it gave its name to many of the sanguinary conflicts that from time to time resulted for its possession, here, with their faces to the foe and their backs to the waves, being the final stand of its defenders after contesting the soil foot by foot. In the ninth century of the Christian era the monarch Crimthainn Niadhair (pronounced Crifan Nianair) who succeeded to the sovereignty of Ireland, A.M. 5193, died at Dun Etar—which was from thenceforward distinguished as "Dun Crimthainn"—in the sixteenth year of his reign, after his return from a predatory expedition, the scene of which is uncertain, in which he amassed considerable spoils. King Crimthainn, as we learn from the "Leabhar na h-Uíde," a work compiled at Clonmacnoise, in the twelfth century, and the "Dinnseanchus," was interred in the royal cemetery of Brugh na Boinne, on the banks of the Boyne, the usual place of interment for princes of the Tuatha de Danann, and whose custom he adopted at the solicitation of Nair, his queen, who was of that mystic race, and from whom he derived his surname of Niadh-nair, "Nair's Hero," otherwise attributed to a Bainlean-nán, or tutelary female sprite, who was fabled to have accompanied him on his expeditions. The wreck of a cairn which crowns the summit of Sliabh Martin, the loftiest pinnacle of Howth, has heretofore been popularly regarded as his sepulchral monument, a conclusion which, it will be manifest, is entirely erroneous. In the early part of this era Conary the Great also had a royal fortress here, and made several expeditions thence into Britain and Gaul. In the year 646—or, according to the "Annals of Ulster," 649—a sanguinary engagement was fought here, known as the "Battle of Dun Crimthainn," between the monarchs Conall and Ceallach, the sons of Maelcobha, and Aenghus and Cathasach, sons of Domhnall, the sovereign who preceded them on the throne, in which the latter were slain. In the early part of the eleventh century (1012), during the reign of Brian Borumha, Maelmordha, King of Leinster, with an auxiliary force of Danes, under Sitric, King of Dublin, invaded and devastated the fertile plains of Meath, to avenge which Malachy II., from whom Brian had usurped the supreme power, retaliated by an incursion into their territories, which he ravaged, burned, and razed as far as Howth, but was overtaken at Draighnen (Drinan, near Kinsaly,) and defeated with a severe loss, including his son, Flann. Towards the close of the century, however, the Leinster troops sustained a retributive defeat from Muircertach Ua Brian, King of Munster, at "Rath Etar," a stronghold which was probably identical with Dun Crimthainn, in which fortalice, also, a remnant of the Danes who had escaped the slaughter at Clontarf, in 1014, are traditionally said to have fortified themselves, and defended with desperate resolution until relieved by a Norse fleet. This is the last record we find of a fort which held so important a position in the annals of the past, and from the massive and compact strength of which the shocks of war and tempest once rebounded ineffectually. It has long ago passed away and mingled with the dust, but many traces of the original fosse and circumvallation were clearly discernible a few years since.

The superstructure reared in its stead—

"A new Prometheus chained upon the rock, Still grasping in his hand the fire of Jove," not less element-defiant when the waves leap over it,

"And steadily against its solid form Press the great shoulders of the hurricane,"

has another character and a nobler design. The Bailey Lighthouse was erected by the Ballast Board of Ireland in the year 1813, in lieu of one of two built on Howth by Robert Readinge, in the reign of Charles II. (1671) which crowned an eminence more to the north, and the desuetude of which was occasioned by its great altitude—three hundred feet—which rendered it liable to be obscured by hanging mists. The shape of the present structure is that of a truncated cone, the illumination, a clear fixed light, being produced by a set of parabolic reflectors, and visible in clear weather at a distance of fifteen nautical miles. The parallels of defence which engirt the ancient Dun, were marked by two distinct divisions, a greater and a lesser, as apparent from an attentive examination of the existing outlines. The source of the term Bailey has occasioned many conjectures, more or less fanciful. It has, however, been generally traced to the Irish baile, a town, a very frequent topographical prefix, and said to be cognate with the Greek polis, and Latin ballium, which in their original sense implied an elevated circular fortification, afterwards extended to the villages of which such citadels were the nuclei. But the authorities for the synonymy of baile, polis, and ballium, and their special application to hill fortalices and towns are very doubtful, and the correct radix of the word appears to be beal, beul, or bel, literally an entrance, pass, or mouth, as well as correlative to the Welsh beile, an outlet, mound, or bailey, from bal, a prominence, or what juts out. The "Lighthouse of the Bailey," therefore, simply means the lighthouse of the out-jutting rock or promontory. This word beal, as also baile, a town, enters largely into Irish topology, as Beal-feirsíde, Belfast, "the pass of the sand-bank;" Beal-atha-na-slugh, Ballinasloe, "the pass of the multitude;" Beal-an-atha, Ballina, "the pass of the ford," etc. During the night of the 15th of February 1853, in a severe snow storm, the Victoria steam-vessel, from Liverpool to Dublin, struck near the Castlen Rock, off the east side of Howth, from whence she drifted as far as the promontory of the Lighthouse, and being thence backed into deep water, went down within a few yards of the shore, a complete wreck, sixty persons, including the commander, Captain Church, perishing. This sad event will recal to the reader that masterly description in Longfellow's beautiful ballad "The Wreck of the Hesperus," which gives us a picture of a similar tragedy.

The breakers were right beneath her bows,
She drifted a dreary wreck
And a whooping billow swept the crew
Like icicles from her deck.

She struck where the white and fleecy waves
 Looked soft as carded wool;
 But the cruel rocks, they gored her side
 Like the horns of an angry bull.
 Her rattling shrouds, all sheathed in ice,
 With the mast went by the board!
 Like a vessel of glass, she stove and sank,
 Ho! ho! the breakers roared!

Such was the wreck of the Hesperus,
 In the midnight and the snow!
 Christ save us all from a death like this,
 On the reef of Norman's Wool!

The scenery in the immediate vicinity of the Lighthouse is very attractive, and has tempted many a gipsy party, satiated, perchance, with the coup d'œil around, or flushed and panting from their climb of the heather-draped and worn sides of the hill, to a grateful halt, and the earnest discussion of well-stored hampers, a matter-of-fact employment in such a place. And often will those sunny days, with their pleasant lessons of—"How the best charms of nature improve,

 When we see them reflected from looks that we love," be scanned by the way-weary pilgrim of life, as the thoughts fly back along the phantom years, and memory pictures through their dim haze forms that once breathed and moved—aspired and loved. Alas! that ever,

The bough must wither, and the bird depart,
 And winter clasp the world—as life the heart!

CELESTIAL VAGRANTS.

THE recent unexpected appearance of the comet which so much startled even the most erudite astronomical authorities, and is admitted to have been unsurpassed as an object of popular observation since the beautiful comet of 1774, will, without doubt, just now, render a general notice of such phenomena interesting to our readers. The name of these "celestial vagrants," as the erratic visitors may be not inaptly called, is derived from the Greek word σάπης, hair, a title which originated in the hairy appearance frequently exhibited by the haze or luminous vapour, the presence of which is at first sight the distinguishing characteristic of these bodies. The nucleus or definite point, the nebulous light which envelopes it, and the luminous train preceding or following it, are the general features of a comet, although none of them are now considered essential cometary elements. All celestial bodies which have a motion of their own, and describe orbits of an extremely elongated form, are classed as comets. To the observations of Tycho Brahe in 1557 is due the discovery that comets are celestial bodies, extraneous to our atmosphere. Sir Isaac Newton succeeded in demonstrating that they revolve around the sun in conic sections, and are consequently controlled in their movements by the same principle which guides the planets in their orbits, with which, however, they are not to be confounded. The latter move in what is astronomically termed "direct motion," from west to east unvaryingly; the movements of comets through the boundless regions of space, on the contrary, are very eccentric, being often from east to west, and retrograde. Again, the paths of comets cut the ecliptic in every direction, some being even perpendicular to its plane, as in the instance of our recent visitor, while the orbits of all the planets are confined to a narrow zone on either side of it. Planetary orbits are, moreover, nearly circular, while cometary present every variety of form. Of nearly two hundred comets whose orbits have been obtained with more or less accuracy, forty appear to have described ellipses, seven hyperbolas, and the rest parabolas. Halley was the first, by determining the parabolic elements of a number of comets from the recorded observations, to identify that of 1682 with those which had been observed in 1581 and 1607, and thus confidently to predict the return, at the end of 1758 or beginning of 1759, of a comet which would have the same elements. To predict with accuracy the time of the return of a comet, it is necessary to make a very accurate calculation of its orbit, taking into account the perturbations of the planets to whose influence it is subject. To calculate the orbit it is necessary, firstly, to determine the exact position of the star or nucleus; secondly its velocity; and thirdly, the variations of velocity produced by the mass of the sun. In the case of Halley's comet, just as astronomers began to look out for its return in November 1758, it was announced in a work, the joint production of Madame Lepante, Clairaut, and Laland, that it would take six hundred and eighteen days more to return to the perihelion than on the preceding revolution. The perihelion passage was fixed about the middle of April, 1759; but Clairaut distinctly forewarned the world that, being pressed for time, he had neglected small values, which collectively might amount to about a month in the seventy-six years. On the 12th of March, 1759, exactly a month before the time announced, the comet passed the perihelion, but within the assigned limits of divergence from that date. For the next perihelion passage of this comet the different calculations fixed the 4th, the 7th, and the 13th of November, 1835. Subsequent observations indicated the 16th—that is to say, a deviation of only three days from what turned out the most accurate calculation, and a deviation of twelve days from the most remote. From the similarity of the elements of its orbit, this comet has also been identified with one observed in 1456, and one in 1378, recorded by Chinese observation. Anterior to the former year there are no sufficiently reliable European observations, but it is conjectured by Arago that Halley's comet is the same with that seen in the fifty-second year before our era; that of 885; the one mentioned in 1006 by Hali Ben Rodaan; that of 1230; and finally with that of 1305. There are three other comets whose periodicity is considered by astronomers as established, and whose paths are accurately known.

1. That of Encke, the orbit of which does not extend so far as the orbit of Jupiter, and with a short period of twelve hundred and four days; 2. That of Biela or Gambart, having a period of six years and three quarters. During its visit in 1846 it was observed to separate into two distinct comets, which kept moving side by side till they disappeared. On its return in the autumn of 1852, the distance between the two nuclei had much increased, suggesting their complete divorcement. 3. That of Faye, with a period of seven years and a half. The orbits of the two last extend beyond the orbit of Jupiter, but not so far as that of Saturn. The celebrated comet of 1680, from which Newton proved that they revolve around the sun in conic sections, appears to have been the most remarkable for brilliancy of any of which we have authentic accounts. It is supposed to have been identical with the one that appeared about the time of Cæsar's death—44 B.C.—with that which was seen in the reign of Justinian in the year 531, and with another in the year 1106, in the reign of Henry II. In the month of June 1770, Messier discovered a comet which remained visible a long time. This enabled Lexelle to calculate its periodic revolutions at five and a half years, but it was proved impossible to identify it with any comet that had been previously observed. Moreover, it was never seen again, a circumstance attributable to the orbital derangements it underwent from encountering the vast body of Jupiter, whose attraction deflected it into more distant regions than Lexelle's orbit, and so entirely changed its form. In the present century the comets most remarkable for brilliancy have been those of 1811, 1843, 1858 and 1861. The comet of 1843 was one of the most remarkable, upon the whole, of which we possess any description; it all but touched the surface of the sun. That of 1858 was the famous "Donati." The one visible in the June and July of this year was of extraordinary magnitude, even exceeding that of 1858. Its position was nearly north, with a slight westerly inclination, in a direct line with the two uppermost distant stars of Ursa Major, and at a distance of about seventeen millions of English miles from the earth. It was at first supposed to be the great comet of 1264 and 1566, named after the emperor Charles V., because its being seen in the heavens is supposed to have influenced his decision in abdicating the throne, and retiring to a monastery, but subsequent calculations of its orbit proved that this hypothesis was erroneous. It bore no resemblance to any comet heretofore observed. The nucleus, instead of being hollow like the half of an egg-shell, as in the case of most others, presented the appearance of a sun composed of fire-works. Many attempts were made to obtain photographs of it, all of which seem to have failed. An exposure of the sensitive plate to its luminous image in a telescope, for one hundred and twenty times as long as sufficed to depict the comet of 1858, entirely failed in giving any trace of an image, thus proving that there was an essential difference in the physical characteristics of the two bodies, inasmuch as whilst the luminous rays emitted by them were nearly of equal intensities, the actinic rays were almost entirely absent in the light from the late comet, the distinctive features of which were certainly not calculated to add to what little we know of those erratic bodies.

Whether comets are self-luminous, or merely reflect the light of the sun, has long been a subject of question. The fact of their becoming invisible when they pass their perihelions and recede from the sun, though still of considerable apparent size, forcibly leads to the adoption of the latter theory. There is no doubt, from experiments made by Arago, that the light from comets is partially polarised, in the same way that the sun's light is reflected by our own atmosphere. What the matter of the comets consists of has hitherto been only a matter for speculation, but the progress of science has recently placed us in possession of a means by which all future conjecture will be probably set at rest. We allude to the new "Spectrum Discoveries," by the aid of which two German philosophers, quietly working in their laboratory at Heidelberg, have been able to determine, without the least shadow of a doubt, the actual chemical composition of the sun! After such evidence of the wonderful power of this art, it is not difficult to foresee what valuable information is likely to be obtained by it on the most obscure subject of stellar chemistry. On an accurate examination of the fixed lines in the spectrum (to which we shall take another opportunity of alluding at length) produced by the light of a comet, if the latter shone merely by light reflected from the sun, the ordinary solar fixed lines would be the only ones visible. If, however, as is not improbable, some of its splendour were due to native light, the spectrum would as readily reveal whether the nucleus or the tail were in the solid or vaporous state. If the former it would give a continuous spectrum, whilst if it were a vapour the spectrum would be disconnected, and the new lines in it would at once disclose the elementary bodies to which they were due. One observer, we hear, detected the presence of colours in the refracted light of the comet. At all events, the composition of the nebulousity and the tail of a comet is something of almost inconceivable tenuity, as illustrated by these considerations. 1. Stars seen through them suffer no diminution of brightness, though the light must have to traverse sometimes millions of miles of the cometary atmosphere. 2. Though the thickness of the tail of a comet may be millions of miles, and its length, of course, much greater, the comets have never been observed to cause any sensible disturbance of the planetary motions, though approaching near enough to be themselves so much affected as to change the entire character of the orbit. 3. The curvature of the tails, and the accelerations of the periodic time, as exemplified in the case of Encke's comet, indicate their being affected by a resisting medium, which has never, we believe, been observed to have the slightest influence on the planetary period.

The ancients entertained some queer notions respecting these "hairy stars." Seneca conceived that their appearance was indicative of important changes in the affairs of mankind. Aristotle maintained that they were nothing more than "meteors generated in the upper regions of the atmosphere." Tacitus has commemorated in two passages in the "Annals" the fact as to the general belief in the destinies of kings, emperors and rulers being affected by comets, and, through them, the condition of the people over whom they presided. One of these stars, he says, was accompanied by incessant flashes of lightning, "certain to be expiated by the imperial blood of Nero." A very notable comet appeared on the birth of the celebrated Mithridates, King of Pontus, of which the historian Justin thus writes: "Even celestial prodigies prognosticated his future greatness, for not only the same year that he was born, but also in that when he began to reign, there was on each occasion a comet star, which, for the space of seventy days, shone so brightly that the heavens themselves seemed all on fire. By its magnitude it occupied a fourth part of the sky, and by its glare outshone the brightness of the sun itself; and both at its rising and its setting it occupied no less a space of time than four hours." Suetonius has three references to the comet, as "a star of great political significance and importance." At the conclusion of his biography of Julius Cæsar, he says that in the public games which his successor Augustus instituted in his memory, "there appeared a comet (stella crinita), which, at the eleventh hour, shone for seven days continuously. It was hence believed that the soul of Cæsar was received into heaven, and on account of the comet a star was affixed to the head of his images." Preceding the death of Nero he also tells us that a comet

"began to shine night after night," and again, in his life of Vespasian, he remarks that that emperor could not refrain from joking even in circumstances of imminent peril, nor when there was a fear of his death, for when, amongst other prodigies that occurred in his time, the tomb of the Cæsars suddenly opened, and a comet appeared in the heavens, "he said that the first had happened in order that Julia Calpurnia, a lady who was a near relation to the family of Augustus, might be interred; and as to the other, it concerned the King of the Parthians more than it did himself, for the latter was long-haired." This story is, however, much better told by Dion Cassius. He says that, when they were talking of the "hairy star," Vespasian remarked: "The hairy star portends not death to me, but to the King of the Parthians; for he wears long hairs, whereas I am bald-headed!" In his satires on the ladies of Rome, Juvenal derides them on account of their political speculations, and their pretensions as to having the earliest intelligence upon every subject. One of these blue-stocking busy-bodies, he says, "was the first to see the comet threatening to the Armenian King, and the Parthian:

"Instantem regi Armenio, Parthoque cometen Prima videt."

In the tragedy of "Julius Cæsar," Shakspeare thus alludes to the general superstition that comets portended the death of kings and the destiny of nations:

"When leggers die there are no comets seen—
The heavens themselves blaze forth the death of princes."

But the notion that comets were celestial indications of great social and political changes in the conditions of mankind, was not confined to the ancients. The writer just quoted has, in the following lines, pointed to the general belief in astronomy, and the universal conviction that the stars influenced the lives and fortunes of mortals:

"Hung be the heavens with black, yield day to night,
Comets, importing change of time and states,
Brandish your crystal tresses in the sky;
And with them scourge the bad revolting stars
That have consented unto Henry's death."

Apollonius, in his "Dissertation on Magic," declares that "a physician without a knowledge of the stars, and a necromancer without the bones of dead men, were nothing better than pretenders, for they were unaided by a spirit of understanding;" and Hermes, in his first book, "De Speculis et de Luce," remarks: "It is necessary for a physician to know well, and to consider the nature of the stars, and of their various operations, so that he may have a due notion of diverse maladies, and of the days that are most critical as regards them, since nature itself is changeable according to the aspect and the conjunction of the heavenly bodies."

Diodorus Siculus relates that a comet which appeared 371 years before the Christian era, was supposed by the inhabitants of Greece to have notified the destruction of the Achaian cities, Helix and Buri. A comet which appeared in the year 389 A.D., with a tail like a scimitar, excited universal terror amongst all the nations of the earth. The invasion of England by William the Conqueror, and his victory over the Anglo-Saxons and Harold in the battle of Hastings, in the year 1066, were supposed to have been prognosticated by the appearance of a comet in the heavens, "as no man ever before saw." The comet of 1106 seems to have been visible all over Europe; Matthew Paris says that it could be seen even in the daytime. The appearance of Halley's comet in 1456 was coincident with the acquisition of Constantinople by the Turks, and their threatened advance into Europe, and was regarded by Christendom with a superstitious dread, the portentousness of the event being increased by the contemporary occurrence of a lunar eclipse at Constantinople. "Lord save us from the devil, the Turk, and the comet," was a general addendum to the prayers of the time. However, although astrology even still has its professors and disciples, its falsity as a science has been long ascertained, and to all such superstitious notions relative to either stationary planets or "celestial vagrants," the universal enlightenment of the age,

"Now shines it like a comet of revenge—
A prophet to their fall!"

THE LAND OF TIN.

FOR upwards of twenty centuries the peninsula of Cornwall, the southmost county in the British Isles, has been supplying the world with tin. Notwithstanding this continued drain upon its resources, it is at present annually producing ten thousand tons of tin-ore, which is very considerably more than the produce of all the rest of the globe; the only other localities in which this metal has been found in any quantities being the Islands of the Eastern Archipelago, and Saxony, and Spain. This fact evidences how vast must have been the first deposit of tin in its rocks. In the days of Solomon, the ships of Tyre discovered the "far islands of the West," and the daring merchants of Asia furnished the Assyrians with British tin, to form those bronzes vessels and ornaments which the researches of Rawlinson and Layard have brought to light in the midst of the vast and desolate plains of Assyria, after the lapse of so many ages, and which serve to illustrate the state of art-manufacture in the time of that magnificent monarch, Sardanapalus, who, as we have been told in the "Bentley Ballads," was

"Nineveh's king,
And if all be quite true that the chroniclers sing,
Loved his jug and his glass,
And was given, alas!
Not only to bigamy,
Nor even to trigamy,

But (we shudder to think on't,) to rankest polygamy!"

We still find marks of the subterranean explorations of the Phœnician miners, or "old men," as they are locally termed, as well as of their smelting works, and to them, also, it is more than probable may be ascribed the erection of those stone circles and pillars so frequent in the peninsula. Some zealous antiquarians assert that Cornwall never came under the dominion of the Romans. If such were the case, however, it would be difficult to account for the indubitable "levels" or "galleries," of the Roman miners found in the county, and which, even in their ruins, display no inconsiderable engineering skill. There is, in our opinion, very little doubt that the Romans were well acquainted with the vast store of mineral treasure that exists in Cornwall, and that they not alone conquered and possessed it, in common with the rest of Britain, but sought its buried treasures with that indefatigable industry which was the secret of their empire's strength. The Saxons were less successful, not having been able to subdue the Cornish men until three hundred years had elapsed from the first landing of Hengist and Horsa. Many of their camps and earthworks are still discernible. This almost isolated district was made a kingdom in 446, A.D. by Vortigern. The West Saxon monarchs conquered it in 650, and in the course of the ninth and tenth centuries, it was overrun by the Saxons and Danes. For many years, until the abdication of Cadwalader, the Britons of Cornwall and Wales acknowledged a common sovereign. The former was erected into a Duchy by Edward III., in the year 1329, when its extensive stannaries or mines, (so called from the Latin word stannum, tin,) together with those of Devon, were granted to the Black Prince, who, with the succeeding Princes of Wales, drew immense revenues from the county. The dukedom is still held by the Prince of Wales, who has an exchequer court and a revenue of £30,000 from land, and appoints the sheriffs. Formerly, for the general regulation of the stannaries, representative assemblies of the miners were summoned, both in Devon and Cornwall. These were termed "parliaments" or "convocations of tinners," and were convened by the Lord Warden of the stannaries, in virtue of a writ issued by the Duke of Cornwall, or by the King, when there was no Duke, authorising and requiring him to do so. The last convocation was held in 1752.

The name Cornwall appears to be derived from the Celtic cornubia, signifying a horn, which is not inapplicable to the form of the country, and the Saxon wealas, a title given to the Britons. Its area, exclusive of the Scilly Isles, is 1365 square miles, about seven-eighths of which are arable, meadow, or pasture. The surface is irregular. A ridge of bleak, rugged granite rocks, rising to the height of from 800 to 1368 feet, traverses the centre of the peninsula, from which the country slopes, and the streams flow on each side. Some of the hill valleys on the southern side are charmingly picturesque, while the "combes" or short valleys, which run towards the sea on the north-western side, are very remarkable. The river Tamar, which rises at the north-eastern angle of the peninsula, and after a course of fifty-nine miles along the east border, falls into the roadstead of Plymouth Sound, forms the boundary between Cornwall and Plymouth. In every other direction the sea alone is the limit of the county. By tracing the coast line, we shall touch at a great number of interesting spots, as well as be enabled to note the chief geographical features of the county, which returns two members to parliament, and, according to the census of 1851, has a population of 355,558.

There is, perhaps, no portion of the sea-board of the British Isles on which the Atlantic breaks with greater force than on the north-western coast of Cornwall, between Moorwinstow and Tintagel Head, nor is there any other part of the peninsula which abounds in wilder or more picturesque scenery. The towering cliffs are everywhere broken and worn into a hundred fantastic forms, representing turrets, columns, and castles, rising far out at sea. There are two shallow bays, Bude and Widemouth, useless from accumulations of sand, and then come the prominent headlands, Dazard Castle, Penkender and Carnbeak Points. Bude Bay derives its name from the village connected by canal with Launceston; the latter place will be connected with Exeter by a railway, which will render the north of Cornwall more accessible. The well-known "Bude Light" was named by the inventor, Mr. Gurney, from this village, where he resides. In the immediate vicinity of this spot, was the ancient mansion of Stowe, for six hundred years the residence of the Cornish Grenvilles, a family of much renown and influence. It was at Stowe that, during the Parliamentary Wars, the intrigues with General Monk for the restoration of Charles II. were mainly carried on. About the beginning of the last century this splendid edifice was pulled down, and the even more stately Stowe, in Buckinghamshire, partly constructed with the materials. Passing the gloomy harbour of Boocastle, where may be seen a rare phenomenon, known as the "blowing hole," which is caused by the water being sucked into a fissure in a rock, outside the harbour, and ejected again in a steam-like jet of spray, and into which, it is locally affirmed, a young lady bathing in the harbour, a few years since, was drawn, as into a whirlpool, and never afterwards heard of, we reach the "silent tower of Botreux," to which is attached one of the most poetical of the innumerable wild legends of Cornwall. It is to the effect, that "once upon a time" a jealousy existed between Botreux and Tintagel, on account of the beautiful peal of bells belonging to the church of the latter, while the former possessed none, and the chimes of which would be tantalizingly wafted up the coast on the calm summer evenings. The inhabitants of Botreux soon raised a sum of money to provide a peal for their church, and the day at length arrived when the vessel containing them hove in sight. As she drew near the shore, the sweet chimes of the Tintagel bells were borne across the blue waters, and the pilot, who was a Tintagel man, reverently uncovering his head, exclaimed: "Thank God that I hear those bells once more! With His blessing we shall set foot on shore this evening." "Thank God upon land, you fool!" interrupted the captain, "on sea thank the seaman's skill, the good ship, and the prosperous wind." Scarcely had the scoffing words been uttered, than a terrible storm arose, the vessel was dashed to pieces on the dark rocks, and of all the souls on board, the grateful pilot alone was spared to tell the tale, while "Still when the storm of Botreux' waves

Is raging in his weedy caves,
Those bells, that sullen surges hide,
Peal their deep tones beneath the tide!
'Come to thy God, in time!'
Thus saith the ocean-chime—
'Storm, billow, whirlwind past,
Come to thy God at last!'"

Proceeding onwards along the "thundering shores of Bude and Boss," we reach the towering precipice of Tintagel Head, crowned with the venerable ruins of the castle reported to have been the birth-place of King Arthur. Judging from the existing remains of the fortress, it was unquestionably of Roman erection; but, although its history is enveloped in impenetrable obscurity, it is not improbable that the early Britons had here some rude fort before the invasion of the Romans. The site of the castle occupied a considerable space partly on the mainland, and partly on what is called the island, a portion of the promontory almost completely insulated by the action of the waves, and the only access to which is now by a narrow path over the dangerous cliffs on the western side, where the least slip of the foot would be certain to be attended by fatal results. After the Norman conquest, Tintagel castle became the occasional residence of several of the English princes, and here the celebrated "King of the Romans,"—as Richard, Earl of Cornwall was called—entertained his nephew, David, Prince of Wales, when in rebellion against the king, in 1245. In "Domesday book" Tintagel is mentioned as "Dunchine," or "Chain castle." It appears to have been kept in tolerable repair, and to have been occasionally used as a prison, until the reign of Elizabeth, when it was allowed to fall into ruins, which are the property of the duchy. From this interesting locality the coast takes a bold sweep to Padstow Bay, an excellent harbour, and the town of which is very romantically situated. Trevoze and Towan Heads are very prominent cliffs, and a few miles south of the latter point, at Perran Porth, near Perranzabuloe, are the singularly interesting ruins of the buried church of St. Piran, which were discovered in 1835, having been inhumed by the treacherous sands for several hundred years. According to tradition it was erected by St. Piran, a disciple of St. Patrick, who in his zeal to convert the fierce inhabitants of this part of Britain, established a church on their inhospitable shore. His reputation for sanctity was so great, that the environs of the church became a favourite burial-place; and when the ruins were being exhumed, an immense accumulation of skeletons, regularly arranged, was discovered. In the course of time this building was overwhelmed, and another church erected further inland, which, however, met the same fate, and so late as 1803, a third church was built still farther from the shore. In the vicinity are the remains of an amphitheatre, of uncertain date, one hundred and thirty feet in diameter, and capable of accommodating two thousand persons. About three miles from Perranzabuloe, near the coast, is the little village of St. Agnes, interesting as having been the birth-place of Hoppy, the carpenter-artist, whose sketches first attracted the attention of the celebrated Dr. Walcott ("Peter Pindar.") The young genius was carefully educated for a painter, and, under the assumed name of Opie, was one of the most popular portrait-painters half a century ago, although he never lost his rusticity of manner. His wife, Amelia Opie, attained much reputation as the authoress of some agreeable tales and verses.

At the north-western extremity of the pretty Bay of St. Ives is situated the pleasant and busy town of the same name. It is a place of considerable antiquity, and, like St. Piran, is supposed to be of Irish foundation. Notwithstanding the dangerous character of the adjacent coast, it is the principal station of the Pilchard fishery, the whole occupation during the summer months of the seafaring population of the Cornish seaboard. As many as 40,000 hogsheads of pilchards have been salted and packed here in one year, the value of which was no less than £80,000, Italy and Spain being the chief consumers. The Spaniards call these fish "fumados," of which, perhaps, the local name, "fair maids" of Cornwall, is a corruption. Near this part of the coast is the town of Redruth, the centre of an important mining district, and the name of which is said to be derived from "Dre-druth," that is to say, the "Druids' town." Be this as it may, crom-leas, circles, and other mementoes of the Druidical carnage-creed are still visible in the vicinity. The richest and most profitable tin mines in Cornwall are in this parish, and vast as have been their yields, they appear to increase in wealth the more they are developed, in addition to which, it may be added, they are comparatively inexpensive to work.

The bold promontory of the Land's End is, as its name implies, the westmost part of England. Its immediate neighbourhood is, probably, of the entire peninsula, richest in antiquarian remains. Amongst these is the celebrated "Logan" or "Logging" Stone, on the point of land where the ancient castle of Trevecon formerly stood. It is a popular error to suppose that this is one of those mis-

"Rocks of the Druid race,
Which a single touch in the world sets moving,
But all earth's power can't stir from their base."

The foundations of this part of the coast consist of a stupendous group of granite rocks, which are worn by the weather into the forms of prismatic, cubical, or spheroidal blocks. The surface of the "Logan" in contact with the under work is of very small extent, and the whole mass is on such accurate poise that, despite its weight of nearly sixty-six tons, the gentlest push applied to its under edge will cause it to very perceptibly oscillate. In the year 1824 it was, in the course of a frolic, thrown off its balance by Lieutenant Goldsmith, an officer of the navy, and nephew of the immortal Oliver, and some sailors, who were afterwards ordered by the Admiralty to replace it, a task which they achieved at the expenditure of much time, and the wear and tear of no end of tackle. Such stones are, without doubt, whether we meet with them in Cornwall or in Ireland, identical with the Betylia or "animated stones" of the Phœnicians, alluded to by Sanchoniathon. The employment of these natural phenomena to the purposes of Druidical superstition has been thus poetically referred to:—

"Behold yon huge
And unknown sphere of living adamant,
Which, poised by magic, rests its central weight
On yonder pointed rock; firm as it seems,
Such is its strange and virtuous property,
It moves obsequious to the gentlest touch
Of him whose heart is pure; but to a traitor,
Though e'en a giant's prowess nerved his arm,
It stands as fixed as Snowdon."

Not far from the "Logan Stone" are situate the Botallack and Levant mines. The workings of these extend considerably under the waves of the Atlantic, the miners pursuing their labours at the distance of half a mile from the shore. To aid their tasks gigantic steam-engines, with cylinders 100 inches in diameter, are employed in pumping water from those vast depths. Winding-engines, which are masterpieces of mechanical skill, are ever at work, raising the minerals from each dark abyss, and "man-engines," so termed because they bring the wearied miners to the light of day, saving them the toil and danger attendant upon ascending perpendicular and rickety ladders, have been introduced in some of these mines. Twenty-four miles off the Land's End, and to its south-west, are the Scilly Isles, a group about thirty miles in circumference, and comprising more than one hundred and forty islands. Only six are inhabited—St. Mary's, the largest of the group, on which stands the fortified town of St. Hugh, the capital; Treco, St. Martin's, St. Agnes', Sampson, and Bryer. Together with Cornwall, the Scilly Isles were the Cassiterides, or tin islands, of the Phœnicians and Greeks; the Romans used them as a place of banishment for political offenders. They were held by Sir John Granville for Charles I., during the Parliamentary wars, and no less a distinguished personage than Blake, "Admiral and General at Sea," was employed in 1651 to dislodge the Royalists. In 1707 the flag-ship of Admiral Sir Cloudesley Shovel, and several other vessels, were wrecked on the Gilstone Rock, off St. Mary's, one of these islands, the admiral and not less than two thousand others perishing. Penzance, near the head of Mount's Bay, is the most westerly town in England. Between this bay and the Scilly Isles, arable land, meadows, woods, and one hundred and forty parish churches, are said to be submerged. Two very eminent men, Lord Exmouth and Sir Humphrey Davy, were born in Penzance, as well as two very remarkable women—Dolly Pentreath, memorable in the county as the last who spoke the real Cornish language, (a Celtic dialect, by the way,) who died at Mousehole, an adjoining village, in 1788, aged 102; and Mary Kalynack, who, in 1851, at the age of 84, walked to London to see the Great Exhibition and catch a glimpse of the Queen. On the opposite side of Mount's Bay is the town of Marazion, or Market Jew, which is connected, by a long, narrow causeway with an island about a mile in circumference, on which stands St. Michael's Mount, a lofty rock nearly two hundred feet in height, and the summit of which is crowned with the ruins of a monastic edifice, "the rude remains of high antiquity," and a castle, which underwent a severe siege during the Wars of the Roses.

Lizard Point is the southmost part of England. In the little parish church of Landevenack, in its immediate vicinity, the service was performed in the Cornish dialect for the last time in 1680. From the Lizard the coast trends away in a north-easterly direction to Black Head, and thence to Falmouth, once a seaport of great importance in the West Indian and Portuguese trades. It was defended by Pendennis and Mames Castles, on the opposite side of the estuary of the Helford, both of which were built by Henry VIII.; Pendennis underwent a lengthened siege by Oliver Cromwell. From this point to the Devonshire boundary the principal headlands are Dodman Point, and Gribban and Rame Heads. Truro, a handsome town, in the centre of a leading mining district; Launceston, possessing very interesting ruins of a noble fortalice; and Bodmin, are the remaining towns demanding special notice. The latter is now the county town, and is a place of great antiquity, having been the seat of an important monastery in the Saxon and early Norman times, some remains of which still exist. In the time of Henry VI., about 10,000 Cornish men opposed the authority of the Protector Somerset, but were defeated by Lord Russell. The rebels had insisted that the youthful monarch should abide by all the decrees of his council, and in all things take the advice of their leader, Arundel of the Mount, and the Mayor of Bodmin! The royal general told the latter he would see him hanged first, and fulfilled his promise. A certain ungallant and scandal-loving local historian says that the mayor's wife intended to petition Lord Russell for her husband's life, and would, perhaps, have been successful, but she delayed so long in adjusting her new French hood, that the unfortunate mayor was gibbeted before she arrived.

When we add that old red sand-stone, the "Killas" of the miner, covers about three-fourths of Cornwall; that in the interior of the county this is intersected by three large masses of granite, as well as by porphyry veins and dikes, and limestone beds; that the climate is mild, especially in winter, but damp, with almost daily visits from Jupiter Pluvius; that the greater portion of the population are, of course, connected with mining operations, and generally devoutly believe in pixies and other hobgoblins, we have said all that our space will permit us anent the LAND OF TIN.

THE THEORY OF DECLARATIONS.

I AM really puzzled to account for the elaborate trouble with which the novelists describe the process of courtship, and the toil and ingenuity expended by those clever gentlemen on that simplest of all forms—a declaration. My cousin, Sarah Fanlight, lately accompanied me to the opera; and when the last scene was over and the curtain had descended, I ventured to ask my candid, unsentimental relative her opinion of the performance. Her reply—she was fresh from Northampton, and was ignorant of dissimulation—convinced me that she had a deep respect for common sense, and that a favourite theory of mine was honoured with her concurrence. "Dear," she said, "the scenery was very pretty; but wasn't there a great deal of noise about getting two people married?" My cousin was as just as she was laconic; for, in common with hundreds of large-headed people, who lament those brighter and more human times, when nature was untrammelled by social artificialities, and love was something nobler than a civil institution; when novels reflected life without exaggerating it, and the heroic world contented itself with monosyllables; I feel bound to protest against those mysteries, combinations of language, feeling, and incident in which the play of the affections is involved by contemporary fiction. This morbid desire for polish and effect, which aspires to gild over everything, from the cornice to the coal-skuttle, must have a demoralizing influence on us and our generation, and end in destroying that tenderness and confidence which are the most fascinating elements of admiration developed into love.

The old novelists and dramatists analysed the affections with a subtle appreciation to which we are totally estranged. See how one of Shakespeare's heroes manages a declaration; a stage conventionalism reduces him to his knees; but that voluntary humiliation does not compromise the wisdom of his tongue or the dignity of his manners. All his compliments, high-winged and figurative as they may be, have broad and obvious relations to truth and rationality; we never lose the lover in the orator. Nothing can be more charming than the Moor's description of the wooing of Desdemona; there is no fustian, no parade, no spasmodic alternations of hope and despondency; he tells a plain story, captivates the lady, and leads her off, without calling in the assistance of fainting fits and blue fire to increase his triumph. In Massinger we find a similar acceptance of truth and rejection of the improbable. Le Sage, who, to the vivacity of a Frenchman united the reasonable tendencies and acute observation of his English contemporaries, delights now and then in stiltedness and exaggeration. Roger, King of Sicily, when he woos the Lady Blanche, has no limits to his transports, and, in consequence, renders himself an object of ridicule. "Adorable Blanche," says his moderate-minded majesty, "your fears are obliging and justify my attachment to your charms; but the excess of your doubts injures my love, and (if I may be allowed to say so) the esteem which you owe me. No! think not that my destiny and yours can ever be separated." But, notwithstanding that the wily Frenchman occasionally levied contributions from this fountain of objectionable inspiration, he knew how to be natural when he liked; and, in "Gil Blas," the "Bachelor of Salamanca," and "the Devil on Two Sticks," he has painted a crowd of pictures illustrative of this subject, with inimitable truth and delicacy. Contrasted with the lights of the modern schools, with, let us say, Bulwer and Balzac, whom we may fairly take as representatives of the English and French drama and romance, it will be seen that the old craftsmen, who were often compelled to observe life through the keyhole, are far more accurate and appreciative than their successors, who enjoy the full blaze and society of the saloons. The former left human nature to its skins and fig leaves, and allowed it to manifest all the graces and eccentricities which spring from impulse or culture; the latter insists on having it spangled and gewgawed, and sent out to practise studied antics under the glare of theatrical gaslight. One is truth; the other, with all respect for verbal propriety, is entitled to the distinction—fiction.

It is a notorious social fact, with which speculative mothers and keen young ladies are specially familiar, that declarations of love are generally made under the most commonplace and unromantic conditions. The suitor requires neither parterre, nor balcony, nor moonlight to inspire his tongue; and the lady, whether in full dress or négligé, is, generally speaking, graciously disposed to lend a charmed ear to the declaration. Now, those are obvious truths, daily negatived by novel writers in their treatment of passion and its legitimate consummation. Sheridan, who won his wife heroically but humbly, and unbosomed himself to the Bath beauty in an ordinary back parlour, makes his heroes commit all sorts of exaggeration in their lofty endeavours to convert a straightforward proposal into an essay on stupidity and diffidence. Why should we not have the plain truth, and abstain from the absurdity of trimming serge with costly lace—of making a simple incident of everyday life an occasion for a display of meretricious rhodomontade?

My friend Nudges—he has been married ten years, and has expended a little money on gum-cornals—was, at an indecisive period of his life, a tremendous patron of the beautiful world of fiction. Man and woman he knew only through the medium of those fine imaginative tissues called romances, which were enough popular twenty-five years ago to secure several long-forgotten authors a handsome competence in return for their labours; but of man and woman, living, breathing, and thinking, Mr. Nudges, except to a very limited extent, knew nothing. He was shy and reserved in society; no lady could boast of having "drawn him out," or extracted from him, in his most familiar moods, anything better than the faint smile or stimulated giggle which betrays inexperience and mauvaise honte. Whilst suffering from this unhappy temperament, my poor friend was caught in the meshes of a bright-witted, sparkling blonde, a Devonshire beauty, who was popularly known as "the pretty Miss Briston." For days and months he loved and languished; but with a reticence above all praise, he held his tongue and worshipped in silence. At last, as he confessed years after, he "could stand it no longer;" he made me his confidant, and requested me to use my good offices for him with the charming Miss Briston. Commissioned with full powers to bring matters to an issue, I obtained an interview with his idol, and pleaded my client's suit with all the fervour of friendly advocacy. Beautiful Miss Briston! her colour came and went, and kept going and coming for some moments, whilst her exquisite hand trifled with an Indian handscreen in the fulness of her gentle confusion. Then she spoke, and said such sweet things of Nudges, that I envied the delicious dog, and wished that client and advocate were rolled into one. Sweet things! but, alas, with a little bitter aloe at the bottom: she would consent to everything, with this important reservation—Miss Briston would not be wooed by proxy. When Nudges had learned the result of my suit, or rather his, he looked very dejected, pronouncing the case hopeless; but I rallied the dear fellow, and sent him off, cheerful and determined, to plead for himself in propria persona. He returned after a lapse of two hours, florid and delighted.

"Well," I enquired, "have you succeeded?"

"Succeeded?—yes; why, there's no difficulty about it, say what they will."

"But how did you do it?" I asked.

"Sit down a moment and I shall tell you," replied the buoyant Nudges. I obeyed, and he began this way:—

"When I got to Salem Avenue I found Miss Briston sewing at the drawing-room window. I praised the weather, and she was good enough to concur with my opinion of it. You will understand that I did not allude to 'the matter' at once; so we fell chatting on a hundred things, and, at her request, I hummed the Sequilda, which she thought very fine, and complimented me on my execution of it. You needn't smile; Emma—I mean Miss Briston—doesn't compliment all sorts of people, I assure you. Well, a hundred times I nerved myself with the firm intention of popping the question; but I could not; I was all in a flutter, whilst she sat before me as cool as an icicle, purling a lace collar and talking of aquatics. At one time I got as far as 'you will excuse me, Miss Briston, but'—when she suddenly raised her head and said, 'Sir,' in a manner which made me instantly decide on changing the topic. Then she grew fidgetty and dropped her thimble, and said 'twas a naughty thimble, and asked me if ever I wore thimbles. I said I did not, and that I should wish her good morning. So I rose and shook hands with her, and went as far as the lobby, leaving her still in the drawing-room. 'Now Nudges,' I said to myself, 'now is your time, my fine fellow; turn back, throw yourself on your left knee, and say you adore her.' I actually got as far as the mat in the hope of having the courage to execute this manoeuvre. I even opened the door and put in my head, but there I stuck, looking at Emma—I mean Miss Briston—and Miss Briston looking at me.

"I beg your pardon," I said.

"Pray, don't apologise," said the lady, 'wont you wait for tea?'

"I'm afraid you'll be offended with me."

"Indeed I shall not, Sir. You're very provoking—what is it?'

"Miss Briston," I said, 'will you do what my friend Tom Walker (that's you, Tom) asked you?'

"I heard a low 'yes';—I rushed into the room—I caught her hand—I—but I'm too much the gentleman to tell what followed."

"My dear fellow," I said, "you knew how to do it." At the same time I became reflective. Here was a simple, truthful, declaration of a man's love, conveyed with a fascinating indirectness, whose total want of conventionalism captivated a beautiful woman, and made a bashful lover the happiest fellow in her Majesty's dominions. If an old declaration-monger only laid hold of this pretty passage of rose-pointed foils, Tithonus! how he would have broken it up into a million fragments, plunged them into his pots and crucibles, stirred and ladled them until every atom of human nature would have been refined away, and the whole reduced to a purely chemical base. We should hear of "the soft twilight pervading the lofty and luxurious apartment;" of "the aurora-like blush which suffused the lovely brows" of the interesting party; Nudges would grow hyperbolical and Emma hysterical; and the scene would be wound up with a theatrical tableaux, bringing out the "silken dress" of the lady, and the black pants of the gentleman. For my part, I regard Nudge's avowal as the model of a declaration; it was sublime in its consistency; and whenever the delicious moment arrives that shall place me in a position similar to that of my friend, I shall lay my hand upon my heart, and "calm the intoxication of my soul" with the recollection of Nudges.

POPPING THE QUESTION!

You know where the green little wicket
Swings round in the blue garden gloom,
And the shaft of the weather-stained dial
Lies low in the sweetbriar blooms;
Where the cottage's wild-blossomed gables
Are dreamily hanging above,
I was there—on a sunset in August—
And dreamt, for the first time, of love:
Twixt my hot hands I prisoned four fingers;
"O lily-white captives," I cried,
"Go plead with your beautiful mistress;
Ask Juliet if she'll be my bride."

I looked in her face, it was pensive,
Calm curved the bright lapses of her mouth,
Her bright hair was rich as the corn-land,
When blown by the wind of the south;
"O pretty ambassadors seek her,
Pat her temples with touches so fine
That her pity may waken and sparkle—
That she may be mine—may be mine."
Black through the gathering twilight
The high rooks sailed dizzily home;
Bright through the rose-tinted heaven
A low planet rayed into bloom.

"Would that the world were mine, dearest,
We'd dwell in a palace, alone,
Abroad on some ocean-sphered highland—
Heart, passions, and fancies our own;
Or sail over measureless waters,
Between eadared and cinnamonod shores,
With the balm of the land on our foreheads,
And the flame of the stars on our oars."
One moment she looked at Uranus,
Then her eyes turned slowly on me,
"Dear Frederick," she anxiously murmured,
"Don't you think that we'd better have tea?"

THE MILLER OF MOHILL.

A TALE IN THREE CHAPTERS.

BY WILLIAM CARLETON.

CHAP. III.—RETRIBUTION—A DEED OF BLOOD.

IT is sufficient to say, that under Jemmy's guidance they reached the cottage; the wounded man still alive, but as it would seem, incapable of speech. Tully and his wife, after having lit a candle, immediately placed him in their own bed, having first taken off his clothes; Tully then examined his wound, which was in the shoulder, but upon the closest possible inspection of it, he was unable to give them any hope of his recovery. He prepared an application, however, which succeeded in staunching the blood, and to some extent in mitigating the pain. His brother Michael then went to him, and bursting into tears, stooped down and kissed him, weeping bitterly. The old man, however, with all the authority of superior knowledge, pulled him from the bed, exclaiming:

"What the sarra do you mane, man alive? Do you want to kill the boy? Don't you know he must be kept quiet? Come now, be aff out o' this every man of you, and lave him to myself. And what is more, mark that I don't make any enquiries into this business; and won't either hear or listen to anything whatsoever about it."

"To know anything about it, doesn't signify much," replied Michael; "bekase it was a mere accident, but do you save his life if you can; and take my word for it, you'll be well paid; here's money for you, and bring a doctor to him, and don't spare any cost. Save his life, and you'll be a well-paid man; that's all I have to say."

They then withdrew, all but Jemmy, who refused, under any circumstances, to leave the wounded man.

"Jemmy be about him;" he said, "and run messages for Peter, and run to you too," he added, addressing Michael;

"and tell you how him is; no, Jemmy won't leave him, Jemmy knows what a heather bed is, and him stop on it, now and den, ay bedadla."

This was considered another good suggestion of the fool's, and it was accordingly acceded to without hesitation.

When the party reached Sullivan's house, the three Tipperary men went immediately to bed, and owing to the natural fatigue of the preceding day's labour, and of their trudge to and from the mountain that night they fell into a profound sleep. Not so, however, with the man who was the master spirit in the whole dreadful proceedings. If ever a mortal soul was torn asunder by the terrible struggles of remorse and revenge, Michael Sullivan's was on that miserable and unhappy night. He was, in fact, a dark, unfeeling hypocrite to the world, but so admirably had he managed his intercourse with it, that no human being had been able to raise the veil which concealed his natural character from the public view. But at the same time, strange as it may seem, his affection for James transcended the love of brethren. His naturally misanthropical spirit cared not for the aggregate of human kind which move in and constitute life. In fact, he only used them for his own purposes, and despised them. So was it not with respect to James. So far as he was concerned, it would seem that all those affections which a better nature would have expended upon his fellow-creatures were gathered in his heart, in order to be concentrated upon his brother. In all the ordinary affairs of life that brother's word and least wish were a law to him. And now, upon the only occasion on which he refused to be guided by his remonstrances, what had he to blame but his own dark and jealous spirit for the bloody and calamitous fate in which he had involved that beloved brother. On this night, indeed, he felt as if his breast were filled with fire. He accused himself as the cause of his brother's death should he die, of which there existed every probability, but he strove to transfer his own guilt to Kennedy, who had only acted in the sacred duty of defending his innocent and beloved daughter from an outrage probably worse than death itself. On the miller, therefore, he turned his darkest and deepest determinations of future vengeance. Should his brother live, however, he was determined to keep himself apart from further outrage—but, on the contrary, if he died, he was determined to have life for life. This dark and bloody logic reconciled him somewhat to what had and what might happen, for indeed his reasonings were the reasonings of a murderer.

We do not wish to keep the reader's attention engaged upon matters of mere detail, but on the contrary, to come, without omitting, however, any necessary circumstance, to the salient points of our story.

On the day following the scene at the miller's house, there was certainly a rumour and an uproar throughout the neighbourhood and the parish; and many of his neighbours and of his friends and relatives flocked there to ascertain the particulars of the outrage. Among the first who arrived was the bridegroom-elect, young Tom Cavanagh, whose consternation and dismay at the occurrence were only equalled by his delight and satisfaction at the providential but narrow escape of his intended bride. The house, in fact, was crowded during the whole day with persons anxious to congratulate the miller and him upon the failure of the foul and dastardly attempt which had been made. Loud were the discussions and innumerable the surmises and conjectures as to who the guilty parties could be. The whole outrage, however, was involved in such darkness and mystery, that it was felt impossible to guess at, much less to name, any particular individual who might be considered the leading man upon the occasion. The good easy miller, when asked whether he had taken any steps to trace or find out the authors of the outrage, replied with a laugh:

"Find them out! Not I, the blackguards, let them take what they got; I'll engage they won't come back again, now that they have a notion of the warm welcome they'll get. My child's safe, that's all I care about, but as for them, they may go to the devil, and sure I am that I sent one of them to him last night; so that I'm satisfied, if they are."

About two o'clock, among others, who should present himself as a sympathiser but honest Michael Sullivan, and scarcely a man had arrived there that day who was received with a warmer or more cordial welcome.

"Here's a man," said the miller, shaking him by the hand, "that would have given me and Anne a lift if he had been near us. Indeed, as it is, I may thank him that my poor ould mill—that's now all the wife I have—wasn't burnt to death and brought to a heap of ashes." He then related the anecdote with which the reader is already acquainted.

"Troth, and I wish I had been near you last night, Frank," replied Michael, "and I wouldn't let my ould sweetheart be run away wid—at laste by any one barrin myself—ha, ha, ha. But how was it, Frank?"

The miller then repeated the circumstances for the twentieth time that day.

"And have you no suspicion of who the cowardly rascals were?" asked Michael.

"Divil a the laste, only that one of them must be an able villain, for he tumbled me like a spatchcock wid one blow—but not before I tumbled him wid another; however, he hot me treacherous."

"I wish to the Father, Tom," said Michael, addressing Cavanagh, "that you and I had been there; it's in the stone-jug the villains would be to-day."

"As it is, Michael," replied Cavanagh, "we have all raison to be thankful to God for Anne's escape; at laste, her own friends and mine have."

"And do you think," replied Michael, "that I'm not as thankful for it as e'er a one of you?"

"Troth I'm sure you are, Michael," said Cavanagh; "and I'm sure that divil a man livin' would 'a come to her relief sooner, barrin' myself or her father."

"Well, I don't know whether you'd be guided by me or not, Tom," said Michael. "Frank, I'm spakin' to you, too."

"What is it, Michael?"

"I say I don't know whether you or Tom here 'ud be guided by my advice or not; but if you would, I'd recommend you not to keep her a single night undher your roof till afther her marriage, when she can go home to her husband, and then nobody will think of runnin' away wid her."

"Faith," replied Cavanagh, looking to the miller for his consent, "and my own opinion is that a squnder advice couldn't be given. Who knows but these scoundrels might come back wid greater force, and that lives might be lost, and maybe my own Anne, too, taken away."

The miller paused a moment. "Troth," said he, "it's a good thought, and it was a kind heart it came from. True enough then; I'll send her down to her uncle's in Ballycloghan, where she'll have the whole market-town to protect her. Thank you, Michael; throth it's a comfort to have such a neighbour as you are."

"I hope, Michael, that you'll be at the weddin'," said Cavanagh, "and that you'll be my own man, too."

"To be sure he will," said the miller; "do you think, Tom, we didn't intend to have him?"

"Well," replied Michael, "I'll be wid yez; but don't you know, Tom," he added, laughing, "that it's too much to ask an ould sweetheart of Anne's to stand by and see her married to another; not that ever I was a sweetheart of hers, but in troth she was of mine. But it's all fair play; she preferred you, Tom, and small blame to her, and for the same raison I'll be your 'man' wid a heart and a half."

In the meantime the struggle between life and death in the case of James Sullivan was dreadful. Peter Tully, finding that his own skill was far from being adequate to grapple with the condition of his patient, procured the assistance of a doctor who lived on the other side of the mountains, who, however, no sooner saw him than he too expressed very faint hopes of his recovery.

"Sir," said Peter, after having given him his fee, and promised to procure the medicines prescribed, and otherwise follow his instructions carefully, "this boy is a nephew of mine, and got this wound in actin' against the landlord and his bailiffs, and I'd take it as a favour if you'd say nothing about his bein' here. You know yourself, sir, that the appearance of bailiffs or the polis undher this roof, and him in the state he's in, would kill him."

"I am a doctor," replied the surgeon, "but not a spy, Mr. Tully; so that on that subject you need entertain no apprehensions whatsoever."

Every night Jemmy went down to his brother Michael to give an account of his condition; and it so happened for purposes which will be seen hereafter, that every account was worse than another, so that all hope was nearly gone from that brother's heart.

"I will go to see him, Jemmy," said he; I must go to see him, for I can bear this no longer. I must have his forgiveness before he dies for having murdered him."

"You didn't shot him," replied Jemmy, "it was Bodagh the Grinder; but Peter Tully says you kill him if you go; he bid me tell you dat; you can't go till him sends for you. De people, too, is watchin' de mountains, but Jemmy knows de byeways, and de can't see me."

"True enough, Jemmy," said Michael, "and I must only wait till he gets better or is dead; as for gettin' his forgiveness I know I will, because he knew that I had no expectation that he would have met the fate he did."

"Him did forgive you," replied Jemmy; "him bid Jemmy tell you that he did."

"Well," replied Michael, "that's a great relief to my heart, Jemmy, and if he dies I know what I'll do."

As he spoke the darkness of murder gathered upon his face, his eyes glared with the lurid fire of revenge, and Jemmy could hear that he ground and crunched his teeth with a fury that he could scarcely suppress.

Whilst James Sullivan remained in this awful equilibrium, between hope and despair, the miller had availed himself of the hint, so artfully thrown out by the elder Sullivan, for removing his daughter from under his own roof. She was removed accordingly, and he remained with no person in the house but his servant-maid, Peggy Devlin, to whom, by the way, Aherne was paying his addresses. There was at that period a shebeen-house, kept by a fiddler, about three miles or nearly from the miller's house, where a dance was held every Sunday evening, which was attended by most of the servants of both sexes for a considerable distance around it, the evening of Sunday being that only on which they could obtain liberty to get out for their amusement. On those occasions the miller was consequently alone, and contrived to solace his temporary solitude by reading a volume or two of ballads, of which he had a considerable variety. In this state of things matters remained until Sunday evening, about an hour after dusk, when Jemmy once more made his appearance, in a state of the deepest distress.

Michael's heart sank with a weight like that of death when he looked upon him.

"Well, Jemmy," said he, "I am afeard you have bad news."

"Oh! him dead!" replied Jemmy, wringing his hands—him dead at last—poor Misty James dead!" and he exhibited manifestations of the most violent grief.

Michael paused and looked at him, and his eyes glazed—for, strange to say, grief at that moment was completely shut out from his heart—that heart which was now thundering, as it were, with the terrible tumults of revenge and murder. He immediately went to the kitchen, and called the three servant-men, but only two of them made their appearance.

"Where is Aherne?"—he asked, "that I don't see him?"

"He and Peggy Devlin," they replied, "are gone to Condy Moran's dance."

"Ha!" exclaimed Michael, his eyes now kindling with a ferocious delight; "ay, that's all right."

"Jemmy," said he, addressing the fool, "go up again to the mountains, and tell Peter Tully that I'll be there to-morrow night; and don't you come here until then."

"Poor Misty James!" exclaimed Jemmy, in evident grief. "Bodagh the Grinder shotted him—'kase he wouldn't let him lash Jemmy wid his whip. Ay, Bodagh the Grinder shotted poor Misty James!" and with these words he disappeared.

"Well," said Sullivan, "Aherne has her off; that's all right. I gave him a hint to do so. God—God!—from the accounts I got of him, I didn't think he'd be apt to pass this day—but now—now!"

"Misther Sullivan," said Houlaghan, "You look strange and quare—something's wroong—what's the matter?"

"My brother's dead!" he replied, "the miller murdered him!"

"Well," replied Hannigan, "it can't be helped now; you know your duty, I hope; there's only one coorse to take; the miller must follow him! Give Houlaghan and me five pounds between us, and we'll save you the trouble."

"I will," he replied; "but listen! by no hand but mine must the villain fall; assist me you may, and I intended it; but the death-blow must be mine. Prepare now; we won't shoot him, for I'm known to have arms, and that might lead them to suspect us, if marks of such wounds were found on him; but we'll settle him some other way."

That night, between ten and eleven o'clock, the miller was sitting, without care, sorrow, or trouble, at his own fire-side, a tumbler of punch on the table beside him, whilst he sang with a lusty voice "The Miller of Dee," and he had just concluded the burthen,

"I care for nobody, no, not I,
If nobody cares for me."

when a knock came to the door. Suspecting no attempt upon his daughter, now that she had been removed to a place of safety, he arose without dread or apprehension, and at once opened it. The miller, who was dressed on that occasion in a black coat and a black vest, with drab trousers, seeing that it was his honest neighbour, Michael Sullivan and his two servants who were there, shook hands in the most cordial spirit with Sullivan, and asked them all in.

"I'm as glad as a pound-note you came," said he, "for I'm sitting here widout a soul wid me but myself. That girsha of a servant o' mine is gone down to Condy Moran's dance, and sure the poor crature, if she doesn't get out for an hour or two of a Sunday evening to pick up a sweetheart and get married, what's to become of her, barrin' to die an ould maid, and, indeed, that 'ud be a pity—and she such a tight, clane, goodlooking girl. Troth she desarved it at my hands at all events, after the manly fight she made for me the other night. Come we must have a glass of punch, and I'll sing yez the "Miller of Dee."

It is not our intention to describe the details of this atrocious murder. It is enough to say that the three miscreants were engaged in it, and that the deathblow was given to him by a tremendous stroke of a large poker, which came from the hand of Michael Sullivan. It was an awful sight to see the large manly frame of the benevolent and kind-hearted miller lying inanimate and dead upon his own hospitable hearth, without ever having committed an offence towards a human being, or a single act—unless what occurred in defence of his daughter—that could entail upon him the resentment or vengeance of man, woman, or child.

"Now," said Hannigan, "that job's finished—and well finished—that last blow of the poker settled him; but what's to be done?"

"I don't care," replied Michael, with a voice of savage exultation, "what is done now? I have taken vengeance for the life of my dead and murdered brother—and that's all I want."

"We must hide the body," said Hannigan, "there's plenty of bog-holes in the neighbourhood, and we'll put him in one of them—then let them find it when they can. It'll keep back the polis for a while at any rate, and puzzle them all besides."

"It's a good thought," observed Houlaghan, "and let us do it at wanst."

"Go out first, mashter," said Hannigan, "and see that the coast is clear."

Sullivan stole out, and went here and there to peep about and reconnoitre the premises.

"Wouldn't it be a good job," said Hannigan, "to see what money's in the house?"

"Ay," replied the other, "but we wouldn't have time, and besides Sullivan wouldn't stand that."

They then procured a large sack, which was lying in the kitchen, for the purpose of bearing away the body in it.

"At all events," said Hannigan, "when the reward comes, it'll be a windfall to us."

Sullivan, who had been peeping stealthily about, came as stealthily back, and as he cautiously opened the door, he happened to hear the last clause of the sentence uttered by Hannigan; and for the first time he suspected treachery. He said nothing, however, and did not look as if he had heard the expression. They then took up the body, which Hannigan and Houlaghan bore in the sack, holding a corner of it in each hand, and with a strong grip, whilst Sullivan took the key from the inside of the lock, locked the door from the outside, after which he slipped it quietly in his pocket. Having thrown the body into a bog-hole, they proceeded a portion of the way home, not by the usual path, but across the fields, when Sullivan said:

"Boys, go home, and keep the house; I'll be afther yez in half an hour, and you won't have any cause to regret it. Trust to me, in half an hour's time you'll see me, or if not tonight, early in the morning."

They accordingly proceeded home, and left their master to accomplish a plan which he had just conceived.

"These villains," said he, "for the sake of the reward that will be offered, will hang me if they can, but it will go hard with me or I will manage to prevent them."

Whether he did so or not, will appear in due time.

(TO BE CONCLUDED IN OUR NEXT.)

THE GHOST OF AN IMPRESSION.—If a wafer be laid on a surface of polished metal, which is then breathed upon, and if, when the moisture of the breath has evaporated, the wafer be shaken off, we shall find that the whole polished surface is not as it was before, although our senses can detect no difference; for if we breathe upon it, the surface will be moist everywhere, except on the spot previously sheltered by the wafer. Again and again we breathe, and the moisture evaporates, but still the spectral wafer re-appears. This experiment succeeds after a lapse of many months, if the metal be carefully put aside where the surface cannot be disturbed. If a sheet of paper on which a key has been laid be exposed for some minutes to the sunshine, and then instantaneously viewed in the dark, the key being removed, a fading spectre of the key will be visible. Let this paper be put aside for many months where nothing can disturb it, and then in the darkness be laid on a plate of hot metal, the spectre of the key will again appear. In the case of bodies more highly phosphorescent than paper, the spectres of many different objects which may be laid on in succession will on warming emerge in their proper order.

EFFIE.

A MEMORY.

From that silent, open window,
High in the lonely house,
Where, through the day, the jasmine boughs
In the crisping sunshine drowse,

A dead, white face looks ever down,
Looks half across the lawn—
Looks and smiles from year to year—
From sunset to the dawn.

O gentle face, O gentle eyes;
O buried love and child!
Long years ago you paled and closed,
When March was blowing wild.

Long years ago; I know it well,
For now mine hair is gray:
Yet, in those dreaming moods, I think
'Twas only yesterday.

And the jasmine caught the sunshine,
And the vine buds sucked the air,
And Effie leant across the sill,
And shook her yellow hair;

And called me twenty pretty names,
When I told her she should be
A little queen of all the world—
An Effie unto me.

'Twas pleasant, through the Summer day,
To pace the garden floor,
And hear her voice ring out between
The elm and sycamore.

To see her stretch her tiny hands,
Out through the curtain's folds,
For the sad flowers she loved the best—
The shining marigolds.

And often when the sun was low,
And the great garden walls
Bloomed with the wealth of Autumn time,
Like crimson waterfalls,

To walk beside her on the grass,
To sit beneath the beech,
And listen whilst her fancies streamed,
In links of wondering speech.

Well, I am old: this rounded life
Slips past with little loss;
The silver lode is pierced and drained,
Much of the rest is dross.

Time breaks our idols into dust,
And turns the tides of will;
But, when the worst has been achieved,
We love their fragments still.

So do I sit, this April day,
Under the garden lime,
And cheat my heart of bitter thoughts,
With thoughts of a sweet lost time.

Sometimes, afloat those peaceful moods,
In which my heart is ailed,
Strikes, like starlight on an urn,
The voice of a little child.

And lifting up my dreaming eyes,
To the old accustomed place,
Between the jasmine leaves I catch,
A glimpse of Effie's face.

OTTER-HUNTING ON THE BLACKWATER.

N the interim, while the dogs are disposing of their early breakfast, a short sketch of the natural history of the animal whose haunts we are about to disturb, may serve to while away the time profitably. The otter is a carnivorous animal, belonging to the family Mustelidae. Two forms of the animal are met with in these countries, namely, the river-otter, or Lutra of Storr; and the Sea-otter, or Enhydra of Fleming. The structure of the latter resembles that of the seal (Phoca Vitulina), particularly in the formation of the cranial bones. It inhabits our sea-coasts, and is extremely numerous on the shores of the Scottish Isles, and along the basaltic crags that tower over the wild sea-waves on the shores of Antrim. From the inaccessible caves and fissures that everywhere yawn around that iron-bound coast, it issues forth, chiefly by night, and commits dreadful havoc among the schools of fish, particularly salmon, that swarm outside river mouths and bays; and for this reason it is looked upon with no small amount of hostility by the fishermen, who frequently band together and make vengeful raids upon its wild haunts. But with such excursions we have nothing to do at the present, and shall therefore return to the history of the river-otter.

The river-otter (Mustela Lutra of Linnaeus) is generally from about two feet and a half to four feet in length. It is of a brown colour, which verges into grey or yellowish white on the breast and neck. Its body is long and cylindrical, and terminated by a tail, which, thick at first, and compressed horizontally, tapers to a graceful point. The circumference of its neck is very little less than that of the body; and its head, which appears somewhat small in consequence of the thickness of the neck, is depressed and flattened in a horizontal direction like the tail. It will be easily seen from the foregoing particulars that it is eminently adapted for the life it leads, which is principally aquatic. Its legs are short, but the articulations of the latter are so flexible, that when it swims swiftly the four limbs may be seen drawn up in a line with the body, and acting after the manner of fins. The foot of the otter is armed with five sharp-clawed toes, connected for almost three-fourths of their extent by webbed membranes, like the feet of water-fowl. Its fur is short and glossy, and was formerly accounted of considerable value.

The food of this animal is principally fish, which it destroys often in great numbers, but nothing comes amiss to its voracious stomach, for it not only feeds upon earthworms, snails, and such like, but will sometimes pay a visit to the farmyard and prey upon poultry, young pigs, and lambs. It is seldom, however, that it resorts to the latter expedient for obtaining food, and probably if the stories of such depredations were diligently investigated by the naturalist, the damage almost in every instance would be found to lie at the door of our craftiest beast of prey, namely, old Reynard.

The eyes of the otter are so placed that whether in front of, beside, or above, or below, it can keep its prey in sight by the slightest turn of its head. Its teeth are also well fitted for seizing fish, generally so slippery and difficult of capture. The tubercles on the molar or jaw-teeth, particularly in those towards the front of mouth, are exceedingly sharp and pointed, so that when once a fish comes in contact with them, it has but little chance of escape. The moment the otter seizes its prey, it makes for the nearest secure spot on the shore, and there commences its voracious meal by taking a luxurious bite out of the shoulder of the luckless fish. It then proceeds downwards towards the tail, which, along with the head and neck, it leaves upon the bank, and plunges in once more, making sad and wanton havoc amongst the finny tribes of the river.

The otter makes its home beneath the fragments of rock that compose fish weirs, and between the gnarled roots of the trees that throw their cool shadows over the limpid waters, by burrowing in soft, sandy banks, and often within the fissures of those romantic crags that tower so gracefully over the green shores of our beautiful rivers. It seems to be very generally distributed over the world. It is an inhabitant of the northern parts of Asia, and formerly its fur formed an important article of commerce between the Russians and Chinese. Captain Cook, in one of his voyages, drew the attention of the English to the immense numbers of otters that infested Nootka Sound, and the coasts in its vicinity. Since that date the trade in otter skins was carried on briskly in Canada, and other parts of North America, up to some years ago, when it declined.

Otters, when taken young, can be easily domesticated. In India and China they are trained to hunt fish by the natives, and in South America they are also tamed and kept as household pets. In the latter country the otter (Lutra Brasiliensis) is of a bright, ruddy yellow colour, and seems more gregarious than in other regions, for it assembles in packs, and thus scours the rivers in search of prey. It inhabits lakes, marshes, and broad streams in Paraguay and Brazil, where its shrill, sinister barking and whistling may be heard at night echoing over many a wild and deserted shore, amid the primeval forests which clothe those tropical regions. In our own country, and in England and Scotland, it is also frequently domesticated. In Scotland there is a spotted variety, which the peasantry call the "king of the otters." They believe it to be enchanted, and that its death is the sure forerunner of some sudden calamity in the neighbourhood—the destruction of some house or village by flood or fire, or tempest; or the violent death of one or more of the inhabitants. Its skin is accounted a powerful antidote against every misfortune, from the effects of a love potion up to poisoning and wounds, pestilence and shipwreck.

Otter-hunting was formerly a favourite sport in these countries. At present, however, the excitement of a fox-chase is more relished by our country Nimrods. But I question whether the wild ride over hedge, ditch, valley, and moorland, after the switching tail of reynard, is one whit more exciting than an otter hunt upon one of our winding rivers, with all its accompaniments of ludicrous accidents, fury, fun, and uproar. It is still kept up by a few of our country squires, among whom Bob Barry, of C——, stands pre-eminent, a gentleman as distinguished for his antiquarian and literary acquirements as for his numerous sylvan exploits by well-stocked river and by merry greenwood side.

With Bob Barry, during a college vacation, I was on a visit. After exploring every object of historical and antiquarian interest in the neighbourhood for miles round, we then took to fishing, coursing, rabbit-shooting, and dog-training, and at last, growing tired of them all, resolved to enliven our remaining days together by a few otter hunts on the Blackwater. This we were enabled to do in fine style, for Bob Barry, besides keeping some specimens of almost every species of dog on the face of the earth, had also a pack of otter hounds, twelve in number, and the like of which, for spirit and endurance, could not, I will venture to say, be found in Ireland or the sister countries.

It was a beautiful autumn morning. The dogs, after partaking of their noisy breakfast, were brought forth from the kennel, testifying their joy at the expected hunt by a variety of rough antics upon the lawn. The pack was accompanied by three terriers of pure Irish breed, whose duty it was to follow the otter to his burrow beneath the rocks, and start him for the hounds. The oldest of these terriers went by the familiar cognomen of "Darby," and was as queer and ugly-looking a specimen of the dog species as could be seen from Brandon Hill to the Giant's Causeway. His head was half bald, and marked all over with scars, relics of his numerous encounters with the otter in their fastnesses; his right fore leg was crooked, from the effect of a fracture he had received in one of his early battles; his left ear had also been bitten off, but a comfortable coat of shaggy grey hair still clothed his hard, compact body; and, as he limped on in front of the pack, and showed his teeth occasionally, when one of his younger comrades took some undue liberty with him, he looked more than a match for the stoutest otter from Youghal harbour to the far-off springs of the Avonmore.

Innumerable were the stories the old huntsman could tell of Darby. Whenever any considerable length of time passed away without a hunt, it was the custom of the latter to steal away several times, during the interval, to the river, about a mile distant, and there refresh himself with a foray upon his aquatic foes. On such excursions Darby was usually accompanied by the oldest hound of the pack, a huge, powerful, and cunning dog, from which, when once fair upon their track, very few otters were ever known to escape. It was probably from an intimate knowledge of this old hound's excellence in the chase that Darby always selected him as his companion on a foray to the river. Whenever they could make their escape from the kennel, they were sure to keep out of the huntsman's way until evening, at which time they scampered away across the country to a certain sweep of the Blackwater, where the otters were numerous, and there hunted and fought until morning, when they returned together invariably.

"Begor, sir!" said old Tom Reilly, the huntsman, as we went along, "if you were to know them, you never saw in the whole course of your life such two comrades as Darby and the ould Squire." (The Squire, by the way, was the usual appellation of the old hound.) Two ould vetherans from Waterloo were nothing to them."

"It seems so," said I, for Darby and the Squire were now pacing side by side with wonderful dignity in front of the pack.

"Nothing at all to them, sir," resumed the huntsman. "One night, they stole away but didn't come back in the morning. I kept their breakfast waiting till near twelve o'clock, and the devil reave the bit of either o' them could be seen next or nigh the kennel at that late hour. At last, when I was tired o' waitin', I saw the Squire runnin' as fast as his legs could carry him, up the lawn towards where I stood. I thought Darby would next appear, but not a trace of him could I see. Well, up comes the Squire, an' after standin' fornin't me for nearly five minutes looking into my face as cute as a fox, he trotted over and caught me by the skirt o' the coat, and then began pullin' me down the lawn. I knew in a minute what he was about—I guessed that ould Darby was in thrubble of some kind or other, and so callin' two or three o' the boys, and tellin' them to bring spades and shovels with them, we marched off towards the river with the Squire before us ladin' the way. At last we came down upon a point o' the shore where a big whitethorn bush grew by itself on the bank near the wather. When the Squire came for'nint the tree, he sat down and looked into a hole between its roots, and then raisin' his head up towards the sky, he broke out into a loud ulla-gone of a lamentin' cry, that brought the tears a'most into my eyes, and that was ten times more sorrowful than the weepin' o' the best keener in the land. Now it was aisy to tell where Darby was; so we commenced with our spades and shovels to root up the burrow. After nearly half a day's work, we at last came to the end, and there found Darby stretched in a faint upon the dead body o' the largest otter that was ever seen in ould Ireland, I believe. Well up I took the poor fellow in my arms as tenderly as I would a child, and carried him down to the wather; there I sprinkled and sprinkled away, but 'twas nearly a full half-hour afore he recovered, or at least, came to life, for he was nearly a week after lyin' sick an' sore on his bed o' pain in the kennel afore he got entirely well. I could tell hundherts o' stories about the pair, but, by the enchanted fox o' Corrin' Thierna, there they are down to the river side by side on the trail of an otter!"

It was true enough. We were descending an upland that sloped down to the river, and along its declivity Darby and the Squire were now dashing downwards obliquely towards the bank with their noses on the trail, followed by the remainder of the pack. We had with us three men besides the huntaman. They were armed with spades and shovels, Bob Barry and I having supplied ourselves with a weapon each, much resembling in its construction a New Hollander's lance, only that our instruments of warfare, besides being barbed, were much heavier. Down we ran after the pack and soon gained the river bank. Here Darby and the other terriers after examining the entrances of various burrows, and finding them untenanted, at last came to one which promised sport. One of the younger terriers pushed himself in, in order to enter this burrow, but Darby caught him quietly by the back, flung him to one side, and deliberately entered himself. We were now sure of an otter of some kind, young or old, so, keeping the hounds back in order to give him an opportunity for a fair plunge in the water, we stood awaiting his coming on the bank.

At last we heard a confused thumping noise under our feet, then a rushing and tearing, then a clatter on the gravel, and a splash, and, amidst a wild shout from the boys and a glad yell from the pack, out went a fine otter into the river, with the persevering and relentless Darby close at his tail. Splash! splash! splash! went the hounds into the water, some above and some below the point the otter had chosen for his launching place—and now the sport commenced in earnest.

The river at this point was still narrow and deep, and with low banks. Above, however, at about a furlong's distance, the valley of the stream assumed a different character, huge, caverned, limestone crags rising in many a fantastic shape above the water, while about the same distance below where we stood, the river ran with extreme rapidity down a narrow, sandy, shallow for the length of about half a mile, and then ended in a deep, whirling pool, beneath another tier of limestone rock.

The otter was now after reaching the middle of the river, and had got a good start of all the dogs save Darby.

"Run!" said Bob Barry to one of the boys, "up with you to the rock, and bring down Paddy Regan's boat. Quick! quick! or I fear the otter will have time to cross the river ere one of us gets to the other side!"

Away went the young man at the command of his master, and, after some short time, he appeared round the rock paddling down the river.

"Now!" exclaimed Bob, once more turning to me, "cross the river with Jack, and have an eye to the beast, should he think of taking shelter beneath those white-thorns at the opposite side!"

In a few moments I was sitting in the boat beneath those white-thorns whose gnarled roots my friend dreaded so much. The otter was now after diving. Jack had stepped to the bank above to watch, and I was sitting in the boat, cheering the dogs and waiting for the otter to rise. At length up popped his dark-brown nose within a yard of my small and rather shaky bark. In the excitement of the moment, I poised my spear and made a lunge, Indian fashion, at him, but, instead of striking him, the weapon passed down to the handle through the water, and I, losing my balance, fell over the side of the boat amidst the dogs. The only consolation I got on my immersion was a rousing cheer, as I came to the surface of the water, from Bob Barry, who was quite used to such accidents. It was well, however, that I had divested myself of my coat and a pair of heavy boots I wore, after I had entered to boat. With them I would have had an unpleasant scramble in the water, but without them, being a good swimmer, I was soon enabled to regain my seat in the boat. I was, of course, wet through, but what did I care when I looked upon the stirring scene before me. It was also a warm morning, so comforting myself with a pull from a brandy flask I had carried into the boat, I now sat quietly, spear in hand, and looked on.

The otter was again in the middle of the river, this time with the hounds swimming on every side of him. Again he dived, and went straight for the other bank, intending, I suppose, to take refuge in some secure burrow. But Bob Barry met him with his spear as he rose, and slightly wounded him in the neck. Down he went once more, and for a long time we saw nothing of him, till at length the sharp and experienced eye of old Tom Reilly detected a slight disturbance of the water, amongst some weeds and sedges near the bank. This was enough to betray his whereabouts, and the hounds, which during his dive had kept themselves quietly on the surface of the water, now, directed by the voice and gestures of Tom, swam towards the bank. Four or five of the youngest of them left the water, and took a refreshing scamper upon the shore, but the elder dogs, headed by the Squire and Darby, rushed in among the reeds, and then followed a scrambling, splashing, and tearing—a barking, biting, and gnashing of teeth, the equal of which I had never before witnessed, and I had seen many a splendid hunt. I soon paddled alongside, and found nearly the whole pack before me tearing at the otter, which was gallantly fighting for his existence.

"For your life, don't touch him with the spear!" exclaimed Bob Barry, who was almost dancing with delight upon the bank; "leave him to Darby and the Squire, and let the young dogs learn how to kill an otter!"

At the word I sat quietly in the little boat and looked on. It was an unequal struggle, for although the otter buried his white teeth occasionally in the neck or flank of one of the dogs, he soon began to give in, and at last, by the united exertions of old Darby and the Squire, he was torn from amidst the furious pack in to the shore, and there killed after another short scramble.

"Bring him up to the bank," said my excited friend to the huntsman. "And now let us go up to Donal's Cave. Paddy Regan told me, yesterday, that it is inhabited by the largest otter in the river!"

The hounds were now marching up the shore behind the huntsman and their master, and I, after paddling my boat along the calm surface of the river, at length came opposite a tall rock, that rose like an ancient castle above the water. At the base of this crag was a narrow aperture, leading into a large, gloomy chamber, which the country-people call "Donal's Cave," from a celebrated outlaw who once made it his home, and which was unapproachable except by a boat. Into this cave Darby and his attendant imps, the two young terriers, were directed by Tom Reilly, the hounds remaining by the side of the rock on the bank, ready for the otter, should he think fit to make his appearance.

After about a quarter of an hour's anxious watch, we at last heard a confused yelling from the cave. Then a wild cry, something between a bark and a scream, and then out came a huge, dark-brown otter, with Darby, as before, closely behind, only one of the young terriers, however, following. Out went the hounds, with a dash, into the deep water, and the chase commenced.

"Fern's leg is sartin broken!" exclaimed the huntsman, alluding to the young terrier that remained inside. "Would you put the boat in, sir," continued he, addressing me, "and thry what's the matter with the poor crathur?"

I brought the boat to the mouth of the cave, and with great difficulty entered. The huntsman's conjecture was but too true, for I found poor Fern inside almost strangled, and with one of her legs broken by the terrible jaws of the otter. As quick as I could I brought her out, got into the boat, and gave her to the care of one of the boys, then paddling down the stream, I followed the hunt. The otter we had now driven from his home was a far more experienced fellow than the first. He took his course in long alternate dives, obliquely across the river, gained the bank of the opposite side, ran some distance downwards, and then took shelter in a burrow under a steep bank. From this, however, he was soon driven by the indefatigable Darby, and again dived away, now straight down the river, passing the place where we had killed the first otter. The hounds ran yelling cheerily down the shore at either side, and the chase went on so swiftly that I had to work hard at the short oars in order to keep up with it.

And now we were leaving the deep water and approaching the rapid above mentioned. Into it the otter plunged after a sharp chase, and dived away with the swiftness of an arrow, the hounds following almost as swiftly, while I, in the excitement of the moment, regardless of my own safety and that of the boat, brought the latter into the rapid current, and swept downward for a time gloriously upon their track. It was only for a short time, however, that I went on so merrily, for the water, in consequence of its great rapidity, was in some places very shallow. Just as I had come up with the dogs, the keel of the little boat struck against the rough bottom with a shock that almost tumbled me into the water. In a moment the boat got free, and began whirling giddily, yet steadily, down the current. Another shock and another succession of gyrations, and the boat was swept rapidly onwards, Bob Barry all the time running down the bank, and laughing as if his heart would break at my predicament. And now I was coming to the end of the rapid, and beginning to think myself quite safe, when just at the commencement of the deep pool, in which the hounds and otter were diving and scrambling, the boat struck against a small rock that lay right before it. In an instant its fragments were floating in a general wreck around, and I was struggling with the water almost in the very centre of the pack of otter-hounds. But here my rather extensive experience in swimming stood to me, and I soon gained the bank above the rock, up which I was assisted by my merry friend Bob Barry. My coat and boots were recovered by one of the boys at the foot of the rock, but the flask was gone for ever with its contents. An application to my friend's flask, however, soon restored my warmth, and I now stood on the rock looking at the hunt.

It was soon over. Large and fierce as the otter was, he was no match for the simultaneous attack of Darby and his friend the Squire, and some of the otter-hounds, so he soon gave in and was killed. It was now getting somewhat late in the morning, and our appetites—for we had eaten but little ere we set out—were getting rather keen. Leaving Tom Reilly and the boys to lead back the hounds, I and my friend walked briskly across the fields, and soon, after I had changed my suit for a dry one, had the satisfaction of sitting down to a jovial breakfast in the comfortable parlour of C—— House, to which repast, I must add, that we both did ample justice after our morning's exertions. And thus ended my first otter-hunt on the Blackwater.

SCIENTIFIC JOTTINGS.

PHONAUTOGRAPHY.

It is not easy to conceive a mechanical operation which requires a greater exercise of intellect than that of verbatim reporting by means of short-hand. Yet even this art seems likely, before long, to be supplanted. For several years a French savan, M. L. Scott, has been engaged in experiments on the fixation of sound upon a prepared tablet, in the same way as photography fixes luminous images, and has met with considerable success in this new art, which he has named Phonautography. At a recent sitting of the French Academy of Sciences, a short communication was made on the subject by the discoverer, a brief outline of which will perhaps be considered of interest. The problem which first required solution was the artificial construction of an ear, by means of tubes and diaphragms, so as to imitate, as nearly as possible, the human ear in its power of collecting sounds of every degree of intensity, and transmitting them to a delicate membrane placed at the extremity. After numerous essays an apparatus was constructed which possessed the above qualifications; the membrane was seen to vibrate visibly, and in a different manner, with each audible sound or note; and if a pen or style were fastened to this membrane its point would trace the wonderfully beautiful and complicated curves and circles appertaining to the elements of sound. The next difficulty consisted in finding a sensitive surface upon which this style could mark the imprint of its movements; for the vibrations of the aerial pen were so delicate that if any appreciable force were required to effect the transcription, the resistance would at once stop all movement. This difficulty was at last overcome by employing a strip of thin paper, upon which was deposited a film of lampblack obtained from the smoke of burning bodies.

The phonographs produced by M. Scott's instrument are marvelously correct; every separate source of sound has an individuality of its own. An oration, delivered with varying rapidity, and with the pitch of the voice greatly modulated in different parts, has a very striking appearance in its phonograph. Rapidly-spoken parts have the curves crowded together, whilst in others they are widely separated. The loud tones of the voice are shown by the written waves rising to perhaps half an inch or more, in height, whilst the low tones are not more than the eighth of an inch high; the modulations of the voice are thus shown very beautifully by the varying height of what may be called the letters of sound. The problem of the graphic fixation of sound may thus be considered as accomplished; but now a new difficulty arises, that of translating these ever-varying curves back again into ordinary language. If each word or syllable, or even compound sound, of which our spoken language is built up, were invariably represented by the same system of curves, the work of transcription would be comparatively easy. This, however, is far from being the case. Not only does the impression vary with the tone of the voice, the rapidity or loudness of utterance, but it has been found that the same words uttered by one person are written down by the instrument very differently from the way they are when spoken by another; just as the handwriting of one person differs from another. This, however, is a difficulty which will be overcome by practice, and perhaps improved instrumental arrangements. The fact of being able to make spoken sounds record themselves permanently on paper is of itself most singular and astonishing; but if it is ever developed, as the inventor says it shortly will be, to sufficient perfection to enable it to take down speeches which may be written off verbatim, it is difficult to imagine the importance of the discovery, whether it be in respect to the unimpeachable accuracy of the process; the entire absence of trouble and expense in reporting any articulate sounds; or the great saving of the time and the exhausting labours of parliamentary reporters.

AT ENFIELD.

RANKED by an order from its courteous superintendent, Colonel D—, of the Royal Engineers, we not long since had the pleasure of inspecting the government factory at Enfield, where the armes de precision, or rifles, of the British army are manufactured. A few notes, therefore, relative to our visit will not be without interest for our readers. We may premise town and parish of the Essex, nearly thirteen miles from London. The factory itself is four miles north of the town, in a suburban area of thirty acres which induced us to select a site so singularly inconvenient and remote enough. A small stream of water, called the Enfield stream, runs through the town, and a canal, which turned a water-wheel exerting some twenty or twenty-five horse power. The idea of economising and bringing into play this little water-wheel (which has now ten times its power of steam machinery to assist it) settled the whole affair. Foundations were laid and buildings commenced forthwith, and factories the size of little villages sprang up with incredible rapidity.

The materials for the barrels are brought to the factory in short square slabs of wrought iron, (with the fibres of the metal crossing and recrossing at right angles), each some twelve inches long by four broad, and half an inch thick. These are heated and bent into a short tube, having somewhat the appearance of a clumsily-made draining tile, and in this state are again heated to a bright white, and passed between iron rollers of the first gauge, which weld up the joining down the middle, and, by compression, lengthen the tube nearly three inches more. It is again heated, and again passed between rollers of a smaller gauge, which lengthens it still further; and so on, again and again, until the operation has been repeated through thirteen different gauges, when the roller is complete, and the barrel—after some two hours' manufacture—emerges at last a slender rough iron tube about four feet long, and having a hole down the centre the size of a large pea. The muzzles are then cut off, the "butts," or "ends," as they are termed, made up, and the process of welding on the "cone-seat," or nipple for the cap, commences. This latter is a difficult operation, and one which requires no little quickness, care, and skill, on the part of the workmen. To insure rapidity of striking while the metals are red-hot, the breech of the barrel with the cone-seat is placed in a steel die, under a small hammer worked by steam, which strikes at the rate of four hundred blows a minute, and under which, amid a terrific din, the metals are crushed together, with more than the strength of one piece. This completes the forgings, and the barrels are passed from the smithy to the boring-shops, where the operation of boring (exclusive of rifling) is repeated no less than five distinct times. The barrels are for this purpose laid in horizontal machines, and the first-sized borer is drawn up through them, not forced down, as, from the bend of the boring bit in forcing it through, it is found difficult to secure strict accuracy. The second boring at swift speed is then continued, and the third at slow speed, by which time the barrel is finished to within some two or three thousandths of an inch of its proper diameter, when the exterior is turned down also to its service size. The operation, if such it may be called, of straightening the barrel, is then gone through, after the screw-hole for the breech-piece has been bored. This straightening is one of the roughest and most unsatisfactory portions of the whole process of manufacture. From the very fine soft nature of the iron used in the construction of the barrel, and the extreme thinness of the metal itself, the least violence or concussion is apt either to bend the barrel outright, or else to put such a dint in its side as effectually makes an end of its accurate shooting. Thus, in the processes which we have already described, in spite of the utmost care, the barrel is supposed to have deviated from its true line sufficiently to require considerable rectification. This is done, therefore, not by machinery but by hand, a workman looking through the barrel and giving it a tap here and a tap there with a hammer, wherever it seems to him to require it. In defence of this apparently very rude method, which seems so astounding in connection with a bore that must be accurate to the thousandth part of an inch, the superintendents of the works point to the results achieved, and say that out of some two thousand weapons made weekly the gauge of all is accurate to a half-hairbreadth! An immense variety of milling and grinding stages are next gone through, which merely relate to the exterior of the barrel, and with which we will not trouble ourselves here. A detailed account of the whole manufacture would be out of the question, as our readers may easily imagine, when we say that the barrel undergoes no less than sixty-six distinct processes, and the whole rifle upwards of seven hundred ere it is completed. The barrel, then, having so far advanced in its progress towards completion, as to be bored for the fourth time, undergoes its first proof test of merely one ounce of powder and ball. Not one per cent of the barrels yield under this trial, which has sometimes, in the case of doubtful barrels, or those which it was desired to burst, been carried to as high a charge as two and a half ounces of powder and seventeen balls—the whole barrel full, in fact—before the metal ripped. After this the nipple-screw and nipple, with the tang or tongue which fastens the barrel to the stock, are made, though not a single piece is put together till the whole weapon is complete to its minutest detail. Before the barrel leaves the boring room it is again bored out for the fifth time, and, having been polished by machinery inside and outside till it shines as bright as silver, it at last reaches its fifty-sixth stage of manufacture, and is taken to the "big" or finishing room. This is a bewildering scene of active, never-ceasing industry. Let our readers imagine, if they can, a single apartment more than an acre in extent, lofty and well-lit, in which some thousand men and boys are incessantly employed in superintending machinery. The roof is composed of light hollow girders, with stays of angle iron, supported upon ninety cast-iron columns, the whole being painted white, picked out with blue, which gives the room an exceedingly light appearance. The air is cooled by the hum of flywheels, which revolve in thousands till the eye is giddy with their whirl. Miles of shafting are spinning round mistily with a monotonous hum, the room is almost darkened and the view completely obscured by some fifty thousand or sixty thousand feet of broad flapping lathe-bands, which are driving no less than six hundred distinct machines, all going together on their own allotted tasks, with a tremulous rapidity and ease that seem to swallow up the work like magic, and the first sight of which is inexpressibly astonishing to the spectator, whom it takes some minutes ere he can subdue the overwhelming feeling of surprise which this scene of activity always excites, no matter how often entered on. Following the barrel, then, but with care, into this maze of lathe-bands, we see the process of rifling first commenced. The rifling of the Enfield barrel consists of three broad shallow grooves, with a pitch of a half turn in the length of the barrel of three feet six inches. The depth of the rifling is 0.5 at the muzzle, and 0.15 at the breech, the width of each groove being 3-16ths of an inch. There are sixteen rifling machines at Enfield, each of which turns out twenty-six barrels a day, though, of course, the grooves are made separately, and after the same fashion as in the boring, namely, drawn through the gun from the muzzle to the breech. After the rifling it is again proved with half an ounce of powder and a single ball; when it is retouched, trimmed-off, milled, levelled, browned, and gauged, coming out in the gauging-room at last a finished barrel, made to such perfection and accuracy that the steel gauge of 577 thousandths of an inch passes freely through, while that of 580 sticks firm in the muzzle. Browning is the final operation which the rifle undergoes, and the merely ornamental process—a chemical one—occupies a week more than the manufacture of the gun itself, namely, four weeks.

THE CASTLE OF MONEA.

THE KNIGHT OF STRANCALLY.

THE Castle of Strancally stands upon a beautiful sylvan slope on the shore of the Blackwater, near the junction of the river Bride, and a few miles from the flourishing town of Tullow. It is built in the Gothic style, with high embattled towers, from the summit of which may be obtained a view unrivalled for its beauty and magnificence. The tourist who takes a voyage up the Blackwater from Youghal, will be well repaid for a visit to this neighbourhood. After lingering amidst the lovely scenery that surrounds the new castle he will not fail to visit the old stronghold of Strancally, which stands upon a high and majestic rock that overhangs the Blackwater.

Old Strancally castle was built by one of the earls of Desmond, and was one of their principal fortresses in this part of the country. It seems, from the ruins that still remain, to have been a fortress of great strength. Like many of the old Norman castles of a similar construction, it had its dark dungeons, where many a luckless prisoner lingered out his life in silent misery; and also its secret passage to the river hard by, by means of which the garrison could escape when hard pressed in time of siege. The ruins of both dungeons and passage still remain. The latter was cut through the solid rock down to the water's edge, and must have cost an immense amount of labour in those wild days, when mechanical appliances were not brought to the perfection that they have attained at present. Another hole, also cut through the solid crag, communicates with the water from one of the dungeons. It is called by the peasantry the "Murdering Hole," and through it, it is said, the bodies of those who were executed in the castle, or had died in prison, were thrown into the river.

In a siege, some centuries ago, Strancally was undermined and blown up by the soldiers of the government. It seems to have been rent by that terrible explosion from its roof to its foundation, but as if the vengeful hand of man was not enough for its destruction, it was struck afterwards by lightning, which brought down immense masses of solid masonry into the river beneath. Strancally, with the lands pertaining to it, was forfeited during the Desmond wars, and fell into the hands of Sir Walter Raleigh, from whom it passed ultimately to the Earl of Cork.

One sweet June evening during the sway of John Earl of Desmond, the sentinels were ranged for watch and ward along the parapets and towers of Strancally, some leaning in an indolent and listless manner against the breastworks, others walking to and fro upon the ramparts, their buff-coats and armour half unbraced, and their long halberds glittering in the soft and merry sunshine. Around them the scenery extended in a broad panorama of mountain, forest, and river, enlivened at intervals by grey and stately castles, each of which sent up its column of blue smoke into the calm, amber-coloured sky, while far beyond them towards the south-east spread out the clear, bright, and placid ocean, with many a stately galley at anchor in the winding bays, and many a white sail glittering far away in the offing. The courtyards beneath were thronged with horsemen, as if getting ready to set out on some important expedition.

"I tell you what, Richard Gibson," said one of the sentinels to his fellow, "the Desmond will not find it so easy to take Youghal. It is only last night that I heard the Knight of Strancally saying that a stronger garrison there never was in the town."

"Yes," answered the other; "but when the old senechal of Imokilly aids the earl, and when our master, James of Strancally, swells the army with those bold horsemen beneath us, it will not, in my mind, be so hard to take the town. And, by my faith, Garret Roe, the earl seems not over idle in the affair, for here he comes with all his forces!" and he pointed to the skirt of the ancient forest that stretched along the bank of the Blackwater.

Both looked in the direction towards which he pointed, and as they gazed a large body of light-armed footmen or horse, emerged from the wood. Long lines of horsemen followed with fluttering banners and glittering armour, then other bodies on foot; then again horsemen falling into regular positions as they came, until at length a large and numerous army lay in a long line before them, marching down the river shore towards the castle. A knight now rode forward from the van, accompanied by a mounted gilly or henchman, and came at an easy gallop towards the walls. He was clad in a suit of bright armour, his helmet being surmounted by a tall blue plume, while in his hand he held a long spear aloft, on the point of which fluttered a banneret, with the Desmond crest painted on its folds.

"It is our own brave Knight of Strancally, Richard Gibson!" exclaimed Garret Roe. "Ho, there!" exclaimed he to his comrades below as he stooped over a battlement. "Fling the barbacan gate open wide for our noble knight. He is coming, boys, to lead to renown and wealth—to the siege of Youghal with our prince the Desmond. Shannet aboo!"

The gate was flung open beneath, and in a few moments the Knight of Strancally came clattering into the courtyard, where his bold horsemen sat their steeds in stern array awaiting his arrival. They were soon filing out beneath the barbacan, and down into the plain with their young commander at their head, and their banner waving proudly in the evening breeze, and were received with a shout of welcome by the Desmond's army, which shaped its course down the river shore to invest Youghal, then in the possession of the English troops.

The night had fallen dark upon the ancient town as the Irish army drew up before its walls. The garrison within seemed well aware of the proximity of their foes, for a double row of sentinels paced to and fro upon the ramparts, peering out warily and incessantly into the darkness. Still they could distinguish no indications of a stir amongst the Irish, save that ever and anon a slight murmur arose outside, at some distance from where they walked their rounds, and dark masses, which they took for the lowering shadows of trees, seemed to move hither and thither in every direction amid the copsewood and scattered forest. The morning explained what those black, moving masses indicated. The sun had scarcely risen when the ramparts were thronged by English officers and men-at-arms, who, looking out, beheld huge piles of earth and brushwood, behind which the Irish forces lay crouched, secure themselves, but close enough and in favourable positions to pick off with musquetry the defenders of the walls. No horses could be seen—they were picqueted in the dense forest behind—but here and there the mouths of cannons protruded over the brushwood and clayey ramparts, while the shock heads of the fierce array outside, with a gleaming helmet occasionally amongst them, might be seen peeping up at intervals from the covert, and examining the fortifications. All at once a fierce war-cry arose, which seemed to proceed from every part of the forest. This was followed by the rolling cracks of matchlocks and musquetoons, and the loud roar of cannons, which, with the answering explosions from the walls, made din that soon woke the town, and struck terror into its inhabitants. All day the firing continued with considerable loss to the besieged. At last a wide breach was made in the walls. Up this breach, on the evening of that day, a large body of the Irish were rushing, headed by the knights and gentlemen who composed the officers of Desmond's army. They were met gallantly by the English and driven back almost to their entrenchments. On they came again, however, crowding up the breach like a wave of the sea. To and fro swayed the combatants, reinforcements pouring in to each side, until the whole battle seemed concentrated round the middle of the breach. The Irish were again beginning to waver, when a cry rose amongst them—"Shannet-aboo! Follow the Blue Feather—Hurra! for Strancally and the Blue top-knot!" and looking up, they beheld the Knight of Strancally far above them at one side, his long plume waving, and his heavy sword clutched in both hands as he hacked and hewed away at the English who surrounded him. A simultaneous rush was made by the Irish towards this point, and the English, by absolute dint of pressure, body to body, were at length forced to give way and retreat from the walls, the Irish following with a wild shout into the town. At this moment an English man-at-arms came behind the Knight of Strancally, and with a terrible blow from his ponderous axe brought him to the ground. Friend and foe then went in a fierce rush over the body of the luckless knight, but he heeded it not, for, sorely wounded and half smothered by his helmet, he soon sank into a deep swoon, and lay as quiet as those who had fared even worse, and lay dead around him. The town was taken, and the remnant of the English who had escaped the fight driven to their ships.

When the Knight of Strancally awoke to something like consciousness from his stupor, it was in the house of Hugh Barrette, an old and worthy burgess of the town, who had been favourable to the interest of the Earl of Desmond, and was, therefore, now left in undisturbed possession of his property. The knight's first sensation on awaking was of a racking pain through his head and body. He soon became aware of a voice singing beside him in a low, sweet cadence, and despite his pain, began to distinguish the words of the song. They floated through his mind with a soothing sweetness, rendered doubly sweet by their contrast with the clang and crash of battle that rang so loudly in his ears the evening before. At length he made an effort to see the person of the singer, but, in turning over for that purpose, he threw his weight upon his left arm, which had been broken on his falling beneath the axe of the Englishman, and the sudden spasm of pain occasioned by the movement made him fall backward again with a heavy groan. He was however more than compensated for the pain he had occasioned himself, on looking up once more. A young and beautiful girl was bending over him, and regarding him with a look in which modest shyness was blended with compassion. Her long yellow hair falling in shining tresses upon her shoulders, almost touched the face of the knight as he looked up half wonder-struck, and she adjusted the bed covering so gently, and handled his wounded arm so tenderly that he began to think himself in a dream, in which some bright angel had come near and was ministering to his wants. His senses were now returning, and he began to recollect all that had happened, but still he was very weak. He tried to raise himself and ask a few questions, but the young girl made a motion to him to keep silent, on which he lay back once more, and fell into a sweet and long sleep, from which he only awakened towards evening at the voice of some one entering the room. It was the kind leech, an old monk, who had bound up his wounds on the preceding night, and who was now coming to see how his patient was progressing.

"Sir James of Strancally," said the monk, "the town is in possession of my kinsman the Desmond, who hath declared that were it not for thy strength and thy bravery, he would be still outside the walls."

"Who art thou?" said the knight.

"I am Gerald the Franciscan," answered the monk, "whose life thou didst save at the foray of Dangan."

"Hast thou found the child of thy brother, the murdered knight of Drumgarmon?" asked the Knight of Strancally.

"No," answered the monk. "It was in my wanderings to find her that the vassals of Ormond caught me at Dangan, and took me for a spy. There my wanderings would have ceased were it not for thy brave onslaught on my captors. Alas, since the night of the murder of my brother and his followers in his house of Drumgarmon, I have wandered for years but could find no traces of the poor little maiden. It is ten years now since the murderers confessed before they died that they had forgot and left her behind at their camping place in the forest. She was but seven years then, and I fear me she died of hunger and cold, or that the wolves devoured her, the last scion of a once brave and gallant house. As for thee, sir knight," continued he, after a pause, "thou wantest but quiet and sleep, and a good nurse, and thou wilt soon be able to wield that good sword of thine once more."

"Ah!" sighed the knight, "had I the nurse that watched over me this morning, I would soon get well, I warrant thee!"

After some further conversation the monk took his departure. We will now leave the Knight of Strancally to his repose, and follow for a time the fortunes of the old Franciscan's niece, the young lady of Drumgarmon. About ten years anterior to the foregoing events, there stood an old castellated mansion on the southern declivity of the Knockmoldown mountains. In this mansion dwelt Sir Thomas Fitzgerald, or as he was more frequently called, the Knight of Drumgarmon, together with his young daughter and a few followers. The Knight's wife had died a few years before, and he, disabled by wounds and hardships in the Desmond wars, had retired to spend the remainder of his life in his house of Drumgarmon, and to bring up his young daughter, the sweetest little flower that ever bloomed in that wild and turbulent district. One night the house was surrounded by some of the fierce followers of Ormond, the old Knight and his men murdered, and the little maid of Drumgarmon—the only living being saved on that wild night of vengeance—carried away by the forayers. The latter, after proceeding some distance towards their own country with the booty they had taken, and the child for whom they expected a heavy ransom, encamped for some hours in the darkness by the bank of a little stream that wound its way into the Suir, through the forest that then clothed the declivity of the Knockmoldown mountains, facing the plains of Tipperary, and farthest from the luckless house of Drumgarmon. After the drunken revel that followed, they proceeded hastily down the mountains fearing pursuit, but forgot the child of the murdered knight in the dark forest.

It was broad daylight when the young orphan awoke from the sleep she had fallen into after the departure of the forayers. She looked sadly around her, and then sitting upon the path beheld a small man with a glittering guitar across his knee, and other extraordinary-looking paraphernalia around him, while a young, pale woman, who seemed to be his wife, sat beside him. The change of scene was such a wild contrast to her home that the poor little maiden began to rub her eyes, thinking it all a dream, but gradually awaking to the consciousness of her situation, she sank back shivering upon the couch of grass with a low, despairing cry. The young woman now arose, and with affectionate care took the child in her arms and began to chafe its cold hands, asking at the same time a variety of questions. When the child had answered all, and told the circumstances of her situation as well as the cold and terror would allow her, the young woman turned to her husband, and after a long consultation they determined on adopting the little orphan as their own. The man was one of those itinerant gleemen, or jugglers, who, at the time, rambled about from place to place, showing off their marvels of sleight-o'-hand, and making merry music in the Irish villages, and particularly in the English-inhabited towns along the coast.

For three years the young maid of Drumgarmon rambled from town to town and from village to village with the gleeman and his wife, during which time she grew more beautiful day by day, and learned to play on glittering and tambour with unwonted skill, and to know all the various dances and other things pertaining to the office of a gle maiden. But it is now time to return to the Knight of Strancally, whom we left sorely wounded in his bed.

Day after day he continued under the kind nursing of Hugh Barrette and his wife, and the lovely Margaret, the girl whom he had seen on his first awaking from his swoon. At length he became strong enough to arise and move about, without, however, leaving the precincts of his apartment. It was now somewhat more than a month after the taking of the town, and he was sitting in his room thinking of some preparations, for on the morrow he was to leave his kind nurses and proceed to Strancally, from which the Earl of Desmond had lately departed with his retainers, in order to take up his abode in another of his family mansions. As the Knight sat thus thinking, the image of the sweet girl who had nursed him so well during his illness continually arose to his mind, and in spite of himself a feeling of fondness and tenderness—which he would not, but many would, call love—began to grow in his heart, as he thought of her beauty and of her unremitting and devoted attention to him. In spite of himself, we say, for how could he, a highborn knight, think of loving a girl who, however beautiful, was lowly-born, and, according to the precepts of those times, unfit to mate with any of his class—proud noblemen, who looked down with scorn on those of humbler birth, however wealthy. Still he thought he saw something noble about the young girl, in her features, in her bearing, and in her actions. In this mood of mind he was when, towards sunset, the oft-recurring subject of his meditations entered the room and sat down—her usual way of keeping him in conversation—on a low chair near him.

"My pretty Margaret," said the knight sadly, "time, no matter how sweet and delightful, must have an end. We part to-morrow—a long parting—but the memory of your kindness shall ever remain in my heart."

"Sir James," returned Margaret, "looking up into his face with an innocent but concerned gaze—"the kindness, if it may be so called, was but befitting from me, the daughter of the Desmond's most favoured servant, to a kinsman of the Desmond; but I fear me about your going in your present weak state; and there are strange rumours afloat of hostile ships having been seen sailing along the coast, and of another siege of the town by the English forces from Waterford."

"Ha! they dare not!" exclaimed the knight. "The Desmond is too strong in this territory at present, and it must be some merchant craft the idle loons in the town have magnified into war-galleys!"

The night had now fallen upon the town and the Knight of Strancally and Margaret were still conversing, when suddenly they heard the boom of a cannon from the direction of the harbour. This was followed by a confused murmur and stir in the town, then came the booming of many cannons again, and the rattle of musquetry, and no doubt was left upon the knight's mind that the English had made descent upon the town and were determined to take it by storm. The knight had not left his room since the day he first entered it, and was still so weak that he found himself unable to descend the stairs unassisted, and his mind chafed within him to think that he should sit there an idle listener to the contest, and be unable to render any assistance to the garrison. Hugh Barrette himself now made his appearance in the greatest perturbation, and said that the English had indeed returned under Captain White, one of the most zealous leaders on the side of the queen, and had, whether by treachery or bravery he could not tell, actually entered the town and driven out the garrison. He said that the knight's only chance of safety consisted in allowing himself to be removed with all possible speed, and concealed in a small apartment he had prepared for that purpose. The knight, assisted by Hugh Barrette and his brisk young shopman, was soon settled in his place of concealment, a small room at the extreme back of the merchant's storehouse, and from which a diminutive window looked out on a narrow street, called Blossom Alley.

The town was once more in possession of the English. After a few days however, everything went on quietly, with the exception of a little pillage on the part of the conquerors: but they kept such a sharp watch at the gates and on the walls, that it was impossible for the knight to make his escape. So he was fain to content himself with his little prison as he called it, and the society, occasionally, of honest Hugh and his wife, but more frequently of the young and winning Margaret. Day after day the knight dwelt more and more upon the loveliness and engaging manners of the young girl. The voice of reason often called back his mind from those day-dreams to the plain reality of the case, but the knight was young, and at his age the voice of the heart is more willingly listened to than the more matter-of-fact warnings of reason. So by slow but sweet degrees he fell in love, and began to think upon his beautiful young nurse with other thoughts than those with which he regarded her, on his first entering the little chamber in Hugh's dwelling.

It was now three weeks after the entrance of the English. Blossom Alley was the abode of a number of the prettiest girls in the town, and in consequence of this delightful fact became the resort of several of the young soldiers from the garrison. One day, while the knight and Margaret were conversing in the little room, some disturbance arose outside in the Alley. Margaret was taking a hasty look through the window at what was passing, when a young corporal in the crowd turning round suddenly, caught her eye, and thinking himself the sole and undivided object of her attention, put on a most amiable and engaging look, left the throng, and swaggered with the air of an Alexander several times up and down before the window. Margaret immediately drew back and saw no more of the amorous corporal for that day. But the next morning he was there again, with his steel-cap, back, breast, and bandoliers burnished up with an unwonted degree of care; but this time not confining himself to a useless perambulation along the street, he came over and gave a glance of his enamoured eyes through the little window into the chamber of the knight, and was rewarded for his devotedness by catching a glimpse of the lovely Margaret inside. Fortunately, the knight was sitting in a corner which was not visible to the gay corporal, but on seeing him, Margaret cast herself with a frightened countenance into the opposite corner, and on enquiring the cause of her trepidation, she told him of the insinuating face at the window, and warned him to be on his guard. The knight, however, in spite of the warning, started up and approached the window, but the soldier was gone. Early on the same evening the knight was sitting alone in his narrow room and thinking on his situation, in a rather unpleasant frame of mind, when the coaxing face of the corporal appeared once more peering in at the window. It was an ill-starred moment for both, for the knight, rendered irritable and over-hasty by his wounds, and unable to bear the affectionate curiosity of the corporal any longer, seized a small iron weight that accidentally lay beside him, and flinging it with his utmost force at the head of the unfortunate gazer, stretched him bleeding and senseless upon the rough pavement of Blossom Alley. Some of the corporal's comrades made their appearance at the moment and created a tremendous disturbance on his account, at which an officer with a guard of soldiers was ordered down from the garrison in order to investigate the matter. The result was that Hugh Barrette's house and premises were searched, and as a matter of course half pillaged, and the knight's place of concealment found. The door was immediately forced in, but the Knight of Strancally was not at all disposed to give himself peaceably into the hands of his enemies, and the first man that entered received several inches of steel beneath his corselet, and fell mortally wounded beside the doorway. Several now rushed in, but the foremost after a few cuts and parries, got a slash of the knight's sword which went sheer through the bars of his helmet, terribly wounding him along the face, and stretching him upon the prostrate body of his comrade. The knight now retreated to the opposite corner of the room, determined to die where he stood, and still keeping a clear space around him with the sweep of his long sword.

"Yield thee, sir knight, or whatever we may call thee!" said the officer of the guard—"yield thee, or we shall hew thee to pieces where thou standest, or else set fire to the house and burn thee to cinders with the worthless rebel catiff who concealed thee!"

The latter part of this threat, namely the burning of the premises of Hugh Barrette, with the body of the worthy burgher himself, had more effect upon the knight's mind than the first claim, so declaring his name, and giving up his sword to the officer, he was marched out of his place of concealment and lodged quietly in the strongest dungeon of the fortress.

It was the beginning of autumn. The English held the town in their possession for somewhat more than a month, when once more the fierce war-cry of the Irish resounded along the walls, for the seneschal of Imokilly with all the warlike inhabitants of that and the surrounding districts, appeared suddenly from the woods, and surrounded the fortifications on all sides. The attack commenced. On came the Irish in long and thick masses, and filling the deep ditches with their fascines of brushwood, gallantly scaled the ramparts amidst a storm of cannon-ball and small shot. The walls were well manned, but the English, despite their bravery, were driven off the ramparts to the castle, and thence to the seaward gate of the town, where they rallied to make a last and gallant stand.

It was just at this moment that the Knight of Strancally heard the sound of a couple of battle-axes breaking in his prison door, which feat being soon accomplished, Hugh Barrette, his shop-man, and the monk stood before him.

"Sir knight," said Hugh, "we are free once more, for the seneschal has made his oath good that he would take the town; and has burnt the walls, and driven the English to the sea-gate. Take this," continued he, giving the knight a huge sword—"they rally there under the protection of their guns from the harbour, and, I fear me, will regain the castle again!"

The Knight of Strancally took the sword, and rushing from the castle, put himself at the head of a body of Irish who were beginning to refresh themselves after their fatigue with a little pillage. "Strancally! Strancally Aboo!" yelled his new followers, for they recognized him in a moment. They soon reached the sea-gate, and there the knight indemnified himself so well for his long inactivity, that the English were in a short time forced to retreat.

It was evening. The knight accompanied the old monk as he went along the streets and ramparts, applying remedies to the wounded and shivering those that were on the point of death. As they crossed down a narrow street, they beheld a dying man before them with his head resting on a small tambour, and a broken ghitt-tern in fragments beside him.

"Take this," he said, when he observed the group, putting a small gold locket into the monk's hand. "I found it around the neck of a young child, I discovered ten years ago in the forest of Knockmoldown."

"How?" exclaimed the monk, greatly agitated, his mind reverting in a moment to his lost niece,—“How came she in the forest and by what name did she call herself?"

"She called herself Margaret of Drumgarmon;" answered the gleeman, for it was he. "We brought her up I trust kindly as we would our own child. My wife died, and about two years after I fell into a lingering sickness myself, and was unable to support the child any longer. I came to Youghal in order to take ship for my own bonnie Lincoln—for I am an Englishman—and met a kind merchant standing with his wife at their door. I begged him for the sake of Him who died for us all to keep the little girl till I could come back to take her with me to England, and they, although they thought she was my own daughter, in the kindness of their hearts took her in and promised to give her a home. Hugh Barrette, I mind it well, was the kind merchant's name. I came back for the child, and woe is me, I shall never see her blithe face again!"

The gleeman was sinking gradually during this story, and at the last words his head fell suddenly back upon his beloved tambour, his legs were drawn up and jerked out with a quick spasm, and the monk bending low to help him in his extremity, found that he was dead.

"Sir James of Strancally!" then exclaimed the monk, turning to the knight who was standing at some distance—"I can tell thee blithe news. My wanderings are ended—I have found the lost child of my poor brother of Drumgarmon!"

"How?" exclaimed the knight, a wild and delightful suspicion crossing his mind. "How hast thou found her, and how am I concerned in her discovery more than befits a knight and a distant kinsman?"

"Margaret! Margaret, thy pretty nurse!" said the monk, is but the adopted daughter of the good merchant, Hugh—she is my niece, the young lady of Drumgarmon!" After explaining all to the knight, he continued,—“Thou lovest her, Sir James of Strancally, and I could see from her bearing towards thee that she loves thee in return, well and truly. She is an orphan, but the child of a brave knight, and will have for her marriage dower her father's broad district of Drumgarmon. Yet methinks she can nowhere find a braver protector than the young Knight of Strancally!"

It is needless to dilate upon the meeting of Margaret and the knight, and the mighty preparations that were made for their marriage feast. Suffice it to say, that they were married by Gerald the Franciscan, that the bravery of the whole country was seen at their bridal revel, and that they loved well and lived happily for many a calm succeeding year in their strong fortalice of Strancally.

THE STREAM OF LIFE.

Fresh flowers are growing
By Life's first flowing,
Whose waves are glowing
In the light of Truth;
And Joy is stealing
O'er every feeling,
While Hope keeps peeling
From the tower of Youth.
From Nature's treasure
We snatch the measure
Of sparkling pleasure,
Which we madly drain;
And deem that never Fond ties can sever,
But shield us ever
From grief and pain.

As Age advances
The sunlight dances
With fickle glances
On the Stream of Life;
And mists of warning
That seem'd adorning
The brow of morning
Grow to clouds of strife.
Last joy appearing
Our sad souls cheering
With dreams endearing
Of the days of yore.
Our spirit pillows
On Mem'ry's billows,
'Neath pensive willows
For evermore! G. B. O'H.

THE CASTLE OF MONEA.

THE Castle of Monea, which forms the subject of our illustration on page forty-one, is situated in the county of Fermanagh, about five miles from the town of Enniskillen, and is a good example of the castellated residences erected at the period of the "Plantation of Ulster." It was built, according to Pynnar's "Survey of Ulster," made in 1618-19, by Malcolm Hamilton, rector of Devenish, a descendant of the first patentees of the escheated lands of Monea. The castle was fifty feet in height, and was surrounded by a wall nine feet in height and three hundred in circuit. It was the chief place of refuge of the English and Scotch settlers during the Civil War of 1641.

A MATRIMONIAL FERRET.

NOW him, do we? Gracious goodness, only ask Teresa. We are quiet, retired people—perhaps the quietest in the neighbourhood, which may account, my dear, for the happy—and, indeed, on our part, unexpected—intimacy which has sprung up between us and Mr. Lionhead. He hates noise and bustle; we can scarcely tolerate a pin to drop. He loves reading, being a gentleman of studious habits, and you know that Teresa was always a decided book-worm."

"Mamma," interposes Teresa, elevating her head, in order that her words may reach the drawing-room window, at which sits pensive Mr. Lionhead, dejectedly sucking a sherry-cobbler through a short straw, "mamma, dear, what if Mr. Lionhead should hear us? It is so rude to speak so of one in his own presence."

"And if he did hear us, darling," replies Mrs. Ferret, springing a round octave higher, "is it not a consolation to a gentleman to know that his good qualities are not unobserved by those around him? Flattery, Miss Whalebone" (this was addressed to a lady of indefinite years and unwholesome complexion, who formed one of the little trio under Mr. Lionhead's window), "flattery is degrading to those who use it, and offensive to those to whom it is addressed. But truth—rigid, exact truth, Miss Whalebone—is quite another thing, and should not be avoided from any silly motives of delicacy. Besides, my dear, what is the use of being good if nobody sees it? Teresa, child, spare your blushes" (this was said with remarkable elevation of heart and voice), "and congratulate yourself on having such an unexceptionable admirer."

Says Miss Whalebone: "He is an admirer, then? You lucky girl! What is the colour of his hair?"

Mrs. Ferret replies: "Some people, my dear—but they know nothing of colours—would call it red, and yet it is not red. Have you ever remarked that rich hair with a golden tint in it—dark gold? That will give you an idea of what it is."

"Harry," remarks my intended, "says that it looks like a bad mauve, or a—"

All at once there is a subdued "Hush—ah!" under the windows, followed by a few moments' silence. I can imagine the pause to be filled up with three deprecatory nods of mamma's head, and a whispered confession of indiscretion from Teresa.

"Of his generosity, his kindness of heart, there can be no question," at last observes Miss Whalebone.

"And we hope for the best, my dear," subjoins mamma, in a resigned, but sanguine tone. "I have every reason to think that Teresa loves him; and that, in good time, an acquaintance begun so unexpectedly will end pleasantly and honourably for all parties. My love, I see you have left a dead leaf hanging to that geranium. You must clip it off with your own scissors to-morrow, darling."

The plant threatened with amputation grows on the sill of Mr. Lionhead's window.

"Those are Mr. Lionhead's geraniums, of course," observes Miss Whalebone. "To watch and water them must be a labour of love to you, Teresa."

"And it is," concedes Mrs. Ferret. "Little offices of this sort make one so familiar with the elegant peculiarities of those whom they wish to please. Teresa, dear, I am afraid you overlooked the caterpillars; they have bored a big hole through that red-dragon leaf."

"Yes, indeed; Teresa, how could you be so careless?" asks Miss Whalebone. "Well, I'm off."

"Teresa and I are just going to have a look at the new baréges at M'Birney's. Good morning, my dear."

And so the group separates. Reader! I beg you will not be astounded at the admission—I am Mr. Lionhead. I repeat this as I write it, for I confess that my own identity has become confused in the snatch of conversation, which I have faithfully reported, under my windows. I am that favoured individual whose cultivated tastes, goodness, and benevolence, have furnished three ladies with a topic for a morning conversation. I am the proprietor of that golden dark hair whose eulogies have been pronounced by the highest tribunals of taste—a council of ladies. As for the "bad mauve," I repeat it as an aspersion below grave consideration. I am a bachelor, and live on the first floor of my residence, Kensington-ville, Rathmines. My room is an absolute litter of worked slippers, embroidered cigar cases, smoking caps, kettle holders, et cetera. The room directly underneath mine is tenanted by Mrs. Ferret and her daughter. The late Mr. Josiah Ferret, of whom the present Mrs. Ferret is the surviving relict (I make the statement on the solid authority of a tombstone at Glasnevin), was, I have been given to understand, a wax-chandler. He died some eight years ago, leaving no will; and as the effects he had to bequeath were limited to a soap-boiler, a refiner, three dozen of deal boxes, and an empty till, there is abundant reason for believing that, in abstaining from reducing his last wishes to the form of a testament, he was merely conforming to the economical instincts of the age. Set adrift on the world, Mrs. Ferret and her daughter went abroad—which is an allegorical way of stating that they quitted Dublin proper, and took lodgings in the suburbs. The maternal Ferret, before the first flush of grief had exhausted itself, began to look about her, and to think that the best thing to be done for Teresa was to have her settled in the world. And, as the best way of settling a girl in the world is to find her a husband, Mrs. Ferret immediately cast her eyes about in search of that desirable acquisition.

It is one of the misfortunes of civilization that whilst a hundred ill-favoured, talentless girls will have a swarm of suitors dangling at their heels and swearing by their nosegays, three hundred and fifty clever ones will remain suitorless and disconsolate. In fact, there is a feeling growing every day deeper amongst bachelors that clever women do not make good wives—that they know more about astronomy than mutton chops, and less of shirt buttons than of geology. In this latter category Miss Ferret found herself, and it is due to her to state that she fully appreciated her situation, without caring much for the consequences. In vain Mrs. Ferret coaxed, threatened, and bullied "desirable young men"—come they would not. They avoided her as they would the pest. So she fretted herself on to the horns of a great social dilemma, and it was whilst writhing transfixed on that ugly position that she heard, for the first time in her life, of the "H.P.E.M.C."—initials which, attached to their legitimate contexts, extend themselves into the alarming title of the "Husband-Providing-and-Eligible-Match-Making Corporation." Mrs. Ferret studied for nine days (I derive my information from one who has known her for years) the prospectus of the Corporation; on the tenth day she paid five shillings, and was solemnly inducted into the secrets of an association which professed, and I believe professes still, that by strictly following up the written directions with which the members were provided, any mother possessed of sufficient nerve, tact, and prudence, might procure for her daughter, if not extremely repulsive in appearance and neglected in education, a suitable partner. "Success," said the programme, "invariably depends on delicacy of manipulation." This was a plain phrase which, notwithstanding its obvious simplicity, took Mrs. Ferret no inconsiderable patience to rightly interpret.

I leave it to any one to judge the merciless character of the struggle which I am obliged to wage day after day with my "judicious" friend Mrs. Ferret, H.P.E.M.M.C. People may affect to smile at it; but if they would only assume my situation for an hour or two, I think they would hasten to change their sneers for sympathies. I met Mrs. Ferret, for the first time, nine weeks ago on the staircase. She was descending, and I literally incorporated myself with the wall that she might pass unruffled by contact. Notwithstanding all my precautions, the lady dexterously contrived to insert the tail of her skirt under the ball of my right foot. The miserable fabric gave way with a soft "whiff;" apologies followed, and an acquaintance was at once established through the agency of a bit of over-starched muslin. Perfectly aware that I had been out-manceuvred in spite of all my caution, I resolved to deprive her of the fruits of her advantage by keeping close to my quarters, and habitually sweeping the staircase through the keyhole before venturing at descent to the hall. My prudence, however, was no match for Mrs. Ferret's motherly sagacity. Four or five mornings after our first encounter there came a gentle, half-diffident, retiring knock to my door. "Come in," I said, and the injunction was obeyed by a lady of some twenty-seven summers. She was attired in an elaborate négligée, and her long hair was arranged with studied carelessness over her pretty shoulders.

"Will you kindly pardon this intrusion?" said my visiter, slowly advancing to the table at which I sat; "but mamma——"

"Mamma!" I exclaimed, with ill-disguised alarm, "mamma!"

"Yes, sir, Mrs. Ferret."

"Oh, Mrs. Ferret, of course. She is well, I trust?"

"Unhappily she is not," said Miss Ferret, with a profound sigh which betokened serious disquietude; "she is suffering from a nervous headache, and sent me to ask if you would oblige her with your pastille burner."

"I'm so sorry that it is not in my power, Miss Ferret."

"Indeed, I feel very sorry for interrupting you; you read so much, and your time is so valuable. Did you see the 'Illustrated Dublin Journal' yet, Mr. Lionhead?"

"I have seen only the announcements of it in the newspapers, Miss Ferret."

"It is really a charming magazine," remarked my visiter.

"You have read it, then?" I observed, languidly.

"Dear, yes. You should read it: it is really a good thing in these days of trashy periodicals."

"Ah, I must see it," I remarked, with a delicate show of impatience.

"Then I shall send it down to you," said Miss Ferret, with a large amount of decision.

A vision of perfumed slips and light criticisms danced through my mind; so I said, in a half-pleading tone, "Pray do not, Miss Ferret. Much obliged, but——"

"There is really no obligation in question, Mr. Lionhead. Then mamma spoke so largely of your politeness the other day, when you walked on her dress going down stairs;" and here Miss Ferret chirruped a little silvery laugh, which gave me an admirable opportunity of observing the soundness and whiteness of her teeth.

"That was unfortunate," I replied, trying to summon up a faint smile. And here I was tempted to add, "But you ladies do dress so extravagantly that really we——"

"Extravagantly, Mr. Lionhead!" exclaimed Miss Ferret, giving a rapid glance at her own costume, "Extravagant! You surely do not mean costliness of material?"

"I don't exactly mean costliness of material, Miss Ferret, but——"

"Oh, now I understand you: breadth—extent—what you call a—a—amplitude. Well, you can see that I am particularly moderate in both ways," said my friend, holding up a dainty little pinch of her gown for my inspection. "I can dress for fifteen pounds a year—perhaps less if we have a wet season."

This was said in a tone intended to fascinate me; but I said nothing, and began nibbling a quill with solemn indifference.

"Then you can't let us have the burner, Mr. Lionhead?"

"I am grieved that I cannot, Miss Ferret."

"Well, good morning. By the way, do you ever go down to Bray?"

"Not often."

"Pretty place."

"Very."

"Good morning."

The "Illustrated Dublin Journal" lies on my table, and between the leaves is a charming photograph of Miss Teresa Ferret, (which I have endeavoured to sketch above) and a tiny slip of white paper, which I never had courage to read until last evening. "Dear Mr. Lionhead," said the slip, "I send you the 'Journal.' It is charming, and has caused quite a sensation in literary circles. Pray do not read so late at night.—T. F."

And, as if determined to fill up the measure of my miserable apprehensiveness, Mrs. Ferret comes down stairs last Sunday morning, and presents me with a green eye-shade, constructed out of a bit of whalebone and a shred of cheap silk. She further insisted on my trying it on before she left the room. As I was removing the horrid thing, a pair of hands were plaited over my eyes, and a seducing voice, which I instantly recognized, said, "Guess who it is."

"Mrs. Searle, my landlady."

"Shame! her hands are as hard as dinner-plates. Guess again."

"One of the skeletons in the College of Surgeons."

"You naughty quiz! Come, guess once more."

"Oh! Miss Ferret."

"Are you sure?"

"Pretty sure," I said, disengaging the young lady's hands, and trying to look patient.

"Pon my word!" she exclaimed, "you cannot even guess how much that becomes you. It brings out your forehead beautifully. And, bless me, Mr. Lionhead, what capital eyes you've got! I should call them—what?—diamonds; but that's too common-place."

This occurred last Sunday morning, since which I have laid strict injunctions on my landlady to admit no visitors to my room without my special consent. But I cannot beat off the Ferrets. Finding that my rooms are no longer accessible to them, and knowing my partiality for fresh air and open windows, they take advantage of this weakness, and hold open-air discussions on my merits, under my nose, twice or thrice a day. The tone of their deliberations is calculated to a nicety to reach my windows. From all I can gather, they have disposed of me finally as Teresa's husband, Mrs. Ferret's motherly doubts as to Teresa's love for me being, I understand, the only humiliating obstacle in the way of our approaching union. But they will be doomed to disappointment, for I have given my landlady notice that I am about to leave her house, driven from it by the heartless machinations of the H.P.E.M.M. Corporation.

CURIOSITIES OF DERIVATION.

SINCE the "odd phases in some popular phrases" have been regarded as deserving of exemplification and illustration,* there can be no reason why the odd traits of certain words in every-day use (and abuse, too), should not be equally noteworthy, not merely for the archaeological lore individually associated with them, but that they are the pivots, so to speak, on which the sense of many an oft-quoted but derivatively obscure expression turns. As the design of this paper, therefore is not more pretentious than to be a bit of idle chit-chat anent some vagrant verbiage, let us, in limine, and as an apt example of its purpose, take the simple word "gossip." In its original sense "gossip" meant a sponsor for an infant in baptism, from the Anglo-Saxon God-sib, that is, literally, "of kin in God." Thus Spenser in the "Faerie Queen":—

"He wonneth in the land of Fayëree,
Yet is no fary borne, ne sib at all
To elves, but sprung of seed terrestrial,
And whylome by false fairies stolne away,
Whyles yet in infant cradle he did crall."

* See Duffy's Hibernian Magazine, Nos. 10 and 13.

The affinity of "godship" was regarded of such consequence that by the Canon Law intermarriages of "godsibs" to the same child were stringently prohibited, as if they were nearest of kin. In the Elizabethan era both the godfather and godmother were termed "gossips," but at a later period the appellation was generally limited to the latter. In his "Diary" for May 20, 1666, Samuel Pepys, the quaint yet instructive, writes:—

"Lord's day. With my wife to church. At noon dined nobly, ourselves alone. After dinner my wife and Mercer by coach to Greenwich, to be gossip to Mrs. Daniell's child. My wife much pleased with the reception she had, and she was godmother, and did hold the child at the font."

Female gossips, according to Junius, were accustomed, under cloak of this spiritual relationship, to "tell stories and tittle over them;" hence arose the present familiar acceptance of the term, as thus slyly adverted to by Sir Thomas More:—

"'Yes, yea,' quod I, 'a woman can kepe a counsayl well ynough. For though she tell a gossip she telleth it but in counsayl yet, nor that gossippe to her gossippe neither, and so when all the gossippes in the towne knowe yt, yet it is but counsayl still!'"

Fie, thou ungallant caviller at the privilege of the sex! However, place aux dames. Here we have the word "lady." Tooke, no mean authority, says its radix is hlaf, the past participle of the Anglo-Saxon hlif-ian, to raise; hence one elevated or exalted. Others assert that in the good old times when the mistress of the manor distributed at stated seasons a certain quantity of bread to her indigent neighbours, with her own fair hands, she was termed by the grateful recipients Leff-day, that is, in the Saxon, the "bread-giver." Would that all the ladies in this year of grace, 1861, could establish their claim to the title by practically illustrating the truth of the latter derivation! At any rate there are few ladies, we opine, unshackled by matrimonial fetters, who would object to a "millionaire." This word is of Venetian origin. Upon the return of the famous navigator, Marco Polo, to the "bride of the Adriatic," from the court of the Khan of Tartary in 1295, to all interrogatories as to the wealth of that potentate he would reply—"ten or fifteen millions of gold ducats." His rejoinder obtained for him the sobriquet of "Messer Marco Milani," and the family dwelling-place was for centuries afterwards termed, "La Corte de Million." Sensorini, in his "Venezia Descritta," attributes the popular application of this surname to the immense riches possessed by the Polo family at the period of their return to their native land. The French employed the word to denote a great capitalist, and it has been of late years naturalised with us. May every fair reader of the JOURNAL enmesh a millionaire, and spend a right pleasant "honeymoon!" It was the custom of the Teutonic tribes to drink mead or metheglin, a beverage made with honey, for thirty days after a wedding. The Saxons imported the custom into England, and from it, in course of time, arose the practice of enjoying the first month after marriage in retirement. A country wedding without a "bonfire" would be but a sombre affair. It was a mediaeval custom to keep the vigils before certain feasts, particularly Midsummer Eve, at which period the imps of darkness were supposed to have special power. To destroy their influence it was usual to light large fires of bones, the smell of which, it was believed, was particularly obnoxious to them, it being said, in the language of the time, "the devil" cannot abide the smell of breyning (burning) bones.

Many etymologists trace the word "saunterer" to the French Sainte-terre, or Holy Land, from which too many of the crusaders returned as loitering, purposeless wanderers. Our own impression is that it is derived from the words sans terre, without land. It is thus illustrated in "Hudibras":—

"Unhappy wretch!
What hast thou gotten by this fetch,
Of all thy tricks in this new trade,
Thy holy brotherhood o' the blade?
By sauntering still on some adventure,
And growing to thy house a centaur?"

The disparaging term "pettifogger" applied to lawyers of a certain class, is also of French origin, being derived from the words petit voque, little fame or reputation. In all great houses, according to Gilford, but particularly in royal residences, there were a number of mean dependents, whose office it was to attend the wood-yard, sculleries, &c. Of these (for in the lowest depths there was a lower still) the most forlorn wretches seemed to have been selected to carry coals to the halls, kitchens, &c. To this smutty corps the people in derision gave the name of "blackguards." As early as the year 1630, the hunters of the wild cattle in the savannahs of Hispaniola were known under the designation of "buccaneers." They derived this name from boucan, an old Indian word which the Caribs gave to the hut in which they smoked the flesh of the oxen killed in the chase. In course of time this food became known as viande boucanée, and the hunters themselves gradually assumed the name of "buccaneers."

A "rasher on the coals" appears to have been a favourite article of food in the time of Shakespeare, who makes special allusion to it in his "Merchant of Venice." It is mentioned, with a red-herring, as a capital incentive for the lover of wine in Nash's "Pierce Peni-lesse." The word is derived from the French raser, to shave—literally a shaving or slice of bacon. Vessels cut down from their original to an inferior size are known as razees. There is a familiar reference to the rasher in Goldsmith's "Haunch of Venison":

"As in some Irish houses where things are so-so,
One gammon of bacon hangs up for a show;
But for eating a rasher of what they take pride in,
They'd as soon think of eating the pan it was fried in!"

But rashers are very provocative of thirst, and a glass of "grog" is by no means a despicable after consideration. This popular beverage was so called from Admiral Vernon, who was generally known in the navy as "old grogram," from a cloak of that material which the veteran was accustomed to wear in squally weather. While in command of the West India station, shortly after the reduction of Porto Bello, he introduced the use of rum and water in the squadron, which became a favourite drink, and in honour of him was called "grog." "Toddy" is from the eastern tai-dé, the sap of a species of pine. Wine and water first received the name of "negus" in the reign of Queen Anne, from the inventor, Colonel Francis Negus, whose favourite beverage it was. It became fashionable at the regimental mess, and the officers in compliment to their colonel called it after him. "Porter" was so termed from the class of society to whom its use was principally confined on its introduction. Probably the earliest reference to it is in a passage in the writings of Nicholas Amherst, 1721: "We had rather dine at a cook's shop upon beef, cabbage, and porter, than tug at an oar, or rot in a dark, foetid dungeon." "Fool" as applied to a dish of boiled gooseberries and cream, is from the French verb fouler, to crush or squeeze. It may, perhaps, be unnecessary to remark that the word "gooseberry" itself should be correctly written goose-berry, that is, the fruit of a prickly shrub or bush. Some consider "luncheon" a corruption of nuncheon, or a noon-shun, the refreshment taken at noon, when labourers desist from work to shun the heat. It is, however, with more probability from the Spanish lonja, a slice or cut, and hence the daily meal at eleven o'clock termed lonce, pronounced Ponchey. This is synonymous with the Armorican lounacqua, to swallow hastily or greedily. Thus Gay:—

"While hungry thou stood'st staring like an oaf, I sliced the luncheon from the barley loaf."

"Muffin" is probably from the old French mou-pain, soft bread, easily converted in mouffin, whence muffin. "Prog" is thought by some to be from the Russian pirog, a custom consisting in the lady of the house distributing a certain quantity of bread or meat to her guests, while others derive it from the Anglo-Saxon pricc-an, to pick out, or select, and hence, victuals, provisions, &c. Congreve thus illustrates the use of the word:—

"While spouse, tucked up, does in her pattens trudge it,
With handkerchief of prog."

There is not, we may here add, properly speaking, such a word as "tureen," the vessel in which soup is served; it is a corruption of the Latin "terrene."

The source of the word "haberdasher" has been a fertile theme for discussion. Some contend that its etymology may be traced to the French, avoir d'acheter, that is, to have, to buy; the phrase "avoir de pois" was formerly written "haber de pois," and a similar corruption may have occurred in "avoir d'acheter," as "haber d'achet," whence haberdasher. It has also been derived from the Saxon Hab þu þis, "Will you buy this?" as well as from the words Haber dass, herr? "Will you take this, sir?" said to have been commonly used by the Flemish traders who settled in London in the fourteenth century, when addressing the passers by. "Berdashers of small wares," were nick-named "What d'ye lack?" in the seventeenth century. But these etymological theories are too fanciful, however apparently correct, for us. "Berdash" was a name formerly used in England for a certain kind of neck-dress; whence a person who manufactured or retailed such neck-cloths was called a "berdasher;" from this to the modern "haberdasher" the transition is natural. We find the word, moreover, in the "Guardian":—

A large number of the names at present applied to materials for articles of dress, are derived from the localities in which they were originally made. As examples of these it will be sufficient to mention cambric, from Cambray, in France; calico, from Calicut, in India; damask, from Damascus, in the East; diaper, from d'Ypres, in France; dimity, from Damietta; paduasoy, a kind of silk, from Padua; shalloon, a light woollen stuff, from Chalons. "Blankets" took their name from Thomas Blanket, who established the first manufactory for these articles at Bristol, about the year 1840.

Innumerable ingenious theories have been ventilated from time anent the etymology of the familiar term "humbug." Many regard it as a corruption of the word Hamburg, in which city, during some continental campaign, so many canards were fabricated, that at length it became customary, when expressing incredulity at any statement, to say, "that is from Hamburg," or "that is Hamburg." As the Italians say, "se non è vero è ben trovato;" if not true this is very well invented. But Scotland has advanced a better claim to its origin. There was, as the story goes, in "auld lang syne," a family called Bogue, or Boag, in Berwickshire, a daughter of which espoused one of the Humes of Hume, whose representatives are still in existence. In time, by default of male issue, the Bogue estate reverted to one Geordie Hume, who was popularly called Hume of the Bogue, or "Aun o' the Bug," as it was pronounced in that district of Scotland then called "the Mearns." This worthy is said to have so successfully rivalled Baron Munchausen in his relations of the marvellous, that at last any extraordinary averment in the locality was treated as "just a hum o' the bug," afterwards contracted to humbug. This derivation is by no means improbable, but we have another nearer home. It is well known that the coinage issued by James II. from the Dublin mint was composed of such worthless materials that the crowns and half-crowns were afterwards recognised merely as pence and half-pence. The base metal of which they were manufactured was known in Irish as "uim-bog," pronounced "oom-bug," and in the course of mercantile transactions such phrases as, "that's a piece of uim-bog," etc., were frequent, and are thought by many to have suggested humbug.

After all, notwithstanding the apparent vraisemblance of this to the preceding hypothesis, the following is the true source of the word. Formerly at public places to "hum" was a popular mode of expressing approbation and applause. We find the annexed notice of the habit in Harrison's "State Trials of the Reign of Charles II.," 1660:—

"[Here the spectators hummed.] Lord Chief Baron—Gentlemen, this humming is not at all becoming the gravity of this court. It is more fitting for a stage play than for a court of justice."

Indeed, so prevalent was the practice at this time that we find instances in which it was employed to reward the eloquence of eminent divines. "When Burnet preached," says Johnson, in his Life of Sprat, "part of his congregation hummed so loudly and so long that he sat down to enjoy it, and rubbed his face with his handkerchief. When Sprat preached, he likewise was honoured with the like animating hum, but he stretched out his hand to the congregation, and cried 'Peace, peace, I pray you, peace.' The word was afterwards used to imply cajolery, flattery, etc., as in the following distich from Brooke's "Epilogue on Humbugging":—

"Beauty, by ancient tradition, we find
Has delightfully humm'd the whole race of mankind."

In Grose's "Dictionary of the Vulgar Tongue," to hum means to deceive, in which sense it is also used by Peter Pindar:—

"Fall many a trope from bayonet and drum
He threaten'd; but behold! 'twas all a hum."

The word "bug" is of Celtic origin, and signifies some terrific spectre or goblin; frequent instances of its use might be adduced. Thus Shakspeare, in his "Taming of the Shrew":—

"Tush! tush! fear boys with bugs."

Holinshed, in his "Chronicle of Ireland," writes: "My lord, there be shrewd bugs in the borders for the Earle of Kildare to feare." "Bug" is the root of the Scotch "bogie," and is also probably identical with the Icelandic "puki," an evil spirit. Two other familiar expressions have likewise a connection with this word. Thus Fairfax, in his "Godfrey of Boulogne":—

"As silly children doe not bend their eyes,
Where they are told strange bug beares haunt the place."

Lloyd, in his "Chit Chat" has:—

"Joeky, my love, say, don't you cry;
Take yea abroad! indeed, not I;
For all the bugaboes to fright ye."

To "humbug" is, consequently, literally to "hum" or deceive with "bugs," or imaginary spirits or appearances, but it will be obvious how simply and yet withal variously the meaning of the word may be amplified.

THE CHASE ON THE PRAIRIE;

AN EPISODE OF TEXAN WARFARE.

MORE than seven years ago I was a sergeant in a Texan cavalry regiment. Texas, although one of the most beautiful and fertile regions of America, was not at the period a very safe or inviting place to live in, troubled as it was by internal strife, and by the fierce and continual warfare upon its borders between the settlers, the Indians, and the Mexicans. The corps to which I belonged was one of the finest in the service, and was, at the time of which I write, quartered near the banks of the Rio Grande, to co-operate with detachments of the regiments which Lieutenant-General Scott had led forward, in order to meet, almost on their own ground, a large army of mounted Indians and Mexican guerillas, who, it was reported, were about making a combined and rapid descent upon that part of the territory.

Woe to the settlers that were fated to hear the terrible war whoop of such invaders! In the solitary ranches along the river the inmates trembled as they heard the news of their approach, and even in the villages that were beginning to spring up on many a fertile spot by wood and plain, there was no small amount of fear, though some of the stout woodmen, indeed, seemed not at all loath to exercise bowie-knife and rifle in a brush with the Indians. No one knew, at the precise time I am speaking of, from what side the Indians were to make their descent. But our general, who knew the tricks of his foes, was not to be caught sleeping. Along a certain broad district of prairie land over which he knew the enemy should pass in order to touch Texan territory, he had placed a chain of picquets, whose duty it was to keep a sharp look out upon the rolling prairies in front, and on the appearance of any hostile force, to send a courier back with intelligence to the main body. With one of these picquets I was stationed as commander. My subaltern was a corporal, a young man of almost gigantic stature. He was a native of Tipperary, by name John O'Carroll, and knew my family in the old land.

Our camping-place was situated upon the summit of an abrupt bluff rising over a small and beautiful stream that ran westward through the prairie, and emptied its waters into the Rio Grande about twenty miles above the spot where our general was stationed with the main body of the army. Nothing could exceed the loveliness of the prospect from that solitary bluff. It was summer, and as far as the eye could reach on every side the prairie spread out, all ablaze with flowers of every imaginable hue, while at our feet, from east to west, the course of the little river might be traced through the bright plain like a silver ribbon with lustrous borders of green, and gold, and scarlet, so luxuriantly were its banks clothed with soft, emerald grass, and many-coloured blossoms. Occasionally a herd of deer enlivened the prospect, as they wound their way at noon over the rolling plain, or approached the river to quench their thirst in the eventide. Less frequently a drove of buffaloes might be seen far away towards the horizon, browsing lazily on the long grass, or sweeping along in mad gambols towards some distant river, and more seldom still the plumed Indian could be observed in the distance, with spear in hand, and painted robe flying in the breeze, careering away upon his proud war-steed like some evil spectre of that perilous and lonely land.

We were not lonely, however, because we were never idle. There was always something to do. Five of us were generally out during the day-time hunting the shores of the river in our neighbourhood, in order to supply ourselves with fresh meat, while of the remaining five—there were but ten of us in all—some kept watch and ward from the summit of the bluff, whilst the remainder usually employed themselves in gathering materials for the night's bivouac-fire. For this fire we could use not even half-dry wood. The latter should be perfectly withered and without moisture in order to avoid smoke, the appearance of which would, of course, betray our station to the Indians. As a further precaution against the observation of the sharp-eyed red-skins, we had constructed around our fire-place a circle of stones, outside which no light could be seen, and within this we usually lay down to sleep at night, our horses being picqueted beneath the trees hard by, under the care of one of my comrades, each of whom took the duty in turn.

One day as I and four others were about setting out on the track of some buffaloes we had seen down the stream, the man on guard gave the word that he saw a stranger approaching from the eastward. Riding up to the summit of the bluff, I looked in the direction pointed out by the sentinel, and saw a horseman riding towards us at full gallop, who, by his equipments, I knew was a soldier belonging to our regiment.

"We'll soon have sharp work, I reckon," said the sentinel. "That man brings us news of the Indians, or my name isn't Wattie Boone."

It was true enough. The courier brought an order from the officer in command of the chain of picquets for me and half my men to repair to a place about forty miles eastward, called the Roaring Forks, in order to strengthen a convoy which was on its march to the camp of General Scott, with money to pay the army. This convoy, the order said, was in hourly expectation of being attacked by a combined force of Indians and Mexican guerillas, who were hovering on its march. The courier presented a similar order for the next picquet, with which I immediately ordered off one of my men on the spur. Leaving four men behind on the bluff under the command of Wattie Boone, who was a lance-corporal, I set off with the rest over the prairie towards the place indicated in the order.

It was late that night when we reached the Roaring Forks and fell in with the convoy, which consisted of about forty men, and which was encamped upon a small tongue of land formed by the confluence of two turbulent streams. The country around was thickly wooded, and I was told on my arrival that a force of about a thousand mounted Indians and Mexicans was lying concealed in a deep valley towards the south-east, almost directly in our course for the camp of General Scott.

The morning light was just beginning to appear over the eastern woods when the reveille sounded, and after a hasty breakfast we were on the march. We had with us a train of about forty mules laden with money for the pay of the army, and about the same number laden with provisions and other necessities. For the latter we cared little, but it may well be supposed that we would not let the former go out of our possessions without a stout fight with our foes, no matter how numerous they were. The country, as we marched along, became more open, but still there was no appearance of the enemy. Once, indeed, as we forded a river, we saw three horsemen upon the summit of a low ridgy hill to the west, but on resuming our march at the other side of the stream they disappeared. By this we knew that we were watched closely. With rifles unslung, revolvers ready, and swords loosened in their scabbards, we still marched on, passing the valley on our right, where the enemy were said to be encamped, but still there was no sign of hostile plume or spear. We were now approaching the verge of the open prairie, when from the south-west six men joined us with the intelligence that the enemy in greater force than ever were marching in a parallel course with us on the right. This puzzled us somewhat, for we expected to be attacked early in the day, but still we marched on till noon, when we halted for a short time on a small plain, surrounded on every side by wood, except towards the west, in which direction it looked out upon the level prairie.

Just as we were preparing to resume our march, a wild and vengeful war-whoop burst suddenly on our ears, and in a moment the whole force of outlawed Mexicans and their fierce allies rushed upon us from the woods. On they came upon their wild war-steeds, raising a cloud of dust as they approached over the sun-parched plain, and brandishing their long gleaming spears, while those that had them sent the contents of their fatal rifles into our midst before they came to the charge. A sharp and decisive conflict ensued, in which, by dint of overwhelming numbers, we were worsted. The mules and their costly burdens were captured, several of our men slain, and the rest scattered, of which latter I, about half an hour after the commencement of the attack, was galloping madly over the prairie to the westward with three Indians in deadly pursuit behind me.

When a man has the free prairie before him, and a good and faithful horse to bear him on, it is not fear that should take possession of his heart, no matter who pursues. If he keeps his wits about him, there are at least two chances to one that he will escape; but the moment fear blinds him, the chances are reversed, and he is undone. Inured as I was to Indian warfare, it may readily be supposed that I kept my senses about me, although as I looked over my left or right shoulder occasionally at the three warriors on my track, and saw them gaining slowly but steadily upon me, I felt that, should I get off, my escape would be a narrow one. One of the Indians came on in a direct line behind me, while the other two, who were a little in advance, kept one upon the right hand, and the other on the left, as if with the purpose of engaging my attention on both flanks, that their companion might the more easily capture or dispatch me from the rear. Thus we swept on for nearly half a dozen miles, my pursuers all the while steadily gaining upon me, though they were still far out of bullet range.

I soon changed their tactics. After passing a huge boulder of rock that lay like a prostrate turret upon the breast of the flat plain, I suddenly turned my horse to the left, by which manoeuvre I succeeded in bringing the three Indians in a line behind me, the warrior who had ridden from the beginning on the left hand being now, of course, first in the chase. Thus we sped for nearly another half dozen miles, till I approached the edge of a deep chasm that ran an immense distance across the prairie in one continuous channel. This chasm I had seen before, and knew that to cross it was impossible, so I was forced to wheel my horse to the right again, by which I brought my pursuers once more behind me in their original order.

I could hear, still faintly, however, the exultant and derisive shout of the three demons behind me, as they marked this movement, which sorely decreased the distance between us. The two that formed the wings of the pursuit now put their horses to the topmost speed, and began gaining on me more rapidly than ever. I now saw that my only chance of escape lay in my weapons, and in my own coolness and bravery. I was well armed. I had a rifle slung at my back, and two revolvers, one of which was the regimental weapon, and the other my own private property. These, with a bowie-knife and sword were well enough, you will say, but then both rifle and revolvers were unloaded, having been discharged in the late battle. I set myself to remedy this, however. Letting the bridle fall loose upon the neck of my brave horse, I took the revolvers in turn from my belt, and loaded them. It is a difficult thing to do, especially with an enemy close behind, but then I was used to it, and succeeded as well at them as in loading my rifle. During the operation, indeed, I was unable to guide my horse properly, and thus my enemies drew closer still. The warrior that came directly on my track seemed not as well mounted as the others, for instead of gaining upon me he had fallen behind, but his two comrades still swept on until we three almost formed a line upon the prairie.

And now I knew that the decisive moment was coming on, for the two were gradually closing upon me as we still swept away madly. Directly before me on the plain, about two miles away, I saw some marshy pools with three dark objects upon them. What those dark objects were I could not tell for some few moments. At last I saw that they were buffaloes; but why they did not scamper away at our approach I could not tell. Indeed I had but little time to think on it, for my pursuers were now almost within bullet range of me. On still I swept directly for the pools, and as I approached, two of the buffaloes started up from the muddy bath they had been luxuriating in, and galloped away; but the remaining one, a huge bull, which it seems had been slightly wounded that morning by some hunter, and which was now mad with the heat and pain, did not take our intrusion so easily. He stood up, and with his shaggy head lowered and eyes flashing angrily, sent a low, rumbling bellow of defiance and fury over the plain, while at the same time with his hoofs he tore the soft marsh, casting up behind him a splashing shower of mingled mud and water. There was no help for it, so I rode straight for where he stood, hoping by some dexterous turn of my horse to escape the half-blind but furious charge he was sure to make as I approached him. All happened as I expected. I had scarcely come within thirty yards of him, when the huge animal, with a fierce and furious roar, tossed up a still denser shower of mud and water, and then charged. He was now within half a dozen lengths of me, when turning my horse suddenly to the left, I brought the noble animal out of the buffalo's charging line, and got forward unscathed. I guessed that the furious bull would now go on till he met the Indian behind me, so I was soon splashing through the marsh, which, luckily, was one of those peculiar to the prairies, shallow, and with a hard bottom.

I was now safe upon the other side, and my horse instead of being fatigued from the soft ground, was rather refreshed by his hoof bath. But the swiftness of my steed was but of small avail to me, for the two Indians at last came rushing in right and left within pistol-shot. I knew by the way they approached that they intended to take me prisoner, but this was not so easy. Throwing the bridle loose once more, I grasped my two revolvers, and presented them right and left at my pursuers. The Indians have an instinctive dread of revolvers. The moment my pursuers saw the terrible weapons presented at them, each slung himself, with the agility of a practised equestrian, at the other side of his horse, and hung there by means of some leathern thongs attached for that purpose to the trappings. So nicely did they balance themselves in their new positions that I could not catch a glimpse of either, although their steeds galloped on with the same velocity as before, one on each side. From the moment I marked their manoeuvre I knew that I was safe from them at least. Taking a sure aim, at last, I discharged three bullets from each weapon through the ribs and shoulders of their horses, and after staggering forward for a few seconds, the steaming animals at length fell heavily to the ground. Up started both riders with a yell of rage, levelled their rifles and fired, but luckily I escaped both, although one of the bullets tore through my shako.

With a wild shout I dashed forward out of their reach. I now had time to look back, and saw the remaining Indian, who had only husbanded the strength of his horse during the pursuit, clattering away upon my track swifter than ever. The enraged buffalo, also failing to catch him, was now in pursuit of one of the dismounted Indians. I could not forbear laughing as I saw the furious old bull chasing my foe, whose comrade pursued the bull in return. At last I heard two shots. Two more followed, and on looking back I saw the pair of Indians standing over the dead body of the old monarch of the prairies. Another mile, and now the remaining Indian, who seemed by his dress to be a young chief, was close behind. I thought that sooner or later it must come to a single hand encounter between us, for he at least did not seem afraid of my revolvers. Closer and closer still he came. At last, as I looked back, I saw him half crouched forward over the neck of his steed with finger on the trigger of his rifle. He fired, and in an instant afterwards my horse bounded into the air, and then fell, shot through the spine, bringing me half under him in the fall. I struggled and tugged, and at last got my leg free from beneath the dying animal, expecting every moment that the Indian would be upon me. And sure enough, the moment I was free, my enemy was scarcely two perches away. But I was too quick for him. Drawing my revolver I fired suddenly in his face the three remaining bullets, and down he came with a dull crash upon the soft grass, while I, rushing forward, instantly seized his horse by the rein, sprang into the saddle, and galloped rapidly in the direction of the camp.

I now could see the well-known bluff I had left the day before, and could distinguish from a rising ground the course of the river that ran beside it. After about two hours' ride I reached the spot, and found there my remaining five men, who through another of the fugitives had got news of the battle some short time previously. Leaving them to their watch upon the bluff, I rode away westward towards the shore of the Rio Grande, along which I knew General Scott would direct his rapid march to intercept the Indians and Mexicans on receiving news of the battle. I was not mistaken.

Two hours afterwards I fell in with the main body of my own regiment, which, with two field-pieces, was making a forced march in advance of the army, hoping to come upon the enemy ere they crossed the river with the booty into their own territory.

On we marched, till we came to a place where the river made a sudden bend into the Texan land. Upon our side, the country at this place was thickly clothed with wood, while at the other the shore sloped slightly upward, barren and bleak, with a narrow belt of stunted trees about a rifle shot from the water. We had scarcely rounded the aforesaid bend of the majestic stream, when a horseman of the advanced guard came riding furiously back with the news that the enemy were in the very act of crossing. The two field-pieces were immediately ordered to the front, and then the entire regiment went forward at a gallop. When we reached the spot to which the vidette alluded, we found that the main part of the enemy had crossed, the coveted string of mules, however, being still in the water, but swimming close for the other shore under the guidance of several Indians and guerrillas. The two field-pieces were unlimbered in an instant, and their heavy charges of grape fired into the midst of the enemy as they gathered in a dense mass upon the other shore. It was a complete surprise. The moment the grape-shot tore in amongst them, they broke and fled with the greatest precipitancy to the protection of the belt of trees upon the opposite ridge, while their companions, who were in charge of the mules, leaving the string of animals upon the shore, also followed their example, and soon gained the shelter of the trees.

I had a brother in the regiment who was also a sergeant. He and I were standing by our horses looking over the river at the enemy, when the colonel rode out to the front, and asked was there any man that would volunteer to swim across and lead back the baggage mules. There was a pause, a long one, for the Mexicans and their allies were beginning to plant themselves in a ridge of rocks at the other side, which commanded the spot where the mules were now quietly standing.

"I will!" exclaimed I at length, growing impatient. The fine bronzed face of our colonel brightened into a smile of approval as he heard me. "I will answer also," continued I, "for my brother. Is there any other man to accompany us?"

"I'll folly ye to the world's end!" said a stentorian voice from behind the colonel, and the next moment I had the satisfaction of seeing John O'Carroll, the gigantic corporal, stepping forward and offering himself as our companion.

How he had escaped from the late battle I had little time to inquire, for we were soon stripped and plunging bravely through the water. It was a strong current and a broad river, but we steamed it, and gained the other shore in safety. There, under a sharp fire from the enemy, we turned the train of mules round, and brought them back across the river once more into the Texan land with their rich burdens. We did not escape unhurt, however. I was wounded in the shoulder, my brother rather severely in the leg, and John O'Carroll was deprived of two of his handsome teeth by means of a rifle bullet—the loss of which two gems he swore to revenge upon the Indians as soon as possible. General Scott came up soon, and was highly pleased at the result of our forced march to the Swimmers' Bend, by which name that part of the Rio Grande is called since that day.

Next morning there was a review of our army. John O'Carroll, whose greatest literary accomplishment consisted in being barely able to write his own name, was made a sergeant, while I and my brother received our commissions as lieutenants in our own regiment.

THE MAGNET.—However ancient the knowledge of the attractive power of natural magnetic iron appears to have been among the western nations (and this historically well-authenticated fact is remarkable enough), the knowledge of the polarity or directive force of the magnetic needle, and its connection with terrestrial magnetism, was, nevertheless, confined to the extreme east of Asia—to the Chinese. A thousand years and more before the commencement of our era, in the dark epoch of Codrus and the return of the Heracleidae to the Peloponnese, the Chinese had already magnetic cars, upon which the movable arm of a human figure pointed invariably to the south, as a means of finding the way through the boundless grassy plains of Tartary.

A GOSSIP AT A WELL.

IN presenting our readers with a characteristic example of the ancient Irish wells—that of St. Senan, near Dunas, on the west bank of the Shannon, in the county of Clare—we avail ourselves of the opportunity to note a little of the fairy legends and folk-lore associated with them. From the patriarchal era every nation has ascribed an importance to their wells and fountains. In particular, in these lands which were the cradle of the human race, whether as the scenes which lent the assembly and covenant their sanctity, or the chosen halting places of nomadic tribes, their history was ever distinguished by an interest to which it is certain is traceable the significance with which succeeding ages regarded them. Ovid alludes to the "Fontinalia," annually celebrated by the ancient Italians, in honour of the naiads and deities who presided over their wells, and these festivals probably dated from the period when Numa Pompilius was believed to hold mystical midnight interviews with the nymph Egeria, at the fountain in the sacred grove, while he was framing the laws of Rome. Horace has inscribed an ode to the fountain of Bandusia, which he regarded as the principal of all the wells of classical celebrity. The subject of Moore's "Evenings in Greece," were the fountain songs which are still so popular in that classic land. The spring of Claros, in Ionia, was consecrated to Apollo, who had an oracle there. The ancient inhabitants of Syra, one of the Cyclades, were worshippers of water, and many traditions are yet current relative to the fountain of Zea, an isle which acquires celebrity as having been the birthplace of Simonides. In the "Evenings in Greece," Moore has thus alluded to it:—

"Bright fount so clear and cold,
Round which the nymphs of old
Stood with their locks of gold,
Fountain of Zea!"

Even the fountain of Castalia, celebrated for the poetic influence of its "dews," and to which was also ascribed the gift of prophecy, for which purpose its oracles were consulted by the Emperor Hadrian, was not considered by the poet comparable to that of Zea.

"Not even Castaly,
Fam'd through its streamlet be,
Murmurs or shines like thee,
Oh, Fount of Zea!"

Thou, while our hymns we sing,
Thy silver voice shall bring.
Answering, answering,
Sweet Fount of Zea!"

Similar to these customs of the ancients was the hydromancy, or water divination, of the Druids, by means of which they presaged future events in wells and running streams, which were stirred with a "magic wand" or oak leaf, the auguries depending upon certain ripples or gurgles of the spring, according to which the responses were favourable or otherwise. In his "Legendary Ballads," Moore notices one of these hydromantic rites:—

"Fly to yon fount that's welling
Where moonbeam ne'er had dwelling,
Dip in its water
That leaf, oh daughter,
And mark the tale 'tis telling.
Watch thou if pale or bright it grow,
List thou, the while, that fountain's flow,
And thou'lt discover
Whether thy lover,
Loved as he is, loves thee or no,
Loved as he is, loves thee."

The earliest reference in the Irish annals to wells is as remote as the first century, in the reign of Nundha-Nechht, near whose palace was a fountain, which, according to the legend, none except the monarch and his three cupbearers were permitted to approach, the penalty attached to the non-observance of this order being an instant deprivation of sight. Determined, however, to unveil the mysticism attached to it, his queen, Boan, disobeyed the injunction. The charm was broken, the spring rose, and she was swept, sightless and mutilated, into the main of waters, which ever after, in memory of the fatal event, retained her name, the Boyne, while her hound, Dabella, which accompanied her, was metamorphosed into the present Da Billian rocks, at the mouth of that river. A somewhat similar legend is related of the well of Sliabh Bladhma (Slieve Bloom), the source of the Barrow, upon which if any person gazed, much less touch, the sky would continue to pour down torrents of rain until the tutelary deity was propitiated. According to the Leabhar na g-Ceart, or "Book of Rights," the seven prerogatives (buadha) of the monarch of Eire included the gift of the "water of the well of Tlachtgha"—the modern Hill of Ward—in the territory of Leoghuaire, in East Meath, where the Druids annually lighted their fires upon the eve of the Feast of Samhain—All Hallows. The prohibitions (urgharta) of the King of Uladh (Ulster) counsel him not to "Drink of the water whence strife ensues, Of Bo Neimhidh."

It has not, we believe, been ascertained in what part of Ulster this well was situated. Amongst the thirteen "Wonders of Ireland," enumerated in the "Ogygia," was a fountain in Sligo, which, although unconnected with the ocean, had alternate influxes of fresh and salt water, and another in Leinster, by which "The hazle tree,

To ash transformed the traveller may see."

Fairy spells were once usual accompaniments to wells. When a child pined away, it was said to have been struck with an elf-head, or carried off by the fairies (daoine maethe), who substituted a sickly elf of their own race. Thus Ben Jonson in the "Sad Shepherd:—"

"There, in the stocks of trees, white fays do dwell,
And span-long elves that dance about a pool,
With each a little changeling in their arms."

Shakspeare, in the "Midsummer Night's Dream," represents Titania, queen of the fairies, as being addicted to thefts of this kind:—

"She, as her attendant, hath
A lovely boy, stol'n from an Indian king;
She never had so sweet a changeling."

Sam Lover has happily illustrated this propensity of the "good people:—"

"A mother came when stars were paling,
Waiting round a lonely spring,
Thus she cried, while tears were falling,
Calling on the Fairy King:

'Why with spells my child caressing,
Courting him with fairy joy;
Why destroy a mother's blessing,
Wherefore steal my baby boy?'"

Caxton thus writes of Lough Neagh: "There is a lake in Ulster and moche fyshe, therein, whiche is xxx myles in lengthe and xv in brede. The river Ban runneth out of the lake into the north ocan, and men say that this lake began in this manner: there were men in this contie that were evyle lyvinge—and there was a wele in ye land in grete of olde time and always coured, and yf it were left uncoured, ye wele wolde rise and drowne all the lande, and so id hoped yd a woman wente to ye wele for to fetch water, and hyed her fast to her childe yd wepd in ye cradle, and left ye wele uncoured; then ye wele sprynged so fastly yd drowned ye woman and her childe, and made all ye contie a lake and fyshe pndr. For to prove this, it is a grete argument that when the wale is clear fyschers of yd water see in ye grounde under ye water rounde towers, and hygh shapen steeples and churches of yd lande." There is a similar legend relative to the origin of the Lakes of Kil-larnay. In a certain valley there was for ages a fairy well, inaccessible until after sunset, when special care should be taken by those frequenting it to replace the stone which covered it, when they had filled their pitchers. It was a favourite trysting-place, and one evening a maiden who had been there illustrating the "old, old story," returned thence, to awake and discover that she had forgotten to comply with the fairy injunction to replace the stone. She frantically returned to rectify her error, but it was too late. The calm fountain was now a raging torrent, beneath which the beautiful valley was for ever submerged. At May-time it was a popular custom to watch the wells all night, as a charm against the Gaesa-Draoidacht, or sorceries of the Druids, and lest the "flower of the well" should be "skimmed" at sunrise on May morning by some "possessed" hag, in which case the milk and butter of the ensuing year would be valueless. There was another method of proving the efficacy of wells, which is thus alluded to by Chaucer, in "The Pardoner:—"

"If that the goode man that a beest oweth, Wol every wike, er that the cok him croweth,
Fastinge, drynke of this welle a draught,
His beestes and his stoor schal multiplie."

Mo nuar! true it is, and "pity 'tis 'tis true," the realms of faery have faded like "unsubstantial pageants." Very gradually did other notions diffuse themselves; but if they spread gradually they spread surely. The sidh-dhrum, or fairy hill, the rath, and the well, nestling in the quiet glen, or amidst the stern sublimity of the mountain, overshadowed by a gnarled oak or blighted ash, are deserted;

"The quaint mazes in the wanton green,
For lack of tread are undistinguishable;"

the banshee is silent, and the leprechaun and the phooka, with their hidden treasures and midnight stampedes, are amongst the things that were.

MAC DONOGH'S DAUGHTER.

AIR—"CAPA DANIG."

WHEN Summer's glory robes mountains hoary,
And woods in radiance mellow,
With step of lightness and eyes of brightness,
And locks of golden yellow;
A flower the fairest, a gem the rarest,
There dwells MacDonogh's daughter,
For her I'm sighing and slowly dying,
Adown by wild Blackwater.

In sweet recesses, when hang the tresses
Of woodbine blooming brightly,
I once sat daily, and carolled gaily
My songs so wild and sprightly;
Now echo lonely repeateth only
Each dirge-like strain I've taught her,
While I sit sighing and slowly dying
Adown by wild Blackwater.

My steed is neighing, my hounds are baying,
In long neglect and sadness,
But, oh! I care not, while still I share not
My love's bright smiles of gladness;
Where'er she wander, she'll ne'er meet fonder
Than this true heart I've brought her,
That's hourly sighing and slowly dying,
Adown by wild Blackwater.

I wish some fairy, from Corrin airy,
Would float with sweet spells o'er her,
And ever haunt her, till he'd enchant her
With one who'll aye adore her;
Then woe would lighten, and life would brighten,
With brave Mac Donogh's daughter,
Though now I'm sighing and slowly dying,
Adown by wild Blackwater.

A CHAPTER ON IRISH COSTUME.

FROM fig-leaves to crinoline—what a transition! From the groves of Eden to the halls of Hyam—what a range! Yet such is the capacity of the history of dress. Civilization is written down in its latest phase in the cut of the newest coat; and the most recent tribute of art and science, and taste, to progress, is exhibited in the last “love of a bonnet.” How few have ever considered what a world of thought is condensed in a tailor’s shop, or the show-room of a modiste: yet, from the wearing of nothing to the endowment of inexpressibles—from a mat to a milliner, is the matter of the difference of six thousand years! We do not know anything over which a tender paterfamilias should find more sentiment of sympathy, than memories of the days of primal clothing—or rather, of no clothing at all. The joys of progress—the exultation of civilization—can hardly compensate him betimes for the pay of a tailor’s bill, the remorseful woe of a draper’s account, whilst it adds an additional modicum of pain to his existence to think when giving away a bride from his progeny of numerous girls, that a trousseau for the fairest of fair beings was once obtainable from a tree, and that nature was of old regarded as the most appropriate provider of the accompanying dejeuner.

Apples may be bitter by the Dead Sea shore, but the fruits of civilization for such a thinker must be much more bitter. Blessed must the greenwood be in his sight when he revolves the uses to which it was wont to be applied, and we can imagine the afflicted soul preferring—in his depth of trial—the fashion of Adam to the fashion of Browne and Payne, and thinking that after all Eve was more tasteful than Eugenie.

Still, to go back to habits of blessed innocence like these, involves a necessity for the ardent paterfamilias who should desire it, that he would wish himself some five thousand nine hundred and odd years dead, according to the modern duration of human life; or if he purposes its enjoyment in those latter days of grace, the thing can be accomplished by emigration. There are still portions of the world under British dominion, where there is a disdain of all tailoring dexterity prevailing to an extent which would fill Buckmaster with disgust; and there are portions of the world where Britain has never been heard of, enjoying the same condition of unconscious happiness. In those regions of unclothed humanity, persons of the most undoubted quality require only slippers to be considered in full dress for the most fashionable evening party; and society of the first water can enjoy a promenade with no other superfluity of costume than an umbrella. But the regions where this ancient state of things is regnant still, have their drawbacks. Instead of playful trout sporting in meandering rivers, jocose crocodiles frolic on their banks; and for gentlesheep, browsing on the green, a roaring lion goes about seeking eatables of uncooked flesh, in what Jeames would call a “pernicious” manner. Those little differences between the condition of the wearers of clothes, and the modern wearers of as little garments as possible, would be quite sufficient to deter the most ardent economists from the districts where there is no prejudice for wearables existing, and where every body is perfectly free to follow his own fashion in the manner which pleases him.

For us, who look at dress with a philosophic glance, there is a world of instructive detail in the cut of a coat, or in its material. The first fashion of such matters was a “pretty thing” in skins, we take it. On ancient vases of Greek and Roman art Hercules is represented wearing a lion’s skin, which is tied round his neck by the fore paws, the head forming a cap; the remaining portion hanging like a mantle. From the same sources we learn that Hyppolite, who was a queen, and consequently the pink of fashion in her kingdom, delighted in a garment of leopard’s hide, and for a bonnet had adopted the skin of a smaller animal. Like her sex, fond of ornament, she considered, according to the portrait to which we are indebted for our knowledge of the lady, that the pendant legs of the animal were most becoming, and so we find them hanging upon each side of her head. In the statues of Isis and Osiris, we find a vast improvement on such rude attempts at clothing, as is indicated by the delineations to which we have here alluded. A robe of linen close fitting to the bust, but more loosely clinging around the limbs, represents the costume of the élite, we have no doubt, of the cities of the Pharaohs. Around the legs, above the ankle, are represented ornaments of precious metal. In Denon’s book of Egyptian antiquities, there are sketches given of those old-world people, in which we catch an idea of their head-dress, which was not much different in design from one of those skull-caps which are familiar to any one who has seen them worn by adult female inmates in our workhouses. So that, no doubt, the ancient fashion, in which dusky princesses were proud in the stately halls of Luxor or Karnak, has fallen down to be despised, even of the dwellers in the abodes of poverty. There is hardly a doubt that the same material, linen, was the article used in both, for woollens were forbidden to be worn by the ancient Egyptian laws. It might be interesting to trace from this point the progress and complications of clothing, from the Egyptian through the Greek and Roman civilizations, and so down to our own times; but for such a dissertation we should not have space, nor probably would our readers have interest. A more agreeable subject for our consideration is the variation of the same matter in Ireland.

Beginning with the accounts which are coterminous with the Norman invasion, we find that the Irish people were different in their manner of dress from any other nation of Europe. The Romans had left much of their mode of costume mingled with the manner of dress adopted by every other nation; but in Ireland the Romans had never exercised any influence, as never having conquered it, or attempted even to do so. Geraldus Cambrensis has given, in his most unfriendly tone, a description of the dress of the Irish in his time. From his account we gather that they wore their woollen clothes mostly black, because the sheep of the country were principally of that colour. They wore a large mantle, in some instances, called a canabhas, or fileadh. More generally used were mantles of a moderate size, closely hooded, which spread over the shoulders, and reached below the elbow. Those garments were composed of small pieces of parti-coloured cloth, varied and regulated according to the rank of the wearer. Beneath the mantle the rest of the body was enveloped in “woollen fallins,” or phalanges, instead of a cloak; or else breeches and stockings were worn, generally of a piece, and usually dyed of some colour. The great majority of the people wore no covering upon their heads, but permitted the hair to grow in such a manner that it became matted, and was capable of resisting a powerful blow, according to the testimony of the English annalists; but in this point of neglect of using a head-dress we think that their veracity is not to be trusted, for the fact that the canabhas had a hood formed upon it, is evident enough that it was used for a covering for the head; and historical record informs us that, for long after the period of the Norman invasion of Ireland, the hood of a cloak was the head-dress usually adopted in the most civilized nation of the times. Such was the costume of the ancient Irish, termed a barbarous manner of dress by Gerald the Cambrian. There is other evidence to show that the Irish people were not only not barbarous in their fashion of costume, but even tasteful in it to a degree. Linen, which was a rarity in most countries at the time, was more generally worn than in any other nation in Europe. Trunkets and jewellery, of exquisite finish, were in use amongst the higher classes. In the ninth century there are records to show that the native princes wore pearls behind their ears. King Brian, on being created Ard Righ, offered a collar of gold upon the altar at Armagh, many a year before Malachy won that—celebrated in song—which he tore from the pirate Viking. Modern fashion has gone back through the intervening centuries, to take as the model for an ornament of dress, the design of some Celtic workman in this Irish land. British royalty has estimated the Tara brooch as an exquisite production of art, worthy to grace the first personage in the wealthiest court in the world. Yet, centuries before the Norman raid, such clasps gathered the folds of saffron tunic and canabhas around the form of Irishman and maiden. Righ and Tanist wore them before yet Patrick stood at Tara, to quench the light of idolatrous worship for ever in our land. It is only reasonable to believe that a people, amongst whom such tasteful and costly ornaments were by no means rare, would not have been at the cost of such skill in the manufacture and modelling of an appendage to a costume, which was itself barbarous and ungraceful. Upon this point the prejudices of the foreigner, Barry, led him into a description, which hardly bears the test of trial by collateral facts.

The Irish excelled in the manufacture of woollens, and the production of their looms was so highly prized in England that an act was passed in the twenty-eighth year of Edward III. exempting it from duty. Anent Irish frieze—Stanhurst, many a year subsequent to this, in testimony of its valuable qualities, gives witness of the high estimation in which he held it, and tells, in his quaint old manner, an anecdote which we reproduce:—

"As they distil," he says, "the best aqua vitæ in Waterford, so they spin the choicest rug in Ireland. A friend of mine being of late demourant in London, and the weather, by reason of a hard hoar frost, being somewhat nipping, repaired to Paris, garden clad in one of those Waterford rugs. The mastiffs had no sooner espied him but, deeming he had been a bear, would fain have baited him, and, were it not that the dogs were partly muzzled, and partly chained, he doubted not but that he should have been well tugged in his Irish rug; whereupon he solemnly vowed never to see bears baitings in any such need."

But one of the most curious facts ever recorded is that in relation to native Irish costume. The English settlers had no sooner become domiciled amongst the people than they adopted the Irish dress, which we take to be an invincible argument in favour of its propriety, gracefulness, and tasteful arrangement. When we consider that those imitators of Irish fashions were men whose conduct towards the natives, upon every possible occasion, was a testimony of unrelenting animosity; we must come to the conclusion that it was out of no love towards Irish customs, or no desire to temporise with their neighbours, which caused them to take such a step. Thus, then, there only remains the conclusion, that they found this Irish manner of dress the most pleasing and most convenient. Nothing would seem to have been able to induce them to adopt any other. From this arose the legislation on the subject, which was rigidly enforced upon all occasions where its provisions could be carried out with success; and, notwithstanding this, during three hundred years that legislation could effect but little, the people still clung to the customs of their forefathers, and even the strangers who sojourned amongst them adopted those old Celtic modes of clothing.

In the reign of Edward IV. an act was passed ordaining that Irishmen dwelling in the counties "Dublin, Myeth, Wrial, and Kildare," shall go apparelled like Englishmen, and wear beards after the English manner, swear allegiance, and take English surnames. In the time of Henry VII., Sir Edward Poyning tried his hand at the fashions, by causing a statute to be passed entitled "A Statute for the Lords of the Parliament to wear robes." Passing from this reign, we find this kind of fashionable legislation extending into the days of the eighth Henry, who issued an order for the better government of the town of Galway, dated April 28th, 1563, by which his Majesty's lieges were ordered not to suffer the "hair of their heads to grow until it covered their ears, and that every of them do wear English caps. That no man, or man child, do wear no mantles in the streets, but cloaks, or gowns, coats, doublets, and hose, shaped after the English fashion, but made of the country cloth, or any other cloth it shall please them to buy." It would be tedious to pass over the various restrictions upon the dress of the Irish people; and so we will proceed from the attempts consequent on this kind of legislation to stifle the inherent attachment of the Irish for their native costume. In the reign of Elizabeth, Spenser writing from Kilcoleman, urges the abolition of the ancient dress. The mantle he terms "a fit house for an outlaw, a meet bed for a rebel, and an apt cloke for a thief." Spenser might be a good poet, but if we judge from this paragraph of his penned opinions, he was not a charitable man. For the wearer, he speaks of the hood "as a house in all weathers," and remarks that, "while the mantle enables him to go privily armed, being close hooded over the head, conceals his person from knowledge to any to whom he is endangered." We shall not pursue the tirades and philippics of Spenser against the fashion of Irish dress; but shall observe that even he bears witness, in spite of his enmity, to its usefulness. From him we shall turn to another malcontent poet, who enrolled his detestation of Irish garb in the following lines. Derrick treats us to a satire on the subject:

"With skulls upon their powles,
Instead of civill cappes,

With speare in hand and sword by side
To bear offe afterclappes—
With jackettes long and large—
Which shroud simplicitie,
The spitefulle darts which they do beare
Implic iniquitie.

Their shirtes be very strange,
Not reaching paste the knee,
With pleates on pleates they pleated are
As thicke as pleates may be.
Whose sleives hang trailing downe
Almost unto the shoe;
And with a mantle commonlie,
The Irish kerne do goe.

And some, amongst the reste,
Do use another weede,
A coate, I weene, of strange device,
Which fancie first did breede;
His skirtes be very shorte,
With pleates set thicke about;
And Irish trouses, more to put Their strange protractours out."

From Derrick's verses we go to detail further facts in this strange, eventful history. The court of Elizabeth once wondered at the costume of the "wild Irish." Hugh O'Neill, prince of Tir-owen, appeared before her Majesty, surrounded by his galloglasses, armed with that legacy of the wars of their fathers with the fierce Vikingr, their ponderous battle-axe, nor hood nor helm upon their heads, with long hair flowing upon their shoulders. The annalist tells us that they were attired in shirts dyed with saffron, their sleeves large, their tunics short, and their cloaks shagged. How the courtly gallants and the good citizens of London must have marvelled at the strangely-dressed following of the Irish chieftain! The story of Irish costume is not long to relate from this date. The wars of the O'Neill were over, and O'Neill himself was in exile, before we come to any more legislation for dress in Ireland. Then, in the reign of James I., we have Lord Deputy Chichester "reforming our tailors' bills." He issued instructions to the Lord President and Council of Munster to punish all who should appear before him in the native garb; and also "to expel and cut off all glibbes." It would seem that this concluded any legislation against Irish costume, for which there no more existed a necessity. In the reign of Charles the First, Sir Henry Piers avers that the Irish costume was not to be seen any where in Ireland: and in this reign, and under those circumstances, an act was passed repealing all former enactments against Irish dress. This stretch of generosity was not followed by the revival of the national costume, and from that hour to the present the ancient dress of Ireland has never been worn by chief or kern—noble or serf! With what love the people clung to it, with what perseverance they preserved it, is indicated by the duration of their struggle against foreign fashions. The progress of manners, or the caprice of luxury, influenced the mode of dress in every other land, and in every other nation. The forms of Egypt have been transmitted by Grecian wanderers to their own land, and influenced the manner of costume. The refined Greek may have contributed to the Roman robes. The Roman may have imparted the gracefulness and beauty of the older civilizations to the modifications of dress in modern Europe; but the Irish nation has not accepted its costume from any other land of its own admiration or its own appreciation of its correctness.

THE USE OF LANGUAGE.—To Talleyrand has generally been attributed the authorship of the maxim that "the use of language is to conceal our thoughts." But in Pycroft's "Ways and Words of Men of Letters," a quotation is made from an article on "The Use of Language," published in a periodical called the "Bee," under date of October 20, 1759, which reads as follows: "He who best knows how to conceal his necessities and desires, is the most likely person to find redress; and the true use of speech is not so much to express our wants as to conceal them."

A WORD FOR OUR SIGHTLESS.

THE world keeps the memory of many a genius in war, in senate, or in song, who has been sightless. Seer and sage, hero and bard, have won the laurel wreath of fame, though their eyes were closed for ever to the light in which this earth looks so fair. Some had the bitterness of the recollection of its beauty, which once they gazed upon, to lend its pang to the pent-up sorrow of their souls, and some only knew of their loss from the words of those who were gifted with that faculty whose deprivation shut them within unknown. Never was there a face less human being which had a of mournful pathos written on it, as if the loss of so great a sight, had founded a claim upon, even on the testimony of beholder. Yet what glorious ing to the category of those Far back in the days of primal sweeps to the tent of the where, deceived by a fond mother, the sightless Isaac blessed and gave precedence to the son for whom neither that blessing nor that privilege were intended. Hellenic songs still break the silence of the groves of Chios, or swell from its rocky ledges, as in the days when the blind and poverty-stricken father of poetry had his home within its shores. Most memorable amongst men is the darkened singer of the battles of Ilium. For many a year the warlike genius of the blind Belisarius scourged the victor barbarian before its prowess, and held together the jarring elements of the Lower Empire from destruction. Venice still clings to the deeds of the sightless old Dandolo, her warrior Doge, who fronted the Saracen in the brightest days of conquest by his hordes, and beat him back from Christendom, broken and defeated. Prince and hero, there is no brighter memory, gilded with its parting glory the last days of chivalry in Europe. A blind bard is the pride of the British tongue. John Milton is to Christian poetry what Homer was to pagan—its representative mind. He is unequalled and unapproachable, and walks his path of fame alone. Although this catalogue of renowned intellect is sufficient to show that genius has a long array of names, upon which it lavished its richest gifts in free profusion, amid the obscurity in which vision was lost, it would be ungracious in us to pass by an Irish lyricist, who has sung her own peculiar visitation of life-long darkness in stanzas which will be familiar until the English tongue is forgotten. Frances Brown, the blind poetess of Donegal, deserves her place amongst the niches which praise has reserved for the sightless. Yet let us think for a moment, after the exultation of such recollections, what a cruel fate theirs must be.

To be shut up in a dungeon where no ray of light could penetrate, be the days ever so sunny and the nights ever so fair, would be a doom of horror. Alexander Dumas, in one of his most spasmodic of spasmodic books, has painted such a picture. The prisoner of the Chateau d'If gives us an idea of such a dread punishment. Yet far removed in degree of suffering from this doom the condition of blindness cannot be. Everything which lends to life the varied aspect which makes much of its happiness, is a blank to the being with darkened vision, and it is a grave consideration to remember that there are many a thousand men, women and children, within the three kingdoms, who suffer under such a mournful deprivation. In the category of sorrow which such a circumstance presents to our notice, Ireland holds the most prominent place. In no other kingdom in Europe, Norway alone excepted, is there such prevalence of blindness. Such a fact is a startling one, and well deserving of the attention of the nation which suffers under so great an evil. The number of blind in Ireland, according to the census returns of 1851, amounts to 7,587, of whom the fearful aggregate of 5,081 are without any occupation or means of sustenance; 953 of those have been educated in industrial occupations or in intellectual accomplishments, and the remainder are without avocation or literary enlightenment—the most helpless and hopeless of paupers. Until the establishment of the institutions at Portobello and Glasnevin for the industrial training of the blind, there were only six asylums for the refuge or teaching of this class of suffering humanity. The total number of persons for which those institutions were enabled to provide was two hundred and seventy, and the numbers for which they really provided were far less.

With all this large amount of blind persons in this kingdom, there is not a single institution available for their support beyond those furnished by private charity. The blind thus have, in the great majority of instances, no refuge save the workhouse. There the capacity with which Providence has gifted them, lies unutilized, and they live in that state of utter stagnation of industrial effort, which is familiar to everyone who is acquainted with the routine of such prisons for poverty. How indescribably the anguish of their deprivation of sight is increased by such a condition, can only be appreciated by any person who has perceived, by observation, the astonishing development of the other faculties in those individuals. The loss of any of the principal senses has been generally accompanied by a certain obtuseness of intellect, whose dulled sensitiveness has compensated somewhat for the void created in the happiness of the sufferer; but no such palliative misfortune has yielded its tranquillity to the blind. There is not a sense—not a faculty—not a perception, which is not increased in the absence of that one of sight. The intellect of blind persons is observed, in almost every case, to be painfully acute, and their sensitiveness is quickened to an intense degree. The faculty of touch has been rendered so accurate, that a system has been devised, by which the blind are enabled to read fluently and correctly by its exercise. It is well known what wonderful development their appreciation of sound attains. With the fact of this readiness of perception, through means of the remaining senses, we can reach at some idea of the quickness of the capacity which is influenced by them, and we can conceive, in some degree, the activity of the minds of those whose bodies are condemned, in consequence of their deprivation, to almost total inaction. The blind are ready in learning, they grow cheerful with employment, and there are many trials which they can exercise. Such facts plead powerfully that they should be given the opportunity of employment. In an institution established in Yorkshire, for the education—industrial and literary—of the blind, it has been found that blind persons cannot, with all the advantages afforded by living in community, and by being rent free, be wholly self-supporting; but then it is known that they very nearly accomplish it by the results of their labour. In the very large and well-conducted institution at Edinburgh, a like fact was enforced by the evidence of the accounts of the establishment. Their earnings were found to vary from eight to fourteen shillings weekly, but it was always found necessary to employ a skilled seeing workman to inspect their work, before it could be offered for sale. Those persons who had been taught in the institutions, and had left them, were found, in the great majority of cases, to be almost wholly unable to support themselves by their earnings. There was a necessity for help, which they could not get when away from the workshops of the institution, which left them slow in the performance of their labours, and thus, by the consumption of time, lessened the quantity of work which they could accomplish. In America they have in some instances obviated this difficulty. There have been established in some of the great cities, workshops for the blind, to which they come during certain hours, and in which they work under the direction of a superintendent. In the winter, fuel is provided for the warmth of the workers, tools are given to them gratuitously, the articles of their manufacture are exposed for sale, and thus a great deal is done towards the purpose of making the labour of the blind remunerative. We have shown in our previous observations what a number are unprovided in Ireland with even the means of gaining a livelihood by their industry. With all the existing institutions, not one blind person out of twenty is provided with an opportunity for this purpose. This is a defect worthy of correction by a nation which is distinguished by its charity, renowned for its compassion, and remarkable for the zeal of its pitying humanity.

THE BRIDAL RING.

A STORY OF CAHIR CASTLE.

THE site on which Cahir Castle is built was formerly a Dun, or fort, a structure which was formed of woodwork and earthen embankments. The present castle seems to have been founded by one of those bold Norman adventurers who came to our shores in the train of the Earl of Chepstow, or Strongbow, as he was more familiarly called. It stands upon an island rock which divides the waters of the Suir, and during the several wars that raged in Ireland since the invasion, was always a place of great strength and importance. It belonged since the beginning of the fourteenth century to the powerful house of Ormond, for we find it then in possession of James Butler, son of James the third earl, by Catherine, daughter of the Earl of Desmond. During the wars of Elizabeth and those of the succeeding reigns it changed hands frequently, and stood several gallant sieges, the relation of which would be far too long for the limits of this paper. The ancient Irish name of the town of Cahir was Cahir-duna-iascaigh, that is, the circular fortress of the fish-abounding fort. One of the incidents, connected with the military history of Cahir Castle, is told in the following story.

In the corner of a solitary churchyard some short distance from Cahir, there lies a portion of an ancient tomb, namely, the upper half of a limestone slab, which is now almost completely hidden from the eye of the curious visitor by the rank and luxuriant growth of docks, nettles, and other weeds that clothe the silent dwellings of the dead around. If you raise it up and rub the moss carefully from its time-worn face, you will be rewarded with the sight of the following portion of an inscription:—

"Heere lieth ye bodye of John de Botiller, who was shot.
Alsoe ye bodye of his Wife Mary de Botiller, who died when he died.
Their youthe was Love,
Their courtshippe was Love,
Their marriage-dais was Love,
Their wedded life was Love,
Their deathe was Love,
And——"

what the remaining portion of the inscription was will most probably remain unknown for ever, for the fracture occurs at the word—"And," while the other half of the slab is lost. Many an hour's toil the search for that lost fragment of sculptured limestone cost us, but it was all of no avail, and the history of the personages whom the above quaint words commemorate would, perhaps, have remained in obscurity till the end of time were it not that we happened, some years ago, to meet Brian Tiernay, of Templeumy, as fine, and jovial, and stalwarth, and withal, as venerable a specimen of a senachie or story-teller as you would find within the four seas of old Ireland. Brian Tiernay's relation is far too long to come within the limits of such a short paper as this must necessarily be. Stripping it, therefore, of some of its ornate flourishes, and a great number of incidental episodes, we shall proceed to relate the thread of the story according to his version.

About a mile or so to the south-east of Cahir Castle there stood, on a high crag over the Suir, a square tower, or peel-house, as they would call it in Scotland, which tower was for a long time the dwelling of Walter Ridensford, an ancient retainer of the great house of Ormond. The tower was one of a chain of similar buildings which, with their high bawn walls and strong gates, stood at the distance of a few miles from one another towards the south and west, in a semicircle beyond the great border fortress of Cahir, and acted as advanced posts through which an enemy would have to pierce before he could attack the strongly-situated central castle. The tower to which we allude was called Tig-na-Sgiath, or the House of the Shield, from a rude representation of that defensive appurtenance of a warrior, which was sculptured over the sturdy archway that led into the bawn. It was a strong place, and especially so during the time it was occupied by the brave old castellan we have named above.

Walter Ridensford, or Wattie Stem-the-Stream, as he was called along the borders, by which we mean that strip of debateable land which lay between the territories of the two great and rival houses of Ormond and Desmond, was one of the most eccentric men that ever stuck morion on head to follow the banner of his master on fray or foray. At the time of our story he had attained to that respectable age which generally precludes a man from engaging in the rough and dangerous occupations of war. But time seemed to have had but little effect upon the iron frame and hardy spirit of Wattie Stem-the-Stream, for he was still one of the most quarrelsome, and at the same time most formidable of all those retainers of the house of Ormond who inhabited that dangerous and troublesome district lying along the south-western banks of the Suir. Many a single combat he had fought, and many a foray he had ridden, in every one of which, by some good chance or other, he had been successful, and this, we need not say, caused him to be regarded as a personage of no small consequence by the various seneschals, castellans, and other people of note and authority for many a mile round. Wattie had married late in life, and his wife dying soon after, left behind her an only daughter, who was dear as the apple of his eye to the old warrior, and who, about the period at which our story commences, was nearly seventeen years of age.

Mary Ridensford was a beautiful and gentle girl, and when we say that much of her it is enough to indicate the fact that her hand was sought in marriage by many a young cavalier of the borders. But to all those, when they ventured to speak upon such a delicate subject to Wattie Stem-the-Stream, that grim old warrior made the rather ambiguous answer that no one but the best man in Ormond would get his daughter for a wife. This oracular response, it seems, instead of decreasing, added considerably to the number of young Mary Ridensford's suitors. There was Gibbon of the Wood from the banks of Funcheon, who looked upon her with a loving eye, and who gave it out that he would cheerfully do battle with sword and axe—if that was the meaning of old Wattie Stem-the-Stream's answer—against any competitor for the lady's hand; there was Donat Burke of Ruscoe, who swore that as he had lost his heart, he did not care a straw about losing his head for her sake; there was Raymond Grace of Burnfort, who made oath to his confidential friend that along with putting his heart's blood in jeopardy for the sake of gaining her affections, he would willingly throw his lands and castle into the bargain, and there was a host of others; but the rivalry at last seemed hottest between Gibbon of the Wood and the young castellan of Cnoc Graffon, whose name was John de Botiller, or Butler; and who, besides being a distant cousin of the Earl of Ormond, was also accounted the boldest horseman of the border, and the best and truest hand at sword-play, pistol mark, or deft tricks of dagger in time of war, and also in every athletic amusement on festival days on village green and by fairy well. One day John de Botiller received intimation from one of his daltins, or horseboys, that Gibbon of the Wood was after paying a visit on matrimonial subjects intent, to the House of the Shield. This information was not, of course, very welcome to the young and fiery castellan of Cnoc Graffon. With a dark brow he began revolving the subject in his mind, and at last took his horse and rode away for the purpose of paying a similar visit to Wattie Stem-the-Stream. He found that worthy sitting by his castle gate grimly contemplating a certain pass in the far-off range of mountains, where once upon a time he had the satisfaction of seeing a detachment of the Desmond soldiers cut to pieces by the followers of his ancient lord and master, Thomas, the Black Earl of Ormond. Now, the young castellan of Cnoc Graffon knew well the kind of man he had to deal with, and proceeded at once to business with an abruptness and candour woe-fully contrasting with the matrimonial circumlocutions and match-making chicanery of more modern times.

"Wat Ridensford," said he, after receiving the curt but hearty welcome of the old man—"you know me since I was a child. I have nothing but my castle and the few acres around it—nothing else but my sword to help me on through the world:—will you give me your daughter for a wife?"

"That I cannot tell," answered the phlegmatic Wattie. "I have often said that the best and bravest man in Ormond should only get her. What do you say to that?"

"Nothing!" answered John de Botiller—"nothing, only that I cannot understand it. I tell you what, I have heard that Gibbon of the Wood was here to-day. To him I suppose you have given the same answer, but know, Wattie Stem-the-Stream, that as I have come—yes, come here for I believe the twelfth time—I am determined not to be put off with a riddle any longer." It was now he showed his knowledge of Wattie's character. "You must tell me what you mean," continued he. "If you do not, here is a level space before us; draw your sword, and you will soon see that, if you were twice as good a man as you are, I'll whip the answer in a trice out of that old iron carcass of yours! Draw!"

This was exactly what Wattie Stem-the-Stream wanted, and what he was for a long time expecting from some one of the suitors for his daughter's hand. He now quietly stood up, and drew the heavy sword he usually carried by his side. With a grim smile of mingled approval and affection, he looked upon the splendid figure of the young castellan of Cnoc Graffon, as the latter stood opposite him also with his drawn sword in hand, ready to begin the strange contest.

"The answer!—the answer!" exclaimed John de Botiller.

"Take that instead!" answered Wattie Stem-the-Stream, making a playful cut of his sword at the young castellan, which, however, the latter avoided by a nimble bound in a backward direction. A sharp combat, half play, half earnest, ensued, the result of which was, that Wattie Stem-the-Stream was at last beaten back against the wall by his young antagonist.

"Yield, Wattie! yield, and give the answer!" exclaimed John de Botiller, as the old man planted his back against the wall and stood warily on his defence—"Yield! yield!" continued he, dancing nimbly round and making various playful lunges and slashes at the old man, at which the latter at length burst into a hearty and sonorous fit of laughter, and dropped the point of his sword with a mark of grimace on his swarthy old countenance, in token of submission.

"The answer you shall have, by my father's head!" exclaimed Wattie, as he now planted himself upon the stone seat by the gateway, and invited the young horseman to take a place beside him. "Here it is" continued he. "I have sworn that none but the best man in Ormond shall get my daughter for a wife, and you may be sure that Wattie Ridensford is not the man to break his oath. I will appoint a day on which the suitors can come to Tig-na-Sgiath, and try their prowess at every kind of exercise. On that day, if you come, you will get your chance, and between us both," continued he, grasping the hand of the young castellan, and giving it a tremendous squeeze, "I wish you success, so whatever happens by flood or field, be here on the day appointed!"

"It is enough," said John de Botiller, returning the friendly grasp of the old soldier. "I will be here, and with Mary looking on me from the castle window, I hope to acquit myself so that I shall come off the winner of her fair hand!"

With that he bade farewell to old Wattie Stem-the-Stream, and rode away to Cnoc Graffon. This occurred on the evening of May Day, but ere a fortnight was over, there was a storm raised in the land which left but little time to the wooers of young Mary Ridensford to think on the day of trial, whatever time it might occur. The Earl of Essex had marched southwards and laid siege to Cahir Castle. After several sallies and skirmishes between the belligerents, and a terrible cannonade from the batteries of Essex, the latter at length succeeded in taking possession of the fortress. Leaving a garrison behind him, he then marched into Desmond, fighting various battles as he proceeded. Throughout the whole siege, John de Botiller and all the young men of the neighbourhood were of course employed in defending the castle, but now, when all was over, they began to think of the strange resolution old Wattie Stem-the-Stream had come to with regard to the disposal of the hand of his daughter. They so importuned Wattie that he at last fixed a day, and now, without the slightest consideration for the feelings of his daughter, although he loved her well, he awaited its coming, thinking of course that the bravest soldier and most active man in the country, whoever he was, would make the best and fondest husband for Mary. But the latter did not agree with her father's notions on the matter. She loved the handsome young castellan of Cnoc Graffon, and was resolved to marry no one else, whoever the successful competitor might be on Midsummer Day, for that was the one appointed by old Wattie for the trial between her wooers. Many an hour she sat and wept in her little chamber in the House of the Shield, thinking of the dangerous position she was in, and what must have been her grief and terror, when at last Midsummer Day came, and though a numerous throng of competitors had arrived at the castle, there was still no appearance of young John de Botiller. The latter, however, was a score of miles away at the time, acting as officer of the guard at Carrick Castle, where military discipline was enforced with such strictness that he did not dare to leave his post during the temporary absence of Lord Ormond.

Meanwhile the trial between the wooers at the House of the Shield went on gloriously, Wattie Stem-the-Stream wondering from time to time at the continued absence of the young castellan of Cnoc Graffon, whose suit he favoured secretly. Several competitors had given in as the day advanced, and before noon was over the contest in every athletic trial lay principally between Gibbon of the Wood, Donat Burke of Ruscoe, and Raymond Grace, the young lord of Burnfort. Poor Donat Burke at last nearly fractured his knee, at the leaping of the bawn wall, and gave up the contest, so that, to all appearance, the hand of Mary Ridenford was destined in a short time to fall to the lot of either Raymond Grace or the sturdy Gibbon of the Wood, both of whom were now engaged at a terrible bout of wrestling on the level bawn. At length Raymond went down, and, notwithstanding his various threats, that he would peril life and lands to gain the hand of Mary Ridenford, and a gratuitous one to the effect that he would have the heart's blood of any other man that would succeed in winning it, he very philosophically gave in at the proposal of the next and final trial, which was to be a deadly bout between himself and the formidable Gibbon, with broad-sword, buckler, and skein.

And now Gibbon of the Wood boldly claimed the hand of poor Mary, who was at the moment, with bitter tears in her eyes, looking over the sloping plain beyond the Suir, expecting her lover to make his appearance. And he did appear at last, just as the fatal words were about being spoken by her father, that would make her the affianced wife of the dreaded Gibbon. Lord Ormond had returned to Carrick early that morning, and when he heard the story from the young castellan of Cnoc Graffon, he laughed heartily, and gave the latter liberty to set off as fast as his good steed would carry him for the House of the Shield. There John de Botiller arrived at the time we have indicated, and a terrible contest commenced between him and the now enraged Gibbon, who did not give in till he had lost the two best fingers of his right hand, in the last trial with skein and broad-sword.

And so John de Botiller won the hand of the lovely Mary Ridenford, and they were wedded shortly afterwards. But there were tears in her eyes soon after the marriage, for, two days afterwards, her young husband was forced to bid her farewell, and, with as many men as he could muster, return to the banner of Lord Ormond, the eastern borders of whose territory were at the time in a state of war and trouble, and continual tumult. Many a weary moon passed over poor Mary, as she sat in the turret window of her father's house, looking out over the wide plains for the return of her gallant husband, but he came not, for he was still taking part in the raids of Lord Ormond, on the far-off eastern borders. Many a time she looked upon her marriage ring, and bathed it with tears, as she thought of the day on which John de Cnoc Graffon had placed it on her finger.

And now the south-western borders began to come in for their share of the troubles. Wattie Stem-the-Stream and the other castellans of the neighbourhood rose with their followers, and fell upon Cahir Castle, but, after a sharp contest with the garrison left behind by Essex, they were forced to retire from its walls. In consequence of this attack, the President of Munster sent Sir John Dowdall, a veteran soldier of the Queen, across the mountains, from Youghal, to quiet the borders, and place a fresh garrison in Cahir Castle. Sir John executed his commission with a high and successful hand. He not only succeeded in throwing in the garrison, but he also laid siege to and took the whole chain of border towers, one after the other, the stronghold of Wattie Stem-the-Stream included. It was thus that, on a certain fine day the belligerent and dauntless Wattie found himself and his daughter, the young and sad wife of the castellan of Cnoc Graffon, close prisoners in the mighty, and at that time almost impregnable, fortress of Cahir. The father fretted and fumed at being thus rendered inactive, when so much was still to be done outside, but the daughter sat quietly in her prison chambers, and, looking on her bridal ring, day after day still bathed it with many a bitter tear, as she thought of the grief her absent husband would feel when he heard of their woeful state.

It is not to be supposed that the young castellan of Cnoc Graffon remained quiet when a secret messenger from the stout Wattie Stem-the-Stream bore him the news. He immediately proceeded to James Galdie, the Earl of Ormond's brother, and with him concocted a plan for the capturing of the Castle of Cahir. At the head of about sixty chosen men, they marched across the country, and, without attracting the observation of the garrison, contrived to ensconce themselves opposite the walls of the castle, just as the shadows of night loomed down darkly upon plain and glen from the adjacent summits of the Gaulty Mountains. They had brought with them a number of ladders, and having crossed the draw-bridge, in the dead silence of the night, they began scaling the inner wall. Ere a dozen of them had gained the bawn inside, the garrison was aroused, and, rushing out sword and gun in hand, under Thomas Quayle, the castellan, a short and sharp struggle commenced between the two parties. Wattie Stem-the-Stream and his daughter were soon awakened in their prison chambers by the loud clashing of swords and the rattling of guns and petronels outside. And now the loud crash of a falconet, or small cannon, resounded from a tower overhead, followed by a strange, fearful, and rustling noise, that seemed to tear the rocky walls of the prison chamber asunder, after which the young bride sat pale and terror-stricken for a moment, and then gave one wild and heart-piercing cry of anguish and despair.

"The ring! the ring!" she cried, holding out her hand towards her startled father. "Ah, me! ah, me! it is broken, and I know but too well that my noble husband is slain!"

The father took the trembling hand in his, and, examining the bridal ring, found it cracked asunder and almost falling off the finger of the poor young bride. Still the uproar continued outside, but after a short time it ceased. The prison door at length opened, and James Galdie and a few men strode into the chamber with the news that they had taken the castle. The moment the door was opened, Mary, with another wild cry, rushed out, and when they searched for her, a few moments afterwards, they found her by the wall, stretched beside the dead body of her gallant husband, who had fallen beneath the cannon-ball from the tower above. They raised her, but she too was dead, and when they took her lily-white hand and looked upon the ring, they found it whole and sound as ever, a mysterious sign of her being reunited to her husband in the bridal of death. They were laid side by side in the little churchyard, and many a traveller, as the seasons come and go, sits there and muses sadly over the last resting-place of the brave John de Botiller and his loving wife!

THE SPELL OF GRIEF.

I.

Joy may assume the guise of Love,
And soar on wings of Iris dyes
Into the Protean bowers that stud
The golden dreamland of the skies;
Or the green hush of Summer glades
With shapes of airy grace may fill,
And incense lade the flowers that flush
The marge of music-haunted rill.

II.

Yet Grief with spell more potent still Time's chequered chain, year after year,
Flies back along, and to each link,
Weaves the Hereafter and the Here.
To lift us from the dust we are,
Joy will the bright Ideal scan;
Eld dweller at the human hearth,
"Grief only teaches what is man!"

THE MILLER OF MOHILL.

A TALE IN THREE CHAPTERS.

BY WILLIAM CARLETON.

[CONCLUSION.]

HAVING accomplished his plan with much difficulty, but at the same time effectually, he resolved to proceed to the mountains, in order to make arrangements with Tully for the private interment of his brother. On his way to the cottage he was startled, from time to time, by an occasional chuckle of wild and gleeful ferocity, which at once he attributed, and very justly, to Jemmy the fool. He called upon him to come forward and accompany him to the cottage, but Jemmy declined to make his appearance, and as he advanced along the old broken way, the chuckles ceased altogether.

At length he entered the cottage, and seizing old Tully by the hand, which he almost wrung off him, he exclaimed:

"So he's gone."

"Who's gone?" asked the old man—"d—n it, why do you squeeze my hand so? Do you think I'm not flesh and blood?"

"Isn't my brother dead?" he said—"isn't my mur—isn't he dead, I say?"

"Heavenly Father!" exclaimed the old man, "what's the matter wid you? It's surely not grief that's in that face—why is it so pale, and why do your eyes blaze as they do? Good God! are you in your senses? Why, the loss of ten brothers oughtn't to put you in such a state! You look more like a man that something has druv mad than anything else."

"But my brother—show me his corpse."

"For God's sake! will you spake aisy—he's asleep, and you'll waken him."

"Who's asleep?" said he—"isn't he dead?"

"No, thank God, nor likely to be dead till his time comes, which, I hope, won't be this many a long year. He's out of all danger now, and will be able to go home in a day or two."

"James!" said Michael, flying to his bed, and stooping over him in a state of frantic agony which no pen could describe—"James, are you alive? Are you livin'? Tell me—spake—spake!"

"I am indeed, Michael," replied his brother, "alive, and, as the doctor tells me, past all danger."

"But," said he, "did you appear to be dead? Were you in a faint or anything that way? for maybe he might 'a' been mistaken."

"Who mistaken?" asked Tully.

"Why, Jemmy the fool—he told me this night—early in it too—that he was dead."

"The lyin' villain!" said Tully, "we sent him to you to let you know that he was out of danger."

Michael sprang to his feet, and looked about him with the fury of a demoniac.

"Where is he?" said he—"where could I find him? But no matter, I will find him;" and with these words he rushed out of the cabin as perfect a spectacle of horror and madness as ever was witnessed. It was in vain, however, that he attempted to find Jemmy. The vindictive fool disappeared from that part of the kingdom, and was never seen in it afterwards.

But how shall we attempt to describe Michael Sullivan's journey home? There is an instinct in man which directs him on his homeward path, even in madness or in the deepest and most helpless excesses of intoxication, and by this he was guided. He sought for the fool—he forgot his own danger and the indiscretion of allowing it to be known that he was on any path that might connect his appearance there either with the situation of his brother or the murder he had committed; a murder with which neither his hands nor his heart had been stained had he known that his brother lived. When he committed the crime he had a motive for it, that motive being the affection which he bore his beloved and only brother. Now that motive was removed, and the murder stood out before him as wanton, hideous, and horrible. He tottered along incapable of reason or any connected train of thought—he tottered along, his heart beating as if it would burst, his temples throbbing until they made his head dizzy, his throat choking as if with strangulation, and the fire, as he thought, shooting in visible flashes from his eyes. The delirium of crime was terrible, yet in the midst of it and in its highest paroxysms, he had sense enough—another natural result of crime—to seek his own house by the most unfrequented paths, one of which was by the very bog-hole where the murdered miller lay. He involuntarily looked at the surface of the water under which the body had been cast, and as he did, a strong gust of wind agitated the water, and caused it to beat against the banks with a heavy and death-like sound. A deep fear now came over him, and he fled as if he had been flying from the very brink of perdition. The death-like gurgle of that water never left his heart.

At length he reached home, but how he knew not, and on entering the house the first thing he did was to go to the whiskey bottle, and gulp down a large quantity of raw spirits. This soon stupified him; yet, strange to say, amidst this terrific whirl of guilt, there was one retiring spot in his heart which afforded him something like consolation. One object only in this life did that heart love out of itself. The consciousness that his brother lived at once aggravated the nature of his crime and consoled him under it—so complex are the states of feeling that arise in a spirit in which there is but one virtue.

The next day the hue-and-cry of men was up, and the hue-and-cry of heaven at the heels of Michael Sullivan. The miller had disappeared—was not to be found—and that he had been murdered was evident from the clots of blood that were found upon the hearth, and the state of the tables and chairs, that were found crashed and broken. Public opinion, or in other words, the suggestions, and reasonings, and surmises of many minds upon the same subject, is very likely to hit upon the truth. The attempt to take away the miller's daughter was now more closely considered, and inquiries among each other were made as to what person in the neighbourhood might be most likely to have committed that outrage: and certainly, the only individual in it who could consider himself as a disappointed man was Michael Sullivan. Still, neither Cavanagh nor Anne herself would listen to this, and for the present the surmise was dropped. This, indeed, was not surprising, as Michael Sullivan himself appeared at an early hour of the alarm, and exhibited a degree of anxiety and interest, if not of affliction, that would have deceived any human being.

Matters rested so for some days; but the police were upon the alert, and, on the fourth day the body of the miller was found. An inquest was immediately held, a post mortem examination made, and the fact clearly proved that the man had been murdered by a blow on the skull, from some blunt instrument. There was no evidence, however, to throw any light upon the perpetration of the crime, and the verdict was returned accordingly—"We find a verdict of wilful murder against some person or persons at present unknown." Such was the result of all inquiries into the murder of the miller.

In the meantime the police were at work, and they had this much in their favour, that every person to whom they addressed themselves for information was sincerely disposed to give it to them, and expressed as great an anxiety to bring the perpetrators of the crime to justice as they did. The attempted abduction was canvassed, and the disappearance of James Sullivan began to appear significant, the period of his disappearance having been found to coincide exactly with that of the attempt. The consequence was, that a body of police came one night to the house of Michael Sullivan, and having secured him and his three servant-men, they put a few piercing questions to him as follows:—

"Mr. Sullivan, where's your brother?"

"Is it poor James? Why, then, I'd give you a good penny to know that."

"He has not been at home since the night the attempt was made to take away Miss Kennedy."

"Oh yes; he was at home for three days after it."

"Take care of what you say, because we can prove that he was with you on that very day, but not afterwards."

"I can't sartinly be sure as to a day or two, but I know that about that time,—oh I know it was two or three days afterwards, for says he to me, Michael, I wish you and I had been near the miller; if we had, the villains wouldn't get off as they did."

"Well, but where is he now?"

"Troth, that's just what I say I would pay you well for, if you could tell me. We had a quarrel, and he left me, takin' some money wid him, and threatened to go to America."

"That's all very well, Misther Sullivan, but in the meantime, you and these three men must come along with us."

"What is all this for," exclaimed Sullivan; "is it me? one of the best friends that ever Frank Kennedy had that you'd go to take up?"

"Frank Kennedy!" said the sergeant, "why there was no one talking about Frank Kennedy or his murder either. Is it that you're thinking of? Very good, a feather shows how the wind blows; come along."

The murder of the miller excited an astonishing sensation throughout the county. His landlord, Lord C——, called a meeting of the magistrates, by whom a subscription was contributed to the amount of two hundred and fifty pounds for the apprehension of the murderers, to which was added another hundred, in consequence of a memorial transmitted to government.

Sullivan, whose heart the agitation arising from his dangerous position had now hardened into that feeling of self-preservation which draws in every consideration to a point, began to reflect upon his chances, and the result was not only that his sense of the crime became deadened and blunted, but his apprehensions of conviction very much diminished, it not altogether removed, and he himself best knew why.

We do not know, nor will we assert, that any knowledge of the public reward offered, reached the ears of Hannigan, Houlaghan, or Aherne, before the trial. The last-named individual the reader knows to have been innocent of any actual participation in the murder, and in consequence of evidence produced before the magistrates, he was discharged.

In the mean time Tipperary integrity came out; Hannigan and Houlaghan turned king's evidence, and Michael Sullivan was formally committed for the murder of Frank Kennedy. The Irish heart is a strange thing. Of course the one outrage bore so closely upon the other, and originated so directly from it, that its history and details were necessarily given; but as to where James Sullivan then was, they assured the magistrates that they could afford them no information. He had been slightly wounded, they said, but it was their opinion that he had gone to America. He had done all in his power, they added, to prevent his brother from the meditated abduction, but was ultimately forced into it from the influence and authority which his brother exercised over him.

At length the assizes came, and Michael Sullivan was placed at the bar, charged with the wilful murder of Francis Kennedy. The court was crowded to suffocation, for the rumour of the crime had gone far and wide, and the excellent character of Sullivan had given to the whole proceedings a more than usual interest. His friends, and they were numerous, had been astounded at the indictment against him, and they all longed to hear the result of a charge which appeared to them so extraordinary and strange.

The first witnesses produced were Sullivan's female servants, who swore, much evidently against their will, that he and his two servant-men, Hannigan and Houlaghan, went out together that night about ten o'clock, but that Aherne was not with them, as Peggy Devlin, the miller's servant-maid, had called upon him by appointment, to bring her to a dance in the early part of the evening.

"Just so, my lord," said the attorney-general, "and the prisoner knew then that Kennedy was alone."

The police were then produced, who proved the finding of the body in a bog-hole, from whence they had it carried to his own house. Then came the approvers, who detailed the circumstances of the murder with the greatest exactness, even to the blow of the poker, which, as they said, "finished him;" then the carrying of the body to a bog-hole into which they threw it.

"What kind of a man was Kennedy?"

"A powerful stout man, sir."

"Did he make much resistance?"

"Terrible resistance; so much so that we towld Sullivan it was a pity to kill him."

"What did he say to that?"

"He said that it was too late now; for if we left him as he was, we'd be forced to fly the country at any rate."

"What did he do then?"

"He struck him on the temple wid a big poker; when he fell and shivered a little, and his jaw dropped, it was aisy to know that he was dead; he never stirred or spoke atherwards; and Mr. Sullivan said: Boys, let us throw him into a bog-hole, and if there's life in him, that will take it out of him."

"The miller, you say, was a stout man?"

"As stout and as fine a looking man as you'd see in a day's travelling; as he sat in his black coat, black waistcoat, and drab breeches, you wouldn't see a finer scantlin' of a man in Europe. We were the prisoner's servants, and he drew us into it, partly by whiskey, and partly by threatening to dismiss us."

We are not reporting the trial, but it came out on the cross-examination that the men were from Tipperary—a circumstance which only deepened Sullivan's guilt, inasmuch as it was supposed he must have selected them in consequence of their proverbial recklessness in committing crime.

During the whole course of the trial Sullivan's features were calm, unmoved, and even placid. He looked upon his accusers as innocence—conscious innocence—would upon premeditated injury and guilt; a circumstance, which told considerably in his favour. The evidence however, when taken in connection with the first outrage, was so complete and irresistible, that his attorney and counsel (the late Mr. O'Connell,) gave him up, and the judge was arranging his notes to charge the jury, when he whispered to his attorney to ask the witness a question which he mentioned to him. This that gentleman refused to do; he then desired the attorney to desire his counsel to ask it, and the latter shook his head, and said it was to no purpose, that the fact he alluded to had been proved by half a dozen witnesses before.

"Then," said Sullivan, "my lord, this is a conspiracy against an honest and an innocent man, by two Tipperary men, that I believe to be murderers! My opinion is that they intended to rob the miller, and that they murdered him for that purpose, and that something unexpected must have prevented them. They're under false names, for I heard them call one another by names different from that they go by in my part of the country. I think the name of the man that passes as Hannigan is Dwyer, and the other man's name is my own, Sullivan. But that's not the thing. My lord, my life's at stake in consequence of their perjury. Will your lordship ask them once more, in the presence of the open court, what was the colour of the coat and waistcoat that the miller had on him when they swear I murdered him?"

"What was the colour of the coat, witness, that the miller had on him when he was murdered, as you say, by the prisoner?"

"Black, my lord."

"Do you swear that positively?"

"I do, my lord—a black broad-cloth coat."

"Let the other approver be called," said the judge, and in a few minutes he appeared.

"Now," said his lordship, "you have sworn that Francis Kennedy had a black coat upon him when he was murdered?"

"I have, my lord."

"And you abide by that oath?"

"I do, my lord."

"Now, prisoner, what have you to say?"

"Let the police that found the body be called again, my lord?"

"Well," added his lordship, "let them be called."

The police accordingly appeared, but only one at a time, in order that it might be ascertained whether their evidence should coincide or not.

"Policeman," said the judge, "you were present, were you not, when the body of Kennedy was taken out of the bog-hole?"

"I was, my lord."

"Do you remember what the colour of the coat was that he had on him at that time?"

"I do perfectly, my lord; a drab coat."

"You swear to that positively?"

"I do, my lord; as sure as I have life, it was a drab-coloured coat."

"Might it not have been a black?"

"Impossible, my lord. Let the men who were with me be called, and I am satisfied they will confirm the truth of what I say?"

This was accordingly done, and the policemen to a man asserted that the coat which Kennedy had on when taken out of the bog-hole was a drab one. A hum of applause and satisfaction now ran through the court, and the judge was preparing to charge the jury, when the foreman said:—

"My lord, you may save yourself the trouble, the jury have agreed, and we acquit the prisoner."

What will our readers say to this? Here, certainly, was an escape from the justice of man, but did the murderer escape from that of the Almighty? We shall soon see.

In consequence of Sullivan's excellent character, his acquittal was hailed by a loud cheer from the body of the court; which, however, was immediately repressed, but his friends surrounded him, shook hands with him, and warmly congratulated him on the happy issue of his trial. He thanked them, and said: "It could not be otherwise, than that his innocence should be made plain, and his character cleared from so foul a charge;" after which he took his way home, with what conscience our readers may easily determine.

"In the meantime, our two Tipperary boys missed their object as to the reward; but if they did, they gained something particular instead. Sullivan having pronounced their true names in the presence of a good number of police, they were closely examined, and recognised as three persons who had absconded after the perpetration of a murder in Tipperary; and before ever they left the courthouse, they were taken into custody, and in due time lodged in Clonmel gaol. In due time, too, they were tried, convicted, and hanged; and Hannigan confessed immediately before his execution, that he had committed twelve murders previous to his participation in that of the miller; a fact which is on public record.

When Michael Sullivan returned home, he found his brother James there before him. He was pale, and all but heart-broken; and when Michael extended his hand to him, the other drew his back, and said:

"Michael, I will never touch the hand of a murderer. Give me the half of whatever money you have; or if not, I will go without it."

Michael saw that his resolution was fixed, and that it was useless to remonstrate with him. He accordingly went to an oaken chest, out of which he took the sum of four hundred pounds, and laid them on a table before him. James reckoned three, and put them in his pocket, adding: "you have given me too much. There were only six hundred in the chest."

He then put his hat on, and was about to depart, when his brother said:

"James, are you lavin me for ever?"

"Yes; for ever," he replied; "for ever, and for ever."

"James," replied Michael; "remember this before you go—that it was my love for you that made me take his life; Jemmy the fool towld me you were dead. If I thought you were living, and would live, the miller too would be a living man this day; but James, James, I thought you were dead when I done the deed."

James's heart was smitten—he forgot everything but his brother's affection for him—he threw himself into his arms, and wept loudly and bitterly.

"Michael," said he, as he was about to go, "I have only one word to say—repent;" and having uttered this solemn admonition, he departed to a far land beyond the Atlantic, where he soon died of a slow decline and a broken heart.

Our readers are probably anxious to become acquainted with the plan by which Michael Sullivan baffled the evidence of the approvers, and defeated the ends of justice. We shall tell them; but it is necessary to state here that the mill and all Kennedy's property came into the hands of young Tom Cavanagh in right of his wife. A journeyman miller was appointed, who managed the mill for them, so that everything went on as usual. Michael Sullivan, what with the consciousness of his guilt and the absence of his brother, felt himself incapable of bearing reflection and a solitary life, he consequently took to drink, and became a habitual and hopeless drunkard. One day in winter, about a year and half after the murder, he went to the mill to look after some oats which he had sent to be ground, and as usual he was drunk. He staggered about from place to place, until at length he lurched over against the machinery, in which his right arm was caught, the very arm with which he committed the murder, and literally dragged from the socket at the shoulder. Had he not been pulled back by those who were present, his whole body would have been mangled to pieces; as it was, however, he was a frightful object. He became instantly sober, however, and felt that his end was at hand.

"Listen to me," said he, "while I have strength; I murdered Frank Kennedy, assisted by two of my servants; I overheard them sayin' that his murder would be a windfall to them, and I knew, when it was too late, that they'd betray me as they did. I thought of the plan I'll tell yez in the miller's house, and after we had put the body in the bog-hole, I sent them home, went back to the house, got his drab coat and buff waistcoat, went to where the body was, dragged it out, stripped it of the black coat, and put on the other. This is the truth, and may God forgive—" and having uttered these words, he expired.

CRABS AND CRAB-EATERS.

AMONGST crustacean delicacies, the crab was, without doubt, one of the earliest known to mankind, seeing that it was selected as one of the signs of the zodiac. There are representations of crabs on the slabs of the Kouynjik Gallery, in the British Museum, which proves that the Assyrians must have been familiar with them. Athenæus, in some comments on the "Miser" of Theognetus, says, 'the taste of the crab is one which many people have been very much devoted to, as may be shown by several passages in different comedies.' We find the figure of this fish on many extremely ancient eastern coins, but for what purpose it was there represented, numismatists are not agreed.

Charles V. of Spain was passionately fond of crabs, which he had cooked in a variety of ways to his own fancy. In a book published at Barcelona, in 1650, the general method of this royal crab cookery is given at full length. The emperor's method of having a crab served up cold was as follows:—A good boiled crab was selected, as heavy as could be found, with the joints of the legs stiff. The legs and claws being broken off, were cracked, the meat extracted and minced small. The body of the crab was taken out and mixed with the produce of the claws, with mustard, vinegar, and ground garlic. A certain proportion of salt and pepper was used. The dish was garnished with several kinds of aromatic plants; and the entire used in conjunction with a portion of oils from the Indies. When his majesty desired hot crabs they were commonly cooked in this fashion:—After boiling, the meat was taken from the claws, cut very small, and mixed with eggs and cream, to which were added portions of butter and ground garlic. Flour or fine bread crumbs were then laid over the top, with pepper, mustard, and salt. The whole was placed in a dish and baked a certain length of time. Another royal method resembled our mode of scalloping the fish. Its contents were extracted, and mixed with bread and various kinds of spices, and then submitted to the process of baking, after which garlic, eggs, and cream were used. Sometimes a species of sweet wine was thrown over the whole. One of the emperors of Germany was also exceedingly partial to crabs, and regularly appointed days when they were to form a conspicuous item in the royal bill of fare. Tim Bright, in his "Treatise on Melancholy," highly extols crabs, which he thinks exhilarating to the animal spirits, an opinion likewise entertained by a distinguished Italian physician. In several districts of the north of Europe it is considered exceedingly unlucky to dream of crabs, more especially at or about the full moon. In the books on natural history written in the middle ages, crabs are frequently spoken of, as well as very grotesquely represented. We have heard of one wherein a crab is holding a conversation with a certain nameless individual, and very coolly inviting him to place his tail into one of his claws! They have an odd way of eating crabs in China, as appears by the following extract from a recent record of travel in the empire of the Celestials:—"When our party of six had seated themselves at the centre table, my attention was attracted by a covered dish, something unusual at a Chinese meal. On a certain signal, the cover was removed, and presently the face of the table was covered with juvenile crabs, which made their exodus from the dish with all possible rapidity. The crabs had been thrown into a plate of vinegar, just as the company sat down; such an immersion making them more brisk and lively than usual. But the sprightly sport of the infant crabs was soon checked by each guest seizing which he could, and swallowing the whole morsel without ceremony. Determined to do as the Chinese did, I tried this novelty also—with two. I succeeded, finding the shell soft and gelatinous; for they were tiny creatures, not more than a day or two old. But I was compelled to give in to the third, which had resolved to take vengeance, and gave my lower lip a nip, so sharp and severe as to make me relinquish my hold, and likewise desist from any further experiment of this nature."

Pliny gravely tells us that the wild boar and common stag when wounded by noxious insects, cure themselves by eating crabs, a notion likewise confirmed by Plutarch. Pliny further adds, that, while the sun is passing through the sign of Cancer, the dead bodies of any crabs which may be lying on the sea-shore, are transformed into serpents! Ovid, in his "Metamorphoses," assures us that if we deprive a crab of its claws, and inter it in the earth, a scorpion will be generated from the part so buried!

The mode of capturing crabs is extremely simple. The wicker-work creels, or crab-pots, in which they are taken, are fashioned somewhat like a large mousetrap, with an opening of sufficient dimensions to admit a full-sized crab. These creels must be set with fresh bait, unlike lobster-pots, which may be baited with any kind of half-decayed fish, or other garbage. When the crab-pots are baited they are sunk by the score or half hundred, on a rocky part of the coast, in water which is four or five fathoms deep. As many boats proceed to the same fishing-place, a line from the traps, attached to a floating cork (with a particular mark upon it), affords a sufficient eye-mark for the fishermen to find their game. But crabs are also caught in considerable quantities by the fishermen's children, in a still simpler way, viz., by means of a stick which they insert into the clefts of rocks and other places which crustacea are known to haunt. The times when the crabs are moulting are those at which the best harvest is obtained in this way. Many curious observations have been made by naturalists since the time of Réaumur, as regards the crab during these periods of change. It escapes from its shell a soft, helpless creature, incapable of exertion or resistance, and would speedily become an easy prey to any of the hordes of aquatic devourers so common in the sea, were it not for a curious and wonderful display of instinct on the part of those of its brethren in better tift than itself. As soon as the denudation is complete, it has been observed that a stout specimen of the same species steps forward and defends it, and takes care of it to the best of his ability until the shelly case grows, and it is enabled again to protect itself, and present a strong back to its foe. When the species are young, the change of shell probably occurs oftener than once a year, indeed some writers say it occurs once or twice a month, and there is most likely a time when the change stops altogether, and the animal may be considered as full-grown. If this sentinel be discovered and removed, another will be found to have taken his place after the following tide, and this will be repeated many times in succession. Mr. Bell, the author of "A History of the Stalk-eyed Crustacea," supplies us with the following account of the process of exuviation, by means of which the crab casts its crust or calcareous covering, an operation rendered necessary by the principle of growth which is common to all animals, but which is hindered in the crab and lobster by their shells, which prevent any gradual or long continued expansion:—"When the animal, by gradual internal increase, has become too large for its existing covering, it ceases for a time to feed, and retires to a secret and undisturbed situation, where it may undergo the process in security. If it be examined at this time, an evident loosening of the crust may be perceived, upon pressing it gently in different directions. Shortly afterwards it appears uneasy and restless, rubbing its limbs against each other, and moving the segments of the body in different directions. It throws itself on its back, and swelling out its body ruptures the membrane which connects the carapace (back shell) with the abdomen, and raises the former, so as to loosen it from its attachments. Resting from time to time, after its laborious efforts, it finally detaches the whole thoracic-abdominal portion, from which it withdraws itself, having, with much apparent difficulty and pain, disengaged the legs, and then the antennæ, the eyes, and other appendages. It is impossible to imagine that the crust of the legs, and especially of the great claws of the larger species, could be cast off unless it were susceptible of being longitudinally split; and Réaumur states that such is actually the case; each of the segments being composed of two longitudinal pieces, which, after separating to allow of the passage of the soft limb, close again so accurately that it is very difficult in the cast crust to discover the line of division. When the animal has disengaged itself of the crust the latter is found absolutely entire, and has exactly the form which it possessed previous to the operation. The new integument is at first soft and membranous, but speedily becomes encrusted with calcareous matter and as hard as the former. The additional size which is gained by each moult is very striking, and I have often felt, on seeing a newly emancipated crab by the side of the shell which it had just shed, that, were not the fact absolutely ascertained by observation, it would appear physically impossible that the larger body could have so recently been contained within so small a case."

The stories of crabs and other crustacea casting away their limbs when alarmed or frightened, as on the occasions of a thunder-storm or on the firing of cannon, are considered to be quite authentic. When a claw happens to sustain an injury, it is cast off by the animal, and a new one in due time takes its place.

There are widely different and strange peculiarities amongst the crabs. The migratory, or land-crab, is one of the greatest curiosities of the crustacean family. This eccentric species is a native of the warmer climates, and is plentiful in the Bahamas and other islands; living in the mountains in the interstices of rocks, in the clefts of trees, and in holes bored in the earthy parts of the hills. It travels once a year, in the early spring-time, from the mountains to the sea, in order to deposit its eggs, and, as they march like a well-disciplined army, in one or more battalions, numbering many millions of individuals, it must be an interesting sight to witness their advance. They march in a direct line, even attempting to scale houses if they find them in their path. They will wind for weeks along the course of a stream in order to attain their destination, for they cannot cross a river, as they are easily drowned. Their migratory excursions are always undertaken by night, and during the rainy season, for although they carry a supply of water in a cavity in their gills, it is speedily exhausted. If interrupted while on the march, they offer a vicious and determined resistance, endeavouring to intimidate their enemies by making a prodigious clatter with their nippers. Arrived at the sea-shore they at once commence preparations for the operation of spawning, by allowing the water to lave gently over their bodies. This kind of bathing, to which they appear to be very partial, lasts for a few days, and then the process of oviposition is begun. When the proper moment arrives the spawn, which exactly resembles a piece of herring roe, is shaken into the water, and the operation is completed. Notwithstanding that fully a third, and sometimes a half, of the spawn is destroyed by shoals of fish directed to the spot by a sharp instinct, millions of ova are hatched in the sand, and in due time the juvenile crabs commence their march to the mountains, to join their parents, who having first arrived undergo their moult, during which period they are, strangely enough, most in demand as a delicacy for the table, being captured while shut up in their holes. Of this class that called the "violet crab" is considered the most exquisite delicacy. Those which Cuvier calls the "burrowing crab" proper, are thus described by that able naturalist:—"The animal closes the entrance of its burrow, which is situated near the margin of the sea, or in marshy grounds, with its largest claw. These burrows are cylindrical, oblique, very deep, and very close to each other; but generally every burrow is the exclusive habitation of a single individual. The habit which these crabs have of holding their large claw elevated in advance of the body, as if making a sign of beckoning to some one, has obtained for them the name of 'calling crabs.'"

It is said that the demand for these favourites of the gastronomic world (we mean the inhabitants of our own waters) is beginning to tell on the supply, and that if some means are not adopted to shield the young from danger, we shall rapidly find them rising in price. To give an idea of the magnitude of the annual crustacean contributions to the London commissariat alone, we subjoin some figures collected by Mr. Mayhew:—

|-------------------------------------|---|---|---|-------------|
| Oysters | - | - | - | 495,896,000 |
| Lobsters (averaging 1lb. each fish) | - | - | - | 1,200,000 |
| Crabs (averaging ditto) | - | - | - | 600,000 |
| Shrimps (324 to a pint) | - | - | - | 498,428,648 |
| Wheles (227 to half-bushel) | - | - | - | 4,943,200 |
| Mussels (1,000 to ditto) | - | - | - | 50,400,000 |
| Cockles (2,000 to ditto) | - | - | - | 67,892,000 |
| Periwinkles (4 000 to ditto) | - | - | - | 304,000,000 |

It has been suggested that the art of pisciculture could be called in to aid in arresting the rapidly diminishing supplies of crustacea. Oysters have been bred in innumerable quantities along the seaboard of France, and even mussels are carefully cultivated as an article of food. Why, therefore, should not piscicultural operations be adopted to multiply the crab?

NATIONAL TINTINGS.

I.—GERALD GRIFFIN.

IN selecting Gerald Griffin as the first subject in a series of tintings of Irishmen who, by their words or actions either in the senate or at the bar, or who with pen or pencil have reflected honour upon their country and themselves, we have been influenced in our choice from the belief that no national writer has excelled him in his delineation of Irish character, in his high descriptive power, in the vivacity and poetry of his dialogue, and lastly, in the beauty and purity of his style. His heroes and heroines are never vulgar, but he has never sacrificed truth to poetry in describing them. As has been well observed of him, his pathos is genuine pathos, and when he gives the people credit for virtue you can heartily believe him. His nationality implied genuine sympathy for his countrymen, a deep-seated respect and veneration for his native land—its history, its essential character, and its patriotic traditions. He had the noble courage to paint Ireland as she is; and the fidelity of the portrait, while it makes his fame as an artist, possesses in the eyes of the world that beauty and dignity which must always attach to the true and unaffected picture of a noble people. In his hands, the Irish dialect of the English language, and the peculiarities of Irish provincialism in accent, character, and mental traits, became, like those of Scotland in the hands of Scott and Burns, invested with a halo of poetry. This is one of the attributes of romantic fiction, which show us how much every historic nation—every nation which aspires to respect itself, and to love its own peculiarities—owes to its men of literary genius. Griffin never wrote a line which the most fastidious could desire to blot. Added to all this, he was most felicitous in his domestic relations—"blessing and being blessed." Seeking in the exercise of every virtue the true rewards of life, he was an example to his fellow litterateurs. He lived a gentleman and he died a Christian.

There is little out of the way remarkable in the life of Gerald Griffin but its purity. His trials were not at all peculiar to him, being those of nearly all literary adventurers. He was born in the city of Limerick, on the 12th of December, 1803. From his memoir, compiled by his brother, it would appear that his family was of Irish origin, having been located from a very early period in the barony of Inchiquin, and the northern and western parts of the county of Clare. The original of the name was O'Griobhtha, pronounced O'Greeta, and Anglicised, Griffy, Griffith, and Griffin. From time to time members of the family removed to the neighbouring counties of Kerry and Limerick, and settled there; of these, our author's grandfather, James Griffin, of Corgarriff, in the latter county, was one. His third son, Patrick, having dwelt for several years on the border of one of these beautiful lakes which abound in the county of Clare, removed to Limerick for the education of his children, and undertook the management of a brewery, in Brunswick-street. During the progress of a mansion which he was building in the vicinity of the brewery, he

to show his gentleness and susceptibility of spirit, as well as his vivid apprehension of the supernatural. However, with Gerald this latter feeling though strong was never paramount or irrational. His father was but little acquainted with the business of which he had undertaken the management, and being in consequence unsuccessful, gave up the concerns in Brunswick-street, and retired again to the Island, although not to the same house he formerly occupied. Gerald's earliest school days commenced here, under Richard Mac Eligot, a character of some celebrity at that time in Limerick, who is represented as having been a man of singular ability and industry, although possessing a few pardonable idiosyncracies. An essay from his pen on the character and grammatical structure of the Irish language, was published in the first volume of the "Transactions of the Gaelic Society of Dublin," in 1806. At this age our author seems to have exhibited a great taste for drawing, and much of his time at school was spent in endeavouring to copy animal figures. In the year 1810, his father removed to a new residence, erected after a design of his own, to which the name of "Fairy Lawn" was given. It was situated on the Shannon, the beautiful scenery of which is the subject of Griffin's most charming word-pictures, about eight and twenty miles from Limerick.

"Nothing (writes his brother, speaking of this noble river) can be more glorious than the magnificent floor of silver it presents to the eye on a fine evening in summer, when the sun is setting, and the winds are at rest. The prospect from any elevated ground in such circumstances is quite enchanting. Indeed, there is no river in these countries that at all approaches it in magnitude. Viewed from the heights of Knock-Patrick on a clear day, when the tide is full, and from whence one can see the broad Fergus, one of its tributaries, dotted with islands, and the Shannon itself as far as the distant island of Scattery, with its round tower and ruined churches, that bright spot, where the stern saint sung his inhospitable melody—

"Oh, haste and leave this sacred isle, Unholy bark," &c.;

and where its waters mingle with the Atlantic, it is precisely what the poet Spenser has described it—

"The spacious Shenan, spreading like a sea."

It is no marvel that Gerald was ever accustomed to regard these scenes of his boyhood with fondness, and that he should limn them with glowing pencil, as in the opening stanzas to one of his later poems, "Shanid Castle."

"On Shannon side, the day is closing fair,
The Kern sits musing by his shieling low,
And marks beyond the lonely hills of Clare,
Blue rim'd with gold, the clouds of sunset glow.
Hush in that sun the wide-spread waters flow,
Returning warm the day's departing smile;
Along the sunny highland pacing slow,
The Keyriacht lingers with his herd the while,
And bells are tolling faint from far Saint Simon's isle!

Oh, loved shore! with softest memories twined,
Sweet fall the summer on thy margin fair!
And peace come whispering like a morning wind,
Dear thoughts of love, to every bosom there!
The horrid wreck, and driving storm forbear
Thy smiling strand—nor oft the accents swell
Along thy hills, of grief or heart-wrung care,
But heav'n look down upon each lowly dell,
And bless thee for the joys I yet remember well!"

Shortly after the arrival of Griffin's family at Fairy Lawn, a tutor was engaged to attend the younger members for some hours daily. He is stated to have been a man of great integrity, an excellent scholar, and a most accomplished penman. He was very partial to the writings of Shakespeare, Goldsmith, and Pope, some of the more striking sentiments in which always furnished the first lines of Gerald's copies. Hitherto the circumstances in which he was placed were not unfavourable for the acquirement of extensive or varied information, and his early devotion to literary pursuits was very remarkable, as evidenced from the fact that he was accustomed to eat his meals with a book before him, which he was diligently studying, while he had two or three under his arm, and a few more on the chair behind him! He made a blank book into which, during his hours of recreation, he carefully copied pieces of poetry, chiefly from the works of Thomas Moore.

"All this time (says his brother) he was very fond of birds, and made repeated attempts to rear them, but most unfortunate were those that came under his guardianship. They seemed ever fated to disappoint the care he bestowed on them. He once asked one of his elder sisters to feed one while he was away somewhere, which she never thought of doing until she saw him on his return within a few steps of the door. Her forgetfulness provoked a general laugh, and she had not time to compose her countenance again properly, when Gerald found her trying to revive the drooping little victim, but too late. He said afterwards, complaining gently of it to one of the family, 'Ellen speaks to me sometimes about cruelty to animals, but I actually saw her laughing and my bird gasping.' 'I observed,' says one of his sisters, 'the cat flit by him once or twice with an appearance of fear, and said, 'How have you managed, Gerald, to make the cat so much afraid of you?' 'Oh, not of me particularly, perhaps,' said he, 'but she generally feels a little timid after having killed a bird.'"

His principal amusements were fishing and shooting, although he never appears to have attained to much skill in either pursuit. A cousin of his, who generally accompanied him on these sporting excursions, has told a characteristic anecdote of him. Gerald, one day, when out shooting, had just presented his gun at a little bird perched on the top branch of a tree, and was about to fire, when suddenly the bird began to sing. Gerald instantly lowered the weapon, fell into a listening attitude, and seemed to greedily drink in the melody of the little songster. When it was over, however, the temptation to a sitting shot became irresistible, he resumed his first intention, and the tiny warbler fell. Gerald used to abjure all remembrance of this circumstance, but his friend, who, it is only fair to remark, was considered a great quizz, as strongly asserted its truth.

In 1814, in the eleventh year of his age, Griffin was sent to Limerick, and placed at the academy of a Mr. O'Brien, one of the first classical teachers in that city. Afterwards, however, a school having been opened in the village of Loughill, near Fairy Lawn, he was removed from Limerick to it, two of his brothers being already placed in it. That he was fully alive to the drollery of the contrast between the methods of instruction pursued at the city and the village academies, is shown by his admirable sketch of a country school in the "Rivals." In the year 1817, Griffin's eldest brother, who had been several years in the army, during which time he had been stationed in Canada, came to reside with his family at Fairy Lawn. Appreciating the advantages that Canada at this period afforded to settlers, and perceiving the difficulties the family had to contend with at home, he urged them to emigrate. They were not at first disposed to listen to this proposal, but at length, the elder brother's solicitations continuing, they seriously regarded the matter, and finally determining on it, sailed for Canada in 1820. The severity of the Canadian winters, however, ultimately compelled them to settle farther south, and they accordingly removed to the United States, to the county of Susquehanna, in Pennsylvania. Some of the family remained in Ireland, and amongst them was Gerald. The separation from his parents was the first misfortune that touched his sensitive spirit; "he felt it," writes his brother, "with all the heaviness of a deep affliction." At this period there was an idea of bringing him up to the medical profession, and he had made some slight progress in his studies, under his brother's instruction, until the passion for literature which had been gradually growing upon him, developed itself so strongly, that all idea of that profession was entirely up. He at this time resided at Adare, within ten miles of Limerick, which city he frequently visited to consult such works as his tastes inclined him to, and to enjoy the society of persons whose pursuits were congenial to his own. Amongst the latter was Banim, just then commencing his literary career. In dramatic poetry Griffin took an intense interest, and although there is no evidence to show that he had completed any regular piece at this period, he used to write, and, with the assistance of some of his cousins, to enact scenes. On one occasion, when it was necessary to poison one of the characters, he compelled a niece of his, who played the heroine, to drink off a glass of quassia, in order to give a natural effect to the facial contortions that were to indicate death! Griffin's talent for writing soon began to be appreciated in his native city, and he found frequent but very unremune-rative opportunities of gratifying his cacœthes scribendi. In a letter addressed to his mother in America, about this period, he confesses that although he derived little pecuniary advantage from his connection with the Limerick press, he was not sorry for the time he spent on it, nor did he consider it lost.

"By constantly attending the court (he wrote). I acquired a considerable facility in reporting, which is a very useful attainment in any situation almost, and the short time which I had spent to prepare an original article, obliged me to write with quickness and without much study."

But the unsatisfactory nature of his engagements on the press necessitated his more assiduous attention to literature, and it was about this time he began to seriously regard it as a profession. Upon a certain occasion his brother observed that he was more than usually intent on his literary avocations, but could form no idea of the reason until Gerald called him into his room one morning, and submitted for his perusal a tragedy called "Aguire," founded upon some ancient Spanish romance. On reading it Dr. Griffin was perfectly astonished at the many passages of exquisite poetical beauty which it contained, as well as the admirable dramatic effect of the incidents. This opinion, which was also ratified by Banim, was heightened from the consideration of the fact that it was the production of an author only in his eighteenth year. For maturity of thought and chasteness of expression some of the minor poems which Griffin produced in his teens, are not unworthy of comparison with any of his latest and most brilliant efforts. The following, written in his seventeenth year, in 1820, may be taken as an example :

"I looked upon a dark and sullen sea,
Over whose slumbering waves the night-mists hung,
Till from the morn's gray breast a fresh wind sprung,
And swept its brightening bosom joyously;
Then fled the mists its quickening breath before!
The glad sea rose to meet it—and each wave Retiring from the sweet caress it gave,
Made summer music to the listening shore.
So slept my soul, unmindful of Thy reign:
But the sweet breath of Thy celestial grace,
Hath risen—oh, let its quickening spirit chase
From that dark seat, each mist and secret stain,
Till, as in yon clear water mirror'd fair,
Heaven sees its own calm hues reflected there!"

It was in the autumn of 1823, ere he had completed his twentieth year, that Griffin first arrived in London, and commenced his literary struggles. He called upon Kemble and Young in the hope of getting his tragedy of "Aguire" placed on the boards, but does not appear to have had much opinion of the taste of a London audience.

"You may judge what it is, (he says in a letter to his brother,) when I tell you that 'Venice Preserved' will scarcely draw a decent house; while such a piece of unmeaning absurdity as the 'Cataract of the Ganges' has filled Drury Lane every night those three weeks past. The scenery and decorations, field of battle, burning forest, and cataract of real water, afforded a succession of splendour I had no conception of, but I was heartily tired of the eternal galloping, burning, marching and counter-marching, and the dull speechifying with which it abounded. A lady on horseback, riding up a cataract, is rather a bold stroke, but these things are quite the rage now. They are hissed by the gods, but that is a trifle so long as they fill the house and the manager's pockets."

The idea of Griffin's play of "Gisippus" appears to have been conceived before he left Ireland, but he made no progress with it until after his arrival in London. He forwarded a passage from it to his brother for his opinion, and likewise showed it to Banim, who, Griffin says, thought the story a beautiful one for the stage, and prophesied he would one day hold a very high position as a dramatist. Of the "opinions of the press," Gerald seems to have entertained but a meagre regard. "Never waste a thought on those newspaper squibs," said he in a letter to his brother, "they are mere puffing trash!" He considered the character of "Gisippus" well adapted to Mr. Young or Mr. Macready, the former in particular. The latter's impersonation of the role, which is one that severely tests the abilities of an actor, was most masterly, and since his retirement from the stage it has found but a solitary efficient representative—Mr. T. C. King, who occasionally delights the denizens of the Irish metropolis by his graceful and finished conception and execution of the character.

"You'd laugh (says Griffin, in a letter to his mother, speaking of this piece,) if you saw how it was got through. I wrote it all in coffee houses, and on little slips of paper, from which I afterwards copied it out."

After herculean exertions—amongst which we must not forget those of his true and disinterested friend, Banim—the play of "Gisippus" was produced for the first time at Drury Lane, in the year 1842, two years after the author's death. Macready sustained the principal character, and the piece met with an enthusiastic reception from the press and the public.

During this time he was contributing to several weekly publications, all of which, he says, except the Literary Gazette, "cheated him abominably." He, in consequence, turned his thoughts to the more pretentious magazines, but if his articles were inserted, when he called for payment "there was so much shuffling and shabby work," that it disgusted him, and he gave it up.

"You have no idea (he remarks in one of his letters,) what a heart-breaking life that of a young scribbler beating about, and endeavouring to make his way in London is: going into a bookseller's shop, as I have often done, and being obliged to praise up my own manuscript, to induce him to look at it at all—for there is so much competition, that a person without a name will not even get a trial—while he puts on his spectacles, and answers all your self-commendation with a "hum—um;"—a set of hardened villains! and yet at no time whatever could I have been prevailed upon to quit London altogether. That horrid word failure,—No!—death first!"

Poor Gerald! Most manfully and honourably did he fight the battle of life. The letters written to the various members of his family at this time exhibit a fearful picture of the struggles which he waged in efforts to obtain employment, even as a literary hack, of the distressing influences by which his mind was for a time depressed, of the high sensibility of that mind, and of his unfaltering devotion to achieve success, which no obstacles could discourage. We next find him "in the gallery" of the House of Commons as a reporter, and it was about this time he commenced to turn his attention to novels, tales, and other prose works, the first book which established his reputation as a powerful and original writer being the volume published under the name of "Holland-tide," the copyright of which was purchased by Messrs. Simpkin and Marshall for £70. In September, 1826, his brother, Dr. Griffin, saw him in London for the first time after his departure from Adare, and was painfully struck by the change which the wear and tear of a literary life had made in his appearance. "All colour (he writes) had left his cheek, he had grown very thin, and there was a sedate expression of countenance unusual in one so young, and which, in after years, became habitual to him. It was far from being so, however, at the time I speak of, and readily gave place to that light and lively glance of his dark eye, that cheerfulness of manner and observant humour, which from his infancy had enlivened our fireside circle at home. Although so pale and thin as I have described him, his tall figure, expressive features, and profusion of dark hair, thrown back from a fine forehead, gave an impression of a person remarkably handsome and interesting." He was subject to most distressing palpitations of the heart, as well as severe rheumatic attacks, which he would endeavour to mitigate by flinging himself out of bed, and commencing to sing some such popular song as "Old King Cole." The health of one of his sisters had been declining for a considerable time, and Griffin left the English metropolis for Limerick, which he reached early in February, 1827, on purpose to see her. However, almost at the moment of their re-union, her death occurred with a painful suddenness, and the shock to Gerald, in his own debilitated state of health, was dreadful. The first series of the "Tales of the Munster Festivals," consisting of three volumes, containing the "Half Sir," "Card Drawing," and "Suil Dhuv, the Coiner"—all written in the short space of four months—appeared in August, 1827, in which month Griffin returned to London to make arrangements for their publication. Of these stories "Suil Dhuv" is far the finest, although it contains some very striking anomalies in composition. The portrait of Lilly Byrne in it proves Griffin's taste in female beauty to have been exquisitely refined. This work was followed by the "Collegians," a production on which our author's fame is mainly based. Having made arrangements with his publishers, the tale, so far as it had gone, was sent to the printers, and he set to work vigorously to complete it. So limited to time, however, was he, that the printers overtook him about the middle of the third volume, and from this time forward it was a constant race between him and them. Incredible as the fact may appear, some of the finest scenes in it were poured forth with the greatest rapidity. Every morning, almost, a knock came to his door, and a messenger was shown in, with the stereotyped saying, "Printers want more copy, sir," the MS. of the previous day was handed forth, without the slightest revision, and he went to work to produce a further supply. Griffin was full of enthusiasm during the progress of the story. "What a great deal I would give," he observed to his brother one evening, with kindling eyes, "to see Edmund Kean in that scene of Hardress Cregan at the party, just before his arrest, where he is endeavouring to do politeness to the ladies, while the horrid warning voice is in his ear. The very movements of Kean's countenance in such a scene as that, would make one's nerves creep; every motion and attitude of his, his ghastly efforts at complaisance, and his subdued sense of impending ruin, would all be sufficient to keep an audience in a thrill of horror, and, without almost a word spoken, would indicate the whole agony of his mind." "As the story drew to a close," writes his brother, he said "I am exceeding puzzled to think what I shall do with Hardress Cregan. If I hang him, the public will never forgive me; and yet," he added, playfully, in the Irish phrase, "he deserves hanging as richly as any young gentleman from this to himself." How he compromised the matter the readers of the tale are aware. It has been frequently dramatised of late, and it is a matter of gratification that one of the most attractive and effective stage adaptations of it is the production of a young and rising Irish author, Mr. G. B. O'Halloran. It placed Griffin in the first rank of national novelists. But although its success was unequivocal, he saw too much of the fickleness of public taste to feel any security in literature as a profession. "I should like, if possible," he said, "to commence the study of some profession that might at one time or another render me independent of this scribbling. The uncertainty of the life it has been my misfortune to adopt is horrible." With this feeling he entered as a law student at the London University, just then opened. Upon the completion of the "Collegians," Griffin turned his attention to the study of ancient Irish history, in the belief that there were many peculiarities in the usages of early times which would form a good groundwork for a story. The result of his researches in this respect was the novel of the "Invasion," a very beautiful one, and the only Irish historical tale of the class ever attempted. A cheap edition has recently been issued from the Dublin press. It was preceded by a second series of the "Munster Festivals." Early in 1829 Griffin came to Dublin, where he was introduced to the late Sir Philip Crampton, the Surgeon-General, who was very partial to literature, and whose kindness he appears to have thoroughly appreciated. He afterwards visited his relations and friends at Pallas Kenry, returning to London towards the close of the year. It was in the year 1830 that that tendency to religious habits of thought first began to gradually come over Griffin's mind, which, by degrees, took away his relish for literary pursuits, and ended in his embracing a monastic life. In this year he published that very beautiful little work "The Christian Physiologist; or, Tales of the Five Senses." In the November of 1832, he paid a visit to Tom Moore, at Sloperston Cottage, who received him, we need scarcely say, with a genuine Irish welcome. Between this period and the year 1835, Griffin's works were the "Rivals; or, Tracy's Ambition," in which his description of an Irish waterfall is among the most charming of his word-paintings; the "Duke of Monmouth," and "Tales of my Neighbourhood." The last appeared in 1835, and contains, amongst other admirable pieces, a story of intense interest, the "Barber of Bantry." In 1838 he made a trip to the Scottish lakes, with the beauty and sublimity of which he was much struck. He also visited in succession Glasgow, Falkirk, Linlithgow, and Edinburgh. From Glasgow he sailed for Dublin. "Never do I remember," he says, in a diary which he kept during this trip, "a more lively day and night than we had on our voyage home; the sea was like glass; the view of the Arran Isles, of Benghoil, of Ailsa Crag, of the shipping, scattered far and wide over the sunny deep, of the numerous sea-fowl, gulls, and divers, by which the surface of the water was animated, gave an interest to our voyage which I shall not easily forget." It was after his return home that he finally resolved to pursue a life of religious retirement. Prior to carrying his purpose into effect, he devoted all his MSS. to the flames. Amongst these was a portion of "Matt Hyland," an exquisitely sweet ballad, in which was introduced the beautiful little song of "Aileen a Roon." From the moment he fairly entered on his new mode of life, he is said to have manifested the greatest disinclination to take a pen in his hand, and to be perfectly indifferent to literary reputation. In 1839 he took up his residence in the monastery of the Christian Brothers, in Cork, where he devoted himself with undeviating energy and unbroken content to the discharge of the duties connected with his new sphere of life. In April, 1840, his fatal illness commenced in a sharp feverish attack, resembling those he had been subject to occasionally at home. He never perfectly recovered from this illness, which terminated in typhoid fever. From the first the attendant physicians did not disguise their opinions as to the result. For those who remained by his bedside—including his brother—it was most distressing to witness his sufferings, as his increasing debility rendered him less able to cope with the malignant disease. On Friday, the 12th of June, 1840, he was mercifully released from his suffering, and his place knew him no more. Three days afterwards his remains were interred in the little cemetery of the monastery, where a simple headstone and inscription, merely recording the name he had adopted in religion, and the date of his death, indicates the spot.

If Gerald Griffin just fell short of being the Irish Walter Scott, it was mainly owing to his drawing too early and too heavily on his genius. Adventuring himself in the great world of London at the age of nineteen, with a MS. tragedy for his capital and genius for his reliance, he filled the interval between his first tale and first play with incessant labour on magazines and literary newspapers. If as time progressed he gained in point of facility he lost in point of concentration, and this want of unity forms a characteristic feature in his more ambitious works. "Some passages in the 'Collegians' and the 'Invasion,'" observes one of his critics, "can hardly be surpassed in simple beauty; and where the style does not attain to absolute beauty, or even falls short of absolute correctness, it is never disfigured by fustian; it is always simple and of a crystalline clearness. The directness and simplicity of his narrative is one of the traits in which he most resembles Scott. There is a quiet consciousness of power in his unpretending manner of telling a story, which at once lifts Gerald Griffin above the crowd of novel-writers to the dignity of a classic." The "Complete Works" of Griffin, with his life, written, as we have already said, by his brother, form some ten volumes.* We have scarcely alluded to Griffin as a poet. Several of his best songs possess that universal popularity which is the best test of excellence. Such is—"A place in thy memory, dearest."

As a song writer he belongs to the school of which Moore is the best representative. Few have known so well how to interweave Irish words in English songs, with a pathetic effect, as in—

"The mie-na-mallah now is past,
O wirra-sthru! O wirra-sthru!
And I must leave my home at last,
O wirra-sthru! O wirra-sthru!
I look into my father's eyes,
I hear my mother's parting sighs,—
Ah! fool to pine for other ties—
O wirra-sthru! O wirra-sthru!"

"My Mary of the curling hair," to the air of "Shule a-gra," is one of the sweetest love-songs poet ever penned, the Irish words being mingled in very musically and effectively. These things are especially suited to music, like the well known "Aileen a Roon," and "I love my love in the morning." Every young lady who has a voice and a piano has played and sung the songs of Gerald Griffin at some time or other, but little do they think as they sing them, that the author at thirty-eight bid the muses farewell, and ended his unblemished life in a monastery.

THE HARVEST MOON.

SHINES the Harvest Moon full brightly
O'er the billows of the sea ;
Shines the Harvest Moon full softly
O'er the upland and the lea.
Shines the Harvest Moon full queenly,
With her chaste and silver light,
With all nature sleeping gently
In the silence of the night.

Shone the Harvest Moon as brightly
O'er the billows of the sea ;
Shone the Harvest Moon as softly
O'er the upland and the lea.
Shone the Harvest Moon as queenly
As she shineth even now,
Though her light, alas, was shining
On a dying maiden's brow !

Full of sorrow, watching sadly,
As we stood about the bed ;
In the heart's sad silence thinking
Of the spirit that had fled !
With the Harvest Moon bright shining ;
In her rich and silver sheen,
O'er the leaves of autumn falling,
Like the maiden that had been.

Drooping slowly, slowly failing,
Growing paler every day ;
We had watch'd our fair one sitting
To her home of love away.
Through the spring, and through the summer,
We had mark'd the paling eye ;
When the Harvest Moon was shining
Came the message from on high !

Once again, so softly speaking,
Once again we heard her say—
"Close around me, dear ones, standing,
Watch my spirit flit away !
Let me hear your voices whispering
Words of hope and trusting love ;
My loosened spirit wafting
To the dwelling of its love !"

Then her faint voice, fainter growing,
(As her spirit ebb'd still more ;)
Like the surges breaking softly
On the ocean's sounding shore.
With the angels she was speaking,
And her face was all alight ;
And we knew that God was with her,
That her soul was full of light !

Then we watch'd the shadow creeping:
O'er her pale and fading face ;
Watch'd it stealing, surely stealing,
All her beauty, light, and grace.
While the Harvest Moon came shining
(As she shineth even now)
Through the casement—shining sadly
On the dying maiden's brow !

In the dead room, watching, watching,
In the silence of the night ;
With the calm face softly sleeping
In the moonbeams' silver light.
With a sad heart, sadly thinking
Of the dear one that had fled ;
With a sad heart, sadly weeping
In the presence of the dead !

ERRORS OF THE PRESS.

ISTAKES will occur in the best regulated families, and it is, then, surely no marvel that in the nineteenth century, when, as King Solomon has recorded of his own time, "of making many books there is no end," and when the whirr and clang of that wondrous engine in their multiplication—the steam-printing machine—is unceasing, literary blunders, by courtesy termed "errors of the press," should not only not be unfrequent, but far more numerous than at a period in the world's history the press was less prolific, for were revised by men who had erudition were of European and when it could be said of as was once said of them by Burgh, Bishop of Durham, not to laymen whether they took turned upside down or in its natural order, they are unworthy of communion with books." In this age of bibliomania and of daily newspapers, the labours of authors, printers, and publishers are indeed Herculean, so literature, ex necessitate, embalms so many errors, clerical as well as typographical, that since it is "Pretty in-amber to observe the forms

Of hairs, or straws, or dust, or grubs, or worms ;
The things we know are neither rich nor rare,
But wonder how they possibly got there."

One of the many arcana pertaining to the craft of book-making is the "correction of the press," a task the difficulty of which it is impossible to over-estimate. This is now-a-days executed by one or more functionaries technically called "readers," whose immediate duties are to mark every error and oversight of the compositor, so as to insure the printed matter being verbum pro verbo with the "copy," and to rectify all inconsistencies in orthography, punctuation, abbreviations, etc. To effect this it is essential that the "reader" should be familiar not only with an extensive and varied circle of knowledge, but that he should be thoroughly acquainted with the art of typography, so as to remedy the mechanical defects of the work. For many years after the invention of printing, in the fifteenth century, publishers performed all the offices necessary to the production of a book, and were sometimes the authors, printers, readers, binders, and sellers of their own works. Afterwards the "proofs" were entrusted to the supervision of the most renowned scholars. Robert Stephen (1526-59), in order to have his publications immaculate, submitted the successive "sheets" to a public scrutiny, and offered a reward to any person who would point out a typographical error. A similar course was adopted by Plantin (1559-89) with the numerous works that issued from his press, which was not only one of the wonders of Antwerp but of the world. Amongst the early publications still held in universal estimation for their intrinsic excellence, and the care with which they were revised, are the famous "Aldine Editions," so termed as having issued from the press of Aldo Manuzio (Latinised, Aldus Manutius) and his descendants in Venice, for upwards of a century—from 1490 to 1597. Many of these are the first editions (editiones principes) of Greek and Roman classics, while others contain amended texts of modern classic authors, as Boccaccio, Dante, Petrarch, etc., the latter having been "read" and carefully collated with the original manuscript by Pietro Bembo. Some of the "Aldine Editions"—the trademark of which was an anchor entwined by a dolphin, and generally with the motto Sudavit et aluit—are of extreme rarity, especially the "Hæ Beatae Mariæ Virginis," of 1497, the "P. Virgili Maronis Opera," of 1501, and the "Rhetores Græci." We may add, a recent classic, that an edition of Virgil, which the celebrated Richard Porson, Professor of Greek in the University of Cambridge from 1792 to 1808, undertook to see through the press, was said to contain not less than nine hundred errors, nearly all of which were attributable to the editor's inattention to the revision of the proof-sheets, consequent upon his addiction to drink, an inclination which proved the bane of his existence.

As Disraeli has remarked, in his "Curiosities of Literature," Bibles "were for some time suffered to be so corrupted that no looks ever yet swarmed with such innumerable errata." However, they were in great part voluntary commissions—passages interpolated, and meanings forged, for certain purposes.

Roger North, speaking of the speculative but mercenary character of the publishers of his day, says: "They crack their brains to find out selling subjects, and keep hirelings in garrets, on hard meat, to write and correct by the grate." Lucky dogs if they could have meat at all! When Samuel Richardson, the novelist, in 1749, stood at "case" in his own office in Salisbury-square, and "composed" most of the "History of Clarissa Harlowe" without "copy," in the intervals of business, Oliver Goldsmith sat in a little closet on the same floor as "reader," and corrected the press. "Nullum tetigit quod non ornavit," as Dr. Johnson wrote in his epitaph, and we have little doubt that "Poor Noll" was the very beau ideal of "readers;" but the office in his day as now was no sinecure. In neither a pecuniary nor complimentary sense is it always adequately rewarded or appreciated. Nevertheless, it must be confessed that our latter-day "readers" are occasionally convicted of some sad derelictions of duty, and it is no wonder that that accomplished heroine of Tom Moore's, Miss Fanny Fudge, when sending a copy of her last lyric effusion to her cousin, Miss Kitty—should have thus complained of the disheartening diablerie of her printers:—

"But 'tis dreadful to think what provoking mistakes
The vile country press in one's prosody makes,
For you know, dear—I may, without vanity, hint—
Though an angel should write, still 'tis devils must print;
And you can't think what havoc these demons sometimes
Choose to make of one's sense, and, what's worse, of one's rhymes.
But a week or two since, in my 'Ode upon Spring,'
Which I meant to have made a most beautiful thing,
When I talk'd of the "dewdrops from freshly-blown roses,"
The nasty things made it "from freshly-blown noses!"
And once when, to please my cross Aunt, I had tried
To commemorate some saint of her clique who'd just died,
Having said he "had tak'n up in heaven his position,"
They made it, he'd "taken up to heaven his physician!"

The fair poetess, aptly citing Shakspeare, might have excusably said with Doll Tearsheet, in Henry IV., "You nasty, famished correctioners, if you be not swinged, I'll forswear half-kirtles!" The erratum by which the queen of flowers was metamorphosed into the most prominent feature of the "human face divine," reminds us of a misprint which occurred not long since in the columns of a leading daily journal, upon the occasion of the successful launch of one of the new iron-plated frigates, which described the air as being rent by the snouts of the enthusiastic spectators! Even in some magazines of high literary character and pretensions, we have met with ludicrously gross typographical blunders. Only fancy a lady being represented as sending word to a visiter that she was at her toilet, but would be down stairs in a few months, instead of minutes, or of a certain phase in the clouds in a sunset sky being assimilated in appearance to "a man's tail," instead of "a mare's tail!" We defy the most staid or melancholy to repress a smile when they are gravely informed that a child ran through a person, in place of a chill; that her majesty's gun-boat, the "Saucy Minx," was compelled to return to port in consequence of breaking the "banjo" of her screw-propeller, or that sundry members of a crack Volunteer Rifle Corps had been "formed into a company for administrative paupers," purposes being, we presume, what was intended. Who ever heard of such an architect as Jingo (Inigo) Jones, or of the Tonic (Ionic) order of architecture, or are any of our readers acquainted with the ill-fated female whose existence a well-known literary divine was made to imperil, when he announced his determination to view nature's paths, and "shoot Polly as she flies?" Erroneous punctuation, although it may be regarded as a minor fault, has caused the antiphrasis of many a sentence. An Italian prelate, who carried with him the humility of the station from which he had been raised, and possessed a liberality worthy of his elevation, once directed this inscription to be carved over his gate:—

"Gate be thou open, and not closed to any honest man." The comma, however, having been placed after the word nulli, instead of esto, the sense was completely distorted, and people read with no small surprise that the portal was open to no one, especially to an honest man. We have seen in the money article of a daily print, the extraordinary announcement that on the Paris Bourse, the funds closed at 6,736 francs, the value of the stock being only 100 francs! Here a wrongly-placed comma was likewise the source of the error, the meaning being that the closing price was 67,36—that is, sixty-seven francs and thirty-six centimes, in lieu of six-thousand seven-hundred and thirty-six francs. After all, vexatious typographical errors will sometimes occur in spite of all the vigilance that can be exercised, and the adoption of every possible precaution, of which a well-authenticated anecdote is sufficiently illustrative. In the course of the last century a certain work was printed at the Glasgow University Press, which it was essayed should be an unique specimen of typographical accuracy. To ensure this result six experienced "readers" consecutively devoted hours to the examination of each proof-sheet, which was then carefully scrutinized by the principals of the University, within the precincts of which it was posted up, with a notification that a reward of fifty pounds would be given to any student who would discover a blunder, each page being suffered to remain two weeks in the place where it had been suspended, before the work was put to press. When it was at length published, and just as the publisher was beginning to felicitate himself on the production of a volume of unparalleled typographical excellence, it was found that several errors had been overlooked, one of which occurred in the very first line of the first page.

TARDY LOCOMOTION.—The following extract from a curious old book, entitled "The Present State of London," by Thos. De Laune, gent., printed at the "Rose and Crown and Seven Stars," Cornhill, 1681, presents a picture that contrasts strikingly with our facilities of travelling and communication in this fast age. After noticing the despatch of mails from the Post-office, in Lumbard-street, the author goes on to say:—"A letter containing a whole sheet of paper, is conveyed 80 miles for 2d., two sheets for 4d., and an ounce of letters for 8d., and so proportionably; a letter containing a sheet is conveyed above 80 miles for 3d., two sheets for 8d., and every ounce of letters for 12d. A sheet is conveyed to Dublin for 6d., two for one shilling, and an ounce of letters, for 12d. This conveyance by post is done in so short a time by night as well as by day, that every twenty-four hours the post goes 120 miles (or five miles an hour!) and in five days an answer of a letter may be had from a place 300 miles distant from the writer. Besides this excellent convenience of conveying letters there is of late such an admirable commodiousness both for men and women of better rank to travel from London, and to almost all the villages near this great city, that the like hath not been known in the world, and that is—by stage-coaches (!) wherein one may be transported to any place, sheltered from foul weather and foul ways, free from endamaging one's health or body by hard jogging or over violent motion. The flying coaches make 40 or 50 miles in a day (!) as from London to Oxford or Cambridge, and that in the space of twelve hours, not counting the time for dining, setting forth not too early, nor coming in too late." What would the admirer of "flying coaches" say if he could see an express train do in one hour what it was thought a great achievement to accomplish in twelve? How rich, too, is this paragraph, which originally appeared in the "Quarterly Review" in March, 1825: "We are not advocates for visionary projects that interfere with useful establishments. We scout the idea of a railroad as impracticable! * * * What can be more palpably absurd and ridiculous than the prospects held out of locomotives travelling twice as fast as stage coaches!"

THE HEROINES OF JEMAPPES.

A TALK OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

COUNT FELIX DE FERNIG was the representative of an ancient family in the south-east of France, who inherited sufficient property to support the rank of a country gentleman, and maintain in comfort, if not luxury, a household consisting of himself, a son, and two daughters, together with a considerable body of servants and retainers. The storm of the Revolution of '89, when it burst over the kingdom, found this family amongst the happiest and most united in the country. They seldom visited the capital, and when they did, their stay was never of more than a few weeks' duration. They found rural enjoyment and amusement perfectly suited to their taste, and they seldom cared to change them for others less congenial. The ladies were constant in their attendance at the field sports in which M. de Fernig and his son took special delight, which inured them to toil and endurance. The circle of their intimate society was necessarily limited, but amongst their closest intimates was a neighbouring family named Duprez, consisting of father and mother, son and daughter. At the time of the opening of this narrative Achille Duprez was, according to local gossip, the destined husband of Felicité, the Count de Fernig's eldest daughter; and the same authority had it that Pauline Duprez was to become Viscountess de Fernig, and, in the course of time, countess of that ilk. Village small talk had not yet found a husband for Theophile, the count's youngest daughter; but as she was only fifteen, and the family lived most happily and comfortably together, there was plenty of time to match her suitably. Even match-making gossip was in no hurry to dispose of the fair hand of the lovely Theophile.

The happiness which this united family enjoyed was interrupted by the outbreak of the great Revolution. M. de Fernig had never taken any active part in politics; but though a noble, and as such, naturally disposed to side with the court party, yet he was one of those sensible, moderate men, who saw and admitted the existence of long-standing political abuses, and recognised the necessity of ample reforms. When, however, the Revolution began to exhibit symptoms of those excesses that subsequently deluged the soil of France with the best blood of her people, M. de Fernig began to regret even the passive countenance he had afforded the great political movement, and felt half inclined to swell with his family the tide of emigration then setting out in all possible directions. When he saw those moderate constitutionalists, the Girondists, perspersed in the direction of public opinion by such men as Robespierre, Marat, Hebert, Danton, St. Just, etc., he thought that his country no longer afforded shelter or security to her well-disposed citizens, and he had his mind made up to come over to England or go somewhere else, when the advance of the Austrians upon the country aroused his patriotic ardour, and determined him to remain where his services might be useful in repelling the invader. Young de Fernig held a lieutenant's commission in the army, and the father himself had served in his youth; so the military instincts of the family had no small share in leading to the conclusion just stated; and it had been decided that the male members of the household should risk the hazards of the impending war, whilst the females were to remain in the seclusion of home, away from the dangers and hardships of campaigns.

But these arrangements were not of long duration. The Fernigs, father and son, together with Achille Duprez, departed to join the army under the command-in-chief of Dumouriez; and the campaign had not been many weeks old when two novel recruits were added to the force. These wore the uniform of staff-officers; but under the casques of the cavaliers appeared two female faces of remarkable loveliness. "Their modesty, their blushes, and their grace," says the historian of their exploits, "under the uniform of officers of the staff, formed a contrast to the masculine figures of the warriors who surrounded them." We need scarcely say they were the Mesdemoiselles de Fernig, who had resolved upon sharing the fortunes in the field of their father and brother. They were, in the words of Lamartine,—it will be seen that we are not treating of imaginary personages—"two young girls, whose tenderness for their father and passion for their country had torn them from the shelter of their sex and age, and thrown them into the camp. Their filial love had left them no other asylum."

After the departure of their relatives for the army they found their home a solitude; added to which was the feeling of filial tenderness which burned within them, and would have rendered an elysium miserable, their father being absent from it, so they decided upon the extraordinary step which we have seen them take. Their application to the Convention was promptly responded to, and government not only recommended them to the commander-in-chief, but cited their names as an example to France, and sent them horses and arms of honour in the name of the country.

Dumouriez was well disposed to pay cordial attention to the recommendation of the authorities, and the objects of government patronage well merited the confidence of the executive, and the friendship of the general. Amongst the heroism displayed on the field of Jemappes that of those simple country girls was the most conspicuous and laudable. There they fought, triumphed, and, with true feminine tenderness, saved the lives of their wounded enemies after having conquered them. "Tasso," says their poetic eulogist, "never invented in Clorinda more heroism, more of the marvellous, and more love, than the Republic was compelled to admire in the exploits and in the destiny of these two heroines of liberty."

These young girls were, with their father and brother, always personally attached to the commander-in-chief, and they continued to wear the dress, the arms, and to perform the functions of staff orderly officers. Their courage, intrepidity, and devotion to the service, endeared them to the general, who pointed them out as models for the imitation of his soldiers. They had fought valiantly at Valmy, and looked forward to the campaign of Jemappes with the ardour of the heroines of antiquity. On the day of Jemappes, where the Austrians had a foretaste of those numerous dire reverses that had their term at Leipsic, the services of the heroic sisters were conspicuous upon a field of patriotic and victorious heroes. Felicité, the elder, followed the young Duc de Chartres, (afterwards Louis Philippe, destined to experience so many startling vicissitudes between that triumphant day and the day of his death, in his third or fourth exile, at Clermont,) on horseback, and did not quit him during the battle. The second, the beautiful Theophile, prepared herself to carry to old General Ferrand the orders of the general-in-chief, and to march with him to the assault of the redoubts on the left wing, which he commanded. "Dumouriez," says Lamartine, "showed these two charming heroines to his soldiers as models of patriotism and auguries of victory. Their beauty and youth reminded the army of those marvellous aspirations, those genii protectors of the people, at the head of armies on the day of battle. Liberty, like religion, was worthy of having her miracles also!"

It is not necessary to give in this place a description of the great battle of Jemappes, or to enlarge upon the political results that followed the victory. It is sufficient to say that the Austrians were routed out of Belgium, which became a French province; that the victory inflamed Dumouriez with the desire of restoring the fallen monarchy at Paris; that Danton intrigued for the elevation to the throne of the Duke of Orleans, who, by his counsel, hung on the heels of the victorious army, to whose triumphs and glory his two sons, de Chartres and de Montpensier, then little more than a child, considerably contributed; that the Ultra or Red Republicans finally triumphed over moderation and mercy; and that such of the nobles of the land, or those suspected of sympathising with them in any way, or on any account, as escaped the guillotine, had to fly the country, and seek in a foreign land the preservation of a precarious existence.

Local gossip had for once been in error in disposing of the affections of the Fernig heroines. The fact is, that during the campaigns of Argonne and Jemappes, Felicité de Fernig preserved her heart intact for her country, and, as she often hoped, for her king, her charming queen, and their two lovely children; for the sighs of the Temple captives were re-echoed in many a gallant breast besides those of the Fernigs in the French army. Not so, however, Theophile. Young Duprez, as well as the Fernig family, held rank on the general's staff, and the love which he had borne Theophile from her early girlhood, unknown to the gossip, her family, and all save herself, who had an instinctive inkling of it from the beginning, manifested itself in the special care which the young squire took of the lovely girl during the war, and the special solicitude which he evinced for her safety upon all occasions of danger. Of course he was not long in learning that his love was not misplaced; and he had the additional gratification of finding that the family of Theophile, Felicité included, approved of the suit of their gallant young neighbour, who, when the French entered Brussels, was looked upon by all their mutual acquaintances as the accepted husband of the Count de Fernig's younger daughter.

The Austrians, though defeated at Jemappes, and compelled to evacuate Mons and Brussels in succession, were not dispersed and broken, thanks to the courage and gallantry of the Hungarian grenadiers; and their retreat before the advancing French was not only slow and orderly, but Dumouriez found it necessary to detach some of his generals occasionally to expedite the retreat of the enemy.

In one of these encounters between the advanced guard of the French and the rear-guard of the Austrians, one of our heroines, Felicité Fernig, who bore the orders of Dumouriez to the head of his columns, found herself, accompanied only with a handful of French hussars, surrounded by a detachment of the enemy's hulans. Avoiding with difficulty the sabres around her, she turned her bridle with a group of hussars to rejoin the column, when she perceived a young officer of the Belgian volunteers, who had been thrown from his horse by a shot, defending himself with his sabre against the hulans, who sought to slay him. Although this young officer was unknown to her, Felicité rushed to his succour, killed with two pistol shots two of the hulans, put the others to flight, dismounted from her horse, relieved the wounded man, confided him to her hussars, accompanied him herself to the military hospital, and returned to rejoin her general, after she had seen him properly cared for. This young officer's name was Vanderwalen. Left in the hospitals of Brussels after the departure of the French army, he forgot his wounds, but could never forget the heroine he had met with on the field of carnage. The countenance of that female, in the dress of a comrade in arms, precipitating herself into the mêlée to rescue him from death, and leaning afterwards over his blood-stained bed in the military hospital, tenaciously kept place in his remembrance.

As we have already said, and it is well known to those who have studied the great drama, or rather tragedy, of the French Revolution, the most distinguished and valuable services to the nation did not protect those who rendered them with their blood, from the fury of the Terrorists, whose excesses covered with infamy the French Revolutionary Government. But we have little to do in this place with the misdoings of Robespierre and his minions, except so far as they affect the fortunes of the heroic personages of this little story.

"When," says the historian, "Dumouriez had fled to the enemy's lands, [he deserted in disgust and chagrin to the Austrians,] and the army had lost all traces of the two young Amazons, whom it had drawn into its misfortunes and exile, Vanderwalen quitted the military service, and travelled through Germany in search of her to whom he owed his life. Long did he traverse in vain the principal towns of the north, without being able to obtain the slightest indication of the family of Fernig. He discovered them at last, refugees in the heart of Denmark. His gratitude ripened into love for the young girl, who had resumed the dress, the graces, and the modesty of her sex. He espoused and brought her home to his own country. Theophile, her sister and companion in glory, followed Felicité to Brussels. . . . She cultivated the arts—was a musician and poetess, like Vittoria Colonna. She left poems stamped with masculine heroism, feminine sensibility, and worthy of accompanying her name to immortality.

"These two sisters, inseparable in life and in death, as upon the field of battle, repose under the same cypress, in a foreign land. Where are their names upon the marble monuments of our triumphal arches? Where are their pictures at Versailles? Where are their statues upon our frontiers, bedewed with their blood?"

Where, he might ask, with no better result, are their deeds chronicled in the page of history, except his own? Thiers, the historian of the Revolution, might have afforded them a niche in his elaborate annals of the revolutionary era, but their names do not once occur in his ponderous work.

But our heroines did not go down to the grave before having witnessed the recovery of their native land from the horrors of the Reign of Terror. Theophile, after having been married to young Dapras, continued to reside with her sister, in Belgium, during the wars of the Directory, the Consulate, and the Empire, in which the husbands of both were prominent actors, winning honours and rewards, till the crowning carnage of Waterloo overwhelmed them; and they fell fighting the battle of that great soldier, whose star they had believed, especially after Quatre Bras and Ligny, to be once more in the ascendant. In this battle also fell young De Fernig; but the count survived the slaughter of the disastrous day, which, however, proved the term of his military career. He retired to live with his daughters, and to exchange sorrows and condolences with them upon their mutual irreparable losses. — Theophile found, in the cultivation and indulgence of her elevating tastes some refuge from sorrow; and Felicité derived comfort for the present, and hope for the future, from her care of an only son, who is now a high official in the Belgian Government, and in the full enjoyment of the confidence of the prudent and politic King Leopold.

THE PARTING.

(From the German of Goethe.)

LET mine eyes the farewell make thee,
Which my lips refuse to speak;
Scorn me not, if, to forsake thee,
Makes my very manhood weak.

Joyless in our joy's eclipse, love,
Are love's tokens, else divine,
Cold the kisses of thy lips, love,
Damp the hand that's locked in mine.

Once thy lip, to touch it only,
To my soul has sent a thrill,
Sweeter than the violet lonely,
Pluck'd in March-time by the rill.

Garlands never more I'll fashion,
Roses twine no more for thee;
Spring is here, but, ah, my passion,
Autumn dark has come for me!

THE FISHERMAN'S DAUGHTER.

A TALE OF RINDOWN CASTLE.

NE of the largest, and at the same time most interesting ruins with which the tourist will become acquainted as he voyages up the Shannon, is the ancient castle of Rindown, which stands upon a beautiful peninsula on the Roscommon side of Lough Ree, and about seven Irish miles to the north of Athlone. The limits of this paper will not allow us to enter minutely into the details of its history. We shall, therefore, merely remark, in passing, that Rindown, with the peninsula on which it stands, was an important stronghold of the native Irish princes since a very remote period. In the ninth century, when Turgesius, the Danish king, anchored his fleet upon Lough Ree, he very probably occupied Rindown as one of his principal military stations. After the tragic death of that renowned Viking, it once more fell into the hands of the Irish, from whom it was wrested, towards the close of the twelfth century, by John de Courcy and a band of Anglo-Norman knights and men-at-arms, who took refuge there after their defeat in a pitched battle by Cathal Carragh O'Connor, son of Roderick, king of Connaught.

From this period it became a regular object of contention between the forces of the Pale and the Irish troops, sometimes remaining for years in possession of the former, and again at various intervals falling into the hands of the latter according as fortune favoured their banners.

Between the Irish forces also Rindown became a frequent point of dispute during the destructive wars that raged in Connaught during the life, and for many years subsequent to the death, of the celebrated Cathal of the Red Hand. Under the year 1286, in the Annals of the Four Masters, is preserved the following record which, giving as it does, a minute and vivid picture of the military customs and mode of fighting practised at that period, we take the liberty of transcribing for the reader:—

"A.D. 1286. Felim the son of Cathal, the Red-Handed, returned to Connaught after his banishment, being invited thither by some of the Connacians, namely, by O'Kelly, O'Flynn, the son of Hugh, who was son of Cathal, the Red-Handed O'Connor, and the son of Art O'Melaghlin, all forming four equally strong battalions. They marched to Rinn-duin, where Brian, the son of Turlogh (O'Connor), Owen O'Heyne, Conor Boy, the son of Turlogh, and MacCostelloe had all the cows of the country; and Felim's people got over the enclosures of the island; and the leaders and sub-leaders of the army drove off each a proportionate number of the cows, as they found them on the way before them; and they then dispersed, carrying off their booty in different directions, and leaving only, of the four battalions, four horsemen with Felim. As Brian, the son of Turlogh, Owen O'Heyne, and their troops, perceived that Felim's army was scattered, they set out quickly and vigorously with a small party of horse and many foot soldiers to attack Felim and his few horsemen. Conor Boy, the son of Turlogh, came up with the son of Hugh, who was the son of Cathal the Red-Handed, and with his party; and mistaking them for his own people, he fell by Roderick, the son of Hugh, who was the son of Cathal the Red-Handed. Felim strained his voice calling loudly after his army and ordering them to return to oppose their enemies. Many of the host were killed by Felim upon the island; and outside the island were slain many bad subjects and perpetrators of evil, as they all were, excepting only Teige, son of Cormac, who was son of Tomaltagh M'Dermott."

The reader will remark, that in the above record the peninsula of Rindown is called an island. At that time it was in fact an island; a huge fosse having been cut across the narrowest part, and filled by the waters of the lake. This fosse was further protected by a huge embattled wall which ran across from one shore to the other, and the ruins of which can still be traced, together with the remains of the formidable barbacan or military gateway in the centre. Near the draw-bridge are two ancient ecclesiastical ruins, one of which was a priory of the Knights Hospitallers, and was founded in the reign of King John. The castle, as will be seen by the above sketch, is now totally dismantled. Passing over the various warlike events which must have occurred in and around it in remote times, we will come up to more modern days, and relate a short story of Rindown, which, we hope, will prove more interesting to our readers.

In that memorable year which the Scots call the "Forty-five," there stood beside the little cove near the castle a small hut, which was occupied by Owen Tierney and his wife and daughter. Owen was a fisherman who day after day plied his avocation on the lake with such skill and industry, that he was enabled to support himself and family in somewhat of a decent and respectable manner. Owen, however, was not merely dependent upon the rather capricious inhabitants of Lough Ree's waters for a maintenance. A small but fertile bit of land attached to his cabin was cultivated by him with great care and industry, in addition to which he had made during the preceding years several mysterious voyages to Limerick, after each return from which it was noticed that a far greater amount of tobacco than usual was consumed by his neighbours and by the inhabitants of the surrounding villages. Be this as it may, in the spring of the year above mentioned, Owen Tierney was as happy and contented a man to all appearance as could be seen for many a mile around the lovely and romantic shores of Lough Ree.

Ellen Tierney, Owen's daughter, was a girl, as the phrase goes, well enough as to appearance—that is, in other words, she was not considered by her acquaintances as absolutely handsome, but at the same time, there was a symmetry about her form, a kind tone in her voice, and a merry, guileless expression in her sun-embrowned face, that made her far more attractive than a girl of much greater beauty. At all events, she was the very apple of her father's eye, and the core of her mother's heart, and you may be sure she did not fail to reciprocate their affection with interest. At the time of which we speak she had just turned her eighteenth year, and we must say to her credit, that on account of her agreeable manners and pleasant temper, there was not a girl in all Roscommon that had a greater number of admirers. But she always contrived to repel the advances of these rustic beaux by either a pleasant, good-natured denial, or a flat refusal, as the case might be—all save those of one, and that fortunate individual was no other than Brian Phelimy, or Brian Gow, as he was more commonly called from his trade, which was that of a blacksmith. Brian was a young man of scarcely twenty-five years, tall, well-formed, and handsome, and a better hurler than he, a more expert hand at single-stick or at any other athletic exercise, did not live from source to mouth of the lordly Shannon. His heart also was of the true sterling stamp, kind and manly, and with all these attributes to recommend him, together with a flourishing trade at horse-shoeing and various other kinds of work, it was no wonder that the love he bore to young Ellen Tierney was returned by that simple-minded girl with an unusual amount of warmth, confidence, and affection. Brian's house and forge was about a stone's throw outside the village of Rindown or St. John's, beyond the Castle, and scarcely an evening passed over his head that he did not pay a visit to Owen Tierney's house beside the cove, there to talk on affairs of state with mother or father, or have a merry chat with his young sweetheart, who, if certain affairs which we are about to relate happened at the appointed time, was soon to become his wife.

It seems that, along with Owen Tierney's taking upon himself to supply the tobacco consumers of the district with a sufficiency of their favourite weed, Brian Phelimy, inheriting the philanthropical virtues of his father and grandfather, had carried out successfully, for a few years, his jovial resolution of adding to the enjoyments of the neighbours; and for that purpose, occasionally put in operation a certain chemical apparatus, called a still, which lay concealed in a lonely chamber at the back of the forge, but the flue from which was ingeniously constructed so as to communicate with the capacious chimney of the latter. In other words, Brian Gow, following the example of his ancestors of jolly memory, manufactured potheen, and better-tasted mountain-dew, as the poetic peasantry called it, could not be found within the four corners of Ireland. At the time to which we allude the still was in full operation, and it was to the sale of a certain run or plentiful distillation of whiskey which was to take place at a stated time, and also to the success of Owen Tierney, who was about setting off on another of his voyages southward in quest of an illicit cargo of tobacco, that he looked forward for an opportunity of being able to marry properly the daughter of the hardy fisherman, and to maintain her in suitable style till another and similar smuggling adventure could be successfully entered upon.

With this purpose in view, Brian Gow eagerly watched the progress of his distilling operation, had a splendid run, and at length was in course of preparation for carrying about half-a-dozen firkins of the most glorious potheen to Athlone, where he could easily dispose of them, leaving the gauger altogether of course out of the transaction. Firkins or butter casks were the vehicles the sagacious Brian had chosen in which to convey his cargo to Athlone, because he knew by experience that they had the best chance of being borne through the town without suspicion.

At last the day came on which he was to set out for Athlone, and on which also his intended father-in-law had settled upon for beginning his voyage to Limerick. About the same hour that Brian Phelimy had set out with a stout horse and cart, carrying his joy-inspiring load towards Athlone, the fisherman had spread his sail to the favouring wind, and was moving over the lake on his voyage southward.

"Well," said he to himself, as he steered his boat onward, and left the ruins of the huge castle towering upon its rock behind, as if guarding his little cot beneath, "if this turns out well wid me, they may all load their dudheens wid the gauger's tobacco ever after, for 'tis the last trip Owen Tierney will make for the neighbours' benefit an' his own. I'll then marry my daughter to Brian Phelimy, an' keep to the rod an' fishing net for evermore!"

It was a market day in Athlone, and the streets were crowded, as Brian Phelimy stopped his cart and prepared to lodge it in a certain yard belonging to a public-house keeper of his acquaintance, to whom he usually sold his cargoes. A butter-buyer soon came in and offered to make a bargain, but was told by Brian that the load was already disposed of. Another immediately followed with his tasting instrument in hand, and was just about proceeding to regale his olfactory nerve by an experiment on one of the firkins, when he also was got rid of in the same manner. It was now evening, when a third butter-buyer came into the yard. This was a sharp, vicious-looking little man, whose name for probity in his dealings was not the best in the country, but who still, from his energy of character, contrived to make many a good bargain on market days.

"There's no mark on those firkins," said he, pointing to the load. "Will you sell?" continued he to Brian, moving nearer to the suspicious-looking casks. "Prices are down now, an' you can't expect as much as was goin' durin' the mornin'."

"I'm determined to take it home," answered Brian evasively. "I don't like the price, an' can afford to wait for better times."

"Let us look at the quality of it at anyrate," said the buyer, moving nearer.

"What's the use," answered Brian "as I'm not goin' to sell? You can't see the butter."

"I can smell it, howsomlever," returned the little tormentor, giving a sniff of his nose and a malignant wink, and with that he left the yard.

Another hour passed away, and the firkins of potheen would soon, under cover of the coming dusk, be stowed away in the cellars of the public-house. Brian, who was not without his suspicions of the little butter-buyer's fidelity, was at last in the act of bearing one of the firkins into the cimmerian cellars of his customer, when a hand was laid upon his broad shoulder, and turning round he beheld, like a terrible apparition, the gauger and half-a-dozen soldiers standing right before him. The very same gauger was, on account of his stern character, his cruelty in various ways to those who came under the power of the law, and his implacable pursuits and persecutions of all and every one engaged in any kind of illicit trade, the detestation of the whole county, besides up to this point of his career having been the cause of the hanging of something near a half-dozen countrymen. At the sight of him, the precious cask of potheen dropped from between Brian's sturdy arms, and smashed upon the pavement of the yard, its contents flowing away inconspicuously through the gutter. The soldiers then surrounded him, took him prisoner at the bidding of the gauger, and marched him along the now half-deserted streets towards the jail, the gauger himself taking possession of the cask of potheen in the name of the king. The soldiers, who thought they had a being something after the nature of a lamb to deal with, were greatly surprised when, on approaching the door of the jail, Brian struck one of them a tremendous blow of his clenched fist upon the forehead, that tumbled him senseless against the wall, snatched a musket from another, and striking right and left with its butt, rushed round a corner, and away down a narrow street. It was a sudden surprise, but the soldiers as suddenly recovered, and rattled away in hot pursuit after him. The street along which he was now darting at his topmost speed led down to the river, without a single turn by which he could escape to either side. He knew there was no chance for him but the river, which was broad and deep before him, but his pursuers were now almost at his heels, shouting to one another exultantly, as they imagined he would have to turn back, and thus fall into their hands. But they had a man of no ordinary physical powers to deal with—one who, in conjunction with his activity and strength, was also rendered desperate. As he approached the edge of the dark water, he cast another hasty glance behind, and to the amazement of his pursuers, instantly plunged in and struck out for the middle of the river. The military did not dare to fire without orders, else probably poor Brian Phelimy would then and there have ended his career. On he plunged, and being a practised swimmer, succeeded at last, in spite of his heavy clothes and shoes, in gaining the middle of the broad stream. The current here was very strong, and he was gradually yielding to its influence, and beginning to float rather helplessly downward, when he was hailed by a well-known voice from a dark object towards his right, and steadying himself for a moment, and looking over the obscure water, to his great joy he at last saw, a few perches away, Owen Tierney quietly resting on his oar, and keeping his craft steady for his reception. In another moment Brian Phelimy was in the boat; and after a few words of explanation and surprise, the pair were floating down the stream, and far beyond the reach of Randal Clinch the gauger.

"Begor!" said Brian, as he divested himself of his coat and began squeezing it, "we're done for, Owen. Put the boat into shore and let me peg away to Rindown. If I don't, ould Clinch will be there afore me, and flither still an' all to pieces!"

"Never mind the still," said Owen, coolly. "If you go now, you'll sartinly be taken again by ould Randal an' the sojers. The still will be saized whether you go or not, an' 'tis better for you to keep out o' harm's way for a time. Come to Limerick with me, an' we'll bring back as much tobaccy as will pay for all."

"'Twouldn't be a bad plan," answered Brian, reflectively. "Here, I'll go! Settle that sail, an' give me the oars 'till I warm myself, an' if you have a drop o' the mountain-dew in the bottle, I'll take a taste of it also."

In about a week afterwards they were on their return from Limerick with a cargo of tobacco, far larger than usual, stowed away in the boat. Meanwhile Ellen Tierney sat at her cottage door, beneath the castle, talking to her mother, and wondering at the absence of Brian Phelimy. It was the day after Brian's adventure in Athlone, and as she turned towards her mother, for the sixth time, to wonder why Brian did not pay his usual early morning visit, a tall, stern-looking man, of middle age, walked down from the castle and accosted her.

"Is this Owen Tierney's house?" inquired the stranger, taking a sharp survey of the premises.

"It is, sir," answered Ellen, standing up with natural politeness, and moving her chair forward. "Won't you take a seat, sir? The mornin' is hot, an' perhaps you would like a drink of something after your walk."

"No, thank you," returned the other. "I merely want to ask you a question. Do you know one Brian Phelimy, who lives somewhere hereabouts?"

"Indeed I ought, sir," answered Ellen, blushing. "He lives beyond there, near the village."

"Do you know where I might see him?" said the stranger again.

"I have something to say to him that will be for his own advantage to hear."

"We were just talking about him," returned Ellen, "an' wondering why he did not come to see us this morning, for he comes often. I suppose you'll find him at his own house."

The stranger, seeing that Ellen could give him no information regarding the whereabouts of Brian, bade her a polite good morning, and took his departure. It was only in the evening, when she heard of the wrecking of Brian's house, and the capture of his still, that Ellen came to the knowledge that she had been conversing that morning with the dreaded gauger, Randal Clinch himself. Days passed away without the appearance of her lover, and many a sad hour poor Ellen Tierney spent upon the battlements of the old castle, looking out for she knew not what, over the bright, gleaming expanse of Lough Ree. It was the evening of the tenth day. The skies were of a lurid copper-red hue, and the winds were howling savagely over the wide waste of waters, for there was a storm on Lough Ree, when Ellen, from where she sat in a sheltered nook on one of the ancient towers of the castle, beheld a sail far to the southward, struggling with the blast. A glance told her that it was her father's boat, and she waited eagerly, as the night gathered down, for his arrival, hoping that he might bring some news of her lover. As for the storm, Owen Tierney was the boldest boatman on the lake, and his daughter had but little fear for his safety.

The night came, and Ellen, who had now left her perch upon the tower, was standing on a rock over the lake, at one side of which was a little cove where her father usually landed his illicit cargo. At length a boat drove swiftly into the cove, two men stepped from it to the strand and began ascending the rock, and the next moment—to her great joy,—her father and her lover stood beside her. Scarcely was their first greeting over, when they heard a rush in the little cove beneath, and the quick tramp of men approaching them. In an instant Brian Phelimy and Owen were seized in the king's name, and the first man who spoke was the hated gauger, Randal Clinch, who, with the help of a soldier, held Brian a firm prisoner. Brian, however, was not a man to yield easily. A blow from his ponderous fist prostrated the gauger, and a terrible struggle then ensued between Brian and the soldier, from which the latter soon rose, leaving his antagonist senseless upon the ground. Brian was now standing upon the edge of the rock, when the gauger arose and presented at him one of the long holster-pistols which he never failed to carry with him on such errands. Ellen saw the pistol presented, and the noble girl rushing forward to shield her lover, just as she had succeeded in standing between him and the gauger, received the bullet through her faithful heart, and instantly fell dead upon the extreme edge of the cliff. With a terrible bound Brian Phelimy sprang upon the gauger and tore him to the earth, and then both went rolling over and over in mortal struggle towards the verge of the rock. Poor Owen Tierney struggled hard to reach the body of his daughter, but three of the soldiers held him fast while the rest ran to aid the gauger; but ere they had time to reach the combatants, the latter still locked in their deadly embrace, rolled over the brink of the precipice, carrying with them in their wild struggle the body of poor Ellen Tierney, into the black gulf of whirling and roaring waters beneath, where they were lost for ever.

From the prosecution that followed, Owen Tierney escaped with a short imprisonment, and then returned to his cot beside the old Castle of Rindown, where he never ceased lamenting his faithful daughter and her lover till his death.

LOVE ME LESS, OR LOVE ME MORE.

Why thus leave me madly doubting,
Maiden, if thou hast a heart?
Wherefore all this useless pouting,
Bid it play a worthier part!
Fear not that thy frown will grieve me
Time can peace of mind restore;
Smile upon me still, or leave me—
Love me less, or love me more.

Is thy heart with grief o'erladen?
Tell thy grief and ease thy pain;
Sighing will not soothe thee, maiden,
If thy sighs are all in vain.
Leave me, if you've learnt to doubt me,
Then be happy as before;
I have lived, can live, without thee;—
Love me less, or love me more!

THE MALISON BRIDGE.

AN ODD GHOST ADVENTURE.

HERE he sat, that ancient dog, shaggiest of terriers, by name Gariffe, or the Rough, upon the parlour window-ledge. The seat was an uncomfortable one, indeed, for he had to place himself in a diagonal position in order to obtain due vacuum for his tail in the corner. The prolonged vertebrae of other dogs may, if you like, be termed a caudal extremity, or caudal appendage, but his was emphatically a tail. Shaggy as he was from nose to heel, there was no shagginess here. No superfluous hair broke the symmetry of its outline, nor could the eye of idleness ever be attracted by its flowing tresses—no! it totally ignored all such things as capillary attraction. It was a round, unvarnished, and straight-backward tail.

Was it nature—was it scissors duly and sternly applied? we have not had the opportunity of knowing, neither have we had the leisure of caring much. It takes also a certain amount of energy to be inquisitive—and though we oft-times mused upon the phenomenon, the musing merely brought us up against that dead wall, whither the exploring minds of all philosophers must go, sooner or later, and against which they unwillingly must strike.

This seems like digression, though it certainly is not: therefore we won't beg our readers' pardon, after the wonted manner of literary culprits who catch themselves rambling, but we shall obligingly return to our Gariffe.

Gariffe the Rough seemed to cherish a tender regard for his tail. We do not say it influenced his reason, yet we think he followed its bent more than once. So tender was Gariffe of his tail, or perhaps, so tender was the tail of Gariffe, that he had always to seek for its accommodation before his own. So it now cosily ascends the angle between window-frame and wall, its extreme point, whereon appears a small brush of hairs, like unto that luxury of a shaving-brush which turkey-cocks adorn their bosoms with, its extreme point slightly ascending and descending by a sort of perpendicular wag, with the motions of his body and sentiments of his mind; and when it ascends, the extreme hairs touch a cobweb, and cruelly tantalize a confiding spider, who makes eager rushes, just a moment too late.

Yet, Gariffe is more than compensated for the discomfort of his situation by the advantage which it gives him over a drop of water which at intervals attempts to drop down upon his contemptuous nose. Here he can keep his eye upon it far more conveniently than if he were on the ground, and that ground damp, too. And he does keep his eye, through a mass of hair, steadfastly upon its probable coming. As it descends he warily, and as it were angrily, snaps at it. Not that anger disturbs his calm mind at all; but it is more piquant, and gives affairs a certain interest to seem so. Sometimes, indeed, as he lifts up his muzzle to watch, thus putting himself in a rather defenceless condition, the drop which had left the eave before his look arrived there, tumbles headlong into his nostril: which makes him sneeze to an extent perilous to the safety of the excruciated and astounded spider and its tent.

The window looked out on a small park. Bounding its edge, a private road conducted to the mill a little farther down the stream, whose murmur we could faintly hear running behind the house. The mill was neither corn, flax, nor paper, but an iron compeller; so that instead of the humming, contented, monotonous noise of those, we had a constant pulsing, loud, mellow, comfortable, and regular series of blows from the great hammer, and variable musical blows, forming themselves into all manners of fantastic tunes, from the little hammers, which were many.

Along that road, then, returning from his dinner, in yonder little white cottage beside Una's bridge, comes a "helper" to his work in the mill,—a "helper" being one who aids, assists, and abets the "finisher" to complete spade or shovel to the ideal. His it is to blow bellows, heat iron, heap coals, wield sledge, put in rivets, furnish, file, and oil the new-created implements.

The rattle of his leathern apron, which covered him, narrow under the chin and broad about the waist, caused a slight quiver in one of Gariffe's ears. But, as the sound was well-known, and specially as he was intent upon a drop about to come, he made no effort to second his instinct and elevate his ears.

Now, beside me was a lad of sedate comportment and uncontrollable waggery. His name was Jac, a transmutation not of John, but of James, through its Latin form Jacobus. Thus his schoolfellows called him, utilizing their slender knowledge of Latin. But the community named him Jim, or Master James, according to circumstances.

Seeing the incipient elevation of Gariffe's ear, and hearing the rattling rustle of the apron, Jac looked out, and exclaimed:

"Boru!"

At the word, abruptly out of place, one of Gariffe's ears went up in a most exalted and peaked style, slightly thrown forward, the other taken aback by the suddenness of the call had turned upon itself, and was folded inside out, but as energetically peaked as the ineffectual struggle could make it.

The "helper" cast a suspicious glance over in our direction, and quickened his pace. Now, Gariffe's eyes had been wandering, but the quick step increasing, the thunder of the apron attracted his eyes at once. On the instant, forgetful of all caudal caution, he jumped suddenly down, smiting his tail against the ledge. A shaft of agony clearly pierced his brain, for he turned round and hastily bit it. Then he set off, his tail at right angles with his body, and as he galloped the helper ran. But not at the helper ran he. The man had to pass beside a heap of turnips, and to them the dog bounded—the helper seemed anxious to avoid them. Gariffe, however, rapidly choosing one too large for his mouth, as rapidly left it for a small one which he tugged by the top after his fleeing butt. The helper escaped at the door of his workshop, but it pleased Gariffe to set up a yell at once so disappointed and victorious, that a swarthy head, youthful or aged, appeared at every casement of the long row of workshops, and beholding Gariffe and his turnip, a burst of jolly, stentorian laughter made the air quake, and a unanimous cry of "Boru" broke forth.

Gariffe, reanimated, took to tossing and turning the turnip back to its place again.

But I, a stranger, what could I understand of all this incomprehensible mystery, this flight, these laughs, and especially the abrupt and singular mention of a renowned warrior's name? Evidently nothing. And musing being of no use, besides impossible in the state of inquisitive energy which had seized upon my mind, I energetically sought for the key from my young friend, in whose eyes tears were standing.

"Do you weep for that helper's wounded feelings?" said I, severely; for being out of the play, I had no philosophic resource but to act the stoic and virtuous censor. "Is it for this the tears come to your eyes, young friend?" said I, encouraged by a blush overspreading his face, and pursuing my homily on humanity "that a dog with such a wretched tail, with such a frivolous mind, which is clearly shown by a drop of water weighing so much upon his brain—"

"Water on his brain! Oh, now you're unjust to poor Gariffe," said Jac, in a broken voice.

"Do you really dare? did you intend that as a pun? I scorn punsters. Dr. Johnson has said elegantly: 'He who would make a pun would pick a pocket.'"

"You, yourself?"

"No, young friend, no; I myself intended no such thing. If such a notion were in my head—"

"An ocean in your head! good gracious! now—now," answered Jac again with a voice scarce audible.

I treated him with silent contempt, which is always the safest thing to do when you are posed for an answer, and pursued my homily, showing his inhumanity, especially as the man must have been really courageous among men, as he had acquired a hero's name—here I was interrupted by a cough and loud burst of laughter.

Irritated, I sought at first in my mind for some epigrammatic line which might represent bitterly how fools laugh, when they should grieve, but not finding it, I found an irresistible sympathy, an uncontrollable desire to join him. As it was uncontrollable I didn't control it.

Mollified by this, my friend Jac condescended to inform me of the state of the case.

"'Twas about this time, last year," said he, "that I and a comrade were essaying to allure some bashful trout out of the stream behind. Gariffe was there, of course. Wherever I was, Gariffe tried to be. But, finding our trade rather dull, he seceded down to the mill-wheel, and occupied his spare time by expostulating with it for its monotonous activity. Wow! bow, wow!"

'His bark was on the shore,' as constant as the evolutions of the wheel, varied only by the different points of view, or stand-points, as the German says, (in his case, sit-points,) from which he expostulated, and an occasional interruption by enthusiastic but vain efforts to stop the flow of water, by snapping thereat, under the delusion that he might thereby catch it, and hold it firmly between his teeth. He was a younger Gariffe then; now he only barks."

"Oh, yes! he's greatly reformed, very sage; witness his conduct to-day, with that drop, and the turnip."

"Poor Gariffe! well, it's no use denying he always liked the drop, and had a spite against water; but of the turnip more anon—as G. P. R. James would say, if he were yet in the land of novels, which he isn't. Therefore, hasty impressions and first views are not al—"

"Conceded, conceded; I give in; go on."

"'I cave in, go ahead,' is a more elegant and republican expression, therefore you might as well have used it. However, as we were pursuing our piscatorial pleasure, we heard, or rather felt, the weight of a noise go off the air. The mill-wheel went slower and slower, and Gariffe's barks became louder and more triumphant. He doubtless felt, as he expressed, satisfaction at having put down the noisy monster. So we fished a moment in quiet. A moment, and I felt a patronizing touch upon my back, and saw my cap careering up along the bank, in a most rollicking style. Gariffe, with superabundant energy, was making endless efforts to catch it, doubtless, to bring it back. But the moment he caught it in his mouth, that moment up it went a couple of feet into the air, so that I and my comrade, Johnnie, had to abandon all thoughts but that of recovering it, which we did by an artful ambushade."

"This seems far enough from an explanation, young friend."

"Just be patient, or I'll make a pun. Having obtained the cap, we adjourned into the forge, where Gariffe took possession of a spluttering water-rat, that had been tempted out of its hole by the cessation of noise. As usual, we found platers, welders, finishers, helpers, in various degrees of preparation for going home. Huge fires raked out threw up a red glare upon the black rafters, great bellows, hammer, and immense beams.

The helper you saw had but lately come. His adventures were wonderful, his courage in them all such as to win from the younger "hands" a deal of respect. So they called him "Boru." Not that they altogether believed him. Yet his voice had a large, impressive roll. It sounded, indeed, unsound, hollow, and, though it drowned opposition, reminded one of a bubble. His eyes, of a nondescript greenish blue, were equally bubble-like, and prominent; his nose, however, probably from the prevailing warlike tone of his mind, was a club.

He was relating some of his experience as we entered, so that we just caught the last words:

"'Be ye man or devil, I'll larn ye to come nigh me, and with that I up with a rock that was lying in my road, and gev' it one tremendous hurl that sent the sparks flying out of the road for twenty yards, so that ye might read print by the light. I'll warrant ye, I wasn't troubled then, nor niver after, by ghosts or sperrits.'"

"Ye're a valiant man, Boru!"

"Och, that's nothin'! (patronizingly,) many's the time I saw quare things, and did quare things, but that's neither here nor there now; so can't any o' ye let's hiv a song to put aff the feeling that the young uns may hiv. Come, Cormac, now I did my part, can't ye say a word or sing a song?"

"Now, Cormac, 'Moorloch Mary,' if ye've a heart alive in yer breast, at all."

"Wagh."

This cynical interjection emanated from Gariffe. He intended no relevancy. He had been standing right opposite the glowing fire, his eyes glistening, his tail stiffly receding into distance behind, "small by degrees, and beautifully less"—his tremendous shadow a monstrous chaos. Now gazing at the fire has a tendency to enthrall any mind, but Gariffe's it seemed to mesmerize. After a space of fixed silence, his nerves strung to their utmost pitch, he uttered that irritated "wagh," and made a short rush at the fire, but, suddenly changing his mind, he retired all abashed from public view into the hollow of a disused great hammer head, that lay upon the floor. Nought broke the iron outline but the tip of his nose in front, and the rigid rod of his tail behind.

Well, Cormac, after as much pressing as is due to singing human nature, which tribute has been enacted not more in Horace's Rome than in our own wild mountains, after the usual preliminary cough and throat-clearing, struck up as follows. The ballad was his own production, and it's odd enough what great numbers of rustic bards we have, possessing feeling and fancy, though expressing themselves queerly in a language still foreign to them:—

"As I roved out of a summer's evening,
Along with fair maids for to be seen;
As I roved out of a summer's evening,
From Aakeen grove unto Smola's green.
I had ne'er been wounded nor yet unweary,
The pains of love I did never know;
But a smiling fair one she has enlaved me,
All red as roses and white as snow!"

"Faith, she's a beauty, Cormac!"

"Hould your tongue, man, an' listen."

"The first time I saw my Moorloch Mary,
'Twas in the market of sweet Strabane;
Her smiling countenance bereaved my senses,
All other fair ones she did trepan!
Her killing glances bereaved my senses,
That I can scarce know the night from day;
In silent slumber, I start, I wonder—
O, Moorloch Mary! will you come with me?"

"I'll dress you airy, both night an' mornin',
To milk your ewes by the ends of day;
By the bonny woodcock an' lark so charmin',
O, Moorloch Mary, won't you come away?"

"Orra! did she, Cormac? My heart's a-breaking for her—och, say she didn't, do now."

"Isht, an' listen, 'tis herself speaks."

"Yes! I'll press my cheese an' my wool I'll tease, I'll milk my ewes at the ends of day,
By the whirring moorfool an' lark so charmin',
An' from bonny Moorloch we ne'er will stray."

"I will build your house on yon high mountain,
An' garnish't round with bush an' tree;
Since I have got you, my Moorloch Mary!
Tho' oftentimes you have strayed from me,
I'll press your head on my tender bosom,
Ten thousand times, love, I'll press it o'er,
Since I have got my own Moorloch Mary!
O, oftentimes I did her adore!"

He prolonged the last note so much that poor Gariffe could not resist joining in, and he did join with some effect, producing such a piercing, melancholy howl that, unable to keep it up or let it down, he had to finish off by a cataract of barks.

"Heaven be about us!" said an old helper, "an' guard us for ever; but isn't that like the yowl of the dog of the Malison bridge?"

"Troth, it's all that, Lily," said another. They called him "the Lily," because he was so exceedingly swarthy.

"The dog of the Malison bridge! why, what's that? I'll warrant it's some o' yer trash-an'-nonsense," says Boru.

"Tell it, Lily, tell it, man."

"Well, if you do, I won't cross it this night."

"Nor I," "Nor I," cried out the younger hands.

"Well, by this and by that," says the Lily, "since it's trash-an'-nonsense, ye needn't care e'ther, but here goes:—"

"Ye'z all know the Malison bridge, but it's a not by that name it wint long ago. That's the "cursed bridge," an' wuz given till it whin it wuz only half as broad as it's now—and dear knows but it's narra enough, and hasn't much to spare, for two carts can't cross thegither, nor scarcely one big one. But, if ye misdoubt what I'm telling, any one o' ye can see the truth, if ye go un'er the arch, when ye'll see the division betwixt and between the new and the ould. It has two high range walls (parapets) now, an's all covered thick with ivy that trails down to the water, an' the trees above it make it dark at twelve o'clock, together with its being in a sort of a holla. But if it's lonely now, 'twuz ten, ay, twenty times lonelier then, when it had ne'ther range walls nor ivy, an' wuz only half as broad. There wuz a poor widda (widow) woman livin' in Artigarvan, near it—an' they do say that that word is ould Irish for a height by a rough river, and true for it, but it is the rough river, rowlin' an' splashin' over rocks an' stones—an' I s'pose there wuzn't a house but her own there; an' she had nothin' left to her o' her man an' family but yin (one) boy, an' he was the good boy, and the dutiful son, careful o' her, an' attentive to a' she wanted, when she wuz ould as when she wuz younger. But, lo an' behold ye! she wuz lyin' on her death-bed, an' he wuz like as his heart wud break, but didn't cry for fear it might vex (sadden) her. An' she called him to her bedside, an' told him that she was dying, an' that they could niver again go wanderin' into the wood, gathering fagots an' feeling glad that they wor thegither; an' they could niver again go among the bonny heather, to cut an' bind it, in the pleasant sunshine of God; an' that niver more they'd be thegither, here on earth, for anything, whether by the burn-side or in the field, lookin' after the graves o' their own that wor gone. Then she told him to go for a dear friend that lived over by Liscurry hill, an so he kissed her, and went away. An' when he left her she niver ceased praying that he might be protected an' safe from sin; an' suddintly she felt as if her prayer wuz answered, for she heard a dreadful, desolate yowl, that made her full of strength, an' start up on her bed, an' soon rush down on the bridge; an' when she did, och, you may think what a sorrowful sight wuz there. The night had been as black as jet, but now the moon jist came out from a cloud, an' one beam went down beside the bridge, on its rocky brink, on the pale face of a young boy, and the drippin' form of a dog. An' the poor widda, out of her raison an' senses, knelt down, an' prayed a prayer against that bridge—an' the curse was on it for ever after—so that every sinner that passed it after should, at sartin times, hear the awful growl an' see horrible things.

"God save us all," said his hearers, drawing closer together, and raking up the fire, as some of them looked suspiciously into the dark recesses away behind them. "But what about the widda?"

"Well, when she recovered herself a bit, she went down on the brink, an' found that her boy could breathe and speak; an' jist then the friend, who had been told by the son, come up, an' as he heard the whine o' the dog, an' the agonizin' prayers of the mother, he turned his eyes down that way an' saw it all, an' came down quietly, an' found the son comfortin' his mother, an' so they died."

"There was a good deal more talk about it, but I," said my young friend, Jac, "whistled on Gariffe and came off; the last words I heard were "trash-an'-nonsense" from Boru."

Mac Award or MacWard (son of the bard), the carter, a shrewd old man, with a good deal of sarcastic wit, and great activity of mind, so that he kept accounts and delivered letters, tho' he did not know a figure or letter of the alphabet, was up early in the morning. About two or three o'clock, his carts loaded with spades and shovels, were slowly rattling down towards Derry. When he was about a mile on his way, he saw the figure of a man crouching under a thorn-tree, by the road-side, and, on coming up to him, who was it but Boru! Boru, however, fallen from his high estate, and showing visible marks of terror and exhaustion. His nondescript eyes had at last got some expression, but it did not improve them. Warned by the sight of a fellow-man, he poured his tale of wonder into MacWard's breast.

"It was about eleven when we separated to go home. I was coming to Artigarvan, and I was crossing by the upper bridge, but the fellows with me who lived by Donnelly's moor and Liscurry wouldn't hear of it. They dragged me with them, sayin' I must be 'feared of the 'trash-an'-nonsense'; and I'm not afeard of any ordinary ghost; but when they turned off home, I had nothin' for it but to cross the Malison bridge. Now, its more nor one ordinary ghost or spirit (single), I've put to flight, but what's a man to do against a lot of them? So I come slowly down—och, hoch, how could it is, don't your teeth chatter with the could?—an' I was watchin' about me, not that I was afeard, but a man has a right to watch. Watchin' I was, when suddintly a grate, immense ball of fire jumped out of the middle of the bridge, and as suddintly changed into a terrible, threatenin' face, with open, devourin' jaws; an' then I heard an awful yowl, that made every hair on my head rise; an' I saw a big, black thing rear out of the level road, and jump up; an' suddintly the fiery head turned round three times an' made a dash at me, an' I—och, isn't it could and shivery?—ran as hard as I could, an' missed my way, an' have been lying here all night. O, but there was an awful smell of sulphur, an' queer, dancin', blue bleezes about that bridge!—an' its hard to be in this country."

"Boru, Boru, ye'd always be havin' yer snigger at sich things; I only wonder ye worn't worse off—blue bleezes, ye're lookin' blue yet!"

"Worse off! Why, only I gev' a tremendous blow—an' my arma felt scorched, so it did—at the monstrous jaws of the second one!"

"Second one! ye said there was only one!"

"An' I tell ye there was two; and its jaws were closin' over me only for my blow! 'Tisn't many wud dar' what I dared!"

"Well, that's enough, I must be off. Ye're safe now; go home, an' sleep it off."

So they parted. Next day there was great commotion in the mill with Boru's adventures. The lower part of the mill was temporarily curtained from the upper by a winnowing sheet, put up to dry. When his narration, still more wondrous than before and more daring, was just over, Randal, the chief plater (worker at the great hammer), pulled aside the canvas, crying, "Is this anything like it, Boru?"

All looked towards the darkened spot, and suddenly beheld a ball of fire leap out of the ground and as suddenly heard a piercing howl, and beheld the dark body of Gariffe jump up at it, seize it victoriously in his teeth, give two or three turns, and come galloping up with it. "I," said Jac, "held the string that, thrown over a beam here, over a bough at the bridge, jerked it up."

"And what was it, young friend?"

"Why, the fellows, though they could hardly see it through the tears of their laughter, knew well enough that it was a turnip-lantern—a turnip, of which nothing hardly is left but the rind, with a hideous face carved on it. Put a candle into it, and it will be all translucent, especially the face!"

"No wonder, Boru does not like turnips since."

"No wonder, indeed! Let's have a walk. Where's Gariffe?" And Gariffe, who, extended at full length, had allowed himself to be taken possession of for bed and carpet, by an unscrupulous cat and her equally audacious, but more innocent family, quietly upset them and all their arrangements, and followed his master out into the woods and fields. He was a wise dog, Gariffe, but his conduct towards his aged aunt had been far from respectable. He in the vigour of youth, she in the indolence of age—he, desiring her for a rollicking playmate, persistently made rapid and horizontal lunges and snaps at her dangling but venerable ears; what wonder, then, that driven to desperation, her white body was found one morning floating in the mill-dam—a suicide.

DAINTY LIVING.—The whale was eaten by the Saxons, and when men were lucky enough to get it, it appeared at table late in the 15th century. In 1245 Henry III. directed the Sheriff of London to purchase 100 pieces of whale for his table. Whales found on the coast were the perquisites of Royalty—they were cut up and sent to the king's kitchen in carts. The grampus, or sea-wolf, was also highly esteemed; but of all the blubber dainties, the porpoise was deemed the most savoury. The Saxons called it sea-hog, and the ecclesiastics of the middle ages, porco marino. Porpoises were purchased for the table of Henry III. in 1246. At the marriage of Henry V. the guests were treated with "roasted porpes;" and we find it again in the first course at the coronation of Henry VII. This coarse animal was esteemed as food until late in the 16th century. It was often on the table of Henry VIII., and even Queen Elizabeth, who was rather choise in her appetite, had porpoises among her Friday diet, and it was sold as food in the markets of Newcastle as late as 1575, from which time it appears to have fallen into disrepute.

ON AND OFF THE BOARDS.

ENGLISH Opera has now become a recognised entertainment. Perhaps it is even more favoured in those countries than the once all-absorbing and all-pervading Italian Opera. There is a little resistance yet, it may be, in Prima Donnas, or their masculine analogues, Primi Tenori, to accept a part in them, and ambitious singers will still persist in appearing on the stage as "Edgardo di Ravenswood" or "Lucia di Lammermoor," instead of "Edgar" or "Lucy" in the English version of the same piece; but the public shows its approbation of what it understands by crowding to its performance, and although it will go to listen to Mario or Grisi, or the other stars of Italian song, it goes for the sake of fashion, whilst for the purpose of being pleased it crushes into theatres to be delighted with Sims Reeves or Miss Pyne. But successful as it is now, there was a period when the dramatic effort of English song was ostracised from the stage, and Italian melody alone was tolerated. From the time of the frail and fascinating Duchess of Mazarin, in the days of the Second Charles, English music was neglected. In the celebrated entertainments given by that lady at her residence, a concert of French and Italian music formed the most prominent feature. Under such auspices grew the taste which lavished wealth on the celebrated tenor, Farinelli, in after days, and the fastidiousness which could only endure the conceptions of Italian maestri. In this way the resources of English musical genius were neglected and forgotten, under the more admired creations of exotic importation. There were no British compositions to be heard, and no encouragement given to them if they chanced to be put forward for public pleasure. Under those circumstances, native song languished in almost hopeless difficulties. That we delight in the harmonic genius of Balfe in better times is due to the success of a musical drama which gave fashion to English melody; and thus that the "Bohemian Girl" has ever been created, perhaps in great probability is due to the inspiration of Swift and the facility of Gay. Let us recall the memories of its inauguration.

That was a great night when the curtain went down on the last scene of the "Beggars' Opera" amid the cheers of the audience—when noblemen thronged around Mr. Gay, the author, to congratulate him on his success, or felicitated Rich, the manager, on his good fortune in falling in for the piece which Cibber missed—when wits, and beaux, and bloods, gathered in the green room to praise the dashing Tom Walker, as he strode about elated, in the garb in which he had performed the character of "Captain Macheth"—when the Duke of Bolton came round from the stalls to the stage, enchanted with Lavinia Fenton, whose last song as "Polly" was yet echoing in the ears of the playgoers—when everybody was delighted except the ministers and the government of the day. It was the night of the first performance of that musical drama which has been almost banished from the stage by good manners and the fastidiousness of refined society—the first night of the "Beggars' Opera." The morning after that night of the 29th of January, 1728, found fashionable London, and unfashionable London too, in an excess of volubility at its breakfast tables, about the Newgate pastoral which Swift had inspired and Pope corrected; which ministers in place found unpalatable, and ministers out of place considered a pattern of perfection. What an excitement in coffee-houses, where rival politicians discussed its merits with party zeal; where some declared it a plot for the Pretender, and others, just as truthful, swore it a plot for the Pope! What longing in all society, among the upper ten thousand and the lower ten millions, until the day wore round, and the winter's night found link boys rushing with officials of state, and officials of no state, to besiege Covent-Garden for admission, in one tumultuous rout. So it went on for sixty-three consecutive evenings. Every salon rang with the music of the "Beggars' Opera," and the streets were vocal with its songs. All the magnates of mind, all the men of fashion, all the names of note in the land, were marked by the sight-seers amongst the audience at the play. Poetry sent its representative in Pope; manners had its paragon present in the courtly Chesterfield; government was never more fitly typified than in the despotic Walpole; beauty was beaming in every tier and smiling in every stall, whilst cheer on cheer swelled from the audience, and gave point to allusions which were made to bear more political meanings than ever their author intended or conceived could be worked out of them. It was a political epic; and political society at the time went to praise or condemn it; the faction of laudation was the strongest, the faction of disagreement was silent perforce, and the general public was observant of the party contest, but it went with fashion, and cheered as lustily as the most violent of the Tories. From all those causes the "Beggars' Opera" became the greatest success of any musical piece ever put upon the English stage.

If we consider the account given by Pope of its origin, we cannot believe it was intended as a political satire on the government and ministers of the day, as has been so often alleged. In seasons of political excitement allusions which would be unobserved at another time as without point or purpose, pass current as being intended to convey a certain meaning; and as men look for an interpretation of their own thoughts, we can hardly wonder if their eager imaginations find those interpretations. Gay found the men of his party doing this, and found it making his own success, so that he did not ask to undeceive them; but Pope's words are conclusive as to his original design, and his entire proceeding in the development of that design as being perfectly free from political purpose. In relation of its origin he states: "Dr. Swift had been once observing to Mr. Gay, what an odd, pretty thing a Newgate Pastoral might make. Gay was inclined to try such a thing for some time, but afterwards thought it would be better to write a comedy on the same plan. This was what gave rise to the 'Beggars' Opera.' He began on it, and when he first mentioned it to Swift, the doctor did not much like the project. As he carried it on he showed what he wrote to both of us, and we now and then gave a correction, or a word or two of advice; but it was wholly his own writing. When it was done neither of us thought it would succeed. We showed it to Congreve, who said it would either take greatly, or be greatly damned!" Such is Pope's detail of the conception and fabrication of the most memorable of all the creations of the British Drama for its wonderful success, and the hold it took on public excitement. When it was completed, Gay took it to the autocrat of Drury-lane, Colley Cibber, who declined it with thanks. He then went to Rich, at Covent Garden, who undertook to put it on the stage; with what success we have told. Several times, during the night of its performance, the prospect of its fate looked gloomy enough. To Miss Lavinia Fenton is ascribed the merit of having saved it from utter condemnation. The chances of the piece were dubious until she came to that part of the song where she sighs,

"For on the rope that hangs my dear, Depends poor Polly's life."

Her exquisite acting, and not less exquisite singing of this ditty, brought down the applause of the house in thunders around her. The audience from this point got into good humour, and were willing to be pleased. When "Lockit" sang the song in which the following verse occurs, the audience took it up in party spirit, and cheered vociferously:—

"When you censure the age,
Be cautious and sage,
Lest the courtiers offended should be.
If you mention vice or bribe,
'Tis so pat to all the tribe.
That each cries, that was levelled at me!"

Amidst the merriment and plaudits of the listeners, every glance at this portion of the performance was directed to the box where Sir Robert Walpole was seated. The party whose politics were in opposition to the government redoubled their shouts and vociferations, and, to take the sting from the shaft which was thus turned at him, the minister applauded more energetically than any one else, and, leaning forward in his stall, cried, in a voice which rang over the theatre, "encore!" But, as the play proceeded, Sir Robert's finesse availed him but little, the scene between "Peachum" and "Lockit," where the quarrel was dexterously conveyed to represent the recent frances between Lord Townshend, one of the members of the cabinet, and Sir Robert, which it was publicly known had taken place at Colonel Selwyn's house. Horace Walpole has given us a description of it. Sir Robert had objected to a certain subject in relation to foreign affairs being brought before the Parliament. Lord Townshend had urged its production in that place. At the meeting of the ministers in the Colonel's residence, some conversation took place upon the subject, when, in answer to Walpole's objections, Lord Townshend replied, "Since you object, and the House of Commons is more your affair than mine, I shall not persist in my opinion; but, as I now give way, I cannot help observing that, upon my honour, I think that mode of proceeding would have been more advisable." To this Walpole replied, "My lord, for once, then, there is no man's sincerity which I doubt so much as yours; and I never doubt it so much as when you are pleased to use such strong expressions." Townshend, offended, grasped Walpole by the collar, and Walpole seized Townshend in the same manner, both then unloosed their holds and drew their swords. Mrs. Selwyn called the guard, but Mr. Pelham interfered, and pacified the irate ministers. The public knowledge of this affair found its parallel in that between the two scoundrels of the drama, and made its application at once. The strong similarity of parody between the scenes caught attention, and discomfited the minister; whilst the name of another character, "Bob Booty," could not be mentioned without drawing out a roar of derisive laughter, and a general gaze at Sir Robert Walpole's box. We shall turn to Pope's account of the gradual development of the success of the piece, and its progress in the favour of the audience. "We were all," he says, "at the first night of it in great uncertainty of the event, till much encouraged by overhearing the Duke of Argyle, who sat in the next box to us, say, 'It will do—it must do—I see it in the eyes of all of them.' This was a good while before the first act was over, and so gave us ease soon; for the duke, besides his own good taste, had a particular knack in discovering the taste of the public. He was quite right in this, as usual. The good nature of the audience appeared stronger every act, and ended in a clamour of applause."

After this night the success of the production was assured. Never before, and, probably, never since, did a play of its character become so popular. Ladies had the favourite songs of the piece written on their fans in the most beautiful style of calligraphy. Houses were furnished with screens having the same poems as their only ornament. The author was the lion of the best society. The actors and actresses of the piece became popular favourites. The fate of Thomas Walker, who originally performed the role of "Captain Macheath," has been noticed in the "Retrospect of the Dublin Stage," which appeared in our first number. He had not been chosen for the part he played in this piece. Quin, who was no singer, had had it allotted to him, but one day at rehearsal, Walker was inside the scenes, and sang a song with such effect that Quin exclaimed to Gay, "Aye, there is a man much more qualified to do you justice than I am." Walker was at once selected, and played the part with what issue we have alluded to.

But the fortunes of Lavinia Fenton were more remarkable, as in consequence of her appearance in the piece, and her singing of the song, she became the idol of the metropolis. Her portrait was engraved, books of letters and verses to her were published, and, to crown all this, as a result of it, the Duke of Bolton made her his Duchess. She has been described as rather pleasing than beautiful, possessing a great judgment and good taste, and upon this account in private society much admired by some of the first wits of the time. She died Duchess of Bolton in the 55th year of her age.

"Oh! ponder well, be not severe,"

As to the taste it inspired for English musical drama there can be no doubt, but critics have often differed widely in their views of the relations of this piece to morality. Some have asserted it had a tendency to demoralize, and in support of this a fact is cited, that Sir John Fielding once told Hugh Kelly, the dramatist, that after a successful run of this play there was always a huge capture of unlucky robbers, pickpockets, and highwaymen, and referred him to the books of the police-offices for testimony of the fact. It is known that Sir John actually wrote to Garrick and Colman, as managers of different theatres, to urge them not to produce it upon the stage in 1777, and Garrick acquiesced in Sir John's opinions, whilst Colman refused to withhold it from public representation. Swift in his time held that it should have a favourable effect upon morality, because it showed up vice in its most glaring light. Johnson condemned it in a conversation which Boswell details. Society has ratified Johnson's opinion, and for a long time, whilst it was formally placed upon the stage as a stock piece, many of its scenes were not given. Now an act or two are sometimes offered to the public, and even those are greatly modified, to suit the higher and more delicate moral tone of public taste. What changes have come upon society since the first appearance of this, the most notable of English musical dramas! The wits, the nobles, the beauties, who first beheld it or took part in its creation and performance, are long gone to their final account. The passions of the parties to which it owed its buzz of fame are at rest in the grave, where they sleep. The stage has lost its influence as an instrument for party uses. The highwayman no longer dashes upon the belated traveller in lonely roads, or startles him with his command of "stand and deliver." The race of burglars is pretty generally learning to be virtuous in reformatories. Robbery is not fashionable any longer; and younger brothers of good family have learned to look to other avenues of fortune than the Queen's Highway. The diffusion of knowledge, and the facilities of mechanism aid morality in wiser teachings when the "Beggars' Opera" is off, than were generally given when it was a piece on the boards.

CHEAP LITERATURE—"Up to this time," says Mr Blanchard Jerrold, in a paper on "The Influence of Newspapers on the Progress of Popular Education," presented by him to the late Social Science Congress at Dublin, "the new journals which cheap paper has brought into existence are weeds rather than flowers. 'The Dagger and the Bowl,' 'The Murder at the Smithy,' 'The Dashing Gipsy,' all seasoned and leavened with columns of facetiae, and answers to correspondents who exist only in the wild imagination of the gentleman who is retained to make answers by the hundred. Such materials, with stale domestic receipts to fill up the columns, even when supplied at one halfpenny, will hardly raise a race of intellectual giants."

THE BLACK DOCTOR.

CHAPTER I.

IN one of those old streets which lead from the more thickly peopled parts of the city to the Liberties of Dublin, stood a time-worn, quaint old house, known as the sign of the "Three Jolly Travellers." It was indeed a strange old pile, as it was a kind of isolation in the midst of a scene of wretchedness and squalor. Its stone faced windows and quaint gables spoke of its having belonged to a bye-gone period, and its richly carved arches and door-posts illustrated that it was originally intended for other uses than that to which it was applied at the period when our story opens. The houses that had at one time stood beside it had crumbled to the ground, and their fragments filled the spaces at either side of the "Three Jolly Travellers," that seemed to have remained as a kind of memorial of the past, and persons not acquainted with the locality, in almost every instance, when going along, walked to the other side of the street from a kind of fear that the "old house" would fall just at the precise time they would be passing. It was indeed, a quaint old house that seemed to be in its dotage, and dozing away its old age. It leaned sadly to one side, and to preserve its gravity a number of old posts and uprights were placed against one of its gables to prevent its falling into the site of another mansion which had stood shoulder to shoulder to it for nearly a century, in all weathers. Many years had passed since it began to settle down, and if its walls had tongues how many queer stories could they tell of youth, and hope, beauty and ambition, wealth and avarice, all long since accounted for and forgotten! In what had once been the parlour was that which was now facetiously called the bar, and the two windows which had originally lighted the apartment were thrown into one to give the establishment a business-like air, and to furnish John Brunt—the portly proprietor—with sufficient light to carry on the business of the concern. Even where innovation had intruded, antiquity seemed to have made a home, as festoons of cobwebs, that had been passed like suspension bridges from the cracked decanters filled with coloured water, to the long clay pipes placed diagonally against the panes of murky glass that seemed to be intended more for the purpose of excluding than admitting the daylight, had not been disturbed for many generations of spiders. In a lower compartment of the window were some votive offerings to Bacchus, presented many years before by John Brunt. These consisted of flowers made out of paper by some poor girl in the neighbourhood, prior to the time that she visited the "Three Jolly Travellers," after midnight. Lemons that had become dark-brown and calcined from exposure, stood on shelves in dirty wine glasses, and small statuettes in plaster, of Shakespeare and Milton, holding scrolls, spoke of the refined taste and poetic feelings of John Brunt. On the rickety counter were nailed several counterfeit coins—nailed there by John Brunt himself, to warn dishonest persons, and to illustrate how sharp he was in the detection of knaves. Three small barrels painted blue, with black coloured hoops, stood in one of the back sections of the bar, and beneath were two portly, dissipated-looking tierces, that had evidently been rolling in the gutter, and were anything but presentable. Pints and quarts, that had come in for hard knocks, stood bulged and bruised as if they had been taken out of some drawn battle, and from the want of being cleaned, yellow streaks of stale porter rendered illegible the initials, "J. B.," on their battered sides. Heaps of sawdust, saturated with rancid beer, were scraped together, surmounted by scraps of half-burned paper. In John Brunt's place of business was the tap, in which were wont to congregate all the local out-door misery and wretchedness—the poor street musician, that had been striving to play gay tunes with a sad heart, and, to make the contrast between his music and himself excite benevolence; the vender of small wares, driven in by the weather, and seeking to dry her clothes before she would retire to her wretched home. The street bravo and the midnight marauder were also to be seen around the fire of John Brunt's tap, who, to do him justice, if he had a dislike against anything in this world more than another it was to a bad fire; and for this reason Tony Johnson (John's boy) never really got into trouble until he allowed the fires to go out between the first of November and the first of April, both inclusive. The front and back rooms on the first floor were set apart for John's respectable customers. These apartments fully sympathised with the leanings of the house, as the floors were much higher at one side than another; but they bore about them evidences of having seen better times. Within these rooms were wont to assemble at night those whom vice, crime, poverty, or misfortune had afflicted—in fact, the "Three Jolly Travellers" was a kind of caravansary, in which human misery was to be heard of from morning to night and from night to morning. It was the Alsatia for the ruined spendthrift or gambler, the house of call for the night robber or street stroller, or the place where the fast young man wound up his night upon town, prior to going to the station-house. It was one of the rendezvous in which the social outlaw had his home, and his hours of boisterous glee, under the special patronage of John Brunt, who, with his boy, Tony Johnson, were the only residents of the "Three Jolly Travellers." John Brunt was a thick-set man, with shoulders so high that no accommodation had been left for his neck. His face, which was perfectly circular, save when his cheeks fell beneath his jaws at either side, presented the appearance as if some secret process of strangulation was always going on, which he had not the power to prevent. A pair of gray piercing eyes looked out from beneath a low receding forehead, over which was combed, with the most precise uniformity, a quantity of thin semi-brown hair, cut straight across. A small nose, that could not be perceived in profile, and a heavy hanging mouth gave to John Brunt's face a most sinister aspect. Whenever he walked, or rather waddled along, he appeared as if he was carrying a heavy load which he could not lay down; and whenever he wanted to make himself intelligible, he generally expressed himself in a series of grunts, which nobody seemed to understand but Tony Johnson, who was ever up for mischief, and always ready to play all kinds of practical jokes on his employer when out of reach of his arms. Some people went so far as to say that John Brunt knew what he ought not to know, and that bad work had taken place in the "Three Jolly Travellers," of which Tony Johnson was not ignorant. John Brunt put up with a great deal from Tony that he would not bear from others, and for this reason people said that John Brunt and Tony were in one another's secrets, and had between them that which could not be shown the light.

Tony Johnson was an orphan boy, who could be seen roving about the suburbs of Dublin some fifty years since. He was, even when a harmless wanderer, a gay, blue-eyed urchin, ever ready to hold a horse for any amount of time for a penny, or to offer to stand on his head ever so often for a half-penny. He was full of life and fun, and, even in the worst times, he was never badly off for his supper or a night's lodging. There was no crowd going that Tony would not be in the midst of, and if any mischief was done within any reasonable distance of Tony's head-quarters he was always suspected. In Tony's wanderings he met with John Brunt, who induced him to become his servant, and from that time Tony was never seen by daylight out of the "Three Jolly Travellers," of which he became a part and portion. Tony, at the time our story commences, was about fourteen years of age, perhaps not so much, for people said, that the boy was not as old as he looked, as there was something preying on his mind. It was remarked that Tony never went to sleep until he had locked his master in his room, and he always showed fear when left alone with him. Tony used to wear all kinds of clothes, but he invariably observed the rule that none of them should fit him. On some occasions he was to be seen in a coat the tails of which would be sweeping the ground, and on others pinioned in a jacket far too small for him, but he tenaciously adhered to a head-dress in the shape of a white hat, which, from old age and constant battering by impatient customers, had fallen in, and leaned to one side at an angle like that of the hanging tower at Pisa. Although poor Tony was generally thoughtful, approaching to melancholy, his old love of fun would come upon him, but in the midst of his glee a cloud of sadness would pass over his fine honest face, and he would relax into his old mood, and retire to his old seat on the rickety stairs of the "Three Jolly Travellers."

One cold wet night in the beginning of December, 1818, while the rain came down in sleety showers, a tall gentlemanly-looking man entered the "Three Jolly Travellers," and asked John Brunt, who was dimly visible in the light of four bilious looking candles, that glimmered in tin sconces on the walls, if Mr. Jacob Barman had been asking for Mr. Frederick Foster that night?

"No," said John Brunt, in one of his most guttural tones, "he was not here last night nor to-night. He knows where to come when he wants John Brunt; but, if he was five times an attorney, he will not beat John Brunt, who beat his master; and I tell you, if you are a friend of his, inform him that John Brunt is not to be trifled with."

Tony Johnson, who was on his old seat on the stairs, was aroused by the loud voice of his master, and exclaimed, "Don't hurry yourself, a big cough will do you good."

"If I had you, you ruffian, within my gripe," said John Brunt, "I would fit you for the coroner, I would!"

"You would!" said Tony; "but there was wan time when you fitted a person for the coroner, and you niver axed that gentleman to look at your work." The boy, who had become quite excited, clapped his hands against his sides, and crowed like a cock.

John Brunt grew ashy pale, and large globes of perspiration burst from his heavy flabby face, over which a smile of fearful malice passed, as he said, "Go along, you cur, only that I am busy I would kick you."

"I can wait," said Tony, "until you can bite as well as kick. I know horses too well not to know that the likes of you is nothing at kicking; you look very like a racer," said Tony, as he withdrew to the door-way, playing the overture to an original opera with his knuckles on his chin. In a few minutes after he hurriedly retreated up stairs, after having accomplished the feat of putting the hat of one of his acquaintances over his eyes, as he was passing along the street.

"That is a great young scamp," said John Brunt, addressing the stranger, who was soaked with wet to the skin, and shivering with cold. "I think you were asking me for Mr. Barman. He was not here, but he is likely to be. So you have better wait for him. If he does not come to-night it will be worse for himself."

The loud voice of John Brunt was heard calling Tony, who, on making his appearance, was told to show the stranger up stairs.

"What name shall I say if Mr. Barman calls?" said John Brunt, eyeing the stranger closely.

"Mr. Frederick Foster," was the reply, as Tony lighted the new comer up the old creaky stairs, that groaned beneath the heavy tread of Foster's feet, as if they had been affected with rheumatism.

Foster appeared to be about forty-five years of age, and, as he stood in the light of the fire, there were evident marks of care and privation on his well-formed face. There was an ease and elegance in his manner and bearing which did not escape the scrutinizing eye of Tony, who, perhaps for the first time in his life, called a person "Sir!"

"This was a cold night outside, sir," said Tony, as he poked the fire into a blaze. "I thought at first," continued the boy, "that you were here the night they planned to burn the big house, to get the insurance from some rich company in England, but I don't think it was you. They often agree between themselves, here in this very room, to burn houses, and 'by dad,' they do be lit up the next night, after the tide goes out."

"You are speaking about people burning houses and defrauding insurance offices," said Foster; "will you be good enough to tell me what I know about such things?"

"By dad, I don't mane to say you do," said Tony, "for if you did, the devil a use was there in telling you anything about it; but, let me ask you, if you are not up to some dodge, what did you want of Barman at the 'Three Jolly Travellers,' at this hour, such a night as this? It was for fun you came out to get wet and could," said Tony; "or, perhaps the missis and you had a scrimmage," added the accomplished young gentleman.

Foster, who was now enveloped in the steam which the fire had extracted from his wet, thread-bare clothes, had to laugh outright at the gestures of Tony, who threw a summersault, and having satisfied himself by standing on his hands and throwing his feet against the wall, approached Foster, and asked him what he was "going to liquor?"

"I have no money," said Foster; "wait till Barman comes."

"Don't mind," said Tony; "I'll stand, or I'll know for what."

In a minute Tony was in the shop, where John Brunt was looking over a file on which were impaled layers of greasy papers.

"I say, Brunt," said Tony, with a leer of quiet mischief playing over his thin sharp features, "put them up—don't let him see 'em."

"Who see them?" said Brunt.

"Hawksworth's nephew," said Tony.

The file fell from the hands of Brunt, as he stood aghast in the presence of Tony, who followed up his advantage. "The gentleman above," continued Tony, "wants to know his uncle's address, and I was thinking of telling him to inquire under the flags in the old kitchen."

Brunt staggered to a seat, and as he remained gasping for breath, with his eyes bent on vacancy, Tony deliberately filled a large measure of whiskey, with which he retreated up stairs to Foster.

"Did I not tell you I would stand?" said Tony, as he re-entered the room. "I don't drink myself, but pitch that into you lively."

The dialogue between Foster and Tony was interrupted by a shrill voice, calling as loud as it could call, for Tony to come down stairs.

"What's the matter?" said Tony.

"John Brunt," said the voice, "looks as if he is dying."

"Is that you, Wisp?" said Tony, from the head of the stairs; "come up, you are 'on the round'!"

The person called Wisp was not long in availing himself of the invitation given to him by Tony, and, having taken a fair share of whiskey at a draught, shook his wet clothes, lit a short black pipe, and seated himself opposite the fire.

"This gentleman's name is Foster," said Tony, "and he is waiting for your friend that owes me five shillings."

"You mean Barman," said Wisp.

"The same," said Tony; "and although I do not drink, I will pledge you, Wisp."

"You young rascal," said Wisp, "you have picked up all the lingo of the crew that comes here; but, now that I think of it, what has come over the governor?"

Tony, who had poured some whiskey into a broken glass, observed, "I did not interfere with your drink, let me take this first," and sniting the action to the word, he threw the whiskey down his throat. "You want to know what ails the governor, do ye? Now, suppose you were told, would that make you better? Well, Wisp," continued he, "you make a fine thing out of it by not nabbing fellows when you get the parchment. How long are you going to keep Abel Isaacs out of the money you were telling me the young officer owes him, for gold watches made out of gilt pewter?"

"You knows too much," said Wisp; "but, as you knows something, I will tell you more. The Jew took the writ out of my hands because he found out the young officer's bill was a forgery."

"Ould Isaacs is stuck, then," said the precocious Tony.

"By no means," said Wisp, taking another pull at the whiskey; "the family of the young chap offered twice the amount of the bill, but Abel won't give it up unless he gets four times the amount and costs, mine included," said Wisp, as he relit his pipe.

Foster and Wisp entered into general conversation, as Tony retired, whistling, to the shop.

"Tony," said John Brunt, "like a good fellow, tell me is that his nephew?"

"As sure as you are John Brunt!" replied Tony; "and it would be too much to have two such handsome men living together! Why don't you die, and make room for some one more purty than yourself, my ould Peruvian sparrow! I will tell you what, I would not stay wid ye for all that is in your ould house, and for fifty times what you tuck from him before you buried him. You told me you killed him, and you often tried to kill me; but that would not save you, as Jerry, the tinker, knows it!"

"He is dead, stone dead!" said John Brunt.

"I saw him yesterday, in this street," observed Tony.

"Liar and devil!" exclaimed John Brunt, furiously, and seizing a large bottle, he threw it at the head of Tony. The missile passed him, and broke in atoms against the wall.

"Missed again!" said Tony; and from the top of the stairs he shouted, as he proceeded to join his friends, "Brunt, I tell you again, it is his nephew; and I will give him the old exciseman's address in the back kitchen! Do you hear me, Brunt?"

"What's the row?" said Wisp. "The old chap is out of sorts to-night. I don't know whether it is the rain or not, but it is coming down as I never heard it before." As Wisp spoke the wind howled through the streets, and shook the "Three Jolly Travellers" to its foundation. The rain fell in torrents, and pattered against the crazy windows.

Further conversation between Wisp and Tony was checked by the entrance of Jacob Barman, who at once recognized Foster, and said, "This is a fearful night to be abroad! I scarcely hoped to see you, but I wanted. What news? Will the Jew do the needful?"

While these questions were being put, Foster looked with anxious gaze on Barman, who waved his hand to Tony and Wisp, and said that "he wanted to be alone with his friend." When Tony and the bailiff had retired, Barman laid his hand on the shoulder of Foster and said, "All is up, unless one thing is done. Your wife at her death has the power to make a will, leaving the funds in court to whom she pleases. My clerk, Quill, will draw up the will, and she can sign it."

Foster groaned aloud, and in a paroxysm of anguish exclaimed, "My poor wife, starving and dying, and I without the means of giving her mere bread!" As he said this he rose from his seat, and as he walked along the wretched room big tears rolled down his cheeks.

"Fool!" said Barman; "listen to me; when the will is signed, Mrs. Foster must get out of the way, and we will manage a mock funeral!"

"How shall we make them believe that she is dead?" observed Foster.

"I will get a certificate of burial," said Barman, "and I will get Dr. Bramble to state he attended her in her last illness, and he will also state the cause of death, which will satisfy the lawyers."

"Is this Bramble the man you call the 'Black Doctor?' and if so, can we trust him?" said Foster.

"With your life!" replied Barman. "And I will see you here at this hour to-morrow night."

Wisp and Tony were enjoying themselves at the expense of John Brunt, as Foster and Barman went through the drenching rain to their miserable homes in different parts of the city.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

LADIES AND LOOKING GLASSES.—To my mind, looking glasses are the greatest enemies ladies have: they ought all to be broken to everlastin' smash. It isn't that they are false, for they ain't; they will reflect the truth if they are allowed. But, unfortunately, a truth never looks into them. When a woman consults her glass, she wishes to be pleased, she wants to be flattered, and to be put on good terms with herself; so she treats it as she would her lover; she goes up to it all smiles, looking as amiable and as beautiful as she can. She assumes the most winning air; she gazes at the image with all the affection she can call up, her eyes beam with intelligence and with love, and her lips appear all a woman could wish, or a man covet. Well, in course the mirror gives back that false face to its owner, as it receives it; it ain't fair, therefore, to blame it for being unfaithful; but as ladies can't use it without deceivin' of themselves, why total abstinence from it would be better. Now, people may deceive themselves if they have a mind to, but they can't go on for ever. Time will tell tales. Whatever year a gal is born, she has contemporaries; when she looks at them and sees that they are ageing, or the worse for wear, she tries to recall the days of her youth, and finds that they are lost in the distance, and when she sees her schoolfellows and playmates married and parents themselves, all the glasses in the world fail at last to make her believe she is still young.—Sam Slick,

THE FOX-HUNT OF DARRA.

FROM the notes of explorers in the fields of natural history, it would appear that before a colony of foxes determine on settling in a neighbourhood, they send forward a pioneer, which, after accurately examining all the points, bearings, and facilities of the place, returns with his report ready drawn up, on hearing which, if it be favourable, the whole family throw the dust off their feet at the enemies they have made, leave the spot which, mayhap, they have rendered too warm by their nefarious practices, and under cover of night, quietly upon the fresh lands they, and there commence a new career of depredation, most mical to the game preserves yards around. If this be the final founder of the fox colony of Darra must have been a patriarch of great judgment and foresight. In fact he must have employed in the selection of this fastness some of the same description of skill under whose ministrations arose many a stern feudal stronghold by the river shores of north and south Britain, by the far banks of the storied Rhine, and by the craggy margins of our own glorious Irish streams—castles from which, in the mediæval times, the steel-clad and marauding barons were wont to issue forth at the head of their armed retainers, and levy black-mail from the surrounding plains, towns, and hamlets.

The judgment attributed to the fox in the above sentence is no untenable assertion. We challenge any historian of ancient or modern times to produce a greater mass of evidence in support of the possession of extraordinary genius by one of his heroes, than can be brought forward to prove that the fox from the very earliest ages was a personage of wonderful accomplishments in all the arts and sciences, from the picking of a bone in the most approved gastronomic method, to the selection of a safe citadel wherein to allow digestion to take its course after the best epicurean fashion, and from that to the highest examples of strategy and worldly craft. Have we not the works of the immortal Æsop to refer to, in which that facetious and sparkling little descendant of Ham seems never tired of relating incidents illustrative of the cuteness, the wisdom, the experience, the hair-breadth escapes, the funny exploits, and bold deeds of Reynard? Take a run through the literature of any country in the world:—ere you have gone through half a volume of any poet, fabulist, or historian, you will find similes, tales, and allusions to no end, all bearing testimony to the brightness of Reynard's brains. But putting all these stray witnesses out of the question, have we not an epic to attest his greatness?—yes, an epic that shall remain green and blooming in the memories of mankind, when Homer is forgotten, Virgil unread, and Milton, as the Kerry schoolmaster said, shadowed under the curtain of oblivion—an epic whose incidents we gloat over in childhood, and remember fondly as we advance in years, namely, the immortal "History of Reynard the Fox" himself; and we ask triumphantly, without fear of denial or a single reservation in the response, is there a man, woman, or child, unacquainted with its soul-stirring and enrapturing contents, from where the constellation of the Southern Cross sheds its light upon the banquets of Austral cannibals, to where the stunted Esquimaux gorge themselves with whale blubbers, by the icy shores of the Boreal Sea?

Even tradition itself is ever garrulous and eloquent in Reynard's praise. According to that everlasting authority, there was once upon a time a fox that could tell fortunes by the shore of Lough Jil'a, on the Shannon, and another at the foot of Croagh Patrick which attended on an ancient hermit who dwelt there, as his gillie or servant. This individual knew his business so well that he not only gathered firewood for his master's abode, but brought in daily a supply of berries, watercresses, and game sufficient to appease the appetite of the old hermit. Not content with this, he generally superintended the making of the fire, roasted the wildfowl to a turn, and laid the table with a degree of taste and elegance that would set the best French cook out of his wits to emulate. There was another fox which dwelt in a certain wood in the south of Ireland, between whom and the gamekeeper a tacit treaty existed, the nature of which was that as long as he lived unmolested by the gamekeeper, the poultry and geese of the latter were to remain intact. Now, on a certain day a number of gentlemen came with a splendid pack of hounds to the wood, unearthing Reynard, and chased him, neck or nothing, over many a rough mile of hill and valley. In the end, however, he escaped, but that night the best geese of the flock disappeared from the paddock of the gamekeeper. It seems that the fox, after his terrible run, being too exhausted to go on his usual rounds in search of prey, was forced by the pangs of hunger to catch the geese for his supper. The gamekeeper of course vowed vengeance for this infringement of the treaty, and next morning was proceeding, gun in hand, to inflict condign punishment on the offender, when, from the brow of a little hill near his home, he saw a sight which convinced him that a fox, of all animals in the world, has the tenderest conscience and the truest appreciation of the point of honour. In a field beneath was his friend of the wood, making his way in a deliberate run for the desecrated paddock, with a live goose thrown over his back. After gaining an adjacent field, he left his burthen by a fence, and then returned for another goose which he had left in some field behind, and which he bore into an inclosure at a distance beyond that in which he had deposited the first. Returning again, he bore the first some distance further, and thus carrying both alternately he at last deposited them with the flock in the gamekeeper's paddock, an ample payment for the robbery hunger had forced him to perpetrate on the preceding evening. Merely making allusion to the luxurious fox that at present is said to smoke his pipe every evening after dinner on Dawson's Table, near Gaultymore, we shall end our paragraph with the above exemplary individual, and pass once more to the valley of Darra, the scene of the hunt whose incidents we are about to relate.

The valley of Darra lies in the midst of a range of mountains from whose summits no finer, more extensive, or more varied prospect can be seen in Ireland. It stretches from west to east, and was formerly clothed from end to end by an ancient and luxuriant forest of oak, mountain ash, and pine. At its western extremity rises a small green hill on the summit of which stand the ruins of an old church and round tower. Some distance from this hill, beneath a gigantic crag, rises one of the streams celebrated by Spenser in his Faerie Queene, namely—which, after flowing downward with an infinite number of meanderings through the whole extent of the valley, discharges itself through a savage and romantic pass into the plain of Cork, where its waters soon join those of the pastoral Funcheon. Abutting into the valley at its south-western side rises the most elevated summit of the range, a steep conical hill with a mighty cairn of stones upon its crest. Along the left flank and foot of this hill stretches a dense and solitary wood, partly the remains of the ancient forest that once clothed the whole district. This wood from time immemorial has been infested with such a number of foxes, that no poultry yard, however well fortified, can be considered safe for miles around its vicinity.

If you take a ramble through the old churchyard mentioned above, your attention cannot fail to be attracted by an ancient, half-defaced tombstone which stands beside the dilapidated wall that fences in the dwellings of the dead from the green pasture land outside. Upon this tombstone can still be traced various quaint figures of hounds, horsemen, and a fox in full career, which circumstance will at once tell you that some mighty hunter sleeps beneath. And such is the case; for the spot marked by that old tombstone with its fantastic figures, is the last resting-place of Tom Geelagher, the most celebrated huntsman that ever wound horn or set foot in stirrup amid the green woods of Munster. We are, however, somewhat over hasty in calling the spot Tom's last resting-place. It may be so by day, but it is the firm belief of the inhabitants of the valley that he haunts Kyleglass, or the Green Wood, that sylvan expanse which we have mentioned as stretching along the foot and side of the hill. Often will the peasant tell you, after returning belated from bog or high pasture land, that he has heard the lonely hollows of the wood echoing the wierd sounds of Tom Geelagher's hunting horn and the wild yells of the spectral pack as they swept madly over glen and glade; and so minute is the description, that you will most probably be treated to an account of the peculiar creaking noise made by the new saddle which Tom had used on the day of his tragic death, and with which he still revisits "the glimpses of the moon" when going on his nightly fox-hunt. Innumerable are the stories related of Tom's appearance in that wild and solitary wood.

On one occasion Paddy Shanahan, one of the best pipers that ever twirled a chanter, was coming late at night down the mountain path that led by the southern skirt of the wood. All at once he beheld a red-coated horseman riding up the path with a splendid pack of foxhounds behind him.

"Arrah, Paddy Shanahan," said the horseman as he came up, "a cead mille failte to Kyleglass!"

"The same to you sir," said Paddy, not a whit frightened, for he knew by the hearty and kind tone of the horseman that he intended no harm.

"Sit down, Paddy," said the cavalier again, "and play us up the Maddhereen Roe. I haven't heard it this month o' Sundays, and 'tis your father's son that ought to be able to finger the chanter in style and glory."

"Wisha, begor, sir," answered Paddy, "never say it twice, an' you're welcome to the best tune in my pipes!" and with that he sat down on a bank and began to put his instrument in order.

"The Maddhereen Roe is the best tune!" said the horseman; "and I haven't heard it now since the day your father played it over my grave the day I was buried on the hill of Ardpatrick!" and in a sweet but unearthly voice he began to hum one of the verses of that soul-stirring Irish opera of which Reynard is the hero, and from which Moore has taken one of the finest airs to his Melodies—

"'Good morrow, fox!' 'Good morrow, sir!'

'What is that you're aitin'?

'A fine fat goose I stole from you—Come taste it while you're waitin'!'—" Yoicks! yoicks! tally ho! Strike up the time, Paddy Shanahan, for I haven't long to delay; and bethune ourselves the hounds aren't to be depended on!"

"Never fear, sir!" answered Paddy, for he had just succeeded in setting his pipes in tune; "here goes for the honour and glory of old Darra an' the blue skies above it!"

With that he struck up the Maddhereen Roe in a style that would stir the heart of a stone; and at every skirl of the pipes, the hounds yelled joyously and the huntsman hollowed or wound his horn, till the deep recesses of the wood resounded with the uproar. At last, as Paddy came to that portion of the piece of music which represents the hounds and horsemen rattling away in full chase over bush, brake, and glen, a huge fox, which appeared to be gray with age, darted out from the wood, and with his neck stretched out and his long tail sweeping the ground, darted swiftly along the hill-side.

"Yoicks! yoicks! tally ho! Towler, Nelly, and Ringwood there he goes—tally ho-o-o!" shouted the horseman, and striking the spurs into the flanks of his spectral steed, away he went with his yelling pack on the track of the fox over the hill, in a wierd and fearful chase, leaving Paddy Shanahan still skirling his chanter upon the green bank beside the haunted wood.

But now for old Tom Geelagher's death, burial, and our fox-hunt. One day old Captain O——, to whom Tom was huntsman, sent intimation to the various gentlemen around, that on the Monday following he was about to have a tremendous fox-hunt in the valley of Darra. At this time there was great rivalry between the gentlemen of the county Cork and those of Limerick with regard to their equestrian feats after the switching bush of Reynard. So you may be sure that when the morning of the hunt came there was a large attendance of sportsmen from both counties. Old Squire Pringle, whose legs had been broken five several times in the chase, was there from the banks of the Blackwater; but though his legs were quite crooked, and he was scarcely able to walk he was so lame, let him once get into the saddle, and he was the best and most daring rider of his county. On the other hand, pitted against him by the gentlemen of Limerick, was old Major Weston, from Ballinacurra-Weston, who, with an iron hook in place of his bridle hand—half the limb had been shot off by a chain-ball at the storming of Seringapatam—was still the boldest and most expert rider from Gaultymore to the Shannon. Others were there also who were determined on that day to emulate the exploits of their leaders, and even the very huntsmen of the rival fox-hound clubs looked upon one another with no friendly eyes as they proceeded to the covert of Easmore, in order thence to start the largest, most cunning, and most renowned fox in the country, which was said to make that wild glen his usual place of abode.

Sure enough they found him there, and the delighted eyes of the red-coats, of whom there were about a hundred and fifty on the ground that morning, testified to the size and wind of the fox of Easmore when at last he broke cover. He was a fine animal. Patches of gray hair on his head and tail showed that he had attained a great age, but his lithe motions and long stretches over the side of the hill as he came into view proved that age had not done away with his activity, and the vigour of his muscular frame. Away over bottom and rushy moorland, and up again across the highland valleys and slopes he led the dogs and red-coats in a mad chase for nearly two mortal hours, at the end of which it became apparent that the county Limerick gentlemen were getting the worst of it, for their rivals from Cork county were getting far ahead, and not a rider save old Tom Geelagher seemed capable of retrieving the honour of the red-coats of the Darra Hunt. Old Tom, however, was still in the van, side by side with the redoubtable Squire Pringle. The fox was now approaching the Glen of the Black Crow, which runs down through the centre of the wood of Kyleglass. At a certain point this glen narrows, forming a deep chasm; over which Tom Geelagher had once sprung his horse some years before. Here was an opportunity of retrieving the lost honours of the Limerick fox-hunters, and poor Tom was not slow in availing himself of it. Calling out to old Squire Pringle to follow, he dashed his horse at the terrible chasm, but the hither bank unfortunately gave way, and Tom Geelagher and his steed going headlong to the bottom, were both killed upon the rough fragments of rock that lay strewn beneath. This dreadful catastrophe put an end to the hunt for that day.

Old Tom Geelagher had often expressed a wish to his master that when he died the gentlemen of the Darra Club, with all their paraphernalia of hounds, horns, and red-coats, should attend his funeral. On this sad occasion, old Captain O—— attended most religiously to the wish of his faithful huntsman; and for that purpose invited all the gentlemen then present to wait for the mournful obsequies. Another wish of the eccentric, old huntsman was, that when the last sod was laid upon his grave, the best piper in the country should be brought to play the Maddhereen Roe over him as a requiem. The day of the funeral came, and the gentlemen in their red coats, with Captain O——'s pack of fox-hounds following, attended in long array behind poor Tom's coffin, as it was borne slowly along the winding road that led to the old churchyard of Ardpatrick, on the top of the green hill. The grave was made, the coffin lowered, the earth thrown in, and the green sods smoothed above, and then old Paddy Shanahan the elder sat down upon the fresh mound, tuned his pipes, and struck up the Maddhereen Roe in tones that drew tears from the eyes of the assembled multitude.

Just as Paddy had come to the lament in which the fox is represented sitting on the summit of a green lonely hill after a hard chase, mournfully giving vent to his outraged feelings in a heart-rending strain of melody, a young hound, which had contrived to steal away from the pack, suddenly gave a wild and savage cry within the ruins of the ancient church, and the next moment out bounded the identical old fox that had lured poor Tom Geelagher to his doom, and clearing the churchyard wall, swept away across the adjacent glen and right down into the valley, with the single hound behind him.

"Yoicks! yoicks! yoicks!" resounded from the attendant throng of red-coats.

"Tally ho! tally ho! tally ho-o-o!" and the next instant the whole meet, with the eager pack in front, swept from the churchyard, crossed the glen, and rattled away down the valley on the trail of the cunning old fox. Squire Pringle and old Major Weston rode abreast in front, and never on any occasion was such prowess shown in crossing dangerous quagmire, scrambling over scraggy fence, and flying headlong over deep trench and stone wall. Away! away! down the bottom of the valley by rolling stream, leafy wildwood, and fair dell—on and on with unslackened and desperate speed, now close upon the brush of old Reynard, and now far behind. Crag and wildwood tree seemed to fly past as the headlong chase swept on, till they reached the eastern extremity of the great valley, where the Molana rushes outward into the plain, from the pass of the Spirit's Ford. Before entering the pass, the Molana receives a tributary from the northern range of hills, and the confluence of the two streams was at that time crossed by a solitary one-arched bridge, and surrounded by a dense wood, no traces of which now remain. In this wood the fox for some time contrived to elude the eager pack. At last a peasant who was fishing by the river happening to look beneath the old bridge, saw Reynard quietly sitting upon a stone beneath the shadow of the arch, and deliberately licking himself after a few refreshing ablutions in the cool water.

The peasant immediately gave the alarm, and away went the fox once more back again up the valley, with the hounds and horsemen after him more madly than ever. It was a wild and dangerous chase, for none but the best and boldest horsemen could run the length of that rough and craggy valley, without a headlong fall or perhaps a broken neck. Before it was over old Squire Pringle broke his leg for the sixth time, and the veteran Major Weston lost his iron bridle hook, but what of that? He was now close behind his victim's brush, as that wary individual, after doubling again around the foot of Ardpatrick hill, swept away once more towards the terrible chasm in which poor Tom Geelaheer had met his woeful doom. As Reynard approached the edge of the chasm, however, with the intention perhaps of luring a few more of the horsemen to their fate, a wild and jovial cry broke from Major Weston, who was still far in front, for Blue Nelly, the mother of the pack, seized her flying foe at last by the steaming flank, and thus ended the renowned fox-hunt of Darra.

LITERARY VAMPING

IS not so acceptable as the process of vamping applied to leather, in the construction of shoes and boots. Nevertheless, thoughts will arise in the mind while we are reading, and we admire a composition as being complete, or feel disposed to add to, alter, or otherwise arrange, perhaps disarrange, it, as it happens to suit our views. It has occurred in the course of my reading, that I have disapproved of the manner in which Byron, Macaulay, Goldsmith, and Mrs. Hemans have terminated particular poems, or in which they have treated the subject of their muse in a moral point of view. This, of course, will appear to be presumptuous. Admiring as I do each of these writers, and admitting how my puny muse must "pale its ineffectual fire" before such luminaries, I yet cannot be justly charged with audacious egotism or unpardonable impudence. Instead of attempting to vamp up compositions of celebrated writers, perhaps it might be more rational in me to endeavour to write something equally good; but in every man there is a little of the critic, and I have not only found fault with the denouement or conclusion of three of the compositions of the author, in question, but have ventured upon an amendment of the defects which I have supposed to exist in these poems. The first which I shall notice—one of the many splendid productions of a noble poet, who may be reckoned in the foremost rank of the poets of any age or country—is that in which the destruction of Sennacherib has been described. It is unnecessary to narrate the history of Sennacherib. Byron has thus begun his Hebrew Melody on this dramatic theme:

"The Assyrian came down like the wolf on the fold!"

In the sixth (the concluding verse) we are told that—

"The might of the Gentile, unsmote by the sword, Hath melted like snow in the glance of the Lord,"

but full justice has not been done by the great poet to the subject which he has treated with so much fervid eloquence. He has not remembered that Sennacherib was worshipping in the house of Nis-roch, his god, when his sons smote him. The following lines have therefore been added to complete the story; the attempt is feeble, but it is made without presumption, and indeed I feel how faint and insipid the lines are, compared with the glorious lyric of the greatest orator amongst the poets, Byron.

And the leader hath fallen—did the hand of the foe,
Or the blast of the angel, the tyrant lay low?
At the shrine of his god, he is kneeling again,
And the sword of the children the father hath slain.

The next poem to which I venture to add a verse is the heroic one of Macaulay relative to the dispersion of the Spanish Armada. The gifted writer thus speaks of the occurrence:

"It was about the lovely close of a warm Summer's day,
There came a gallant merchant ship full sail to Plymouth bay,
Her crew had seen Castille's black fleet, beyond Aurigny's isle,
At earliest twilight, on the waves, lay heaving many a mile."

Then follows a glowing description of the rising in different parts of England, but the poem wants a finish. Like some of the old plays, it has "a lame" though not "an impotent conclusion;" and we are not told what became of the Armada. The cobbler again intrudes to put a peg in the classical boot:—

But stay you here, battalions, stay, you've naught to fear from Spain,
The tempest of Omnipotence is raging o'er the main;
The voice of God, a Guardian God, hath o'er the waters breathed,
Then furl your flags, recall your bands, let all your swords be sheathed;
The Spirit of the Storm hath done, all that your hosts might do,
Then bless the tempest and the Lord, for thus preserving you.

The third poem to which I shall advert is the very spirited composition of Mrs. Hemans—"The Spanish Champion." The subject represents a young Spanish warrior awaiting the expected arrival of his father; the king promises that they shall soon meet—the cavalcade advances—the king and the youth go forth to meet them—but the youth discovers that his father has been slain, and that it is only the lifeless body, dressed in armour and seated upon a horse, that appears before him; he is shocked and enraged, and drags the king towards the body of his father, placing them face to face—"the king before the dead"—the poem thus concludes:—

"He loosed the rein, his slack hand fell upon the silent face,
He cast one long, deep, mournful glance, and fled from that sad place;
His after fate no more was heard amid the martial train,
His banner led the spears no more among the hills of Spain."

I am inclined to say, as Mercutio said, when Romeo left without resenting the insult of Tybalt—

"O, calm, dishonorable, vile submission!"

And fain would I substitute the following verse for that which in the original describes the young warrior as casting a glance and flying from the place:—

Then from the scabbard of his sire the sword he quickly drew,
And at the guilty monarch's throat, like blood-hound, wildly flew;
Exclaiming, while his skull he cleft, "Accursed of thy race, Thou, too, shalt have the spectral-look of my dead father's face!"

CTESIPHON.

FICTION.—Fiction is the keenest, and deepest, and most real of all realities; the result of years of experience, observation, inquiry, reflection, and learning; the outpourings of a heart enriched too amply for its own peace, with all the varied contributions that a life of study, disappointment, and suffering can bestow; the upheaving of hidden treasures, which the bosom throws back again to fertilize the world from which it called them, as the fountain flings over the earth the waters that it had been silently gathering from the ocean, the cloud, and the mist.

LOVE AMONG THE GIPSIES.

THE character of every nation is strongly marked in the habits and customs of its people; but in no people that has ever come under the observation of a writer, are those characteristics so completely developed as in the wandering Bohemians that make every land their own. Gipsies resemble Jews in so far as they are to be found in all countries; but there the resemblance ceases. The once great people of Israel is scattered over the world; they are to be met with in every clime—subjects of every sovereign; but wheresoever the Jew settles, there he remains and there he is certain to acquire wealth, if not fame. The wealthiest, and the most famed for wealth among the citizens of the world, are Jews. The name of Rothschild is to us what that of Croesus was to the ancients—a pillar of gold. In England, Russia, Austria, and France, its influence is felt, acknowledged, and revered. America would be cap and knee to the millionaires of the eastern hemisphere. Even Andorra, that little state of which so few know anything, and which, with extraordinary politeness, returns the compliment to the unconscious many, knows that such a house as Rothschild exists, whose very name can conjure up untold treasures, and purchase almost every pleasure that human nature can desire.

Many interesting and amusing descriptions of Gipsies have been given by some of our best writers. Sir Walter Scott has immortalized the gipsy mother in his great novel, "Guy Mannering," upon which photograph Signor Verdi undoubtedly had his eye when he composed his best opera, Il Trovatore; and a still better picture of gipsy life is given by Cervantes, one of the very few great writers that have ever flourished on the other side of the Pyrenees. In our younger days we read a gipsy story, from the pen of the author of "Don Quixote," (in the original,) which we here transcribe from twilight recollection.

When Philip the Third, of the house of Austria, was King of Spain—a time when it was an honor to be a Spaniard—there resided in the capital of the kingdom one Don Fernando de Azevedo, who, at the time our tale opens, had been married close upon a year to a renowned beauty, Dona Guiomar de Meneses, who had just presented her lord and master with a daughter. This beloved child was christened Constanza de Azevedo y de Meneses—so as to combine in her own title, the illustrious names of both her parents. When the child was but nine months old, that is to say in the year 1595, she disappeared; and although indefatigable exertions were used to recover her, no trace of the missing heiress could be discovered.

Years rolled on. Don Fernando de Azevedo was appointed corregidor in Murcia, whither (accompanied by his lady) he went to reside.

The 15th of June, 1610, brought to the city of Madrid a band of gipsies, who, by singing, dancing, conjuring, and stealing, managed to collect a considerable sum of money. On the banks of the Manzanares—that most contemptible of rivers—the gipsy troop was collected about eight in the evening of the day we have mentioned. The vagrant band was surrounded by a number of idlers and cavaliers; and amongst the latter was a young man remarkable for the beauty of his face and the symmetry of his proportions. His gaze was intently fixed upon a young gipsy girl who was dancing, and who elicited by her graceful motions and her exquisite beauty many expressions of admiration from the motley audience. When the zarabanda, which is a rapid Spanish dance, was finished, an old gipsy woman made her way through the crowd with a begging face and a beseeching tongue, receiving each ochavo with a profusion of thanks. On approaching the young cavalier whom we have specially noticed, she said:—

"Signor will bestow a real upon the gipsy girl."

"Send me that lovely creature who danced and I will give thee an escudo."

"Preciosa, Preciosa, my love," cried the old gipsy, addressing the dancer, "come this way."

As the girl advanced the crowd respectfully made way to let her pass. When she arrived at the place where the cavalier and the old gipsy stood, she said:—

"What want you with me?"

"This gentleman," replied the gipsy, "will give you money."

"Corpo di Bacco!" exclaimed the cavalier, "I would give half my fortune for one smile of those lovely lips."

"Ah, signor," the girl said, "I am used to such speeches from gallants like you, but they are never worth anything."

"You shall not have that reproach to offer me," he said, placing an escudo in her hand; "and I am sorry you have classed me amongst those that speak lightly to you, for they must be villains indeed."

"An escudo!" exclaimed the girl. "Oh, thanks, signor; the gipsy girl shall always bless your kindness."

"Give me the gold, grand-daughter," the old gipsy cried, seizing the money; and putting it into the common purse, she hastened away to try her luck with others.

"That your grandmother!" said the cavalier. "Oh! I am sorry for that."

"Nay, she is very kind to me, signor," the girl replied, "and she loves me dearly."

"You are a good girl," said the gentleman, "and most beautiful. I am almost sorry that I have seen you, for it will be long before I recover my heart again."

"Farewell, signor, and bless you," she said, tripping lightly off to rejoin the people of her nation.

That night, an hour after the sun had sunk through the portals of the west—as the little stars came out one by one like maids of honour in attendance on the Queen of night—as the placid moon paid out her fathoms of silver light, the cavalier whom we noticed at the gipsy performance of the morning, might be seen walking leisurely down one of the principal streets of Madrid. He was evidently engaged in deep thought, for his head was sunk upon his chest, and his hands were clasped behind his back. But at length his reverie was broken by the cries of a woman, which issued from a neighbouring street. He hastened to the spot, and found the pretty gipsy girl, who had so strongly interested him that morning, struggling with a man, who, judging from his manner, had evidently indulged rather freely in the wine cup. On perceiving the approach of our hero, the girl cried—"Oh, signor, release me—save me!"

"Unhand the girl, villain!" exclaimed the cavalier.

"Ha, ha!" laughed the person he addressed; "and pray who are you?"

"Release her, I say," repeated the girl's champion, striking the other on the face.

"Furies!" exclaimed the man so struck, letting go the girl's arm, and drawing his sword; "a blow! You shall answer this with your blood, Don Juan."

"So then, you know me, Signor Clemente," quietly observed Don Juan, drawing his sword also, and parrying some furious thrusts which the other made at him.

"Know you, I do; and if you were fifty times a greater man than you are, I'll avenge your insult."

"If you can, signor, you are welcome."

For some moments Don Juan stood only on the defensive, but a slight scratch on the arm, inflicted by his adversary's sword, changed his tone and called up the angry blood. After a few passes more, the sword of Don Juan entered Clemente's right side, and the wounded man fell with a groan.

"Oh! signor," exclaimed Preciosa, who had watched the conflict with breathless agony, "what have you done?"

"Punished the villain that dared to insult you."

"Oh! kind signor, I am the cause of all this. But let us bind his wound," she said, at the same time kneeling by the body and binding the wound with her scarf.

Don Juan lent what assistance he could; and, after feeling his pulse he said, "By my father's shade, I fear I have done for him. But he brought it upon himself. This is very awkward, Preciosa. He is the alcalde's nephew, and I will certainly be prosecuted. I must fly the city; but whither must I go? Can you advise me how to escape the consequences of this unfortunate affair?"

"You had better come with me, signor, and join our camp. There you will find a shelter, however poor, and a welcome for the protection you have afforded me."

"Agreed, sweet Preciosa," responded Don Juan; "and I shall ever deem this mishap a lucky chance, that it furnishes me an excuse for being near thee."

That night Don Juan was introduced to the gipsy camp by Preciosa, where he was received with all honour by the tribe. The King furnished him with a change of clothes and dyed his skin, which altered his appearance so completely that even his most intimate acquaintances would not have recognised him.

As they sat around the blazing wood, the King enlarged upon the advantages which gipsy life enjoyed beyond all other modes of existence.

"We are the lords of the country," he said, "of the fields, the woods, the hills, the rivers. The rocks afford us shade; the ravines, cooling breezes; and the caverns, shelter. The inclemencies of the weather do but refresh us—the snow serves to cool us, the rain to bathe us; the thunder is our music, and the lightnings are our torches. We say yes or no, as we find it most convenient. For pictures, we have those that nature paints—those noble landscapes of lofty mountains and snowy peaks, of winding streams and verdant dales—of spreading lawns and lordly forests. We sleep under the open sky, and see the first breaking of the dawn, and watch the stars flying before the approach of day, and see the sun as he mounts to heaven in his fiery chariot, gilding the peaks and circling the mountain heads. In short, we enjoy life as best we can, and are satisfied with those luxuries which nature supplies, and which our own ingenuity can furnish."

Some of the sentiments contained in this oration were rather new to Don Juan, but he judiciously held his peace.

The gipsy encampment remained for some days a short distance from Madrid, during which time Don Juan was thrown constantly into the society of Preciosa, the influence of whose beauty and gentleness was every moment becoming stronger upon him. On the third evening of his residence in the gipsy camp he was accosted by Preciosa, who had just returned from the city. She told him that she had there heard of Signor Clemente; that his wound had turned out to be one of very light importance, and that he was rapidly recovering.

"Therefore," she added, "you are at liberty, Don Juan, to return to your own home, and bid the gipsies good bye for ever."

"Nay, Preciosa," he answered, "I will not return, save on one condition."

"And that is?"

"That you accompany me. Dear Preciosa, I love you too deeply to suffer the agony of parting from you now. Come with me, and take the position which it was intended by nature that you should occupy and adorn. Preciosa, I lay my love and fortune at your feet."

"I will not endeavour to hide from you, signor," replied the gipsy girl, "that you are as dear to me as I could possibly be to you; but still I cannot accede to your request. It would not be for your happiness. In a few short months you would come to deplore the error you committed in marrying a poor and ill-educated gipsy girl; and then I would be even more wretched than I shall be when we part."

"I swear to you, Preciosa—"

"Nay, signor, oaths prove nothing. But if you are indeed attached to me, and willing to prove the sincerity of that attachment, I have a proposal to make."

"I agree to it," Juan said, eagerly, "I agree to it, whatever it may be."

"Well, then, if you can be content to reside with us for one year, and if at the end of that time your sentiments remain unaltered, then I will joyfully become your wife."

"Dear Preciosa, I am well pleased with the course you propose, for it will afford me an opportunity of proving to you how devotedly I love you."

It was so agreed upon. The next morning the gipsies had disappeared from Madrid, and were bending their steps towards Murcia. It took them nearly three months to reach that place, and when they arrived within a mile of the city they took up their quarters at a comfortable hostel. It so happened that a military party was stopping at the inn when the gipsies arrived; and they all, officers and men, turned out to have a look at the Egyptian wanderers. The officer of the party was no less a person than our old acquaintance, Signor Clemente, who was instantly recognised by Preciosa and by Juan. On seeing Preciosa, Clemente uttered a long whistle.

"And so," he said, "do we meet again, my pretty one? Let this be a pleasanter meeting than our last. Come, that scratch I got on your account deserves a couple of salutes."

With these words he advanced towards Preciosa with an insolent swagger. But Juan stepped before her and stood face to face with Clemente.

"Stand back," said Juan, "nor dare to offer an insult to that girl."

"How now!" exclaimed Signor Clemente, "am I about to meet another Don Juan here?"

"You will find one at least," replied the disguised cavalier, "that will act by you exactly as Don Juan did."

"Begone, insolent thief!" exclaimed Clemente, striking Juan in the face.

The proud Castilian blood crimsoned Juan's brow in a moment, and rushing furiously upon Clemente, he drew his sword from its sheath, and buried the blade in its owner's bosom, exclaiming—

"Liar! die like a dog!" and Clemente fell dead at his feet.

Juan was seized in a moment by the soldiers, and he, together with the entire party was carried to the city, and brought before the corregidor. Don Fernando de Azevedo no sooner beheld Preciosa than he turned pale, and trembled violently.

"Come hither, my child," he said; and when Preciosa complied with his desire, he said—"What is thy name?"

"Preciosa, your excellency."

"How came you to be in such company?"

"I have no relation, your excellency, but my grandfather, who stands there." She pointed to the old gipsy woman who was standing at the farthest corner of room, and appeared unaccountably agitated. As soon as the corregidor's gaze settled on her she came forward and fell on her knees at his feet.

"Oh! your excellency," she cried, "I acknowledge my crime."

"What do you mean, woman?" the corregidor asked.

"Your excellency's child—"

"Yea, yes," he said eagerly, "what of her. What know you of my dear Constanza? Tell me and thou shalt be richly rewarded."

"It was I, your excellency, that stole her."

"Dreadful woman!" he said, in a tone of deep sorrow; "and what has become of her?"

"She stands before your excellency now. Yea, Preciosa, you are no relation of mine, and now I restore you to your father."

To describe the scene which ensued is more than pen dare attempt.

Preciosa, restored to her parents, became the joy and pride of their old age. Her hand was bestowed upon Don Juan, who had long since won her love by his sincere and honourable attachment to her as a poor gipsy girl. He lived with his bride long and happily, for the laws of Spain were not so absurd as to punish a nobleman for avenging an insult.

ARDFINNAN CASTLE.

ARDFINNAN CASTLE.

THE village of Ardfinnan, in the county of Tipperary, is a place of very considerable antiquity, and derives its name from a celebrated ecclesiastic who founded a church here in the seventh century, prior to which time it was called in the Irish Annals "Druim-abhradh." The magnificent ruin of Ardfinnan Castle is one of the most picturesque and attractive features of the river Suir. It was erected in the year 1186, by John, Earl of Morton, afterwards King John, of infamous memory, of whom it has been remarked that he achieved nothing during his sojourn in Ireland, but the construction of this and two other castles, namely, Lismore and Tibraghny. A large amount of judgment and military skill were exhibited in the selection of Ardfinnan as the site of a fortress, as it commanded one of the principal passes into South Munster. As its ruins still sufficiently show, its general form was that of a parallelogram, strengthened by square towers at the corners, and having a strong entrance gateway. It was preserved as a military stronghold until the year 1649, when it was dismantled by that inveterate castle-destroyer, Oliver Cromwell. The village of Ardfinnan itself was once a place of great importance, and appears to have had a corporation, as it is on record that in the reign of Edward II. a grant of "pontage for three years" was made to "the bailiffs and good men of Ardfynan." The banks of the Suir, beneath the Castle, are connected by a bridge of fourteen arches, said to be coeval with the erection of the fortress.

THE GOLDEN BUTTERFLY.

AFTER visiting the stupendous cliffs of Moher, the tourist who proceeds inland and climbs to the summit of a certain steep mountain in the parish of Kilsaboy, county Clare, will see shining beneath him in the summer sunlight the beautiful lake of Inchiquin, with its solitary island and its ruined castle. This lake is nearly three miles in circumference, and with the wild tier of mountains that rises abruptly over its western shore, and the varied succession of woody glens, fern-clad slopes, green meadows, and heather-empurpled moorlands that meets the eye from their summits, the traveller who gazes upon the scene will scarcely fail to pronounce it a picture of beauty equal to the best he has seen during his wanderings amid the fair hills of our romantic isle. Not alone from the circle of beautiful scenery of which it forms the centre is this fair sheet of water interesting. Hoar tradition still lingers by its shores, and the solitary herdsman who sits with you on the brow of the mountain, or the sun-embrowned peasant in the corn-field beneath, who returns your salute with the warm response peculiar to his native land, will treat you to a number of legends associated with that delightful neighbourhood, many of which the careful inquirer will find to be connected with some historical incident of olden time. The poet, too, has not left it unsung. One of our most gifted bards has limned it in a poem of more than ordinary excellence and beauty—"The Monks of Kilcrea."

The point of land on which the ruin stands seems to have been originally an island. The castle, though now greatly dilapidated, is still interesting, both from its situation and from the historical and legendary lore connected with it. It was built by a powerful chief of the O'Quins, the ancestors of the present Earl of Dunraven. Passing from the date of its erection, which is involved in obscurity, we come to about the middle of the fifteenth century, some time previous to which the castle seems to have been taken possession of by the O'Briens. The first of that name who made it his residence was Thiege, Prince of Thomond, whose death, according to the "Annals of the Four Masters," occurred in the year 1466. From that date it continued to be the residence of the successive chiefs of that powerful family, the O'Briens of Inchiquin, whose title of earl is now merged in the higher one of Marquis of Thomond.

Like many another Irish lake the waters of Inchiquin are said to roll over the domes and palaces of a submerged city. The solitary fisherman who rows his light skiff or curragh over its smooth expanse on a calm summer evening, still believes that he can see and will tell you a tale of a remote ancestor of the O'Quins, in which that hero is represented in the act of being overwhelmed by the raging waters, castle, town, and all, on account of some offence against one of the fairy potentates of the locality. Be this as it may, we will now come to the last O'Quin who ruled over the wild and romantic territory of Hy-Ifearnan, his ancient patrimony, and relate the cause of his expulsion from that region of mountain and moor, lake and tumbling river, together with his migration at the head of his broken clan across the Shannon, and his settlement in the county Limerick where his descendants, as we have remarked above, remain to the present day, still holding a considerable portion of the rich lands of which they originally took possession.

"The round towers of other days

In the castle of Inchiquin dwelt Donal, an aged chief, whose youth and manhood had been spent in battle and turmoil, but who now in his old age determined to throw aside targe and spear and iron glove, and spend the remainder of his days governing his broad lands in peace and equity. Of all Donal's children none remained to cheer his heart as he trod the final stages of life's troublous journey, save his youngest son, Rory the Black, a youth of whom the old chief was very proud, and who was already renowned for both his personal beauty and for his many knightly accomplishments. At the period to which we allude, young Rory the Black was just after leaving the ancient monastery of Kilfenora, in which he had been educated from his childhood, and from which he had never been allowed to come forth, save on such times as he was sent to the wars to learn the profession of arms, or during the great days of festival held by his clan in their merry principality of Hy-Ifearnan.

One day, after his departure from Kilfenora and final settlement in his father's castle of Inchiquin, young Rory went out to hunt. Unattended by either headsmen or horse-varlet, he crossed the rugged chain of mountains that overhung the lake, and rode down into a deep glen through the bosom of which a murmuring brown stream rolled down sparkling in the sunlight. After traversing several miles of this glen with his four gray stag-hounds behind him, the green forest beneath which he rode gradually became more stunted and at length disappeared altogether, when before him opened a wide, stern, and solitary valley, without a single shrub or tree to hide its grim rocks and barren hollows. On making the circuit round the base of a huge crag that towered over the turbulent stream, he looked up the valley and saw a huge red stag rushing down its eastern slope, with a man who ran with extraordinary swiftness in close pursuit behind him. This strange hunter was clad in the skins of beasts, and held a short bright spear in his hand, which he cast at the stag as the latter with a bound cleared the broad bed of the torrent. He missed his aim, however, and the spear stuck quivering deep in the green sward on the further bank, while the stag bounded swiftly up the other slope of the valley. And now the hunter, also with a single bound, cleared the stream, snatched up his weapon, and with chest bent forward and head erect darted up the hill at a speed that soon brought him within his original distance of the panting stag. But beyond that distance he seemed unable to advance as both swept up the hill, till at last they disappeared from the view of Rory the Black beyond its verge.

The young chief now rode farther up the valley, expecting to see no more of the hunter and the stag; but after a short time they appeared retracing their headlong course, and enacting over again what had occurred at the crossing of the torrent. Six times was all this repeated, during which Rory had great difficulty in preventing his hounds from darting forward and joining in the marvellous chase. At the seventh time, just as the hunter had thrown his spear, and was in the act of springing across the glen, his foot caught in a looped ivy stem that stretched along the edge, and he was thrown headlong into the deep pool of water beneath. Rory knew that such a hunter had but little to fear from the narrow pool of a mountain torrent, and seeing the stag rush up the hill, he found himself unable to resist the temptation any longer, so, throwing the bridle loose and touching his steed with the spur, he called merrily to his hounds and dashed in pursuit. The stag had got a good start, and as Rory gained the ridge or spine of the hill, was half way down the slope at the other side. But now both steed and hounds went bravely downward and began to gain upon the deer, till the latter, coming to the base of an immense wall of rock at the bottom, turned upward in a circular course, and went back again in full career for the first valley, where, instead of directly crossing the stream as he did previously, he now rushed obliquely along the slopes and rocks towards the extreme end, and there turning, came down at a thundering pace on the opposite side, with Rory and his baying hounds still close upon his track. Another round of the immense valley, and again the stag came down, now on the very brink of the roaring stream. Just as he had gained the spot where his first pursuer fell, however, Bran, Rory's best hound, seized him by the haunch, and after a violent struggle, during which the other dogs had come up, all rolled over the abrupt edge into the stream. Rory, on coming to the spot, dismounted and looked down. The huge stag was stretched dead beneath upon the sand, and the hounds were quietly lapping the cool water beside him. The strange hunter, however, was nowhere to be seen, till Rory, after descending the steep side of the glen and making a close search, at last found him lying upon a damp bank, apparently dead from the effects of his fall.

After a copious sprinkling of water from the stream, the stranger at length began to revive, and was soon able to stand and account for himself.

"Knight of Inchiquin," he said, "thou hast done me a service, for which I will repay thee well."

"Who art thou?" returned Rory; "for I never saw a man in thy strange guise amid these mountains before."

"I am Merulan the Wizard," answered the stranger.

"Take thy stag, then," said Rory, "Wert thou another hunter I might claim him for myself, seeing that my hounds have killed him; but, by my knightly faith, it were pity to deprive hunter like thee of such spoil. Take him—or, stay. Come to my father's house, and thou wilt have good cheer during many a merry moon."

"I cannot go," answered Merulan, "but I thank thee none the less. Thou and thine wert ever bountiful to the poor and friendless from generation to generation, since the day that the mighty Ollicl Oluim put his sword in the scabbard, and made the wise laws for the sons of Inisfail."

"Why canst thou not come?" said Rory, looking kindly on Merulan. "Thou hast nought to bind thee to one spot, so come with me, and we will have feasting and merry revel for many a day in the halls of Inchiquin."

"It cannot be," returned Merulan. "I must spend a year and a day, in the cave that lies beneath yonder crag. The stag thy hounds have killed will give me food for a long time; and," continued he, with a smile of strange sweetness and benevolence, "when I want another, thou hast seen enough of me to-day to show thee that I cannot die with hunger whilst a single deer bides within these mountains. However, for the service thou hast done me, take this," and putting his hand into his leathern pouch he drew therefrom the semblance of a butterfly, carved in flashing gold, and handed it to Rory. One of the legs of the glittering little image was pointed like the pin of a brooch.—"Take this," continued he, "and place it as a clasp for thy plume. As yet thy heart is kind and full of equity, but when thou growest older, the world may change thee, as it changeth every mortal man. Wear this, however, above thy forehead, and as long as thou dost right it will continue to shine brightly as thou seest it now; but the moment the doing of a bad deed enters into thy heart, it will cease to shine, and become dull and dark as the damp sod beneath our feet!"

Rory, after looking with delight on the strange gift, placed it as a clasp to the plume of his light-barred cap. Merulan, with another smile, bade him farewell, and then both left the glen, Rory riding across the ridge into another valley, and the wizard bearing the body of the stag towards his solitary cave.

When Rory had crossed the range of mountains, the mighty and rugged spurs of which shot out into a wide plain, a great forest extended itself before him, within the mazes of which he wound his horn merrily and hunted all day long, till the sun seemed resting beyond upon the far glittering waves of the boundless ocean. He then bethought himself of returning, but before he did so dismounted and sat down upon a green bank, in a flowery dell surrounded by many a silver birch and waving rowan-tree. At last the sun set, and the dim shadows of twilight began to steal upon the resting-place of the young hunter. He now took off his barred-cap, and looked again upon the golden butterfly. Its two minute eyes seemed of diamonds, and as the dark shadows gathered down faster and faster, and made a gloom upon all the forest around, the wonderful image emitted a light that seemed to fill the whole glade, and enabled him to distinguish the smallest leaf or blade of grass, even to a point far in between the trunks of the encircling trees. After gazing and wondering for some time, he again mounted his steed, and calling his hounds, proceeded through the forest homeward, the magic plume-clasp lighting his way through dark recesses and tangled paths with a brilliancy far transcending that of the brightest star or the yellow moon of autumn.

On the farthest verge of the forest ran a broad, swift river, to which the turbulent stream of the desert valley was a tributary. As Rory came towards the bank of this river, he heard a wild and piteous scream, which seemed to proceed from some one struggling for life in the water. Down he rode to the bank, the magic butterfly still lighting his way, and looking out upon the stream, beheld in the midst the figure of a young girl as she floated helplessly with the tide, still, however, faintly endeavouring to keep herself upon the surface. In an instant Rory dashed his horse into the river, at a point below that where the girl was still struggling, and as she floated downward, caught her in his strong grasp, and carried her safe to the other shore. For a time she lay insensible on the bank, but she soon recovered and thanked her deliverer in a voice of exceeding sweetness. She said that she was the only daughter of a kern, or foot soldier, who lived hard by, and who served the lord of Inchiquin, and that as she was crossing the ford, a little distance above, she had lost her footing and fallen into the river.

Rory, by the light of the golden image, had time to examine the features and form of the young girl, as she stooped up and prepared to depart for her father's cot. He had never before beheld a being so beautiful. She seemed at first frightened at the strange light emitted by the image, and began to think that she owed her deliverance to some forest sprite, but, when again she looked upon the smiling, noble face of the young chieftain, and heard his kind words, she knew he was mortal, and invited him to partake of the hospitality of her father's cot beside the river. This invitation Rory thankfully accepted, and when they arrived at the wood-kern's cottage, the surprise of the young girl knew no bounds when she saw her father welcoming Rory as the son of the brave lord of Inchiquin.

The more Rory saw of the beautiful young girl, the more he admired her, and when he took his departure in the morning, it is not to be wondered at that he resolved to return frequently to the cottage. And he did return, and who will marvel when they hear that he was at last in love with the beautiful Enna, the daughter of the wood-kern, and that he swore, come what would, to make her his wife. All this, however, he kept secret from his father, for he knew that the latter, though just and wise, would sooner see him dead than the husband of a low-born maiden such as Enna.

And thus a year passed away, at the end of which the old lord of Inchiquin, finding his health failing, and wishing to see his affairs settled before his death, began to negotiate a match between his son and the daughter of O'Brien, lord of Thomond. It was now that Rory found himself sorely beset, between his duty to his father and his love for the young peasant girl. In those times the wishes of children were not consulted, particularly by their parents, and so after a few meetings between the lord of Thomond and his vassal chief, old Donal of Inchiquin, the match was made, and the day was appointed for the marriage of Rory the Black and the haughty Maud O'Brien.

The important day came, and Rory, who had secretly married the lovely Enna in the interim, refused of course the hand of the princess of Thomond, for which rebellious act, at the instigation of O'Brien, he was lodged in one of the strongest dungeons of Inchiquin by his incensed father.

Day after day the old chief visited Rory in his prison, expecting the latter to be brought to reason, and thus matters went on for nearly half a year, at the end of which time Rory grew tired of his confinement, and began to think in his misery of repudiating his low-born wife, and marrying the young princess of Thomond. The father, noticing the change, now worked upon his mind untiringly until at length Rory gave his consent, though he knew that in the far-off cottage by the forest river, his rightful wife would die when she heard the woeful news. It was now all rejoicing in Inchiquin. Rory was liberated, and another day was appointed for the bridal that had caused so much trouble. The lord of Thomond's castle was situated a considerable distance away from Inchiquin, beyond the mountains, and that they might reach it about noon, Rory and his father, and their gallant train set out on their journey before the dawn of day. On they went, and now some glamour seemed to influence Rory, for never a thought came into his mind of the golden butterfly, and the kindly warning of Merulan, in connection with it. At the crossing of a glen his horse stumbled, but there was now no light to guide his way—nothing but darkness before and around him. During the passage of a quagmire, again his horse stumbled and almost fell forward into a treacherous pool of water; still he thought not of the golden gift of Merulan.

And now upon the plain smooth road, the horse for the third time stumbled and fell forward, bringing Rory down with him.

"I would to heaven," exclaimed the young chief, as he extricated himself from his horse, and then helped the animal to rise—"that it was on the road to the far-off forest I was, where dwells my loved and lawful wife!"

At that moment the golden butterfly cast a faint glitter upon the dark road.

"She will die, poor thing," resumed Rory, "when she hears of the base act I am about to do. I have half a mind to refuse once more, be the consequence what it may!"

The gleam from the golden image became brighter.

"Yes!" exclaimed Rory as he now noticed the change suddenly, "come what will I will not advance a step further towards the consummation of this bad deed. I will return and proclaim my wife to my father's vassals, and die if necessary to defend her!"

And now the light became like the rising sun, brightening all a-pear. Rory sprang to his saddle, wheeled his horse around, and in a moment dashed away on the backward track, pursued by his father and the train of gallants who attended him. It was still dark, and the rays from the magic butterfly lit Rory's path as he fled fast and far towards the cottage of his young wife. His father was soon left behind, and the pursuit at length entirely ceased.

Rory reached his wife before the hot noontide, and lived concealed in her little cot beside the river for a month. At the end of that time his father died, and he was proclaimed chief of Inchiquin. He then avowed his marriage, when a fierce war followed between himself and the prince of Thomond, who swore that he would never rest night or day, till the clan O'Quin was swept, root and branch, from the principality of Clare. And he kept his vow, for he never ceased till he had driven Rory the Black to such extremities, that the latter, with his young wife and his broken clan, was at length forced to bid farewell to his ancient patrimony of Inchiquin, and cross the Shannon into the county Limerick, where his line, as we have said, is still represented by the earl of Dunraven.

SCENES OF LIFE.—Many scenes of life are holy: the early morn, the twilight hour, the starry night, the rolling storm, the hymn of thousands from the sacred fane, the marriage rite, or funeral dirge; but none more holy than the chamber of the dying, lingering beside a departing spirit, seeing as if already the angel shone above the mortal, waiting but the eternal summons to wing his flight on high.

A VICTIM TO ADVICE.

Y unfortunate friend, Ned Dalton (poor fellow! he has long put off this mortal coil), was respected by everybody, because he did every thing that everybody wished him to do. He once had a small—very small—independence, and had lived a life of ease for some years, until at length the love of strong waters, and the intoxicating society deprived him of it. He had nothing friends have been heard of it remarkably well sort, that he was not to do any thing else. mode of employment, and very unprofitable in sort Ned was fain to friends for assistance, sovered that they were acquainted with the moral obligations" to recognise the principle that, because they had been willing to accept favours from him, they should be equally willing to grant him favours in return. He had puzzled his brains to such an extent, without any favourable result, that at length he began to think he no longer had any brains to puzzle, and being reduced to extremities, he meditated a trip to America, or to one of those distant colonies (at the time I write of the gold regions of California and Australia had not been discovered), where people imagine that fortunes are to be picked up like acorns on a windy day. He mentioned this idea to his friend and quondam associate, Ralph O'Malley, who took, or affected to take—which, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, means the same thing—a warm interest in his welfare. "I am quite weary," said he, "of this precarious state of lodging-house existence, for, without money or employment, I am as helpless as a turtle on the broad of its back. There's nothing to be done here, for people will not employ me because I wear moustaches, and there's nobody to be done, because the Small Debts Act has given to trade an advantage over speculation. I shall, therefore, be off to the colonies, and bid good-bye to the miseries and mysteries of Dublin life."

"Pooh, pooh! my dear Ned," said O'Malley, "don't talk in that strain. Fortune is, at best, but a fickle goddess, and as often changes her favourites as a country changes its ministers. Take my advice, stay where you are; and I'll tell you how you may jump out of your present chrysalis state, and become a butterfly of the choicest colours."

"Well, let me hear it," replied Dalton; "but don't lead me into any rash speculation which may in turn lead me into a prison."

"Nonsense, my dear boy," rejoined O'Malley, "I only want to lead you to the altar, not to the gallows. Be advised in time, and now is the time. Get married. I'll introduce you to a girl who is well qualified to make a faithful wife, for she has plenty of money and very little beauty."

Now, amongst the various schemes which Ned Dalton had conceived for the improvement of his fortunes, the idea of matrimony had not once entered his head, but he was never too proud to take advice, and he immediately yielded to the suggestion proffered to him.

The preliminaries were speedily arranged through the dexterous contrivances of O'Malley, and in the course of a few days Ned Dalton was received as a visitor at the house of the young lady's parents. He was not devoid of natural gifts, and so well did he display them before the fair damsel whose fortune he wished to make his own, that in less than three weeks he was her accepted suitor. Miss Laura Nettleton (for her name need not be concealed) was certainly not handsome, nor was she very young, but her manners were tolerably pleasant, and she had a head of black hair which was always so beautifully arranged that a fashionable coiffeur would have been proud to exhibit it in his window. Now a head of black hair was a most charming ornament in the eyes of Ned Dalton, and as in the present instance it bore the recommendation of belonging to a lady of fortune, he thought he should be a very happy Benedict. As he could not boast that degree of respectability which is said to belong to "a gentleman who keeps a gig," he contrived on several occasions to borrow a horse, in order that he might raise himself in the estimation of his beloved fiancée, whose confiding nature, he was quite sure, would never allow her to doubt that the animal was a part of his own stud. One fine morning he proposed to Mr. Nettleton, the father, that Miss Laura should take a ride with him in the Phoenix Park, for Mr. Nettleton was himself the proprietor of a horse, and Miss Nettleton was the proprietress of a habit. The matter was soon arranged, and Ned Dalton and Laura were amongst the dashing equestrians in the Park, the former thinking how delightful it would be when he and his wife could disport themselves on their own chargers, and the latter meditating upon her good fortune in having gained so promising a husband. Suddenly, the horse which Miss Nettleton rode made a bound forward, and whilst that young lady was endeavouring to ascertain the cause of this eccentric movement, he began to indulge in various gymnastic exercises, which, though apparently very agreeable to himself, were extremely dangerous to his rider. Dalton seized the horse's bridle, but not in time to avoid the shocking catastrophe that ensued. The lovely Laura, being unused to such capers as we have described, was unable to maintain her seat, and in the violence of the shock which disturbed her equilibrium, her hat fell off; and, oh, horrible to relate! the head of black hair fell with it, revealing to the astonished eyes of Ned Dalton a stunted growth of—"carrots"—(the dreadful word must out, however angry the ladies may be to see it), which would doubtless have shone forth in rich luxuriance, had they not been deprived of their fair proportions!

As a novelist would say, I must throw a veil over Miss Nettleton and the scene which followed between that young lady and the bewildered Dalton. Suffice it to say that, having been deceived in one instance, Ned began to fear he might be so in another; and, therefore, he thought it advisable to make minute inquiries respecting the "fortune," which, together with the beautiful black hair alluded to, constituted the attraction of Miss Laura Nettleton. The result of those inquiries was, that the fortune proved to be no more a reality than the hair, and thus was poor Ned Dalton's disappointment complete. He had innocently thought to improve his hapless condition; and whether he did so or not will be gathered from a brief dialogue which took place between himself and Ralph O'Malley, about a month after the appalling accident in the Phoenix Park.

"Here's a nice predicament you have brought me into!" exclaimed Dalton, as he entered his friend's apartment. "I'm a victim to your confounded advice!"

"What's the matter now?" said the astonished O'Malley, "I thought I had given you advice which any man ought to be grateful for; and I not only persuaded you to marry, but I introduced you to a young lady of good connections and large property."

"Yes!" replied the deluded Dalton, scarcely able to control his indignation, "a lady whose property might be purchased at any wig-maker's in the city of Dublin."

O'Malley was about to seek an explanation of this mysterious speech, but Dalton checked him by exclaiming, "Ask no questions, Ralph, but be satisfied with what I tell you. All I need say is, that I have become the victim of your gratuitous advice, and that, instead of being the husband of a lady of fortune, I am the defendant in an action for breach of promise of marriage!"

The result of the trial was, that the would-be Benedict was mulcted in heavy damages; and I have good reason to believe that he paid the debt of nature without paying the penalty of his matrimonial defalcation. There is, moreover, strong ground for supposing that, in his determination to avenge himself upon the gentler (and fickle) sex, he afterwards penned that bold piece of advice which Sir Creswell Creswell must long since have endorsed—"To persons about to marry—Don't!"

THE SHEPHERD'S FAREWELL.

(From the Spanish.*)

Ballyshannon, flowery village,
Flowery village, once my home!
Peaceful rest amid thy mountains
That afar off see me roam.

Left my little flock for ever,
Never, by the river-tide,
Shall I tend the merry kiddings
Leaping by the mother's side—
On the upland pasture, never Pass the glowing noon away,
Shaded 'neath the wavering wild-rose
Looking o'er the dreamy bay!

Bear I these alone for dower,
Flowery village, once my home!
Sweet old songs and tunes of childhood,
In my breast where'er I roam!

On this mountain-slope above thee,
Where I spent my happy time,
Mid the fruit my hands had planted,
Gladdened by thy distant chime,

Here, ere leaving thee for ever,
Here I light a fire—the last,
Mid my cot's down-broken ruins,
And the ruins of the past.
Nought remains of all my labour—
Nought but broom and nettles rank,
Thistles, gorse, and wild weeds cluster
Over meadowy field and bank.

Burnt in flame, dry weeds and branches
Light the ruins of the home,
And the sad steps of the master
Who afar off now must roam!

Seeking some fair spot of safety
O'er the hills my path shall lie,
Sleeping, mayhap, in their bosoms
Neath the vigil of the sky.

Sleeping, mayhap, by the fireside
Of some shepherd rough and kind,
With my heart gone back in slumber
To the land I leave behind.
Or, it may be, in the valleys,
Roving through the gentle spring,
Tilling mid the lowland gardens
Whilst the flowers are opening.

Or upon the moving waters,
Seeking good gifts of the sea,
Till another tempest coming,
Drives me off, as now from thee!

But amid the cities never,
Never shall my pathway lie,
Where great walls shut out the mountains,
And dark smoke the roofy sky.
Ballyshannon, flowery village,
Flowery village, once my home!
Peaceful rest amid thy mountains,
That afar off see me roam!

ERIONWACH.

* The original is the composition of Dr. D. Joaquin Villanueva, a distinguished Carlist, who having been compelled to leave Spain from political reasons, sought and found a happy refuge in Ireland. His historical work, in Latin, in reference to Irish history is well known, but few are aware that amongst his poetical works are to be found many a grateful reminiscence of Irish scenery and legend. The original of the above commences thus:—

Ballyshannon la florida
Do fue un tiempo mi casar,
Quedate entre tus colinas
Que me voy a otro lugar.

CHINESE DELICACIES.

NE of the most curious food products in high repute in China, is in the form of the edible nest of a species of swallow, extensively obtained in some of the islands of the Eastern Archipelago. These nests are attached to the sides of rocks, like those of our martin and swallow to walls, and look like so many watch-pockets. The eggs are white, with a slight pinkish tinge, and are generally two in number. The nests are either white, red, or black, and the natives maintain that these are built by three distinct species, but this is altogether erroneous. The gathering of these nests takes place three times a year—in the end of April, the middle of August, and in December. The yearly produce is commonly between 50 and 60 piculs of 133 lbs. The business of collection is described as being opened with great ceremony by the natives. By the assistance of ladders and stags, made of rattan, the collectors descend the rocks and cliffs, provided with the requisite bags to contain the nests, which are taken from the wall by the hand, and those which are on the roof by an iron hook made fast to a long bamboo. The birds feed upon different kinds of bloodless insects.

The nests are brought principally from Java and Sumatra, though they are found on most of the rocky islets of the Indian Archipelago. The species of swallow whose habitation the nest is, is known as the "Hirundo esculenta." The nests are composed of a mucilaginous substance, but as yet they have never been analysed with sufficient accuracy to show the constituents. Externally, they resemble ill-concocted, fibrous isinglass, and are of a white colour, inclining to red. Their thickness is little more than that of a silver spoon, and the weight from a quarter to half an ounce. When dry, they are brittle and wrinkled; the size is nearly that of a goose-egg. Those that are dry, white, and free from dirt and feathers, are the most valuable. They are packed in bundles, with split rattans run through them, to preserve the shape. Those procured after the young are fledged, are not saleable in China. The quality of the nest varies, according to the situation and extent of the caves, and the time at which they are taken. If procured before the young are fledged, the nests are of the best description; if they contain eggs only they are still valuable; but if the young are in possession of the nests, they are regarded as worthless. The best are found in deep, damp caves, which, if not injured, will continue to produce indefinitely. The method of procuring these nests is not unattended with danger. Some of the caves are so precipitous, that no one but those accustomed to the employment from their youth can obtain the nests, being only approachable by a perpendicular descent of many hundred feet, by ladders of bamboo and rattan, over a sea rolling violently against the rocks. When the mouth of the cave is attained, the perilous task of taking the nests must often be performed by torchlight, by penetrating into recesses of the rock, where the slightest slip would be instantly fatal to the adventurer. Such is the price paid to gratify luxury. After the nests are obtained they are cleansed, carefully dried and packed, and forwarded in the native junks to market. The majority of the best kind are sent to Peking for the use of the court. It may be remarked that this curious dish is only an article of expensive luxury amongst the Chinese; the Japanese do not use it at all. The labour bestowed to render it fit for the table is enormous; every feather or impurity of any kind is carefully removed, and then, after undergoing many washings and preparations, it is made into a soft, delicious jelly. Mr. J. H. Moor, in his notices of the Indian Archipelago, published at Singapore some years since, thus writes concerning these nests. "One of the principal and most valuable articles of exportation is the edible bird's-nests, white and black. These are found in much greater abundance in and about the Codi, more than any other part of Borneo, or from what we at present know on the subject, all parts put together. On the western coast they are scarcely known to exist; about Banjermassin and Bagottan there are none; at Bataliching and Passier they are found in considerable quantities. At Browe there is abundance of the black kind of a very superior quality, but little of the white. At Seboe, and all the parts to the north of Borneo, we know there is none, as I have seen many letters from different Rajahs of those countries averring the fact, and begging the Sultan of Coti to exchange his edible nests for their most valuable commodities, and at his own price. Nor ought this to create surprise, when we consider not only the large consumption of this article by the Cambodjans, who almost exclusively inhabit some of the largest Sooloo islands, and the northern parts of Borneo, but the amazing demand on the whole coast of Cambodia, particularly of Cochin China, the principal inhabitants of which countries are as partial to this luxury as their more northern neighbours, the Chinese. There are in Coti and adjacent Dyak countries perhaps eighty known places, or what the natives term holes, which produce the white nests. I have seen the names of forty-three."

The exports of birds'-nests from Java, between the years 1823 and 1832, averaged about 250 piculs a year, but latterly the exports have not averaged half that amount, and in 1853 and 1854 there were only about thirty-five or forty piculs shipped.

Talking about Chinese dishes and Chinese cooking, the late Albert Smith, writing in 1858, says: "It consists for the most part of rats, bats, snails, bad eggs, and hideous fish, dried in the most frightful attitudes. Some of the restaurateurs carry their cook-shops about with them on long poles, with the kitchen at one end, and the salle-à-manger at the other. These are celebrated for a soup made, I should think, from large caterpillars boiled in a thin gravy, with onions." Not a very inviting repast that! The following is said, with what amount of truth we know not, to be an extract from the bill of fare of one of the San Francisco eating-houses:

|-------------------------|-----------|
| Grimalkin steaks, . . . | 25 cents. |
| Bow-wow soup, . . . | 12 " |
| Roasted bow-wow, . . . | 18 " |
| Bow-wow pie, . . . | 6 " |
| Stews ratified, . . . | 6 " |

What is meant by "stews rat-ified"? to say the least of it, the dish is very dubious. In contrast to this, however, take another description of a Chinese feast in San Francisco. The writer (an American) after describing some ten or twelve courses, consisting of stewed acorns, chestnuts, sausages, dried ducks, stuffed oysters, shrimps, periwinkles, and ending with tea, each course being served up with small china bowls and plates, in the neatest manner, observes: "We have dined in many a crack restaurant, where it would be a decided improvement to copy from our Chinese friends. The most difficult feat for us was the handling of the chop-sticks, which mode of carrying to the mouth is a practical illustration of the old proverb, 'many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip.' We came away after a three hours' sitting, fully convinced that a China dinner is a very costly and elaborate affair, worthy the attention of epicures. From this time henceforth we are in the field for China, against any insinuations on the question of diet à la rat, which we pronounce a tale of untruth." But we fear the truth of the great consumption of rats in China as a delicacy is incontrovertible. Mr. Wingrove Cooke, the special correspondent of the London "Times," in his graphic letter from the Celestial Empire, describing a certain gnoll, says that two hundred rats are destroyed in it every night, which the prisoners saw every morning "with tearful eyes and watering mouths" cast out in waste. Unable at last to see these delicacies thus wilfully destroyed, they indited a petition to the authorities, proving from Confucius that it was sinful to cast away the food of man, and praying that the rats might be handed over to them to cook and eat! Mr. Cooke vouches for the authenticity of this circumstance. It is not long since a genius originated the idea of introducing a new article of traffic into the China market from India, namely, salted rats! A correspondent of the "Calcutta Citizen," in writing from Kurrachee, the principal town of Scinde, a province much infested with rats, announced his determination to export 120,000 salted rats to China. He said:—"I have to pay one pice a dozen, and the gutting, salting, pressing, and packing in casks, raises the price to six pice a dozen (about three farthings), and if I succeed in obtaining anything like the price that rules in Whampoa and Canton for corn-grown rats, my fortune is made, or rather I will be on the fair road to it, and will open a fine field of enterprise to Scinde."

What can be said of Chinese delicacies after this?

THE LONG VACATION.

E all remember the delight with which the word "Vacation" used to fill us when we were schoolboys. The mere thought of the glorious season when he should be at liberty, when books were to be thrown aside, and the rule of ushers should for a time be no more, was enough to make us bear up cheerfully against the manifold disagreeabilities, which after all make up no small portion of a schoolboy's existence. Well do I recollect how, as the blissful day of release drew nigh, the dreaded cane, that awful sceptre of pedantic despotism, would be filched from its place by some daring spirit, covered with crape, and hung up over the scroll which adorned the schoolroom wall, and from which blazed out, in the most magnificent calligraphy, the dear old doggerel Latin lines—

"Omnia bene, sine pœna,
Tempus est ludendi.
Venit hora, abaque mora
Libros deponendi."

There was not a dunce in the place, whose palms had grown callous from repeated "pandyng" for hopeless obtusity in the matter of Delectus or Greek Testament, who could not construe those verses, aye, and if need were, parse every word of them. The head boy of the school himself, great a scholar as he was, found in them a philosophy and a charm, which the sweetest of Horace's lyrics did not contain, and even the masters could hardly refrain from allowing them to get mixed up with every task which they set, and every lesson which they heard. And then, when all was over, when the break-up had come, and the only work before us was that of packing up our trunks and getting off as fast as we could, to what a cheer did the roof of the school-house echo? How warm were the hand-shakings as we bade each other good-bye, and set out for our several homes, and how bright and happy were the faces which but a few days ago were heavy and dismal, heavy with wearisome attempts to master tasks which would not be mastered, dismal at the prospect of speedy and certain corporeal correction. But all that was forgotten now; the most mortal enemies became reconciled, and even Pickle, whose life, during the year, was one long flagellation, and consequently one long vow of dire vengeance against the tyrant who wielded the rod, forgot on this day both his sufferings and his purposed revenge, and parted kindly from the hated Doctor. And then the place was empty, save for perhaps one or two of the Masters who remained behind, and perhaps too, some poor little fellow whom some evil destiny compelled to stay, when all the rest were gone, and for six long, wretched weeks,—how short and happy for others,—to mope in solitude about the deserted playgrounds and class-rooms, without even a lesson to learn and kill time with. Another kind of breaking up I also remember, that at a large continental college, at which it was my fate to have been a boarder for some years. There was not the same boisterousness about it which is usually found at an English school. French boys, and Germans too, are, in general, rather quiet and subdued in their manners. There is more uproar in an English school in one day than in a French one in a month. But though there was no cheering, though there were no doggerel Latin rhymes, though there was no funeral decoration of the cane,—one good reason for this being, that there was no cane or other instrument of bodily torture in the school,—the signs of the approach of vacation were manifest enough. Frequent visits had to be made to the school tailor for clothes for the journey home, some of our residences being distant enough, and the period I am writing of, being anterior to the general existence of railways on the continent. As time wore on, the boys struck out the several days in their Ordos or school almanacks, a process which had the effect, rather of making time move slowly, than of adding any swiftness to his flight. Then various boys began to take their departure, some alone, some in companies of two or three, others in larger numbers. Before they went, they always came dressed, for the road, to the playgrounds of the various divisions, into which the school was divided, to bid farewell to their companions. Then was performed the ceremony of what, as well as I remember, was called the caravan, that is, those who were going away were taken by the arms of those who remained, and all the division, linked thus together, walked backwards and forwards in two long lines facing each other, for twenty minutes or half an hour. This of course was meant as a token of regard and affection for those who were about to depart. Then, when it was time, the caravan broke up, and there ensued a scene, not of hand-shaking in our honest, insular way, but of weeping, embracing, and kissing, as is the fashion, even among males, on the continent. And so, well embraced and much wept over, each departed. Then as the last day drew nearer, those who were to spend their vacation in walking tours, such as M. Töppfer has described in his admirable Voyages en Zig Zag, became the lions of the moment, by virtue of the thick-soled shoes studded with heavy nails, and the leather gaiters in which they began to clothe their nether extremities. And so, little by little, all melted away, somewhat more rapidly indeed, after the prizes of the year had been distributed, than before; but still it was a melting away rather than a breaking up. The last to leave were the les Voyageurs, who, in two or three detachments, clad in blouses, their sticks in their hands, and their knapsacks on their backs, set out on their various routes. Ah, how vividly I still remember those glorious tramping expeditions! As I write, the old times rise before me, and I seem once more to be in places that I have not known for many a year. Pleasant halts on Swiss hill-sides, with the shade of the pines over our heads, and the cold waters of a stream flowing at our feet, flowing away to the lake that glittered in the distance; rambles through districts covered with vines, when the songs of the vintagers were ringing through the air, and,—unromantic, but to a school-boy, wearied with a long march, delightful fact,—grapes were to be had in abundance for nothing or next to nothing; grand climbs through the wild snow-clad scenery of the Alps; weary, weary tramping along dusty, ill-shaded Lombard roads, with no tree in sight taller or broader than a mulberry tree, and not a drop of water to be had wherewith to wet our parched lips; strolls through Italian cities, visits to churches, palaces and galleries, pleasures and pains of foot-travelling, blisters, fatigue, well-earned repose, lovely scenery and hearty dinners, where are ye all now? Alas and alas! the "Black Monday" of life has come, and worse than French college or English academy is the school where I am finishing my education; sterner than Dr Birch or my old continental friends, is the master who now wields his rod over me; and a right well-pickled rod too, I must say it is.

Yet, after all, why should I speak thus. I began this paper with a certain object in view, and assuredly that object was not to make a moan about life; yet, somehow, recollections of old times forced themselves upon me, and I believe that if there is any one thing which more than another must tend to make men melancholy, it is looking back into the past. Better cling to the present; and after all, life is not all one long "Black Monday." A good deal of it is hard enough, no doubt; still it has its pleasant seasons, and the pleasure of those seasons derives an additional zest from the hard work that goes before them and is to come after them.

In this matter of vacation, of all men who earn their bread by hard work, there are none perhaps so much to be envied as lawyers. Other mortals, to a great extent, take their recreation in fear and trembling. They do not know what opportunities their absence from their business may cause them to lose; they never can be assured that some sudden emergency may not arise to call them back from their short-lived leisure to the wear and tear of the work-a-day world. A fluctuation in the market, an extensive bankruptcy may dash the cup of pleasure from the merchant's lips, before he has almost had time even to sip from it, and hurry him back reluctant, but yet of necessity yielding, from the banks of the Rhine or Tiber to the shores of the Liffey or the Thames. The physician sets out for a month's enjoyment, but when he does so he cannot but feel that he is running a certain risk. People will get sick at the most unreasonable times; they have not always the courtesy to wait until the regular family physician is within call; and when they do take this absurd fancy into their heads, they have the bad habit of sending at once for the nearest medical man, rather than wait for a few weeks for the return of the doctor who, from long knowledge of their constitutions, is the best fitted to treat their disorders. Hence connections are lost; hence Jack Camomile, who has hitherto scarcely been able to keep a roof over his head, springs suddenly into a well-appointed brougham, and drives about, fat and puffy, with all the appearance of a man who has a good balance at his banker's, while Doctor Sangrado grows pale and sickens when he compares this year's decreased tot in his fee book with the much more comfortable figures of but a year ago. But the lawyer! From the middle, or at all events the end, of August to the end of October he is secure, and as free as a bird. Even if he would go to court and harangue judges and jury, he cannot. There is no judge, there is no jury, there is no court. His business cannot be filched from him, for there is no business. There is a sort of Truce of God in the war of litigation, and the Condottieri on both sides may for the while unarm and wander whither they list. And well for them is it that it should be so; for there is, perhaps, no profession in which a fixed recognized vacation is more necessary.

Let our reader enter into any of the Courts during the last few weeks of the sittings, and observe the men who are doing the business there. There is not one of them whose countenance does not tell of long-sustained exhausting work. A yellow skin, heavy eyes, and a general weariness of manner visible through all the energy which they put into the business before them, all show that the men who are sitting there must soon have rest, or sink under their toil. And so it is, and there never yet was a schoolboy who so ardently looked forward to his holidays as the hard-worked barrister does to his long vacation. He longs for the time when his days shall be passed in some purer atmosphere than the hot, close, stifling air which he breathes in Court, and where he shall be able to give his nights to sleep, and not to the almost endless study of dry books and drier papers. For his labour has this peculiarity: it does not, like that of most men, end with the working hours of the day. When the merchant, ay, and the ploughman and bricklayer, are forgetting in sleep the cares and the toil of the by-gone day, and gathering in repose strength for the morrow, the lawyer is sitting by the light of his lamp, writing, studying, thinking, committing hard facts to his memory, and deeply pondering over the legal principles which are applicable to them. And then he stays till the gray light of morning breaks in through the chink in his shutters, and then when the last weary paper has been read, the last argument carefully thought over, and noted down for to-morrow's use, he goes off at length for a short sleep, to be followed by more work and more work again. Such is his life throughout the greater part of the year; but at last the vacation draws near, and he sees daylight through the mass of business that yet remains to be done. At his chambers briefs come fewer and fewer; in Court the list of cases is gradually growing smaller, as one by one each of those that is to be heard before the vacation is disposed of. He can find time to make arrangements with his friends about a tour abroad, or a moor in the Highlands. His family sees more of him than it has done for some time. Court is emptier than usual; the public is beginning to be tired of sitting in the gallery; the great body of the briefless, who usually devote themselves to carving their names, or drawing pen and ink sketches on the back benches, are growing lazy, and invent excuses for absenting themselves from Court—excuses to their own minds I mean, of course—for saving a feeling that they ought to be on the spot to show their diligence and attention to the business which they have not, there is nothing to detain them. Accordingly, they show themselves but rarely, and for the most part addict themselves to smoking in their chambers, or to trips into the country, or pulls up the river, according to their respective tastes and inclinations. Attorneys' clerks and apprentices grow fidgetty, constantly mislay or forget important papers just when they are most wanted, and, of course, receive tremendous snubbings, both from the Court and their counsel, in consequence. But even the Court itself—whereby we mean the solemn old gentlemen who presides there, and looks down from an awful height alike on counsel, solicitors, and public—feels the influence of the time, and is plainly anxious to rise and be gone. It approves of cases being settled, deprecates irrelevant arguments, and accedes with alacrity to any statement that a matter is not pressing, and can very well stand over until next Term. Occasionally it grows irate, and remarks in strong language on the impropriety of bringing on a heavy case at this late period of the sittings. In fact, the Court, with all its grandeur and dignity, has one half its soul on the Continent or in the country, and the other half, which alone is attending to business, is impatient for the Continent or the country also. Accordingly, the Court we fear is in that state of mind, in which it cordially subscribes to Sheridan's maxim of never doing to-day what can by any possibility be put off till to-morrow, and being in this mood, it despatches business with great rapidity; that is, it settles or postpones everything which will bear being settled or postponed. At length, by dint of hearing a little, half-hearing a good deal, and not hearing at all a great deal more, the list is got through. Then comes a rush of juniors with motions of course which ought to have been moved long ago, but which his Lordship will kindly attend to before rising. Be wary, oh ye juniors, with your motions; move on; lose no time in standing up when the man before you has obtained what he has required, for of a surety his Lordship longs to be away, and if ye delay, if any long pause ensues between the "Thank your Lordship" of the motion which precedes, and the "if your Lordship pleases" of the motion which follows, his Lordship will be off the bench with scant ceremony, your golden opportunity will be gone, your words will be addressed to an empty seat, and you must wait three long months ere your voice can again be lifted up in this place. And see, said I not so? Old Humdrum who has worn stuff, and consequently been a junior for something like thirty years, has a motion and is rising to move it. But Humdrum's movements are all marked with a certain gravity and slowness, which are sadly out of place in this bustling age, and so, when he has slowly got upon his feet, slowly opened his brief, slowly fixed his glasses, and slowly begun to draw out "If your Lordship pleases, in the matter of"—he is interrupted by a roar of laughter from his brethren of the bar. The court which saw him not, or affected not to see him rising, has disappeared, and Humdrum is sarcastically advised by his friends to follow it to the moor in the neighbourhood of Ben Lomond, whither it will proceed by a very early train, and see if his motion will be entertained there. Poor Humdrum folds up his papers, and in five minutes the place is empty. The Court is "up for the long vacation."

This picture of the legal breaking up applies, however, only to the Courts of Equity. Those gentlemen of the long robe who prefer the fun of the Common Law, to the stately pace of Chancery proceedings, are already enjoying a sort of modified vacation while their less fortunate brethren are still perspiring and inhaling mephitic air in the capital. The Common Law Bar is scattered in several bodies throughout the length and breadth of the land doing the business of the Assizes. The circuits are all out, and though on them, there is plenty of serious work seriously done, that does not prevent circuit from having a certain vacation air to all those who go it. In the first place it involves travelling, moving about, often through a pleasant country, and visits to quaint old places, which, dull and stupid enough through all the rest of the year, wake up into bustle and life, as the judges with their attendant train of registrars, barristers, attorneys and litigants, draw near them. Then there is all the light-hearted fun of the mess with its jokes, its songs and its mock trials, when the Attorney General of the Circuit arraigns some luckless brother for some breach of bar discipline, real or fancied, and Briefless is assigned as council, and first in this hour of misrule exhibits those qualities which afterwards more seriously employed will, perhaps, lead him to eminence in the graver duties of his calling. Not the slightest charm, too, of circuit is the manner in which young and old are thrown together and forced, as it were, into a familiarity which the comparative stiffness of town business could never produce. All this tends to make circuit-time a season of extreme pleasantness, even for the leaders, who, at the end of the day, find in their lodgings just such piles of briefs, and just such hard work as awaited them at their chambers in town. We have only to look into the life of Lord Eldon, or into Lord Campbell's books, to see how barristers on circuit can join fun with hard work, and make the two pull very well together. But after all it is only a modified holiday, and even after it the grand, full leisure of the long vacation comes most welcome to the wearied juriconsult. Then he seeks some spot where not even the rumour of law may reach his ears. He has had quite enough of it during the year, and now his grand object is to avoid it. Off he goes then to Scotland, to Germany, to Italy, to Egypt, anywhere so that he may no more see calf-binding, parchment, or red tape. What matter is it to him that reports are coming out week after week, and that he will have hard work to read them up when he gets back to town? What matter is it that in some nook of the country events are brewing which must result in litigation and consequent employment of him? All he knows, or cares to know, is, that he is in the long vacation, his own master, and bound almost in duty to enjoy himself as much as possible before his "Black Monday," the first day of Michaelmas Term, comes round. And when that day comes, what a different being is he from the sorrow-faced, heavy-eyed man, who but a short time ago, was unexcitedly drawing out a most unexciting statement to a wearied judge. Look at him and his brethren on the day when they first assemble together after the vacation. All are in high spirits; their cheeks are still sunburnt, and hale and hearty with sea or mountain air. Everyone shakes hands with everyone else, and anecdotes go round, of how one learned brother was seen with a fierce moustache shading his lips, and an alpenstock in his hand, striding off for one of the most inaccessible passes of the Alps, while another was recognised in a Turkish garb, entering a mosque somewhere in Syria or Egypt. They seem to have hardly yet grown accustomed once more to their wigs, those grave legists, and they hold their bags and briefs awkwardly, almost as awkwardly as they did when many years ago, they entered as unskilled apprentices the workshops of litigation wherein they are now masters. They linger lovingly at the doors of the courts, as if loth to enter, and so pass the barrier that for another year must separate them from leisure and recreation. But a buzz goes round; the judges are sitting; the groups that were loitering together break up into human fragments that rush off in different directions, and in five minutes more, the man who a moment ago was the best shot in the Highlands, the cleverest fisherman in Norway, or the sturdiest walker in Switzerland, becomes again what he was three months back, a cool, calculating, talkative, keen-witted lawyer. The Long-Vacation is over.

NOTICE.

The extraordinary and unexpected circulation which the "ILLUSTRATED DUBLIN JOURNAL" has already attained, renders it quite impossible for the Publisher to have a sufficient supply (100,000 copies) of the First Part of WEBSTER'S CRITICAL PRONOUNCING DICTIONARY ready for delivery with the seventh number of the Journal, on the 19th of October, as already announced. He is, therefore, obliged to postpone the delivery of the First Part until Saturday the SECOND OF NOVEMBER, when it will be delivered with the Ninth Number. The Subscribers to the "Illustrated Dublin Journal" will please to give their names to our Agents, on or before the 26th of October, in order to enable the latter to provide a sufficient supply, as the First Part of the Dictionary cannot be given GRATIS after the 2nd of November.

THE BLACK DOCTOR.

CHAPTER II.

WHEN Tony and Wisp had been left alone the bailiff took off his old hat, which was stuffed with law documents and newspapers, and having placed it under the rickety chair on which he was sitting, drew nearer to the fire. Having performed these movements, he said to Tony, "Aint this jolly?"

The boy looked cautiously towards the door, and having satisfied himself that Brunt was not listening on the lobby, replied—

"It may be jolly for you, Wisp, but it aint for me, and I will tell you now what you must stop in this house with me to-night, as I do not like Brunt's looks. I know Brunt too well of late to trust him. He knows I know too much," continued Tony; "but how could I help finding it all out."

Wisp cocked one of his grey, sharp, twinkling eyes, and having ran his right hand inside a red cotton handkerchief that was twisted like a rope round his thick, muscular neck, said—

"Brunt and you are nice customers! What is it that you and the old chap have between you?"

"Nothing," replied Tony evasively, waving his hand. "We will have a prime lot here to-night; but for the life of me, I do not know what's keeping Bramble, the Black Doctor. It can't be the rain, although it's coming down like mad—as, wet or dry, storm or no storm, Bramble is sure to be here every night. I tell you what, Wisp, Bramble knows a good deal about the weather at night, for he never goes to bed. He is not a bad poor devil after all—he is very obliging. Now," continued Tony, "for fear I should forget it, why is it that they call you Wisp?"

"Because I am a man of straw," replied the bailiff, laughing.

"My name is Tim Mullins, but every one knows me as Wisp. Many a man in my time did I take up to limbo on a suspicion of debt. I had dirty work to do, Tony, for attorneys, about manor courts and police offices; last, I must say, that I often did a good turn for a boy at the assize, by swearing an 'alibi' for him."

Wisp, who was always to be seen by daylight in company with men like himself, strolling about attorneys' offices, or watching at corners of streets, was a thin though athletic man, about fifty years of age. His dress consisted of a snuff-coloured surtout, which had become highly polished from friction; old blue, patched, and worn continuations; short boots, armed with big-headed nails, and the old hat turned brown from age, with the red, greasy kerchief above referred to, completed the costume of Wisp. His face bore the marks of divers collisions with combative debtors, and a surgical operation performed with a pewter measure flattened his nose on his upper lip, after the manner of an otter. This alteration gave a peculiar nasal twang to his mode of speaking. Tony was proceeding to deliver himself of some refined observation, when he was interrupted by a person whistling out of tune as he ascended the stairs.

"How are you, Quill," said Tony; "your governor is gone an hour since with a gentleman, who has great talent for crying."

The person addressed was Mr. Jonas Quill, law assistant to Mr. Barman. Jonas was a young, thin man, dressed in fossil sables that had been dug out of one of the numerous museums where they had been deposited after having been exposed to a great many hard rubs in the world. There was a solemn, six-and-eightpenny expression in his face, and whenever he addressed his acquaintances, his attitudes were quite forensic, and his language assumed a legal form. In fact, Quill was always in the habit of studying the peculiarities of the Nisi Prius barristers, with the object of being better prepared to hold forth in argument and eloquence at the "Three Jolly Travellers" nightly. Jonas had been for a long time in the office of Barman, in which he held a high position on a high stool, on which he was wont to balance himself for hours together, while, with a pen placed across his mouth, his eyes were in the habit of being fixed on the dirty layers of paper, tied with faded red tape, that reposed in mouldy bundles on strata of black dust, on tumble-down old shelves that surrounded the place of business of the astute Barman.

"'Take wine for your stomach sake,' is a fine old saying," said Quill—"I say, Tony, bring me a glass of whiskey. I saw Brunt in the bar, looking like a calf in a pound," continued the loquacious Jonas.

Tony rose slowly to bring the whiskey, and when he retired Quill said, addressing Wisp—

"Well, friend, what's up to-night, that we have the honour of your company?"

"I have to see the Black Doctor to hear some news and to get my instructions. I think it is something about Brunt and Tony he wants to see me."

"Indeed!" said Jonas. "The Black Doctor is a rare fellow—did he not know old Nelly that lived here, when Tony first came to this place?"

"He did," replied Wisp, "and he knows a trifle or two, between you and I and the wall."

A growl from Brunt and a loud scream from Tony disturbed the conversation between Jonas and Wisp.

"What's the matter?" sung out Quill.

"Nothing," said Tony, as he re-entered the room, "but what old Brunt shall hear of, and others besides."

Wisp winked at Jonas, and gave a peculiar kind of cough, which was taken up by Quill, who observed that it was a terrible night outside.

"Your master beats you I believe," said Jonas, addressing the boy.

"He does," said Tony, "but what is that to you, Mr. Quill?"

"That's the Black Doctor below stairs," said Wisp, "or I'm no bailiff and a sworn officer."

"You're right," observed Jonas, "I would know his voice in a thousand."

Rather a long conversation ensued between the Black Doctor and John Brunt, but it was carried on in such a subdued tone that even Tony, who was on the qui vive, could not hear more than a passing word. But matter of the most vital importance was going on in that wretched shop. By the flickering of two tallow candles the figure and face of the Black Doctor could be distinctly seen. Brutus Bramble was an Ethiopian and a native of Cuba. He was brought to England in the beginning of the present century when a young man. He received a very liberal education at the expense of his patrons, who intended him for the medical profession. He attended lectures, smoked, and drank whiskey and water as extensively as any of his fellow students. Although fiery and vindictive when roused, no one bore a higher reputation for courage and good nature. When about seventeen he came to Ireland, where he became acquainted with a number of fast young men, who led him into all kinds of folly and dissipation. He was known to all the ruined gamblers, post obit drawers, and night walkers of high and low degree, and his head quarters at night was the "Three Jolly Travellers." He was below the middle height, and stout, approaching to corpulency. His dark hair, sooty black, crisped into small woolly curls, over a large round head that seemed to be too heavy for the stout little man who had to carry it. His forehead was low, though broad and massive, and his nose was elevated above a heavy sensual mouth, armed with large teeth, that looked extremely white, because of the contrast which they formed to the dark coppery hue of the skin of his face. When he walked his legs were wide spread, and his short stout arms, terminating in big swollen hands, stood out at angles from his portly sides as he waddled along. Nobody could say that Bramble was a disagreeable person, as there was great ease in his manner, when speaking in a broad musical accent, which he used with great fluency. He always wore black clothes, and his love of dress approached to womanish vanity. Brutus Bramble was the terror of his enemies, and when he gave one of his deep, loud, guttural laughs, even his most intimate friends felt a kind of instinctive fear.

Long and earnest was the conversation between the Black Doctor and John Brunt; and when the former was going up stairs, Brunt looked the picture of fear. Bramble had nearly reached the door of the room in which were seated Tony, Wisp, and Quill, when he suddenly returned to the bar, and said:

"I tell you, Brunt, touch not a hair of the boy's head."

"But he will tell all," groaned Brunt.

"Beware of me," said Bramble; "and remember, on Tony's safety depends your precious neck."

"They will hear you above," said Brunt.

"No matter," replied Bramble, as he went to join his friends.

"Well, Tony, my young terrier," said Bramble, as he entered the room, "has your respected master made any attempt on your precious life since I saw you last?"

"He has," responded Tony; "and will again."

"Again, will he?" said Bramble, as a smile of intense meaning passed over his face. "Well," continued he, turning to Wisp and Quill, "you appear to be drinking nothing. Say what you will imbibe, as I intend to nourish myself powerfully to-night."

"Good," said Quill. "I have been a long time at scrivenery, but there is nothing I would sooner be 'engrossing' than whiskey-punch."

"His sentiments are mine, Doctor," observed Wisp.

"Good again," said Tony. "I had better be off for the punch."

"Any amount of punch," said Bramble, as Tony pretended to fall down stairs.

"That's a clever boy," observed Quill.

"He is so," rejoined Wisp; "and a good boy."

"We will want him," said the Black Doctor, "to let us into a secret or two when he comes back. I believe Brunt has heaps of money, and we have very little," laughed the speaker. "I think Tony will help us to get some of it."

"I want you, Doctor," said Quill, lowering his voice to a whisper. "There will be great value to-morrow night, and Barman wants to meet you here particularly. He told me to tell you so."

"Any rhino in the wind?" inquired the Doctor.

"Lots," replied Quill. "You will have to assist at a mock funeral of a lady, and to swear that she is dead, though the contrary is the case."

"Does Wisp know anything about the 'little game'?" whispered Bramble.

"No," said Quill; "but he will—we want him. Wisp is not to be sneezed at when a job is to be done."

The return of Tony, with a steaming jug of punch, and a number of glasses, caused a pause in the conversation, which was broken by the Black Doctor addressing Tony, with the remark: "Remain here; we want you."

"All right," replied Tony; "particularly as I was not going."

"Do you drink punch, Antonio, for if you do, pull in your chair," said Bramble.

"I won't drink to-night," replied Tony, as he seated himself opposite the fire, over which he spread his attenuated and dirty hands.

"Old Nelly, that was here, kept you at school?" inquired the Black Doctor.

"She did," was the reply; "and she was always very good to me."

"Did she tell you anything when she was dying?"

"She did," said the boy, "and pointed out the place where they buried him."

"Who were they?" said Quill.

"Brunt and the tinker," replied Tony.

"Did I know the man they buried?" asked Bramble.

"Ah, well you did. It was Hawkesworth, the exciseman, who had all the money always in his pockets. Won't you stop here to-night, Wisp?" added the boy, who appeared to get fearfully frightened lest Brunt had overheard the revelations which he had just made.

"I will, to be sure," said Wisp, as he rose and threw some coals on the fire.

"I will see you to-night," said the Black Doctor. "It is now within an hour of daylight."

The Black Doctor and Quill left the house, and Wisp and Tony remained seated in the position which they had so long occupied.

In a few minutes after the bailiff and the boy had been left alone, Brunt was heard carefully locking and bolting the street door.

"He is up for mischief to me," said Tony. "I knew he meant no good when I asked you to stop."

"I will hide behind the old table," said Wisp, "and I'll show him some sport."

Wisp had scarcely ceased speaking when Brunt ascended the stairs.

Tony held his breath, as the voice of his master was heard exclaiming: "So, Master Tony, you are to tell on me, are you? Make your will in five minutes, for that's all the time you have. Come this way," said the ruffian. "I want to show you the old kitchen you are so fond of speaking of."

He entered the room, and approached the boy, who was sitting at the fire. He was deadly pale.

"I have you at last—I have. No more tales out of school."

Wisp sprung from the place where he had been concealed, and stood before the horrified Brunt, who thought that the bailiff had gone home with the Black Doctor and Quill.

"Go to your bed, Brunt," said Wisp. "I am far too fond of Tony to leave him alone with you."

The landlord of the "Three Jolly Travellers" retired, and Wisp and Tony waited by the fire until broad daylight.

When the Black Doctor and Quill had left Tony and Wisp, they walked along through the lonely streets without exchanging a word for a considerable time. Jonas lifted the collar of his coat about his ears, and having placed his chin on his chest, and stuffed his hands into his trousers pockets, followed in the wake of his companion, who appeared to be quite indifferent to the influence which the sudden transition from a warm room seemed to exercise over the more susceptible Quill. Bramble walked with his hands behind his back, and his eyes bent on the ground, as if he was thinking deeply over some matter that weighed heavily upon him. The dim uncertain light thrown from the greasy street oil-lamps, made the damp cold morning appear more miserable and cheerless. There was still no sign of light in the sky, and the progress of the wayfarers was not interrupted, nor a sound met their ears save the tramp of their own footsteps on the rugged pavement. Not a soul was abroad save some half-drunken watchman, then called a "bulkey," who, on being awakened from his dose by the approach of footsteps, called out the hour, three hours later or earlier than it might be, for the purpose of informing the public that he was vigilant at his post.

The night robber even had retired to his den, and it was only when the rattle of a dairy-cart could be heard in the distance, that a person would be led to believe that the whole community had not made up their minds to remain as quiet as possible. On Bramble and Quill walked through lanes and alleys, in which the doors of all the houses were open, to give free egress and ingress to the street wanderer, the vendors of saloop and purl, and hordes of pickpockets, who did business around the doors of late taverns, and who were wont to charge excited citizens the moderate price of all that was in their pockets for seeing them safe home.

"I can't go any further," said Quill, "I am aground."

"Come on," said the Black Doctor, "there's milk-punch hot in the distance."

This assurance gave new life to Quill, who, giving a lurch or two, righted himself and resumed his walk, after having ascertained with his shoulder on two or three occasions, that there was no fear of the walls of the houses at either side falling down. In one of those experiments he fell himself, and as he lay on the ground, exclaimed:

"All right, Doctor! my foot only slipped. Give me your hand, I want to get up."

"Fool!" said Bramble, as he raised him from the ground. "Where is your hat?"

"I am sitting on it," said Quill; "and I am afraid it is injured."

Bramble, though not in the most amiable of humours, had to laugh outright, as he placed Quill against the post of an old doorway.

"Plead justification," muttered the legal Quill. "File an affidavit, and lodge the money in court, and pay no costs till the bill is taxed."

After delivering himself of this profound decision, he fell backwards into the hall of the house, where in a few minutes he composed himself to deep sleep, and was dreaming over addresses to juries and favourable verdicts, as the Black Doctor was continuing his journey to the place where he was to see his friend Bob Stammers. After many and various turnings, Bramble stopped in front of a low two-storied house, in the centre of a narrow, dark, and dirty lane. Having carefully looked around him, he placed his ear against one of the old shutters which hung from the outside, and gave a short, sharp whistle, which was answered from within. In a minute the door was opened, and Bramble entered the front room on the lower floor. Around a low table a number of squalid-looking creatures were playing cards for some money, which was in the remains of an old snuff-tray, and two or three miserable-looking beings were huddled together, fast asleep on the floor. A large fire, composed of old timber, gave light and warmth to the room. An old woman, with toothless gums, sat dozing on the hearth, and as the blaze fell on the shrivelled parchment that was stretched over the bones of her face, she appeared more like a disinterred mummy than aught that breathed and lived. The entrance of the Black Doctor interrupted the card-players, who "turned down" their hands.

"Was Splint here to-day?" said Bramble, as he stooped to light his pipe at the flame of a candle, which was burning in a broken bottle.

"Is it Stammers you mean, Doctor?" said the old woman, who was called Tabby.

"Hush!" said Bramble, "you ancient witch. I thought you were asleep."

"He is above stairs," continued the old woman, "and never stirred out this two days."

The Black Doctor bit his lips.

Relaxing into one of his meditative moods, as if thinking of something that he could not find, he seated himself on an old stool beside Tabby, and asked her in a low voice: "Is Jerry the Lift and Jerry the Tinker, that I used to see at the 'Three Jolly Travellers' with John Brunt, one and the same person?"

"Yes," said Tabby; "and while I am here purring like one of my namesakes, I could tell much about Jerry. Oh, ho!" said the hag in an affected laugh, "what a tinker he was!"

"I will go to Newgate, and return here again. In the meantime, tell Stammers when he wakes to take care that Squint does not leave this," said the Doctor, as he took his departure.

AN OLD MAN'S LAMENT.

WHEN I sit down to read the news,
And know each thing that passes,
I frequently my temper lose,
If I can't find my glasses.

When through the streets I chance to stray,
To see the Dublin lasses,
Recalling pleasures past away,
I oft forget my glasses.

When to the theatre I go,
Where all the splendid gas is,
I am obliged to walk quite slow
When I forget my glasses.

And when I mingle with a crowd,
To make one of the masses,
I oft in pain cry out aloud
That I forgot my glasses.

When I would view the sun's bright ray,
My great defect, alas! is,
That age hath dimm'd the brightest day,
If I have not my glasses.

Except in bed when sound asleep,
Or in the fields where grass is,
I spectacles on nose must keep—
Depending on my glasses.

Time steals the vision from mine eyes,
Still more each hour that pass-
And points his finger to the skies,
Where none require glasses.

CONCERNING LOBSTERS.

As we have already, in our papers upon Oysters and Crabs, detailed some of the world's celebrities who were remarkable for their penchant for these crustacean delicacies, we cannot do better than preface our notice of the lobster by enumerating a few of its admirers. Bellon, a foreign writer on natural history, tells us that Alexander the Great was so partial to this fish, that his courtiers were accustomed to mollify his frequent paroxysms of anger, by furnishing him with a supply of them. He is said to have delivered one of his five orations after a dinner of lobsters. We are told that at a ven to the Emperor Vitellius by her, there were, amongst other fish, eight hundred lobsters. Another Emperor, Maximian, is said to have eaten twenty large lobsters at a single meal. Chardin, the Great, according to a work called "Things that Be Olde and Newe," published in London in 1611, was passionately fond of lobsters, upon which he feasted every night. In a book called "Specimens of a Diary," published towards the close of the eighteenth century in London, we read the following: "June 27, 1771. Went to see the 'Maid of Bath' performed for the first time at the Haymarket Theatre. Saw there Lord Lyttleton, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Doctor Johnson, Garrick, and Oliver Goldsmith. We all went out to have some refreshment. The Rev. Mr. Horne, afterwards John Horne Tooke, met us at the threshold of the play-house; and, learning our errand, he proposed we should all go with him to sup upon lobsters, cooked in a new fashion, with the richest sauce, at a fish-house hard by. We all consented readily, except Lord Lyttleton, who hung fire a little, but was prevailed upon to come with us, and Horne entertained us with some of his most piquant jokes and bon mots." Few of our readers, we opine, would object to join such a lobster party as the above. Pausan, the famous Professor of Greek in the University of Cambridge, and so well known for his profound classical knowledge, and dissipated, grovelling habits, regaled himself three nights out of the week, to the full bent of his appetite, with lobsters. He had a curious theory that these shell-fish were the purist in the ocean, and lived entirely on water, and was accustomed, when in his cups, to argue the point with great vehemence, which occasioned many paroxysms to be chalked on his door. Dr. Parr's fancy for hot lobsters, with shrimp sauce, is well-known. He once told a friend that he wrote some of his finest pieces after his lobster suppers. Old Elmer, the miser, lived almost solely on chocolate and lobsters. He was in the habit of occasionally attending Billingsgate market to purchase this fish at as cheap a rate as possible.

There is little doubt that the lobster has been known from the most remote times. It is frequently found represented on medals and coins, both ancient and modern. Many of the ancient coins of Tyre and Greece bear the figure of the lobster on their reverse sides, but we do not believe the meaning of the emblem has yet been accounted for. One Roman medal portrays the Emperor Nero riding on one, as a mark of derision. Some of the fables associated with the history of lobsters are very amusing. Olaus Magnus and Geener gravely assure us, that on the shores of Norway, and also in some localities in the Indian Ocean, they have been found twelve feet long and six broad, and have been frequently known to seize unwary mariners with their claws, and drag them to their retreats and devour them! A certain Italian writer on natural history affirms that he once saw a lobster which measured fifteen feet, and was so viciously inclined as to require six men to terminate its existence! A curious, but it is said well-authenticated, incident is related of a storm which took place on the south-western coast of Scotland in the year 1627. The violence of the hurricane cast upon the beach of the parish of Caerlaverock, an incredible number of lobsters, which were seen crawling about in all directions. A very large one happened to be thrown into a cradle containing an infant, which in the hurry and confusion of the moment had been forgotten by its parents, and was in danger of being swept away. The lobster, however, surprised possibly at the novelty of its position, seized the foot of the infant with its claws, and the screaming which it set up, brought people to its providential rescue.

Of the physical conformation of the lobster, it may be observed that the limbs are divided into three sets. First, on each side of the mouth are five limbs called foot-jaws, furnished with tentacular appendages employed in masticating its food. There are next five pairs of true limbs, of which the two first are developed into powerful claws or pincers, of which one, sometimes the right and sometimes the left, has its edges finely dentated, to use as a saw in seizing and rending its prey. The third class of limbs are arranged on the under surface of the tail in five pairs, and are termed false feet. The head and thorax form one mass covered with a dorsal plate of armour; broad semi-belts of the same consistency protecting the abdominal viscera. One of the most striking facts connected with the natural history of this fish, is the power which it has of reproducing its limbs lost by accident, and of the moulting and re-acquisition of its shells.

The lobster is often called the scavenger of the seas, and is a determined marauder, pouncing upon garbage of all kinds; its carnivorous voracity leads to its destruction. It appears to have a powerful sense of smell, although we are not aware that any distinct organs for this office have been as yet detected. The capture of lobsters is actively carried on all round the British coasts. The mode of taking this epicurean crustacean is exceedingly simple. The apparatus used is generally made of wicker-work, with an aperture at the top or the side for the animal to enter by. Having been baited with any kind of half-decayed fish or other garbage, they are sunk in great numbers on a rocky part of the coast in water which is four or five fathoms deep. A line from the traps attached to a floating cork, denotes their whereabouts. On some parts of the coast of Yorkshire, strong bag-nets are used. The season for lobsters begins about March, and is supposed to close with September. After being trapped, the lobster has his claws secured preparatory to being boiled alive.

The supply of lobsters from the Norwegian coast is very extensive. They are brought in steamers built for the purpose, having perforated wells in which the animals are kept alive during the voyage.

THE FIRST REPORTERS.—As reporting is now a scientific profession, the following note may prove of interest to "gentlemen of the fourth estate." Few of the learned professions can boast such an ancient and noble origin. In O'Halloran's History of Ireland, published in Limerick in 1778, is the following curious entry:—Bille, a Milesian king of a portion of Spain, had a son named Gollamh, who "solicited his father's permission to assist their Phœnician ancestor, then greatly distressed by continental wars," and having gained his consent, with a well-appointed fleet of thirty ships and a select number of intrepid warriors, he weighed anchor from the harbour of Corunna for Syria. It appears that war was not the sole business of this equipment; for in this fleet were embarked twelve youths of uncommon learning and abilities, who were directed to make remarks on whatever they found new, either in astronomy, navigation, arts, sciences, or manufactures. They were to communicate their remarks and discoveries to each other, and keep an exact account of whatever was worthy of notice. This took place in the year of the world 2650. It is quite clear that those "twelve noble youths" were reporters, and it is curious enough that when a few of the Dublin or London reporters attend in the country, at meetings or on other business, they do what those "noble youths" were commanded to do, namely, "communicate their remarks" and information to each other. Reporting, therefore, according to the above, must be over 3200 years old as a profession. What will our friends in the "gallery of the house" say to this? We know a few of the latter, and would back them as "short-hand writers" against the dozen of noble youths who sailed with Gollamh from Corunna!

LOVE IN THE COUNTRY.

HEAVILY, drearily, wearily murmurs

The swift spinning-wheel from the top of the day,
Till, slow, through the noon-haze, the little bells tinkle;

And the oaks by the road-side are misty and grey,— What am I thinking of, what am I dreaming of—Whom am I waiting for? Look at that shadow

That slants in the sun, o'er the village path dusty,
And grows, with increasing delight, from the meadow.

Ah! 'tis my brother,

I thought 'twas the other—

Is he not tiresome to linger so long,

Whilst I, a poor maiden,

With heart overladen,

Mask all my fears in the moonlight of song!

Yesterday, bless you, he stood by the wicket,

Long after morn'g time; bronze-templed, yet fair,

"Give me," quoth he, and his voice sank to whispers,

"One little lock of your wheat-goldened hair."

I turned to him sharp, with an eye that knew scarcely

How to encourage or how to reprove best—

"Dear," I replied, "I retain all my tresses

For him whom I know well and him whom I love best."

With a cheek red as fire,

Down by the sweet-briar,

Passed he, with slow-pacing footsteps, believe me.

Oh, love! well-beholden,

Take all, rare and golden—

Take it, and keep it, and only forgive me!

What did Maude Rice in the evening time tell me,

That late, in the village dance, Charley was seen

With his arm round the waist of that Alice M'Sweeny,

In her ball-dress of white and a petticoat green;

And they walked, if you please, by the woods near the castle,

And she filled his pauses with sunniest laughter,

Heeding not young folks who walked by them slowly,

Heeding not old folks who came swiftly after.

Ah! wickedest Alice,

When laughter means malice,

There's blight on the wheat and there's smut on the barley;

Most patient and meekest,

Take what thou seekest,

But, sweet, at your peril, be chary of Charley!

Hark, did you hear it? Dear saint, there's his footstep,

Oh! little wheel, whirl round, and hide half my shame;

On his face glows the light of a rich, ripe affection;

On his lips, oh, God bless them, there trembles a name!

Go, leave me, and fly to your true love, Miss Alice,

Oh, she's your first-cousin—now, none of your kissing!

Oh! aunt, look at this! I am cruelly pilfered,

The longest and best of my love-locks is missing.

Am I your blossom?

Ah! poor little blossom,

My heart, in its weakness, is fainting and sinning:

Don't gaze at me, hypocrite,

Sit in the fading light,

And look, if you like, whilst I'm singing and spinning!

THE LOST FAN.

A TALE OF VENICE.

OME few years ago I had been travelling through Belgium, and was en route to Calais, where I intended to make a prolonged stay, when I stopped for the night at Ostend, with a determination to proceed to my destination on the following morning. I had not the means to accomplish this object on the day of my arrival, but I had sagaciously written home, some short time previously, requesting that a remittance might be forwarded to me at Ostend. In due course the money ought to have been at the poste restante, awaiting my arrival; but it was not there, and when the morning came, I found, upon making application, that I was doomed to another day's disappointment. Ostend is certainly, or at least was in those days, a most uninviting place to a stranger, with its cold monotony of buildings, and cheerless absence of activity, even in the more populous parts of the town. The hotel at which I stopped was tolerably well conducted, but the salle-à-manger was huge and dreary in the extreme; and, to add to the discomfort consequent upon this fact, there was only one occupant of the apartment besides myself. Moreover, the rain poured in torrents during the entire day; so that I had no alternative but to confine myself to my bed-chamber, or to try my fortune in the gaunt and dismal salle-à-manger, hoping that some fresh arrivals might be the means of introducing me to passengers who would help me to "beguile the tedious time." But, alas! it was not the season for travelling, and still less was it the weather for it; and I had no other course open to me than to cultivate the acquaintance of my fellow-traveller. I had an easy opportunity of addressing him, for I had heard his name at Brussels, and he had just handed to me Galignani, after studiously conning its contents. As I took the paper in my hand with a pretence, but with very little desire, to read it, my companion immediately began to comment upon the news which he himself had uninterruptedly mastered—a course of proceeding which, though in most cases it is anything but provocative of good will, received in the present instance my grateful approval.

Upon his remarking that the paper was full of details relating to the Carnival of Venice, I replied with that degree of shrewdness which is peculiar to my country—"Indeed!"

"Did you ever travel in Italy?" inquired my companion, whom it is as well I should at once introduce in his proper name—Carlo Volponi.

"Never."

"Then you have never seen Venice?"

"I regret to say I have not."

"You need not regret it," said Volponi, suddenly rising from his seat, and pacing the room, as if a strange thought had occurred to him—"for a pleasure to come is surely preferable to one that is past."

"So says the old proverb," I rejoined; "but after all, there is something very gratifying in the recollection of places one has visited in distant parts, and in the power which is thus afforded of conversing freely on topics of universal interest."

"True," said Volponi, resuming his seat, and averting his head as he spoke; "but when I allude to past pleasures the thought suddenly occurs to my mind, that, for me, all pleasures are past, and I see nothing in the future but gloomy associations. I was once happy in the recollection of the past—in the enjoyment of the present, and in the prospect of the future; but now all is changed, and even the once beautiful Venice frowns upon me with a cruel scorn, and seems to close her gates against me."

"Once beautiful!" I remarked, beginning to feel peculiarly interested in his conversation, for he spoke in language which expressed a "rooted sorrow," and which I felt I should be able fully to interpret if I encouraged him to proceed. "Is not Venice still beautiful in your eyes?"

"Far from it," he replied. "The sun shines upon the city as brilliantly as ever; and the waters of the canals still reflect his beams amid the busy scenes which are constantly passing on their surface. To the eye of the expectant traveller Venice, doubtless, presents manifold beauties; but for me, whose birthplace it was, and who am driven from my home by adverse fortune, all its charms are gone, and I regard my native city almost as a city of the dead."

"But," said I, watching him earnestly, "you still feel some interest in the every-day life of the place—you have just been reading the particulars of the late carnival."

"Ay, true," answered Volponi; "it was because I was thus brought back to the most eventful period of my ill-starred life."

"Ill-starred!" said I, becoming more and more anxious to lead him into disclosures which were evidently calculated to gratify curiosity, and which he seemed but too willing to make.

"It was during the carnival time," he said, "that the events occurred which caused a blight to fall on my fortunes—not the late carnival, but one which was held some few years since, and in which I played so conspicuous a part, that my name, in connection with the period, is recollected to the present day; as you will perceive by referring for one moment to the newspaper I have just placed in your hands."

I hastily glanced at the paper, and perceived some complimentary allusion to his name, accompanied by expressions of regret that a sad calamity should have kept him from his native shores, at a time when he might have been the cynosure of admiring eyes.

"A sad calamity, indeed," he went on to say, "and one which I would willingly bury in oblivion, but that recent revelations have revived it in my memory. As I before observed, it was during the time of the carnival, and I was invited to a grand ball at the palazzo of one of our distinguished nobles, where all the guests were expected to assemble in their masquerading costume, due care being, of course, taken that none should be present whose mode of attire would be unbecoming an occasion which called together the wealth and distinction of the land. My dress was simply that of an Italian noble of bygone times, such as has been handed down to us by the highest ornaments of the lyric stage. It was certainly very handsome, and was considered to sit gracefully and effectively upon me. In short, I may be permitted, at this distance of time, to say that my appearance was allowed to be one of the great "successes" at the ball; and I found it far from difficult to secure such partners in the dance as attracted my most rapt attention. The scene was, indeed, a gay and cheerful one, and I need hardly say that in such a motley group there was, perhaps, less restraint than is generally observed where large numbers of both sexes are gathered together for the purpose of social enjoyment. Amongst the beauties who were polite enough to accept my attentions, and to join me in the dance, even when she had declined to grant that privilege to others, was one whom I will introduce to you by her Christian name of Adelina. I had seen her in the day-time in one of the balconies in the gayest part of the city, when I was occupied in playing my gambols for the general amusement; and abundantly engaged as I was, I could not but reflect upon the winning beauty of her face. It appeared to me to be all that a painter could desire for the more delicate touches of his pencil, or a poet for the more graceful touches of his pen. To describe her natural charms, I will not presume to attempt; nor would you thank me for doing so, inasmuch as I should most imperfectly do that which your own imagination can effect much more satisfactorily to yourself. In a word, Adelina was lovely in the day, when I saw her bright eyes beaming on me in the distance, and, if possible, still more lovely at night, when I was sufficiently close to her to regard her every feature and to watch her every movement. I will not dwell minutely upon the nature of our converse, or upon the means by which I succeeded in awakening her to an interest in me, such as I could not have had the hardihood or the vanity to predict. Suffice it, that before my final dance with her was concluded, Adelina had reciprocated my professions of friendship—dare I call it attachment?—in language which I think too sacred to be revealed. I had led her to her seat, and was about to procure for her a valuable fan, which I had carefully put aside ere the dance commenced, when I discovered that it had been removed. During the dance I had perceived a tall and handsome, though somewhat brigand-like, Neapolitan lingering near the spot where I had placed the fan, and whom I had several times observed taking especial notice of my movements, and regarding me with a look which I could only construe into jealousy of my happy position. Having expressed aloud my desire to recover the fan, some little commotion was produced in the salle, and immediately afterwards I saw the Neapolitan descending the stairs from the ball-room. I followed him, and somewhat imperatively requested him to assist in recovering a lady's fan which had been suddenly lost or—I was about to say stolen—but I checked myself, wishing to avoid any expression which might lead to an altercation. He turned hastily round, as if offended at my words, and exclaimed:—

"Why do you ask me, and in this suspicious tone, Signor Volponi?" (for my name was well-known to him, and his to me).

"Simply from a desire," said I, "to recover a treasure which is valued by another; not to render any benefit to myself."

"But, whence comes it," said Casolari, "that I, who have unavoidably quitted the ball-room, should be called upon by you to 'assist' in recovering that which does not appear to me to warrant your interference at all?"

"It was," I replied, "because I observed you quitting the room at the moment the loss was discovered, that I have sought to gain from you some knowledge of the missing property."

"Dare you insinuate, Signor Volponi," exclaimed Casolari, in a loud and threatening tone, "that I have —"

"I have made no insinuation," I cried, interrupting him, and at the same time feeling a consciousness, amounting almost to a conviction, that—either from jealous motives, or possibly from the pleasure he might see in restoring it to its owner on the following day—Casolari had the fan in his possession, and was conveying it away with him—"I have made no insinuation hitherto, Signor Casolari; but I now demand of you to give into my hands the fan which, it is my fixed belief, is in your pocket!"

"Impudent pretender!" he exclaimed, with a degree of rage which betokened more of bravado than honest indignation; "take the consequences of your groundless insolence," and, striking me a violent blow on the chest, which threw me backwards against the stairs, he hastily darted from the scene. I was endeavouring to pursue him; but the blow had for the moment rendered me comparatively powerless, and I thought it more prudent to seek reparation for the injury at a subsequent period when my actions would not tend to disturb the enjoyment of others, than at the present moment.

It chanced that in the back of the fan was a small receptacle, in which, as Adelina informed me, on my return to the salle, (where the resumption of the dance had caused the absence of her property to be little heeded,) she had placed a piece of paper, containing my name and address, and the hour fixed for me to see her again. Her own address was also enclosed in the same place; and, to say truth, it was at that address, or rather on the margin of the lagoon which fronted the residency, that I undertook to meet my charming Adelina, after sun-set on the following evening. Imbued with that spirit of romance which, from time immemorial, has been associated with all that pertains to that romantic city, and which has supplied such inexhaustible material to the poet, the novelist, and the painter, I agreed to be beneath Adelina's window in a gondola, with a guitar in my hand, (for I should tell you I had the reputation of being a graceful musician,) and attired in the same costume which I wore on the eventful day, and the still more eventful night.

That night passed away; and in the morning I sought every opportunity of gaining access to Casolari, whom I resolved to chastise for the personal injury he had inflicted upon me; but being unable to obtain any clue to his whereabouts, I suppressed my indignation for the present, and awaited with tremulous anxiety the coming of the hour when I should again behold my lovely innamorata. A whole lifetime seemed to be concentrated in the brief period during which I had abandoned the pursuit of Casolari, and the time appointed for my assignation with Adelina, so conflicting were my emotions, and so perplexing did I find it to realize in my mind all that had happened to me since I joined the maskers in their joyous revels. Was it a dream? or was it a reality decreed by Fate to test my powers of endurance, and to put my susceptibilities on the rack? A dream it was not, could not be, and being a reality, why should it not have its source in a happy intervention of the All-merciful Dispenser of life's blessings? And yet, whence the black cloud which hung over all, as seen in the inexplicable conduct of Signor Casolari? What had I done, what offence committed? Still less, what had the innocent Adelina done, that each should be made the victim of his merciless effrontery? Time would, doubtless, solve the difficulty; and I devoted my thoughts for the remainder of the day to the interesting object of all my hopes and aspirations. At length the evening came, and never had I seen the sunset on that favoured spot reflect more exquisitely the acknowledged beauties of the scene. The Carnival had closed on the previous day, and the city was now, at the hour of twilight, wrapt in calm repose, as if sleeping after the excitement and fatigue she had undergone. There were still a few gondolas on the grand canal, and, taking possession of one of them, I proceeded on my agreeable journey. I had thrown my roquelaire over my shoulders, and slung my guitar round my neck, so that my personal appearance was in most perfect accordance with the romance of the position. I approached the window where I saw the light, which in a few moments more was to disclose to me the vision of my fair enchantress, and was preparing my guitar for the tune by which it had been arranged I should invoke her attention, when a sound from behind suddenly arrested my notice. Turning round I observed another gondola immediately in my wake, and which the twanging of my guitar had prevented my seeing, or rather hearing, previously. At this moment, however, the plashing of the oars in the second gondola was too loud to remain unnoticed, for the boatman was evidently striving to overtake me. This task he easily accomplished, and as I saw the trusting Adeline throw open her window to welcome my arrival, I received a sharp tap on my shoulder, from a man who was hitherto almost invisible in the other gondola, but who now stood erect before me. It was Casolari!

"Your presence is most inopportune, Signor Casolari," said I; "but as I have sought you all day, I ought, perhaps, to thank you for placing yourself within my reach. I received a blow from you last night; am I to understand that you are now here to offer me reparation?"

"Did you not deserve the chastisement I gave you?" he inquired unflinchingly; "and were not your attentions to the Lady Adeline somewhat unwarrantable?"

"A blow, Signor Casolari, is what no man ever deserved, unless he had abandoned his honour; and as for the lady, do not couple her name with aught that is not free from stain."

"You charged me with theft, did you not?" said he, looking me full in the face, and then turning a glance towards the window, where stood the anxious and expectant Adeline, watching, with a degree of suspense which may be readily imagined, the painful scene that was now passing beneath her eyes.

"That word never escaped my lips," cried I, preparing myself against an anticipated attack, for, happily, a trusty doctor formed part of my accoutrements; "but I charged you with the possession of that which belonged to one in whom my honour is interested."

"Do you still hold to that charge?" said Casolari, placing himself in an attitude of attack, and threatening an aim at me.

Smarting under the recollection of the indignity I had received, and being too glad of an opportunity, however ill-timed, of avenging the insult, I unhesitatingly answered:

"I do!"

"No! no!" cried the sweet voice of Adeline, who, unable any longer to suppress her fears, thus boldly declared her presence, in the hope that she might bring the sad dispute to an end. But her intervention was too late, for Casolari had struck me the threatened blow, which I speedily returned, and he fell headlong into the stream!

What would I not have given, what sacrifice would I not have made, rather than that untimely disaster should have occurred? But, alas! the revengeful spirit which filled my very soul when I saw Casolari standing undaunted and unflinching before me, superseded for the time those tender emotions which ought to have predominated over all other feelings, and which now absorbed my whole being. I thought not of the act I had committed, nor of the consequences which might follow. My mind was occupied with the reflection that I had bitterness the sleepless hours of the fair Adeline, and that I had converted myself from an object of love into one of detestation. She whom I had gone forth to meet, in the happy prospect of a blissful interview, she whom for worlds I would not do aught to aggrive, was now driven into the solitude of her chamber, to meditate upon a scene, every thought of which must have been poison to her delicate senses! But I forbear dwelling further on the terrible result of my adventure on the lagoon, for it pains me to associate the name of Adeline with events which her gentle nature would revolt from.

When morning came, I made inquiries respecting the fate of Casolari, and I found, much to my relief, that the blow I had given him was pronounced not to be mortal, the fact of his recoiling at the moment having lessened the impetus, and in like manner caused him to fall into the water, from which he afterwards emerged. For myself, my cloak effectually protected me, and I remained unscathed. But why had Casolari pursued me on the lake, and whence the mystery of the lost fan? The manner in which he had discovered the appointed time and place for my interview with Adeline, seemed apparent enough, from the fact that the fan contained, in itself, the requisite particulars on that point; but in opposition to the presumption that the fan was in Casolari's possession, stood the inference that if he had been guilty of theft, he would hardly have dared to assault me as he had done, and afterwards throw himself voluntarily in my way. I confess that the more I reflected upon this complication of affairs, the more perplexed I became; and all this time, why had my thoughts wandered from Adeline? They had not wandered from her. They were always with her; but I feared to return to her, until I had ascertained the fate of my antagonist, and had gained some information regarding the fan which I became more and more desirous of recovering, and the loss of which had led me into this very unenviable, and, indeed, painful dilemma.

In a fitful mood I was passing through the Piazza of St. Mark, hesitating whether I should endeavour to obtain ingress to the dwelling of the wronged Adeline, and meditating on the possible or probable issue of these strange adventures, when the fair lady herself, accompanied by a female attendant, flitted like a vision before me. Whether she saw me or not, I am unable to say. Most probably she did not, for her veil was down, and my attire had been so much changed since we last met, that I might very easily escape her notice.

Darting forward, with the impetuosity of one who had just lighted on a long-lost treasure, and was eager to seize it, I was instantly by the side of Adeline.

"Fair lady," said I, in a subdued tone, "will you grant me a few moments' audience?"

She beckoned me to a more retired spot, and I followed her, the attendant (who, I found, was in the confidence of her lady) keeping a few paces in the rear. I then expressed to Adeline, in the most emphatic language I could command, the intense regret I felt at having been a party to an encounter, which, to say the least, must have been most unseemly in her eyes, and was certainly calculated to involve her in the bitterest anguish. I told her that, albeit the origin of the quarrel was not of the most serious nature, referring as it did merely to the loss of a fan, the insult I had received was such as my Italian blood was unable to brook, and the less so as her proud name had been associated with mine in a manner which I did not consider respectful to herself. I assured her that I had no thought of Casolari, or of any object in the universe, save her own sweet self, when I set forth on my peaceful mission in the gondola, and that the sad conflict which followed was forced upon me by one who, I feared, was too dangerous a foe to be spared my revenge. Providence, however, seemed to have decreed that he should not fall a victim to his cupidity, and therefore I had not rendered myself amenable to the laws. Hence I begged her to regard me, not as a malefactor, but as an injured person, whose sole idea of happiness was centred in herself, and whose life should be spent in offering homage to her goodness. Adeline, evidently overcome by emotion, was about to reply, when I observed a tear in her soft, expressive eye, and I was fain to exclaim:—

"Pray forgive me, that I have caused you a moment's grief, and tell me if I have said aught that has conjured up recollections which your gentle nature would dispel. If in my words I have offended you, or in my deeds injured you, pause not to visit me with your displeasure, and let me atone for my conduct with the most profound self-denial; but do not punish me so severely as to make me witness of your tears."

"Slightly recovering herself, she said, with an ill-suppressed sigh:—

"Would that the catastrophe had not occurred to one who!"—

"And is Casolari then known to you?" I cried, eagerly, but inadvertently, interrupting her.

"He was the friend of my father," she replied, "during many years of exile, and though I have seen him but little of late, he has always held my esteem, and I would not that a gentleman, whose name was always mentioned with honour by my now deceased parent, should receive an injury at the hands of one who wishes well to me."

"Thus, then," cried I, almost involuntarily, "is my cup of misery rendered complete by the reflection that my enemy is your friend? Such a discovery is sufficient to drown all thoughts of animosity, and to compel me, without reservation, to avow myself in the wrong, and to seek forgiveness from Casolari. I will at once fly to his abode; and, when I behold you again, Adelina, as I fondly hope to do ere night-fall, may Heaven enable me to say that Casolari and I are friends, and that he is fast progressing towards recovery."

It was not, however, so ordained, for after I had escorted Adelina to a gondola, and was proceeding towards the residence of Casolari, a messenger hastily placed in my hand the following brief epistle, and as hastily disappeared.

"One who lies at the point of death, desires to see Signor Volponi, in order that those hands, which last met in enmity, may now join in friendship; and that, ere the final hour shall come, a mystery may be solved which has been the cause of all."

Very little time had elapsed ere I was at the bed-side of Casolari, and I then found that, although in the first instance his wound was not considered fatal, alarming symptoms had since presented themselves, and it was now too evident that he could not survive.

In my inmost heart I could call Heaven to witness, that I had acted only on the defensive; but still I had undoubtedly given the provocation which led to the first assault, and, in any case, how could I ever dash from my brain the reflection that I had slain a fellow creature—and that fellow-creature an object of interest in the eyes of her I loved!

I need not distress you by dwelling minutely on the scene which took place at the death-bed of Casolari. It does not behove me to tell you more than is requisite to enable you arrive at a solution of the mystery, and to understand the position in which I am now unhappily placed. I expressed to Signor Casolari my heart-felt contrition; and he reciprocated my sentiments with an earnest devotion which made me feel more keenly, perhaps, than I otherwise should have done, the remorse which had now seized me. I was about to divert his thoughts for a moment from our relative positions to some consideration of the lost fan, and had almost pronounced the word, when he significantly pointed to his desk, which stood inside an open escrutoir, and—breathed his last.

In due course the desk was opened, and amongst Casolari's papers was one, the contents of which were very illegibly written, but which bore an interpretation to the effect, that, finding his end approaching, and lest the opportunity for a verbal explanation should be denied him, he had deemed it right to himself and to those who thought ill of him, to declare that—when he went to the fatal ball, it was his desire to cast a protecting shield around the fatherless Adelina—that he was somewhat chagrined to find her attentions monopolized by one to whom he had become known only through the gay frivolities of the Carnival, and that he hoped for an occasion to avow his sentiments in that respect—that long ere the dance took place, during which the fan was supposed to have been abstracted, he had observed a mysterious-looking personage in a corner of the room, going through a series of vagaries, which induced him to think he was a professor of legerdemain. Having been refused by a lady as a partner in the dance, he seized her bracelet (which she had doffed for the moment), dashed it to the ground, and, to all appearance, trampled it to pieces; but the bracelet was afterwards restored to its owner uninjured! When it was announced that a lady's fan was missing, the thought occurred to him (Casolari) that, either from a malicious design, or from a desire to shew his magical skill, the same adroit person had, perhaps, subjected the article to some extraordinary process of destruction or metamorphosis, which would result in its ultimate restoration. He was in quest of that mysterious individual, when he encountered Volponi on the stairs; and it was because his jealousy had been aroused by the latter's attentions to Adelina, and because he was irritated at the tone of accusation in which he mentioned the subject of the fan to him, that he forbore to tell him his own impressions, and resented, by a blow, the final indignity he had cast upon him. When the guests were departing, the magician (for so he proved to be), whose face was still concealed beneath a mask, produced the fan from a conspicuous spot, to which, he said, he had conveyed it while all eyes were looking on him; and his motive for doing so was, that he might cause a diversion unfavourable to one whose movements had excited his envy. He (Casolari) had taken the treasure (for it proved to be an article of considerable value and of most uncommon construction), to his own abode that night, intending to return it to the owner on the following day, and having read the piece of paper enclosed in the receptacle at the back of the fan, he was prompted, by some unconquerable spirit of evil, to repair to the dwelling-place of Adelina, at the time and place appointed for her interview with Volponi. When he emerged from the water, which he did without much difficulty, wounded though he was, he remembered that the fan had fallen into the gondola, and would, perhaps, never have been recovered, but that the owner of the boat chanced to know him well, and brought it to him on the following morning. The fan was now in his escrutoire, and he was happy to be the means of restoring it to her for whom he would have died to preserve it."

Then followed a few incoherent words respecting his fate, and the hasty language on my part which had led to it, but these were scarcely comprehensible, save for the moral they conveyed, viz., that we should ever be cautious how we charge others with guilt, lest their innocent blood should afterwards flow in judgment against us.

The fan was immediately restored to the now deeply distressed Adelina, and I was doomed to perpetual banishment.

Here ended Signor Volponi's narrative, and on the following morning we parted.

Some two or three years afterwards I chanced to be travelling on the Italian frontier, when I observed, at a table d'hôte, a gentleman of commanding figure, and conspicuous attire; and seated by his side was a middle-aged but still beautiful Venetian lady. The one was Signor Volponi, the other Adelina Strozzi. The offence had been condoned; Volponi had returned to Venice, and Adelina and he were now making their wedding tour. G. II.

FLOWERS.—The body and the spirits are alike improved by the cultivation of the garden. More grows in the cottar's plot than flowers; the cultivation of pansies may tend to his heart's-ease, the bed of thyme may speed a dull hour, and kind thoughts spring up while watering the clump of forget-me-nots. Everywhere the heart of man blesses flowers; the child seeks them in the hedges, the old man finds in their culture and study soothing recreation and delight. Pagan and Christian have used them in their rites; flowers deck the bride, and are strewn on the grave. In every country they smile around us. Babylon had its hanging garden; Greece its roses and lilies—"Lilia mista Rosis;" and Rome its boxtrees cut into the figures of animals, ships, and letters, to say nothing of its violets and crocuses.

TULLY CASTLE.

THE castle of Tully is situated on the south-western shore of the lower lake of Lough Erne, county Fermanagh. Amongst the English and Scotch settlers "planted" in this county, the most largely endowed with the confiscated estates of the Irish was Sir John Hume, or Hume, the founder of the castle the ruins of which, as they appeared some years since, form the subject of our illustration. The property of Sir John, consisting of nearly five thousand acres, remained in the possession of his male descendants till the demise of Sir Gustavus Hume, in 1731, who dying without surviving male issue, it passed into the possession of the Loftus family. The castle was for some time the chief residence of the Hume family, but on the breaking out of the Civil War of 1641, it became the refuge of many of the English and Scotch settlers of the county, who were besieged in it by the Irish forces, under the command of Rory, brother of Lord Maguire. The garrison having surrendered on a promise of quarter for their lives, and safe conduct to either Monea (illustrated in our third number) or Enniskillen, is said to have been inhumanly massacred, and the castle pillaged and burned. It does not appear to have been re-edified after this. In its general character, as shown in its ruins, it seems to have been a keep, or castle, turreted at the angles, and surrounded by a bawn or outer wall. Pynnar, writing of it in 1618, describes it as a "bawne of lime and stone, an hundred feet square, fourteen feet high, having four flankers for the defence. There is also a fair strong castle, fifty feet long, and twenty-one feet broad. He hath made a village near unto the bawne, in which is dwelling twenty-four families."

THE ROSE OF DRINNAGH.

WHATEVER side we turn to around the city of Dublin we are sure to meet mementoes that carry our thoughts back to those turbulent days when lance and sword usually settled questions which are now adjudicated without disturbance, save an occasional battle of tongues, in our peaceful courts of law. Many of these ancient fortresses, which, like a crescent chain of watchful sentinels, towered beyond the city for the protection of the Pale, still remain and raise their hoary heads over valley and river shore, adown which, in bright array, plumed nobles, and steel-clad knights, and men-at-arms rode gallantly forth to battle—where the weary cruet bowed, after the foray in which they had been driven from some far-off fastness of Innyke, Leix, or Ossory; and where the minstrel, half-Irish and half-Norman, once twanged his glittern, as he went from castle to castle, relating in rousing and voluble stanzas, the deeds of the knights of St. George.* Among the most remarkable and interesting of these ancient structures is the Castle of Drinnagh—the subject of many a legendary tale. Could the bearded old warriors who once thronged its halls awake, they would witness many a wonderful change since the half-forgotten days when they lived and loved, revelled and fought, conquered or sustained defeat. Where the "Asla" or mounted courier, once spurred forth upon his hasty errand, the lightning of heaven now speeds by telegraphic wires to the farthest corners of the land; through the craggy passes and along the level plains, marked some centuries ago with scarcely a bridle path, the mighty steam-horse thunders over its iron track with its ponderous load, and instead of the small city which lay cooped up within its battlemented walls around the castle, a glittering panorama of streets and squares, docks, store-houses, towers, and splendid domes, now spreads outward to the capacious bay, where, in place of the crazy fleets of diminutive war galleys and merchant vessels, with their fantastic prows and carved mast-heads, the huge hull of the steam-propelled ship now rides at anchor beside the populous quays, or ploughs the blue waves beyond the hoary headlands of old Ben Hedar, like a miniature volcano, with its attendant cloud-volumes on the far horizon line.

* This band of knights was instituted in the year 1475, for the protection of the English Pale. A troublesome life they must have led in those days, for there never passed a season over their heads that they did not cross swords with the neighbouring Irish clans.

Retaining still some of its ancient appurtenances, such as its moat, curtain walls, etc., the Castle of Drimnagh presents one of the best specimens in the neighbourhood of Dublin of the ancient feudal stronghold. It stands beside the way leading from Crumlin to the village of Clondalkin, and within a few short miles from the city. According to the most authentic accounts, it was founded in the time of King John, by a knight named De Bernival, who came to Ireland in the train of that prince, and received from him a grant of the surrounding lands. From this knight the different families of Barnwell in Ireland claim their descent. His death occurred about the year 1221, and his descendants held possession of Drimnagh and the Terenure till the time of James the First, when their possessions, after a tedious lawsuit, fell to Sir Adam Loftus. During the great insurrection of 1641, it was garrisoned for the King by the Duke of Ormond, and had the rare fortune of escaping the destruction that followed after the arrival on those shores of Cromwell and his stern legions. It is still inhabited and in good preservation, and will well repay the tourist who leaves the dust, and toil, and din of the city, and saunters out along the quiet country roads, to pay it a visit. Should he linger there, and hold converse with the surrounding peasantry, he will hear many a story and romantic legend of days gone by, the particulars of which will prove no unpleasing accession to his note-book. One of these we will now proceed to relate, and hope it may prove as interesting to the readers of the "Dublin Journal" as it did to ourselves when we heard it told one quiet summer evening, beneath the shadow of the ivy-wreathed battlements of Drimnagh.

During the reign of a certain English monarch, whose name we need not particularly mention, Sir Hugh de Barnwell ruled with a high and lordly hand in his feudal stronghold of Drimnagh. He was a stout and stern knight, whose life had been spent amid the commotions of the war that year by year raged between the Palemen and the Irishrie. Many a tough battle he had fought, and many a wound he had received since he first donned the knightly spurs, and it will not be wondered at, therefore, when we mention that he looked upon the native races around with no small amount of hatred. Among those against whom his animosity burned most fiercely were the O'Byrnes, lords of Imayle, whose chief had once sacked his Castle of Drimnagh, and driven the herds pertaining to it over the southern mountain barrier into Wicklow. The chief was still living at the time our story commences, and had two sons, the youngest of whom, named Sir John O'Byrne, was a knight of unwonted bravery. To his great personal beauty was added every accomplishment fitted for one of his high station, and when, at the head of his bold horsemen, he rode down the mountains, on a foray into the Pale, it would be hard to find, in the whole wide champaign over which he cast his eagle eye, a man of more splendid appearance and gallant bearing. Sir Hugh de Barnwell had one son, who was renowned throughout the Pale for his prowess and for the ferocity with which he always fought against the neighbouring chief of Imayle. The following will explain his reasons for hating the O'Byrnes with such bitterness. Living in his father's house at the time was his cousin Eleanora de Barnwell, who, in consequence of her beauty, was called "The Rose of Drimnagh." To this young lady Sir Edmond de Barnwell had been betrothed, and matters went on smoothly and pleasantly enough for some time, till, during a truce entered into between the Palemen and the Wicklow clans, Eleanora met Sir John O'Byrne at a nobleman's house, on a festival day, in Dublin. Up to this "The Rose of Drimnagh" knew little of her heart, but she soon learned to love the young Wicklow chief, and, as a natural consequence, to look with coldness and indifference upon her cousin, who, after at length coming to the knowledge of the affair, swore to be avenged upon his rival. The truce was scarcely over when he was up and at work, and many a rifled hamlet and burning dwelling marked his track through the glens of Wicklow, and many a desolate widow cursed his name and race as she sang the keen over the bodies of her slaughtered ones, who had fallen beneath the spears of Sir Edmond de Barnwell and his ruthless followers.

But at last a time came when a triumphant light shone in Black Sir Edmond's eyes, for he thought upon the day, now near at hand, which was fixed upon for his marriage with the lovely "Rose of Drimnagh."

"Once more," he said, "I will seek the mountains, to find him before the marriage revel. By the soul of a knight, an' I lay my hands upon him, but he shall rue the hour. Yes, rue it, for I swear to bring him in chains to look upon the bridal, and then to string him up, as I would one of his own mountain wolves, upon the gallows-tree, before the gate of Drimnagh!"

It was nightfall as he spoke thus. Little he knew that at that same moment Sir John O'Byrne was sitting quietly beneath the dark shadows of a tree outside the moat, looking up, cautiously, at the window of the little chamber in which Eleanora de Barnwell was sitting, weeping bitterly over the sad fate to which she knew but too well she would soon have to submit. As she sat thus, a low soft sound, like the cooing of a dove, fell upon her ears. She listened intently a moment, then stepped softly over to the single window of the apartment, and, opening the casement, looked out. Again the sound stole up from under the dense foliage that shaded the outer edge of the moat. Eleanora leant upon the sill, and peered down into the gloom, but nothing met her gaze save the ghostly shadows of the trees upon the black belt of water beneath.

"It is his signal," she whispered to herself, as the sound was repeated once more. "Ah, me! I fear he will get himself into danger on account of those nightly visits. And yet, I cannot—I cannot bid him stay away!"

She muffled herself in a dark mantle, moved towards the door, opened it cautiously and listened, ere she ventured to steal down and meet her lover.

"I must and will warn him to-night to stay away," continued she, as with a light and stealthy step she descended the winding stair—"ah! to stay away, and leave me to my misery. It is hard, but it must be done, otherwise he will assuredly be captured and slain."

After stealing down an infinite number of dark passages, corridors, and stairways, she at length emerged into the open air, and glided through a neglected postern out beneath a spreading beech-tree, that shaded the inner edge of the moat opposite the spot whence the signal of her lover proceeded. Again she peered into the gloom, at the other side, and saw there a tall dark figure standing beneath a tree on the edge of the water. Well she knew the graceful outlines of that figure, and fondly her heart throbbed at the sound of the voice that now addressed her.

"Dearest," said the young mountain knight, in a low tone, "I thought thou wouldst never come. I have been standing like a statue against the trunk of this tree behind me for the last half hour watching for a light in thy window pane. But it seems that darkness pleases thee better. Ah! Eleanora, I hope thou art not still indulging in those sorrowful forebodings."

"And wherefore not, John?" answered she sadly. "What thoughts but gloomy ones can fill my mind, when I am ever thinking of the danger thou incurrest by coming here so often—and thinking, too," she added, after a pause, "of the woeeful fate to which we are destined?"

"Think no more on't," said her lover, in a cheerful tone. "We have hope yet, Eleanora; for, mark me, thy marriage with Sir Edmond de Barnwell will never take place."

"Alas! there is no hope," resumed Eleanora. "Even to-day, my uncle, the Knight of Drimnagh, hath fixed the time for—to me—the woeeful bridal. And thou, John—Let this be our last meeting—our last meeting, alas! in this world. Wert thou 'a'en prisoner by my dark cousin, he hates thee so, that he would burn thee at a stake in the courtyard."

"Fear not for that, dearest," answered the young chief. "And this bridal that thou fearest. Listen, Eleanora. Before the hour comes, or perchance at the very hour when he is about to place the bridal ring upon thy lily finger, the gay goshawk may swoop down and bear thee away to his free mountains—amid their sunny glens and bosky woods, to love thee, darling, as no other mortal man could love thee!"

"Ah me!" sighed poor Eleanora. "Would that it could be so. But I fear that we are fated to see each other for the last time to-night. I warn thee, John, to be wary henceforth, for I am well watched. Hush! was that a foot-fall amid the grove yonder?" and she pointed to a clump of trees some distance to the right of where her lover stood.

"By my faith, but it may be so," answered he; "and so thou hast better return to thy chamber. In the meantime, I will wait here till I see the light in thy window once more, and until thou biddest me farewell from the casement."

Again they listened and heard a slight rustling sound amid the trees to which Eleanora had pointed. It ceased, and then the fair Rose of Drimnagh trembled at the thought of her fierce cousin, waved a fond farewell to her mountain lover, and then gliding once more through the postern, ascended the stairs to her chamber. But the bold knight of Imaile was not to be frightened away by the sound, whatever might have caused it. He moved in beneath the shadow of the tree, listened for a time, and hearing nothing further, advanced again and looked up to where the light was now burning brightly in Eleanora's window. Seating himself upon the side of the moat in the shadow, and still looking fondly upward, he commenced, in a voice low but distinct, a lay in praise of his mistress, of which the following paraphrase may convey some idea:—

"Oh! wilt thou come and be my bride,
Oh! wilt thou fly with me,
Where wild streams glide by mountain side,
By glen and forest tree;
And thou'lt be lady of that land,
And like a queen shalt reign
O'er shore and strand, and mountain grand,
And many a sunny plain!
I've found a lone and lovely cave
Where gleams a little lake;
Where the wild rills fling the silver wave,
And the birds sing in the brake—
The lake gleams clear, the rills dance bright,
Down gorge and rocky pile,
But the darkness of a starless night
Is in my soul the while!
And nought can light it save a glance,
A beam from thy jet-black-eye,
And nought can break my heart's cold trance
Save thy witching song or sigh.
Then come!—I've decked that cave for thee,
With summer's fairest flowers,
Away, away o'er the hills with me,
To the forest glens and bowers!"

The moment the song had ceased the fair form of the Rose of Drimnagh appeared at the casement overhead. She waved a fond farewell to her young mountain minstrel, and closed the window, but the light that shone through its pane had now lost its charm for him, as he had no longer her fair face to look upon. He stood up, and after gazing once more at the casement that glimmered like a star amid the dark masses of masonry above, was turning to depart, when he felt the heavy grasp of a steel-clad hand upon his shoulder.

"Stay!" exclaimed the intruder in a deep stern voice, whose tone the young Knight of Imaile knew but too well. "Thou hast a small account to settle, fair sir, ere thou leavest this spot. I am Sir Edmond de Barnwell!"

"And I," answered the other, "am Sir John O'Byrne of Imaile; what seekest thou from me?"

"That thou shalt soon know, skulking hill-cat!" answered de Barnwell, unbuckling his sword, unsheathing it, and throwing belt and scabbard upon the ground. "There be a certain tide which men call blood, coursing beneath that breast-plate of thine. I seek to discover its fount with this!" and he extended his weapon.

"There be a certain tide behind thee, which thou art more likely to explore presently!" retorted O'Byrne, "Ha! ha! 'ware the hill-cat's spring, de Barnwell!" and he gave a sudden bound that brought him inside the guard of his antagonist, whose waist he instantly encircled with his sinewy arms. There was an ineffectual attempt to pluck forth their daggers, and then Sir Edmond de Barnwell was hurled from the stalwart arms of the brave Knight of Imaile, and sent plunging headlong into the black waters of the moat.

Leaving his foe to scramble as best he could from his dangerous bath in the fosse, O'Byrne glided through the thickets and sought his steel, which he had left in a lonely grove hard by, and was soon riding in headlong haste across the plain towards the stern mountain barrier that lay between him and his native glens. And now, de Barnwell, after extricating himself with great difficulty from the treacherous waters, stood all dripping upon the firm bank, his burly frame quivering, not from the chill of his immersion, but from fury at his mishap. Pursuit of his late antagonist was, he knew, of little use now, so plucking up his sword which lay beside him, he raised the cold steel blade to his lips, kissed it, vowed a stern vow of vengeance against O'Byrne and his race, root and branch, and then striding down by the water side, crossed the draw-bridge, and sought his chamber, where he sat till long after midnight brooding over various plans of merciless and bloody retribution.

The particulars of his subsequent cruel raid into the glens of Wicklow it is unnecessary to relate, and we shall now come to the day which his father had fixed upon for the marriage. It was early in the morning, and the fair Rose of Drimnagh, surrounded by her lovely maids, looked sadly upon the gorgeous white bridal dress which lay on a table beside her, and which she was at last about to put on.

"Ah, me!" she sighed mournfully, "that it hath come to this. In vain have I watched for him to appear in his accustomed place by the moat, but his promise is broken, and what could have broken it but death?" and the tears gathered into her eyes as she thought thus of her lover.

"Cheer thee, Eleanora," said her cousin, a young and gay city dame, "I warrant thee that such a bridal as thine was never seen in Dublin; I only wish I were in thy place."

"Alas that thou art not," returned Eleanora. "Something tells me that what thou sayest is but too true—that such a bridal as mine was never seen!" and with the help of her maids she now began to don the dress.

The marriage was to take place in the city, and Sir Edmond de Barnwell had summoned his kinsmen of the Pale, with all their fierce retainers, in order to strengthen his escort for the bridal train, which at last in splendid array crossed the draw-bridge of Drimnagh, and moved along the winding road that led to the western gate of Dublin. This road was crossed by another midway between the castle and the city, and within a wood which stretched down from the mountains to the shores of the Liffey. About half the bridal train had passed the cross, and the remainder, with the bride and bridegroom before them, were moving gaily forward, when all at once the wild war-cry of the O'Byrnes resounded from the wood all around, and the next instant a large body of men headed by the young knight of Imaile sprang from their concealment, and fell upon the escort, front, rear, and flank. It is needless to go minutely into the details of the terrible fight that then took place at the Minstrel's cross, as the spot was called. The escort were at first put to flight and pursued by the O'Byrnes, but returning again to the charge, the light kerne of the mountains were borne down by their heavy horses, though they fought it out bravely to the last. The knight of Imaile, after badly wounding the bridegroom, was shot through the heart by the old lord of Drimnagh, as he attempted to seize the bridle of Eleanora's palfrey. This ended the fray. The body of the young knight was borne away by his followers, and buried in the lonely graveyard that lay amid the mountains. The bridal train, instead of proceeding to Dublin, returned to the castle of Drimnagh, where Sir Edmond de Barnwell was laid upon a bed from which he never rose.

Three days after the fatal battle at the Minstrel's cross, Eleanora disappeared from the castle of Drimnagh. Search was made for her throughout the surrounding country, and even in the neighbouring city, but it was of no avail; she was nowhere to be found. At length a party of the O'Byrnes, who were driving a creak of cattle across the mountains, halted beside the solitary churchyard to pay a visit to the last resting-place of their young chief, and upon the fresh sod that lay above his gallant breast, found the lifeless body of the ill-fated Rose of Drimnagh. They hollowed her a grave beside her lover, and there, in the words of the old ballad,

"These loving hearts by fortune blighted,
By sorrow tried full sore,
In life apart, in death united,
Sleep side by side for evermore!"

MY EXPERIENCE AS AN INTERPRETER.

It chanced that in early life I became, for a short time, tolerably intimate with several natives of Poland, and that, as one result of my intercourse with them, I picked up a certain portion of their language. Let the reader not be astonished when I say that that portion only amounted to three very short words, and that my knowledge even of these was not extremely clear. In fact, any one who has heard as much Polish spoken as it has been my good fortune to have heard, will not, I am persuaded, charge me with dullness for not having achieved more in that most unattainable of languages; but be my dullness or aptitude what they may, the three Polish words I had learned, or at least attempted to learn, were dobra, dobja, and tak—three mysterious sounds it must be owned, and calculated to remind one of the Abra-cadabra of the ancient Cabalists. The meaning of the two former words, is, I believe, “good,” and “well,” but which is the adverb and which the adjective is a point I have failed to recollect. The third word is simply equivalent to the little affirmative, “yes.”

Now, it fell to my lot to exercise this very scanty knowledge of the ancient Slavonic dialect of Poland once in a very remarkable manner; and to explain how this came about it is necessary, in the first place, to mention that I frequently attended the proceedings at the Dublin police courts in the capacity of a reporter for a morning newspaper. There are few positions in which a man has an opportunity of observing a greater variety of the phases and vicissitudes of human life—much more of the evil than of the good, no doubt; but often some of the good, also, and still oftener a vast deal of the ridiculous. Sometimes, when more industriously inclined than usual, I attended Major Sirr's morning levees at the Head Office, and would feel, of course, greatly edified by his worship's pious exhortations upon the numerous night charges brought before him. On these occasions the prisoners generally found it the best policy to make an ample confession of their guilt, and the more abject their assumed contrition, the greater chance they had of mercy. Thus, a dilapidated weaver from the Liberty, who, while in a state of intoxication, had nearly murdered his unfortunate wife, hung down his head very low, one morning, and heaved some most penitent sighs while the major was denouncing human wickedness in general, and that of the prisoner in particular. He then ventured to say, in a very meek voice:—

“Ah! true for your worship! It was nothin' but the Devil that tempted me;—cross of—oh, I beg your worship's pardon!”

Major.—“I see you are an unfortunate man.”

Prisoner.—“Ah! your worship, I am very unfortunate,” (and then, sotto voce), “the murderin' ould villain, I wonder could he count all the people he hanged!”

One day, I stepped in at a later hour, and found the court unusually dull. The Major sat quite mute, with eyes closed, spectacles raised on the bald forehead, and hands clasped together on the desk before him. He was in one of his accustomed reveries. The alderman tried to rouse himself from a state of impending somnolence to sign some official documents which had been placed before him by the office sergeant; and I stood examining the charge sheet which lay at one end of the bench, vainly searching for a “case.” It was indeed a day hopelessly barren, or, as a learned policeman had called it just before, a “dies non,” when suddenly the drowsy tranquillity of the court was broken by the entrance of two men in a state of considerable excitement. In a moment it seemed as if the office, which, until then, was quiet, had been visited by a whirlwind. The Major opened his eyes, but the alderman would not descend from his importance by looking up, at least, for a while, from the documents to which he still appeared to be affixing his signature. Indeed, had a real whirlwind entered he would not have condescended to notice it for a moment or two, that he might sustain the magisterial dignity.

One of the new-comers was a small, elderly man, with a short, cocked nose, and an irritable expression of countenance. His face was meagre and dirty, and his habiliments greasy and thread-bare. He was evidently the plaintiff in the case.

The other was a foreign-looking personage, rather fashionably attired in blue dress coat and white waistcoat, with gilt buttons on the latter; and there was something of the ancien militaire about his neck and chin. He was, of course, the defendant, and appeared by much the more excited of the two.

The plaintiff, in stating his case, said:—“This foreigner, your worships—he's a Pole, your worships—well, he took a room from me for a month, and he left it the very next mornin' without payin' me a farthin' rent, your worships, and so I brought him here to get justice.”

The defendant, who seemed almost bursting with indignation, and jerked his whole person about in a spasmodic state of excitement, could not wait for the preceding brief statement to be finished, but made sundry efforts to explain the case in his own way. His language was a strange mixture of Polish and English, but unfortunately the English, as he spoke it, was not a whit more intelligible to his auditors than the Polish, and so he might as well have held his tongue. Of this, however, he did not seem sensible, and he continued to pour out a torrent of sounds perfectly incomprehensible.

“Oh, I give you my oath it's true!” said the plaintiff, attempting to resume his statement of facts.

“What is true, man?” exclaimed the Major; “we cannot understand one word from either of you.”

“What I'm tellin' your worship is true, and not what this foreigner is sayin',” resumed the plaintiff.

This drew forth from his antagonist a perfect cataract of Slavonic and pseudo-English eloquence, which was quite lost upon his auditors. The magistrates seemed bewildered; we were evidently treated to a second edition of the confusion of Babel; and in an unlucky moment I permitted myself to utter, in an undertone, the word dobja!

Had I shivered a talisman in pieces, in the days of Abdelmelek the son of Mirwan, the effect could not have been more astounding. The poor Pole turned towards me, and delivered what was, I am sure, a very effective oration in Slavonian, if I could only understand one word of it; while he, poor man, imagined that I understood it perfectly, and congratulated himself on meeting an interpreter in such an emergency.

All eyes were now fixed on myself, and I endeavoured to look as solemn as possible, and after the Pole had proceeded some way in his vehement exposition of grievances, I ventured to use my second word of his language, and pronounced the mystic syllable dobra! very significantly. I knew it must answer, for I had often heard dobra and dobja used indiscriminately, pretty much as the French employ their interjectional bon! and bien! and it appeared I was quite right, for the Pole himself repeated dobra very emphatically, and went on with a great deal more to the same effect, which every body present, except myself, thought I understood perfectly well.

“What on earth is he saying?” enquired the alderman despondingly, and looking towards me.

“We don't understand a word from you, my good man,” said the major calmly; neither did my brave Pole care whether he did or not, seeing that I could understand him so thoroughly, and could explain every thing to the bench.

I began to feel exceedingly uncomfortable, and addressed the Pole in French, but he intimated that he knew nothing about that language; and it was evident that my French and the defendant's Polish sounded pretty much the same to the worthy magistrates.

“I am sure I don't know one word he says,” repeated the alderman enquiringly, and looking towards me.

“Your worship,” I replied, “he appears to give a very satisfactory explanation of his case, and it is quite clear he cannot remain in this man's lodgings.”

I thought I might go so far in safety.

“And what objection does he make to your lodging?” said the magistrate, addressing the plaintiff, who looked terribly perplexed all this time.

“He says it's dirty, your worship, and every thing, but sure there isn't a word of truth in that, I give you my oath;” replied the irritable-looking old man.

“Oh, we must dismiss the case;” said the alderman.

“And wont he pay me the month's rent?” ejaculated the astonished plaintiff.

“Don't you hear man, we can do nothing for you?” said the major.

In the meantime the excited defendant continued to ply me with Polish, and as I saw the case was coming to a close, I thought I might hazard my third and last word in that language, so I said "tak," nodding my head very wisely. Still the Pole persisted, and as I had exhausted my vocabulary, I repeated tak, tak, rather impatiently, and with an air which implied;—"your case is settled and you may now go about your business; I have other affairs to attend to."

The litigants departed, and all was soon peace again, but for a while the magistrates did not seem to have recovered their usual placidity. I could perceive, however, that I had risen considerably in their estimation, and the rather because I had been able, a few days before, to interpret their behests to an Italian organ-boy, who was brought up for disturbing a nervous gentleman by his music, and who could not be made to understand a word of English. Thus was my reputation established as an interpreter; and yet I knew a case in which even a smaller amount of linguistic knowledge was turned to more profitable account; for I myself, in my juvenile days, was swindled to a small extent in Boulogne by a fellow who gained my confidence by repeating verre good! verre good! though I firmly believe he did not know another word of English even such as that was.

But to return to my Polish exploit. On leaving the board-room, I went into the office of my friend, Ross Cox, and told him how I had acted the interpreter. He enjoyed the joke so well that he made the entire establishment ring again with his peals of laughter—and many a time and oft did similar peals from the same generous and kindly heart, long since stilled in death, echo through the same sombre halls and offices, but having had so narrow an escape in my first attempt, I resolved never again to set up for a Polish scholar. THE LAST NEW POEM.

E should, perhaps, incur less risk of being misunderstood as to the subject of this notice, had we chosen for it a title slightly different. It is not our intention, of course, to be satirical, and hint that Mr. Alexander Smith's production is not a poem, for such it is in every sense of the word; but, as every lady is a woman—and something more—so Edwin of Deira is more than a poem, it is an epic. Therefore, had we given this paper the heading of "The Last New Epic," (though some exception has been taken to that too,) we could not possibly have been understood to refer to any of the lucubrations of those gentlemen, who, to judge of their writings, possess the "fatal facility" of pouring forth verse in quantity and of quality similar to that of the prose of Molière's "Bourgeois Gentilhomme."

In the year 1851 Alexander Smith was unknown; at the present moment he holds, if not the second, certainly the third place among the poets of the day. In ten years he has acquired a reputation equal to that of some who have been before the public for twice that period, and by each successive work has managed to deepen the impression produced by its predecessor. From the first the public perceived that they had to deal with a great poet, possibly the greatest of the age; and hence the immediate popularity which his writings obtained.

The manner in which they were introduced to notice affords a good lesson to those amateur poetasters who imagine that they would lose caste did they suffer their verses to appear in the pages of a periodical. In the early part of the year 1852, the Critic, a well-known London print, contained from week to week portions of different poems, which attracted general attention, from the evident powers they displayed. These extracts being quoted and kindly commented upon by the Leader and other journals, it transpired that the author was a young man about one-and-twenty years of age, who was engaged in mercantile pursuits in Glasgow. The approbation with which these fragments were greeted induced a London publisher (Mr. Bogue) to bring out, in a separate form, such pieces as had been completed; and a volume, entitled Poems, by Alexander Smith, was the result. Its success, which, as we have mentioned, was very great, was, however surpassed by that of his next volume, City Poems; while his last work, Edwin of Deira, a little epic, bids fair to eclipse all his former productions.

The subject of Edwin is good. The poet has evidently brooded over his idea, planned and re-planned it, years before he committed a line to paper.

In marking out his plot, which is very simple, Mr. Smith has, in many instances, deviated from the account given by Bede, his chief authority. Most of these differences are perfectly allowable, but others, to say the least, are unnecessary. We are first introduced to the hero after a great battle, in which he has been utterly defeated by Ethelfrid, whose name Mr. Smith has changed, somewhat gratuitously, we think, the accentuation of both words being the same, into Ethelbert. He flies for refuge and aid to the court of his father's old friend Redwald, who, after hesitations to incur the enmity of the powerful king, Ethelbert, at length gives him an army under the conduct of his seven sons—with whose aid he succeeds in overthrowing the usurper and recovering his kingdom. He then weds the daughter of his benefactor, and the poem concludes with the conversion of Edwin and his people to Christianity.

A kingdom's strength upon a battle-day,

It will thus be seen that Mr. Smith has called in no adventitious aid in the shape of intricacy of story, no dreadful woman-in-white-like secret to be disclosed at the end of the volume, and has dragged in no "strong situation" neck-and-heels, whenever he felt the interest flag. He felt that his poem needed no such "relish" to make it go down, and he acted accordingly.

The delineation of the heroine, Bertha, in whom Edwin's two real wives are judiciously amalgamated (for what romance can there be in second love?) was, with the poet, evidently a labour of love. In reference to her, are found the finest passages in the poem. From her entrance——"With the dawn, and like another dawn,

But fairer, Bertha came."

To the last line which refers to her, she is surrounded by a halo of true poetry. Her meeting with her father Redwald is thus described:—

"He clasped his withered hands
Fondly upon her head, and bent it back,
As one might bend a downward-looking flower,
To make its perfect beauty visible;
Then kissed her cheek and mouth."

But the best bit in the whole poem, to our fancy, is the following, which describes the effects of first love on a young girl:—

"The woman's heart that woke Within the girlish bosom—ah! too soon!
Filled her with fear and strangeness for the path,
Familiar to her childhood, and to still
And maiden thoughts, upon a sudden dipped
To an unknown, sweet land of delicate light
Divinely aired, but where each rose and leaf
Was trembling as if haunted by a dread
Of coming thunder. Changed in one quick hour,
From bud to rose, from child to woman, love
Silenced her spirit, as the swelling brine
From out the far Atlantic makes a hush
Within the channels of the careless stream
That erst ran chattering with the pebble stones."

To a certain degree the poetry of Alfred Tennyson has influenced the poetry of Alexander Smith. There is hardly a living poet, with the exception of Browning, and perhaps of Owen Meredith, who does not owe his poetic being to Tennyson. Some are mere servile copyists, and as such reap their reward; others, like Mr. Smith, are indebted to the Laureate for the form and manner only of their utterance. We understand that Mr. Smith avers the greater part of his poem was composed and written before the publication of the "Idylls of the King." This we can well believe. We think that the similarity which undoubtedly exists between the two poems is almost entirely due to the fact of their both being Saxon in character; and as to those passages to which, we are informed, "Tennyson might have set his initials," we confess ourselves unable to discover them.

A REAL GRIEVANCE.

A GLANCE AT THE GRIEVANCE OF MR. SNOBBINS, AND A NOTICE AT SOME LENGTH OF MRS. SQUEEZER AND HER CAT.

HE intelligent readers of the "Illustrated Dublin Journal" may, perhaps, remember a paper, (we were going to say a remarkably clever and interesting paper, but we smother the vain suggestion,) which appeared in our first number, on the subject of "grievances," real or imaginary. We trust that they were satisfied with the manner in which this interesting subject was treated, and are quite ready and willing to hear more on the same important matter. It is very satisfactory to ourselves, at all events, to know that the discriminating Editor of this "Journal" was quite satisfied with our humble paper; and you will understand this point more clearly, courteous reader, when you call to mind that in these matters the satisfaction of a prosperous and well-to-do editor is wont to be expressed in a very substantial manner. Some journals are started on the plan of getting all they can for nothing in the shape of contributions; and we must say, that writing for these journals, after one gets over the first satisfaction of seeing one's own productions in print, is a very profitless and mild kind of an undertaking. We don't deny that one receives a profusion of thanks, but, then, what are mere thanks, we should like to know?

"Airy nothings!" On the other hand, when one is engaged in writing for a journal like the "Illustrated Dublin," conducted with so much tact and discrimination by our worthy friend, the Editor, if he will allow us to call him so; (and here our friend places his hand upon the region where his heart is supposed to be, and bows to us,) it becomes a very different thing; and the arrival of a polite note and still more welcome enclosure, gives to the airy nothings of which we just spoke, "a local habitation and a name." Shakspeare, hem! Hence, courteous reader, you will now clearly understand, we are sure, how satisfactory it was to us to know that our paper on the subject of "Grievances" met with the approbation of our friend (if he will allow us) the Editor; and how willing we were to respond to his invitation to continue our humble efforts to amuse and interest his hundreds of thousands of readers.

And before we proceed to investigate still further the subject of grievances, we must beg in this place to be allowed to make one little remark. It strikes us very forcibly that there may be some of our readers rather inclined to turn up their noses (excuse the homely simile) at the preceding remarks. Snobbins, for example, sent in a paper, and Snobbins's paper was rejected. Snobbins is quite sure that the subject of his paper was quite as interesting as the subject of "grievances" can possibly be. Of course, it doesn't become Snobbins to speak of the style, language, and composition of his paper, but he is quite prepared to leave that point to the judgment of his friends, and yet his paper was rejected, and the rapid, silly paper of this "Mr. Incog"—whoever he may be—was accepted with many thanks, and printed in the very first number of the "Journal." Now, Snobbins, don't be in a passion, but listen to reason, like a good old fellow. You know that some one must be the judge between you and us, and you have no right to maliciously insinuate that you will "demolish" the "Journal" in the columns of the "Weekly Crusher," for which you now and then write a stray article. It would never do for us to decide on the merits of our own papers. Then, perhaps, you haven't been at the business so long as we have. We assure you that we wrote a long time, and received nothing more substantial than thanks in return. We have been at the work some time now, and, between you and us, very up-hill work it is, and still our papers, even now, are not always accepted. Only a very short time ago, a paper which cost us a great deal of labour in its composition was rejected, for the simple reason that we had made a mistake in the selection of our subject, and had written "above" our readers, their tastes and inclinations; of which tastes and inclinations, the editor of the journal for which we wrote our article was the natural judge. Your turn may come next, and some day, when one of our pet articles may be quietly sleeping in the bottom of the pillow-case, where our friend, the Editor, puts the rejected communications to rest, you may be figuring in large type. At all events, don't be angry, but if you feel that you have the "stuff" in you, stick to it, and in the end you will rise to the surface; and, Snobbins, dear old fellow, don't let you and us ever forget how much power of doing good God has put into our hands through the instrumentality of our pen; and then we shall work together bravely for our common object. Perhaps, when you looked hurriedly through the pages of the first number of the "Dublin," and found that your piece was not accepted, you threw the magazine down in disgust, and read no more. If such was the case, take it up again, and read the "Greeting" of the "Dublin," and you will there find a sentiment which, we venture to say, we shall both of us be the better and the kinder for remembering—

"For the brother help'd by brother,
Hath a force that none may stay."

Let us apply this to ourselves. Don't you be angry because your article was rejected, but try again, like a man, and you will succeed at last; and we assure you that we shall be delighted to hail the appearance of your article, although it should involve the rejection of one of our own; and we will give you our hand, frankly and heartily, and do whatever we can to help you on your way in the world of letters, and if you should come hereafter to be crowned with glorious bay leaves, whilst we never get beyond a wreath of stinging nettles, with, at most, here and there a scattered leaf of sham laurel, we will try to look on at your coronation without envy or spite, and to join with all our heart in the ovations which greet you as you traverse the Olympian way. We will do all this, and a great deal more for you, if we are able, Snobbins, dear old fellow, only don't speak of us as "that Mr. Incog, and his silly, vapid papers," for we are sensitive on this point; and don't get into a passion with us because our paper was accepted and yours rejected; and, above all, don't abuse and get into a fury with the poor Editor, who, we are certain, has done his best to do justice between you and us.

But, to return. Having spoken in our former paper of the grievances under which our friends Scroggins and Jenkins are labouring, we now proceed to speak of our own special sources of suffering, grumbling, and general discontent; and here we are aware that we may be met, in the very outset, by the question, "Cui bono?" What's the use of it? What do we care about it? Well, dear friend, it may be of use both to you and us to investigate this matter. First of all, you know we all have grievances, or what practically comes to the same thing, we fancy that we have. These grievances may, indeed, be without foundation, "trifles light as air," yet they prey upon one's mind none the less, and perhaps one of the greatest comforts we can experience is to talk them over with a sympathizing friend. Thus the poet asks—

"Why should calamity be full of words?"

And he answers, as tritely as truly,

"Windy attorneys to their clients' woes,
Airy succeders of intestate joys,
Poor breathing orators of miseries!
Let them have scope, though what they do impart,
Help nothing else, yet do they ease the heart."

Hence it is that we venture to bring our own grievances before the countless readers of this journal, in the hope of meeting with many who will sympathize with us, and whose kind sympathy will help us to bear our afflictions more cheerfully for the time to come. Secondly, we imagine that it is only by developing these ideas, and bringing our mutual grievances under the notice of one another, in a familiar manner, that we can strike the balance fairly, and come to a just decision as to whether, after all, our blessings or our grievances do most preponderate; and whether or not a great many of our grievances are not grievances because we make them so, and do not take out of our every-day life all that it might be made to render us of happiness, of love, and mutual help. Listen to the poet again. How beautifully he writes upon this subject.

"O, mickle is the powerful grace that lies
In herbs, plants, stones, and their true qualities,
For nought so vile that on the earth doth live
But to the earth some special good doth give;
Nor aught so good, but strained from that fair use,
Revells from true birth, stumbling on abuse."

And, to speak for ourselves, we really must confess that we have already derived great benefit from the investigation of this subject. We confess candidly and openly, that we are much more inclined to make light of the grievances of our friends, Scroggins and Jenkins, than we were before we began to write these papers. And, in regard to our own special sources of grumbling, we must admit that we begin to feel rather shy of bringing them forward at all. However, as we are still persuaded that some, at least, of our grievances are grievances and no mistake, we shall now, with your kind permission, proceed to lay them before you, with as much brevity as the importance of the subject admits; merely premising that we are perfectly prepared to submit the decision on our own case to the enlightened judgment of our readers.

You may remember that in our first paper on this subject we described ourselves as a single gentleman, of a certain age, with a literary turn of mind; and from one or other of these three sources all our grievances have their origin.

We are a single gentleman; consequently we live in lodgings; and living in lodgings, naturally enough, we have a landlady. The name of our landlady is Mrs. Squeezer. We should be happy to describe Mrs. Squeezer as a prepossessing female, if our regard for truth would allow us to do so, which, we are sorry to say, it will not. We should be equally delighted if there were less appropriateness in Mrs. Squeezer's name to her nature; but here again, candour compels us to admit that Mrs. Squeezer is a "tight" one in the severest sense of the term. In fact, no one but ourselves know, how much we suffer from this aged female; and yet, somehow or other, either we cannot or we dare not assert our liberty and leave her. When we first came to Dublin we were recommended to Mrs. S. as a motherly woman, who would make us a comfortable home. We called and looked both at the apartments and the landlady. Of course, Mrs. Squeezer hadn't been accustomed to set lodgings, or "apartments," as she called them; and "only since the lamented death of Mr. Squeezer had she been compelled," etc., etc. We were prepared for all this, and didn't much heed it. Mrs. Squeezer's appearance was not prepossessing, and we confess that the tint of her nasal organ was rather higher than we altogether liked; but then, her dress was so neat and matronly her air so serious and reserved, that we thought she must be an unexceptionable character. During our interview, which did not last more than half an hour, we had learned much more of the late lamented Mr. Squeezer than we at all cared to know; for, after all, what interest could we be supposed to have in that defunct gentleman, who, we dare say, was a very respectable member of society in his day? We were also told of his blessed end, and the charge he had imposed upon Mrs. S. with his dying breath, of devoting her widowhood to works of mercy; such as providing young men, like ourselves, with a home where they might receive a mother's care and watchfulness. Whether Mr. S., in these last words of his, made any reference or not to the "consideration" which Mrs. Squeezer delicately introduced into the conversation, did not appear. However, the end of it was, that, in consideration of a certain monthly sum, Mrs. Squeezer undertook to take us in and do for us, as she expressed it, and we can pathetically assure you, sympathizing reader, that we have been taken in, and done for. We have occupied Mrs. Squeezer's apartments for nearly three years, and have suffered a martyrdom during the whole time, and yet, how to sever the connection we can't possibly conceive. We never read "Dombey and Son" without warmly sympathizing with poor Captain Cuttle, although we firmly believe that the rule of Mrs. M'Stinger was light and pleasant compared to the tyranny of Mrs. Squeezer. You know, after all, Mrs. M'Stinger was a coarse, violent woman, and although she managed to cow poor simple Captain Cuttle, that kind of tyranny could never have been exercised over a man of more mind and education. Mrs. M'Stinger merely represented the principle of brute force—if we may be allowed to apply such an ungallant expression to a lady—but it is quite different with Mrs. Squeezer. Our difficulty in regard to Mrs. S. is, that she is so intensely respectable, that she will not quarrel with us. We have several times endeavoured to provoke her to the use of opprobrious language. Say what we will, she only folds her hands, raises her eyes to heaven with the resignation of a saint, and sighs so deeply and bitterly over our depraved nature, that we suddenly became quite ashamed of ourselves, and, with tears in our eyes, recall the "warning to quit our apartments," which we had just given her; all the time feeling in our heart that this woman is stealing our milk, nibbling at our chops, using our coals, taking our novels from our book shelves, whither they are returned all greasy and soiled, and exercising over us a thousand acts of tyranny and spite. "Taken in and done for," indeed! We are taken in and done for, and no mistake. All we have to say is, that if any one can put us into the way of finding a Captain Bunsby, whom Mrs. Squeezer may carry off and marry, in spite of himself, we shall do our utmost to bring about an introduction between the parties, and will make a present of presentation copies of all our works (red morocco and gold) to the person who will kindly find such an individual for us.

Then, there is Mrs. Squeezer's cat. We are quite sure that most of the persons who read these remarks would, if they were placed in our position, consider Mrs. Squeezer's cat a decided grievance. We don't say that we do; but this we will say, that a more ferocious specimen of the feline tribe, or one with such an immense caudal appendage, we have never met. The way in which he stalks about the house is quite imposing, and the looks of undisguised contempt with which he regards us, when we happen to meet on the staircase, are positively painful to a man of our highly nervous temperament. It is not, however, so much on these grounds that we object to him. We object to Mrs. Squeezer's cat on the ground of his appetite. Being a large animal, it is natural enough that he should have a large appetite; but we indignantly ask whether we are called upon to provide for that unwholesome animal's unnatural cravings? By what right does he drink our milk, and steal our chops, and make dainty meals on the relics of our dinner, which we have put away for a relish for to-morrow's breakfast? We hate that beast with a hatred of the most intense character, and yet we know that the very next time we meet on the staircase, that filthy animal will stand and stare at us, and say, as plainly as cat can say it, "Poor anob! I know you hate me, but, for your life, you daren't touch me. I should only like to see you at it! Wouldn't I claw your handsome face for you, if you did but raise a finger against me!" And then the odious brute gives two or three contemptuous purrs, and, with a whisk of his enormous tail flies down the stairs at two bounds. We are quite certain that we must break with Mrs. Squeezer some day, and we are equally certain, that when we do, we will poison that cat before we leave the house, if human ingenuity can compass a "consummation so devoutly to be wished."

Bad, however, as Mrs. Squeezer's cat undoubtedly is, we are very much inclined to doubt whether he, evil-minded as he is, can perpetrate all that is laid upon his shoulders. If a cat could get up a small tea party, or read novels, we believe that Mrs. Squeezer's cat is the very animal to do it; but we are convinced that no cat can accomplish these feats. How is it, then, that our tea goes so fast? Although we are a bachelor, we know how to make tea. One spoonful for each person and one for the pot! This, we believe, our fair readers will admit, is the orthodox allowance. We have measured how many spoonfuls there are in a quarter of a pound of tea, and we invariably find, that when we neglect to lock our caddy our tea only lasts about half the time it ought to do. How is this? The only living beings in the house are ourselves, Mrs. Squeezer, and the cat. Of course, we don't steal our own tea. Of course, Mrs. S. doesn't do it—it must be the cat. We spoke to Mrs. Squeezer about our milk, our chops, and our cold meat, nay, even about our tea and our brandy, for this goes too. She drew herself up to her full height, and surveyed us with ineffable pity and disdain. Her lips moved slightly, and we could just catch the words, "the cat." "But, Mrs. Squeezer," said we, "allow us to remark, madam, that cats don't read novels, and here is our beautiful edition of 'The Brimstone Eater' completely spoiled." That injured woman did not vouchsafe to answer the insinuation conveyed in our words, but swept from the room with a look that was intended to wither the very marrow in our bones. Oh! who will protect us from Mrs. Squeezer and her cat!

But, although we might put up with all this, there is one thing which is a still greater grievance to us than Mrs. Squeezer's cat, and this is the state of our linen. We candidly confess that we are particular on the matter of shirt buttons. When Mrs. Squeezer undertook, for a consideration, to take us in and do for us, she undertook at the same time to do for our linen; and yet we never put on a clean shirt without finding a button wanting, in what we may call some vital part. We have remonstrated, but without effect, and are gradually lapsing into comparative indifference on this important matter. Last Sunday morning, indeed, we were dressing with a little more care than usual. Our things were all laid out. Fawn-coloured inexpressibles, white waistcoat, dark blue coat with velvet collar, and mauve neck-tie—about the proper thing, we imagine! But, what is this? Another button off! We confess that we did storm a little, and that the tones of our voice, as we bellowed for Mrs. S., may have been somewhat of the loudest. After some time that placid lady made her appearance. We held the garment in question before her face. Perhaps she may say that we rudely thrust it into her face, but we didn't. At all events, she proceeded calmly to examine it. Neck-button all right! Wrist buttons all right! A look of conscious triumph mantles on Mrs. Squeezer's expressive countenance. "But," we suggest, "don't you see, Mrs. S., that the breast-button is wanting, and we can't wear a shirt with no button on the bosom, for we don't use studs." Mrs. S. makes no answer, but stands provokingly silent, with the garment at arm's length, in her hand. We suggest a needle and thread. Mrs. S. shakes her head impressively. Use a needle and thread on the Sabbath, indeed! Catch her at it! She knows her duty too well to do any such thing. We snatch our garment in a fury from her hand, but Mrs. Squeezer is not in the least disturbed, and as she sails majestically down stairs, after her fresh victory over us, we hear her murmur to herself, "All this fuss, indeed, about a button! He ought to be thankful that he has a shirt to wear at all, for some of his betters are without one. Poor young creature! So thoughtless, and so ungrateful!" Oh! again we ask, and ask pathetically, who will protect us from Mrs. Squeezer?

Thus far have we pursued courteous reader, the subject of our own grievances. We are sorry to say that we haven't half exhausted our matter; but we are afraid that, if we "spin it" out much longer, we shall run the risk either of having our article consigned to the pillow-case of which we have spoken, or, if we succeed in passing that Rubicon, of wearying you; and, as we are very anxious to avoid either one or other of these unpleasant circumstances, we shall conclude for the present. Permit us, however, to repeat that we have by no means exhausted our subject; and if it shall appear good to our friend, the Editor, we hope, with his permission, again to bring this matter before the readers of the "Illustrated Dublin Journal," for our mutual amusement, consolation, and instruction. But if Mrs. Squeezer should conclude that we have now done with her, and that she may henceforth carry on her tyranny without fear of again being held up to public reprobation, we beg to inform that amiable lady that we haven't half done with her and her evil ways yet. We beg also to inform her, for her greater comfort and consolation, that having suffered from her tyranny so long, and now finding the means of retaliation in our grasp, we shall not desist until we have made her a strong, and, we trust, salutary example to all those, who, under pretence of being mothers to single young men like ourselves, inveigle us into their dwellings; and when they have once succeeded in "taking us in," "do for us," and no mistake. So, Mrs. Squeezer, our compliments to you, madam, and au revoir.

THE PRIZES OF LIFE.

I.

A YOUTH leapt out from childhood's thrall,
His onward course to run,
With stern resolve to rise or fall,
By duties bravely done.
He reck'd not ways that led to pain,
Nor thought he of the past;
His only hope was hence to gain
The student's prize at last.

II.

The boon was gained, while yet the spring
Was in its golden prime;
Ere birds had tuned their throats to sing
The joys of Summer time.
Those days now gone, the strife and din
Of commerce bind him fast:
The youth has yet a prize to win—
A home through life to last.

III.

The same proud zeal that lent him power
The boy's bright goal to reach,
Still leads him forth, in sterner hour,
To do what parents teach.
No more he heeds the coldly wise,
Who round him dangers cast;
For now he holds life's golden prize—
A trusting heart at last.

IV.

'Tis thus ambition leads us on,
From childhood unto age:
No prize so high but may be won,
At each succeeding stage.
Let youth be warn'd, though fate seem hard,
And hope be overcast,
How oft in life our first reward
Leads onward to the last!

MERTON MANOR;

OR, HOW ELLEN O'MALLEY WAS WOONED, LOST, AND WON.

LOVELIER spot than the little village of Merton it would be difficult to find, nor a more cheerful or pleasant residence than that known as Merton Manor.

Everything there spoke of comfort and hospitality, for Frank O'Malley was as fine a specimen of an old Irish gentleman as could be found in the kingdom. When he came home to settle down on his property in the county D—, after years of residence abroad, he did what most men under similar circumstances will do. In other words, he took home a wife. In the discharge of all his duties, public and private, he contrived to journey along the road of life as evenly as most men, meeting, however, with an irreparable shock in the death of his wife, who left him one child—a daughter. Just then, as if in part to fill the vacant spot in his heart's affection, and to give a companion of her own years to little Ellen, it happened that his brother, Myke O'Malley, died, leaving his only child, Philip, now parentless, to the love and care of Frank. Time thus passed on; the cousins grew up to be man and woman, or nearly so, but Philip, at the time when our story opens, had not visited the Manor for nearly two years, having been pursuing his studies in old Trinity.

In the meantime, however, it was tacitly understood that when he had completed his studies and been fairly started in a legal career, he would find a reward in the hand of his pretty cousin.

Seldom was the tranquillity of the beautiful little village of Merton so put to the rout as it was one fine May evening, in the year 18—, when a neat and dashing curricie with two horses, followed by two mounted grooms, in a rich, though not gaudy, livery, whirled up to the door of the 'Merton Arms.'

There is something wonderful in the celerity with which the tidings of an arrival are spread through the population of your small, quiet villages, where such an event is of unfrequent occurrence; the knowledge becomes universal in spaces of time so exceedingly brief, that it seems to be the result rather of intuition than of any ascertained mode of communication. Such was the case in the present instance. It was not every day that a curricie with outriders was to be seen in the village of Merton, so the excitement of the Mertonites was intense, and the occupant of the vehicle was received with a degree of curiosity and attention adequate to his distinguished appearance. He took the two best rooms at the 'Merton Arms,' and was understood to intend making a long stay in the village. He was rich, and paid for everything with an unquestionable and most agreeable liberality; young, handsome, and accomplished. In short, never were the people in and about Merton so delighted with man, as with the dashing proprietor of the curricie. He had a particular faculty of making himself acquainted with everybody, and by the end of the first week of his stay, was on visiting terms, not only with every family of the least note in the village, but with all the neighbouring gentry within a circle of twenty miles. But there was one thing that slightly—but very slightly—diminished the universal satisfaction felt and expressed at the presence and manners of the new-comer; and this was the mystery in which, for some reason or other, he thought proper to envelope his parentage, connexions, and pursuits.

At any rate, he neglected no occasion to let all the world (of Merton) know that the subject was one on which he did not choose to be interrogated. One of his first visits was at the Manor, a circumstance which was the result of an accident. Amongst his other habits, Frank O'Malley was a sportsman, and at the close of one day when he had been enjoying the pleasures of the chase with some of the neighbouring gentry, he found himself quietly riding homeward in company with the stranger, who had ridden to the hounds during the day, and who now beguiled the road by pleasant discourse. 'Imperceptibly, by his apparent frankness and cordiality, the latter so favourably impressed the squire (as Frank was called), that when he arrived at the gate of the Manor, he tendered him an invitation to his table, which, after a slight demur, was accepted. Probably the stranger's acceptance was influenced by the appearance of Ellen, as she flew down the avenue, like a fawn, to greet her father's return; certainly he speedily made himself at home and at ease, evidencing the most flattering estimate of the hospitality that made him thus comfortable. The day turned out very stormy, and Frank solicited the stranger, if he were not particularly pressed for time, not to "break cover" for the night, a request to which he readily acceded. Indeed his time, he said, was quite his own, as he was an idle bachelor, rambling leisurely through the country. And not only for that night, but for many succeeding days and nights, did he remain at the Manor. Frank O'Malley found out that he was very cunning at tying flies, and handled a double-barrelled gun like a man that knew what he was about. Ellen at first merely thought him a very agreeable, pleasant fellow. In point of fact his visit appeared about to be indefinitely prolonged. He presented Ellen with a guitar, piles of new music, and some charming bijouterie, all of which he laid with such easy grace before her that she felt no embarrassment, nor thought of declining his gifts.

And so the summer passed away, and autumn found the captivating stranger still at the Manor, which for many years had never been so gay as under the inspiring influence of his presence. The men all swore that he was the best rider, and one of the best shots they had ever seen. The old ladies eulogized his profound skill and attention at whist, and the young ones were all in raptures with his fine voice, his exquisite taste in dress, and his delightful gallantry. He was always proposing and carrying into effect some particularly agreeable scheme of amusement; to-day a pic-nic on the summit of one of the bold hills at the base of which reposed the Manor; to-morrow a ride to the ruined castle that frowned over the river, which, either leaping and tumbling down over rocks and shingle, or warbling along the flat, rich meadows for a space, lent such a picturesque effect to the valley of Merton.

Ellen from simply regarding him as a pleasant visitor, gradually but surely was affected by his assiduous and elegant attentions. She was a delightful creature, and when her bright hazle eyes made the stranger (Hugh Dalrymple, as he at length acknowledged his name to be) her slave, was just nineteen. Occasionally thoughts of her absent cousin, Philip, would strike her, and she would ask herself were it possible that the affection which he believed to be centred in himself could ever be transferred to another, but still she could not shut her eyes to the evidence of her power over the stranger, nor (with a woman's vanity) to the deal of envy which his marked attentions to her excited.

Such was the state of matters on one evening, when those grey lines in which September monotonously, but sweetly, arrayed the little village, verdant mead, and tinted wood, were gradually deepening, Ellen O'Malley sat in pensive thought on a green bank, beneath a canopy of umbrage, formed by a cluster of ancient sycamores and elms, in the park of the Manor; a few patches of gleaming sky from above redeemed the place from the character of gloom which the loftiness of the trees and the masses of foliage contributed to produce. A deep shade of melancholy had settled upon her lovely features; a frightened, nervous expression, betokening long unrest. A few days previous, a letter had been received by her father from Philip, in which he announced some college success, and his intention of paying the Manor a visit, after his lengthened absence. That very day, too, Dalrymple had told her, in low and hurried accents, how he only lived in the hope of winning her love, and that one little word from her lips would decide whether he should be a wanderer without aim or end of existence, or remain by her side.

Confused and surprised, Ellen found no words for utterance. Almost suffocated with contending emotions, she besought Dalrymple to be less precipitate. Yet she did not appear deaf to the voice of the charmer, but on that September evening, as she pensively sat beneath the spreading sycamores, she could not avoid reproachfully asking herself how she had rewarded the devotion of her cousin. In their infant days they had played together in the shrubby lanes and the grassy meadows, and were ever the companions of each other's hours; and the mutual sharers of all childish joys and sorrows. But the phase of childhood passed over, and feelings which fill the breast of infancy with pleasure, and hedge in its hours with a heyday of joy, gradually change—as the capacity of heart increases, and take new shapes with the ripening years. And so, just at the period when Philip left the Manor to pursue his studies in the metropolis, the timid little Ellen, who sported with him in the meadows, and accompanied him upon all sorts of expeditions, had begun to grow shy of her playmate. There was another expression in her eye, and a womanly sedateness mingled with her smiles, as she laughingly and blushing promised Philip to be his wife when he returned a great man. Was she now about to withdraw her consent to their betrothal, and bestow her hand upon another, and that other a comparative stranger? Slowly and heavily passed the hour she spent beneath the sycamores, and keen and bitter were her feelings that night, as she rested her head on her pillow.

Philip, in his letters to Ellen, seldom reminded her of their betrothal. All earth's powers could never have persuaded him that in his absence her tastes or feelings would have become perverted. His faith was centred in a belief of her high principle, her truth, and her warm heart, and so when he heard from herself, as well as from her uncle, of the continued sojourn of the handsome stranger at the Manor, and of the attention which he paid her, no jealous pang wrung his heart, and he hopefully looked forward to the time when emancipation from his studies would place him once more within the domestic circle at the Manor.

About a week before the time when Philip was to arrive at the Manor, the 'Merton Arms' received an accession of guests, in the shape of two travellers, who, if not as aristocratic as the one who had dashed up to its door in a curricule some months before, preceded by outriders, were, at any rate, equally mysterious in their movements. One of them was a man of some five and forty years, rather short in stature, and whose features were harsh and unprepossessing. But there was a certain amount of plausibility in his speech, and he evinced considerable tact and cunning in the manner in which he contrived to acquire information relative to the various families in the neighbourhood, and the principal items of local gossip. Much of his time, for a day or two after his arrival, was spent in the bar-room of the 'Merton Arms,' in the company of Hugh Dalrymple's two servants, who still remained there, although what he was able to see in their society, was more than the portly landlord could fathom. When not thus engaged, he busied himself in his own apartment in the careful perusal of various bundles of papers, while his companion, who was much more reticent and reserved in his manner, availed himself of the privilege accorded to residents at the 'Merton Arms,' by Frank O'Malley, of visiting the grounds surrounding the Manor. In the course of these rambles he now and again encountered Ellen and Dalrymple strolling through the demesne, and upon these occasions, although it might have been observed that he respectfully stood aside to allow them to pass, he would follow their after movements with a degree of scrutinizing zeal, that evidenced the interest he took in them was of no ordinary kind.

And that he and his companion had a motive in their apparently eccentric proceedings, was soon clear, for a circumstance occurred, so much out of the ordinary course of events in Merton, that to this day it forms the most notable event in the history of that quiet little village.

One fine afternoon Charley Grace, then the butler, but at one period the huntsman of Frank O'Malley, perceived, with no small surprise, the two guests at the 'Merton Arms,' leisurely walking up the avenue that led to the Manor, and to his still greater amazement, saw that they were accompanied by the village constable. O'Malley was not a J.P., and what the latter's object in thus seeking the Manor was quite beyond Charley's comprehension, and, therefore, he hastened to apprise his master, who was in his study, of the circumstance. O'Malley was no less surprised as to the meaning of this unusual visit, and directed the trio to be shown into the parlour of the Manor, where he speedily joined them, anxious to know the cause of their appearance there. To his inquiry on this point, the sojourner at the 'Merton Arms,' to whom we have more particularly alluded, said:

"I have the honour, I believe, to address Mr. Frank O'Malley?"

"The same, sir, at your service."

"And I, sir, have the honour to introduce myself to your notice, however unpleasant my visit may ultimately prove, as John May."

"The name is one that I do not immediately call to mind. Perhaps you would——"

"Probably not, sir, but it is one well known in London. I am, in short, as well as my comrade, a Bow-street officer, and my present business here is to arrest a person who has been enjoying your hospitality for, I believe, some months. My justification for this seeming strange proceeding, is this warrant," he added, producing that document.

"Arrest my guest, sir!" said O'Malley. "I do not exactly comprehend you."

"I am convinced of that sir, but allow me to explain myself in as few words as possible. There are so many charges against the person in question that you would be hardly able to comprehend the general nature of the proceedings instituted against him. Nor is it necessary that you should do so, but the specific charge upon which I hold this warrant for his arrest, is his malversation, to an incredible extent, of the funds of a London bank, in which he held the position of cashier. I have had," continued the officer, "for the last six or eight months a stern chase after him, and that is proverbially a lengthened one, but I have earthed him at last, and while my success is to me a source of more than mere gratification, I have only to tender you, awkwardly it may be, but I can assure you sincerely, my regret that my professional avocations should have necessitated my intrusion into the residence of a gentleman whose character is beyond any suspicion, and whose only association with the business which I have in hand, is that he has unwittingly allowed himself to be made the dupe of an impostor."

The feelings of Frank O'Malley at the conclusion of this speech are indescribable. Motioning the speaker and his colleagues to seats, he remained silent for a few minutes, but at last observed:

"I need not remark how poignant is the regret which I experience at the fact of my roof-tree having for a second sheltered one whose antecedents are such as you have described. And this regret is the more irritating, seeing that the plausibility of his manners has gained for him so much of the society of my daughter, while his qualifications as a sportsman have secured his access to the circles of all the chief families in the neighbourhood of Merton. He is not at present within, but I expect him every minute, and will gladly afford you every facility to aid the ends of justice."

But this change of malversation of the Bank's funds was not the only one against the gentleman who whirled up to the 'Merton Arms' one May morning, followed by a pair of outriders; whose distingue appearance and off-handed manner so completely awed the good people of Merton; who followed the county hounds with such sportsman-like ardour and dash; who was the cynosure of all eyes; who so coolly made himself at home at the Manor; and who wooed and almost won the daughter of its owner. "Hugh Dalrymple," (as he called himself when he did condescend to give a name) had so many aliases that it would be a difficult task (even for John May) to trace his true patronymic. There were few of the gaming-tables in continental cities at which he was not disadvantageously known. He was, in fine, an accomplished rouse and black-leg, and it was whispered even worse, although it was difficult to fix the darker crimes upon him. How he contrived to obtain a position of trust in a London bank was never known; the only feasible opinion hazarded was, that having got the son of one of the firm into his power in some "hell," he had employed his advantage in securing a berth in the establishment—with what result we have seen. So cool and consummate a scoundrel was he, that when arrested by John May (whom he at once recognised as an old acquaintance) on his return from a stroll with Ellen, he coolly raised his hat as he left the place in custody, and, with one of his most elegant bows, remarked that there were few pleasanter days in his career than those which he had spent at Merton Manor.

And what said Ellen to the denouement of this strange but true story? She flung herself upon her father's neck, and while her bosom heaved and throbbed, as her feelings sought to gain utterance in speech, no words could express them. They were too deep for speech, and it was not until her parent soothed her with all a parent's tenderness that she at length revealed how deep a hold the stranger possessed of her affections, and in what a new light Philip stood in her estimation. Never before had she appreciated his patient and enduring attachment. Pressing her hands upon her burning forehead, she remained some moments buried in deep thought, but at length she exclaimed:

"Oh! has it at last come to this; and is my once happy home to be rendered desolate for ever through me. Oh, Philip! Philip! how my poor brain racks and throbs—how you will hate and loathe me when you learn all!"

Philip did learn all, when a few days afterwards he reached the Manor, and found Ellen prostrate on a sick bed, and delirious through an attack of fever. And when at length some reason glimmered through the dark feelings of desolation that had for a time clouded her faculties, the first low voice she heard beside her couch was that which murmured her name:—

"Ellen! dear, dear Ellen!"

It was Philip, who strove by every means to assuage the grief that so entirely depressed her spirits; but, though he never once alluded to the painful cause of her illness, she had herself awoke from her delusive and bewildering dream.

To no explanation would he listen; and if the wonted peace and quiet of Merton was singularly disturbed when the dashing guest at the Manor was (under the safe conduct of John May,) conveyed, handcuffed, from his snug quarters there to the 'Merton Arms,' and thence, in his own curricule, (without the outriders,) to the county gaol, pending his transmission to the locale of his last offence, it was more than paralleled by the scene which that pleasant hamlet presented not long after Ellen's recovery. Then the church bells rang out merry peals; then the village children strewed the path with flowers, and then Philip O'Malley led his fair cousin—so unexpectedly wooed and so providentially lost by another, and now fairly and honourably won by himself—to the altar, and in after years, many were the golden-haired children that joyously gambolled with old Frank O'Malley and their parents, beneath the ancient sycamores that shaded the grounds of MERTON MANOR.

THE BLUE SKY.

'Tis true that youthful hopes deceive,
But ever the flowers return with Spring;
That tenderest love has cause to grieve,
But still when the young birds pair they sing.

The west winds play with the leaves of May,
And the peach hangs ripe on the garden wall;
And the blossoms grow and the fountains flow,
And the bright blue sky bends over all.

Though Love may fade with early prime,
As the cowslips fade on the fallow lea,
Yet Friendship cheers the face of time,
As the sunshine gilds the apple-tree.

The morning's pain may be evening's gain,
And sometimes 'mid the flowers we fall;
And the sun for thee is the light for me,
And the bright blue sky bends over all.

The Reason lives when Fancy dies,
For the season's blessings never fail;
And Winter oft has brighter skies
Than April with her sleet and hail.

Our joys and cares are wheat and tears,
And our griefs, when ripe, like the fruit, must fall;
And come what will, 'tis justice still,
For the bright blue sky bends over all.

HALF AN HOUR AT RINGSEND.

DUBLIN has not inaptly been described by the late Lady Morgan as "the most car-drivingest city in the universe," and there is, perhaps, no other portion of it in which the character and idiosyncrasies of its Jehus can be better studied than the immediate neighbourhood of Carisle Bridge. The unsophisticated provincial or utter stranger who may chance to find himself for the first time in its vicinity—at the corner of D'Olier-street, for example—cannot fail to at the sensation which his appearance under difficulties, for the police magnates have expressed their unqualified disapproval of the habit, and often mark their sense of the enormity of the offence by a fine or temporary suspension of license. But no matter whether the Dublin representatives of the Sam Weller school be seated, standing, lounging, reading, burnishing, or smoking (the idea of their ever sacrificing at the altar of Bacchus is an absurdity), the advent of a polestrian, as if by magic, inverts the order of things. No crack company of a crack rifle corps can excel them in the rapidity with which they come to the "attention," and the stranger beholds with amazement a forest of whips elevated in the air, while a perfect Babel of voices stuns his ears, the drift of which he will find considerable difficulty in solving, until he can distinguish an individual voice, when he finds it to be simply the query, "Going out, sir?" Where the "out" is situated will be his next wonder, but this he can speedily learn if he accedes to the Jehu's request to "get up," and make one of a party of half-a-dozen, whom the latter is willing to "rowl out" to Ringsend, Irishtown, or Sandy-mount, for a trifling consideration per head. And by the way, the cars which in former times plied to these localities, were the earliest and rudest specimens of these peculiarly Irish vehicles. They have been described as consisting of a seat suspended on a strap of leather—which supported the entire weight of the company—between shafts, and without springs. Theophilus Cibber, in his familiar epistle to Mr. Warburton in 1763, has an allusion to the "driver of a Ringsend car furiously driving through thick and thin, bedaubed, besplashed, and bemoreed." This description of car was called a "noddie," from its oscillating motion backwards and forwards. The use of the noddie by certain clergies originated the proverb—"Elegance and ease, like a shoeblack in a noddie!" The noddie was succeeded by the "jingle." "The jingle and jaunting-car," says the clever and amusing author of "Ireland Sixty Years Ago," "was both in use for some time after the Union, when most of the nobility became absentees, and gave occasion to the box mot of the witty Duchess of Gordon, that there were but two titled men who frequented her soirées at the Castle—Sir John Jingle and Sir John Jaunting-Car." The latter was an allusion to Sir John Carr, of pocket-book celebrity.

The etymology of the rather odd name, "Ringsend," has occasioned some controversy. Many aver that previous to the formation of that portion of Dublin which is now termed "Sir John Rogers's Quay" (being so called after its maker, who was at one time Lord Mayor of Dublin), there were great piles of wood driven into the sand, and to each of these piles were attached large iron rings, for the convenience of the shipping moored there. The outermost of these piles having a ring, was called ring's end, that is, the end or last of the rings. Another derivation, and one having a greater verisemblance, attributes the name to a corruption of Rinn-Abhainn (pronounced Rinn-Aun), i.e., the point or turn of the tide, and to be the correct title of this locality. One etymologist has endeavoured to trace it to a Norse word, signifying a sewer, "which the river Dodder is to that part of the country." However, whatever its radix may be, and despite its present unimportance and malodourousness, Ringsend was once a place of very considerable note. It was here, on the 14th of November, 1646, that the Parliamentary forces disembarked, and here also, on the 14th August, 1649, during a severe storm, Oliver Cromwell, as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, arrived in the bay with an army of 13,000 men, to commence his memorable nine months' campaign in Ireland. "On his arrival in the bay of Dublin," says Ludlow, in his memoirs, "the men-of-war that accompanied him, and other ships in the harbour, rung such a peal with their cannon, as if some great news had been coming. He and his company went up in boats to the Ringsend, where they went ashore, and were met by most of the officers, civil and military, about the town." The direct approach from Ringsend to Dublin formerly lay across ground overflowed by the tide, but passable at low water for a man and horse, about the place now occupied by the Ringsend bridge. About the year 1650 the first bridge was erected over the Dodder here, and had scarcely been completed when, singularly enough, the stream suddenly altered its channel, "in which perverse course," says Boate, "it continued, until perforce it was constrained to return to its old channel." In 1670, Lord Berkley, Baron of Stratton, landed at Ringsend as Viceroy, and in the same year the Dodder here overflowed its banks, and flooded high into the city, causing much loss of property. In 1672, Sir Bernard de Gomme, of the Royal Engineers, arrived in Ireland for the purpose of ascertaining what works were necessary for the defence of the ports in that kingdom. A copy of his map, which was entitled "an exact survey of the city of Dublin, and part of the harbour below Ringsend," and was, with the necessary estimates, presented to Charles II. on the 15th of November, 1673, was exhibited at the conversations of the President of the Royal Irish Academy in the March of the present year, accompanied by some interesting explanatory observations by Charles Haliday, Esq., M.R.I.A., to which we are indebted for much of our information on the subject. The site selected by Sir Bernard for a citadel for the defence of Dublin, was in the vicinity of the space now occupied by Merriem-square, to the foot of which the sea at the time flowed. It was not then quayed or deepened, and flowed at low water in streams, winding in devious courses through a labyrinth of sands. Mr. Jones Moore, in his report, in the year 1675, states, that "if his majesty should think fit to proceed in the design of building a fort-royal on the strand, near Ringsend, as was designed by Sir Bernard de Gomme, it is doubtless the only proper piece of ground where a fort can be built so as to be relieved by sea, although for arms the sea-air will be very prejudicial." The citadel was designed to be a pentagon, occupying a space of 1,946 yards, with ramparts, ravelins, curtain, and bastions; the walls were intended to be of brick, faced with stone, and built on a frame of timber and piles. The estimated expense was £131,227 5s. 9d. In Sir Bernard de Gomme's map Ringsend is represented as a long and narrow tongue or point (ria) of land, running out into the sea, "the water on its western side," observes Mr. Haliday, "spreading over all the low ground between Irishtown and the slightly rising ground on which stands the barracks at Beggar's Bush, and under Sir Patrick Dun's Hospital, along the line of Denzille-street and Great Brunswick-street, to Townsend-street, called Lacey otherwise Lamer's Hill, and flowing even to that front of the Parliament House called the Lords' Entrance, facing College-street, as may be seen on the ground plan of Chichester House (the site of which the Parliament House occupies), where ground under this face is described as 'the Old Shore.' At Lamer's Hill, in the year 1657, we find a frigate built and launched. Among the Treasury warrants issued by the Commissioners of England for the affairs of Ireland, is an order dated the 24th March, 1656-57, 'That James Standish, Receiver-General, do issue forth and pay unto Mr. Timothy Avery the sum of £100, on account, the same being to be by him issued out towards the finishing and speedy fitting to sea the new frigate, called the Lamby Catch, now rebuilt and lately launched at Lacey-hill, Dublin, according to such orders as he shall receive in writing under the hand of Captain Edward Tomlins, and Joseph Glover, who is to command the said ship, for payment whereof this is a warrant." In the year 1674, Andrew Yarranton, the publisher of some plans for the improvement of English harbours, came to Dublin, and, at the solicitation of the then Lord Mayor, devoted some time to a survey of the port, in the course of which he tendered many suggestions for an artificial harbour and fort for its defence on the strand (then covered by the tide) between Ringsend and Townsend-street, the want of some protection for the trade of Dublin just then engrossing public attention, in consequence of a French privateer having entered the bay, and cut out a Spanish vessel from near the bar. Yarranton's plan appeared in a treatise entitled "England's improvement by sea and land, to outdo the Dutch without fighting," published in 1677.

In April, 1690, the famous Sir Cloudesley Shovel, who had conveyed a fleet of vessels, containing provisions and munitions of war for King William's army, to Belfast, learning that a frigate and several merchantmen were lying at anchor in the bay of Dublin, destined for France, "took the Monmouth yacht, and one or two more, with several long boats, and went to Poolbeg, where the frigate lay, having sixteen guns, and four paterrocks. King James, when he heard of it, said, it was some of his loyal subjects of England returning to their duty and allegiance; but, when he saw them draw near the ship, and heard the firing, he rode out towards Ringsend, whither gathered a vast crowd of people of all sorts..... Captain Bennet, that commanded the frigate, ran her on ground." Such is Story's account of this affair. In December, 1690, when de Ginkel was departing for England, the Lords Justices, and most of the nobility and gentry of Dublin and its vicinity, accompanied him to Ringsend, when he embarked on board the Monmouth yacht. The Earl of Wharton landed here in 1709, as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. In 1782 the old bridge over the Dodder was swept away by a flood, and it was not until 1786 that statutory enactments were passed for restoring the communication. The bridge erected in its stead was, however, together with Ormond bridge, completely destroyed by an inundation in 1802, after which the present substantial one was erected. On the western side of the Dodder, in the immediate vicinity of the village of Ringsend, are the Grand Canal Docks, comprising an area of twenty-five acres, with two thousand yards of quayage, and about eighteen feet depth of water. They have three commodious graving docks, and are entered by two gates, called the Camden and Buckingham locks. They were opened on the 23rd of April, 1796; the following curious and interesting account of the ceremony is from "Walker's Hibernian Magazine:" "This being St. George's Day, was exhibited one of the grandest and most interesting spectacles ever witnessed by this kingdom—the opening of this Grand Canal Floating and Graving Dock. At 11 o'clock his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant, attended by his suite, and accompanied by Mr. Secretary Pelham, went on board the yacht (commanded by Sir Alexander Schomberg) lying in the river. The yacht immediately proceeded into the great eastern ship lock, from whence she passed into the floating docks. As soon as the yacht entered the basin a royal salute was fired from the park of artillery on the south bank of the docks, which was returned by the yacht as soon as she came to anchor, when she also hoisted the royal standard. About twenty vessels of considerable size entered the docks after the yacht, and each of them saluted as they came in; they were followed by a considerable number of small craft and a variety of barges and pleasure-boats handsomely decorated, which gave great variety and beauty to the scene. His Excellency, Earl Camden, with Mr. Pelham, attended by Sir Alexander Schomberg, came ashore, and was received on the wharf between the two large graving docks by the Court of Directors of the Grand Canal. The company, which consisted of about a thousand of the principal nobility and gentry, then went into a breakfast, prepared in tents." From the point of Ringsend the south wall of the harbour extends into the bay, nearly three English miles and a half. It was commenced in 1748, and is formed of immense granite boulders, strongly cemented, and strengthened with iron cramps. At its extremity is a lighthouse, commenced in 1762. It is formed of white hewn granite, firmly cemented, and is three storeys high. From its summit a magnificent view may be obtained of the glorious Bay of Dublin, and its villa-diapered shores.

THE HAUNTED LAKE.

I.

"My love, braid up thy golden locks,
And don thy silken shoon,
We'll sit upon Kilbrannon's rocks
Where shines the silvery moon;
And bring thy little babe with thee,
For his dear father's sake,
Thy lands where he'll be lord to see,
By lone Kilbrannon lake!"

II.

She's braided up her golden locks,
She's donned her silken shoon,
And they're away to Kilbrannon's rocks
By the cold light of the moon;
Sir Hubert he took both wife and child
Upon that night of woe,
And hurled them over the rocks so wild
To the lake's blue depths below!

III.

And he has married another May,
With the locks of ebony,
And her looks are sweet, and her heart is gay,
Yet a woeful wight is he;
He wakes the woods with his bugle horn,
But his heart is heavy and sore;
And he ever shuns those crags forlorn
By lone Kilbrannon shore!

IV.

For down in the lake the dead won't rest,
That vengeful murdered one,
With her little babe at her pulseless breast,
She walks the waters lone;
And she calls at night her murderer's name,
And will call for evermore,
Till the huge rocks melt in doomsday flame
By wild Kilbrannon shore!

FEARFANA.

A FEW WORDS ABOUT EGGS.

Of course all of our readers have made up their minds in a collective manner that they will not read one word of our lucubration about eggs. We fancy the expression of indignation which is evoked simply by the heading of our chapter only. We can imagine the general contortion of disdain which wreaths every lip in the family circle as each of its members inquires what can be said upon such a subject, or rather, what does any one want to know about it! Everybody asserts his or her perfect knowledge of everything interesting in relation to eggs. They could tolerate Oysters, and find Crabs endurable in a dissertation; but nobody ever could conceive anything new to be related about eggs, or nobody ever heard of an essay on eggs before. If the gentle reader or the gentle listeners will be but patient with us for a little, we trust to convince them that there is a great deal of matter about our subject, as well as in it, which is entirely novel to them, and which may afford much more pleasing information than ever they had any notion was or could be contained in any reflections arising from eggs.

History is silent as to who first boiled an egg, and finding it good eat it, deriving much comfort to his inner man therefrom. But there is no one can deny that the primal Ovophagite was a great benefactor to his species, although the obscurity of ages conceals him from our gratitude. Many a time the convalescent, just escaped from days in whose dreary shadow death lingered, has felt the first impulse of returning strength vouchsafed to him through the nutriment of a fresh egg. Many a time a valuable life has been saved from the simple fact, that when the weakened organs, vitiated by disease, could tolerate no stimulant or strengthening food, they could just bear an egg, cooked by a skilful hand, and borrowed thus a little more supply to keep the fire of life alight until it could bear to consume a richer fuel. And for a final instance of the value of an egg, many a time the traveller, taking his rest in "mine inn" on some far wayside, has dined with a gusto from the genial though homely dish of bacon and eggs, fried and smoking, which devourers of French dishes at Mivart's or Very's never knew.

Amongst many nations to this day the egg is a sacred object as representing the great mundane germ of the transition of things from chaos to order. In the Rig Veda of Hindooism the supreme spirit is represented as decreeing the evolution of the world from an egg. At a later period of its mythology, Brahma is stated to have deposited in the primordial waters an egg shining like gold. In the days of the Pharaohs, in the temples of Luxor, it was taught by the Egyptian hierophants that Cneph the Demurgus produced an egg—the symbol of the world. In the Sandwich islands an eagle is represented to have deposited an egg in the primordial seas, from whence sprang all of which we have cognisance. To this day, in portions of Finland, where the people have not forsaken the ancient idolatry of their race, they have the same legend as the islanders of the South Sea, with the difference that the wonderful egg is said to be the produce of an aquatic bird. In the dim old Celtic legends, the mundane egg was produced by a serpent, which had no sooner brought it forth than it hastened to devour it. The littlest boy at his Virgil will tell us the fanciful creed of Lacedaemon, wherein Leda produces two eggs, from one of which issued Helena, and from the other the Dioscuri. The city of Salmonus, the grey old Elis, had its wild legend, too, of twin heroes, called Molionides, produced from a silver egg. In far Peru, in the tracks of the footstep of the victor Spaniard, we meet with another of those symbolic tales in which it is told of two miraculous eggs, one containing Apo-Catequil, the Prince of Evil, an idol reverently worshipped in that country; and the other containing Figueroa-Catequil, who called his mother from the dead. In the Flowery Land we find the same idea expressed in a different way. Martini tells us that the Tonquinese have a legend, that the princess Auleo produced a hundred eggs, from which came forth a hundred male children. To prevent quarrels amongst this numerous progeny, the father and mother agreed to separate—the one to the sea-coast, the other to the mountains. According to Father Martini, the Chinese acknowledge the creation of a first man, whom they called Puoncu. This man derived his being from an egg, the shell of which was snatched up to heaven—the white expanded through the air, and the yolk remained upon the earth.

Curiously enough, not only is an egg chosen to represent the mundane origin, but it is found as the emblem of the renovation of the world after being purified by fire. Herodotus—old Pagan dreamer!—relates that the Phoenix buried the body of its father in a mass of myrrh of the form of an egg. The modern Jews, in many places, eat eggs in funeral feasts in token of the resurrection. In Russia also the custom of using eggs in the Paschal season is understood to have the same emblematic signification.

Klaproth gives, from a volume of Japanese chronology, which has been for more than a hundred years past in the library of Paris, a system of cosmogony, which states "that at first the heaven and the earth were not separated; the perfect principle and the imperfect principle were not disjoined; chaos, under the form of an egg, contained the breath of life, self-produced, including the germs of all things. Then what was pure and perfect ascended upwards, and formed the sky, while what was dense and impure—coagulated—was precipitated, and produced the earth." At Miaco, in Japan, there is a pagoda consecrated to a hieroglyphic bull, which is placed on a large square altar, and composed of solid gold. Its neck is ornamented with a costly wreath; but what is most remarkable is an egg which he pushes with his horns whilst he seizes it between his fore-feet. This bull is placed on the summit of a rock, and the egg floats in water, which is enclosed within a hollow space. This egg represents chaos. The Japanese say that the whole world at the time of chaos was enclosed within this egg, which floated upon the top of the waters. The bull observing this egg, broke the shell of it by goring it with his horns, and so created the world—by his breath forming the human species. In the Persian belief, they taught that Ahriman, the power of evil, created twenty-four genii, which he enclosed in an egg; and that Ormuzd, the power of good, created the same number, which he also enclosed in an egg. Those eggs breaking, say the Persians, the good and evil became mingled, and pervaded all things. The great merchant peoples of Phoenicia worshipped an egg with idolatrous rites; and no doubt our forefathers, in this Irish land, may have looked with awe upon the strange homage paid by the Tyrian wanderers who traded to their shores, if perchance they beheld them at the religious solemnities of their country in their ships by the sea-board.

So far for the fiction of our subject, now we will treat of the facts. For the weight of substance contained in it, there is no other article of human food as nutritive as the egg. It is divided into three different structures—the shell, the white, and the yolk. The shell is composed of carbonate of lime, and is penetrated by numerous minute pores, which convey air to the embryo during the process of incubation. The same access of air through those tubes is the cause of decomposition occurring in the egg. A very simple process is sufficient to preserve it from this incident. To rub the egg over with any fatty substance closes those minute pores, and preserves it as hermetically sealed as those meats which are put up to keep during long voyages. For this reason eggs are rubbed over with butter by the dealers who desire to preserve them sound. A peculiar sign for discovering fresh eggs arises from this fact: An unsound egg, if shaken near the ear, will give the sound which is conveyed by a puff of air blown with some force through water, the cause of this sound being the presence of air within the egg, whilst a fresh egg, although agitated in the same manner, will emit no sound whatever. The white of egg has a close chemical affinity to the essential substances of meat—musculine and gluten—and abounds in a far greater degree with fat. It is different in appearance and in sensible properties; but its component radicals are almost the same, and serve nearly the same purposes as material for food. In fatty substance it is only equalled by pork and eels, but it abounds in more nutritive elements than either. As an instance of the appreciation which eggs have received as an article of food, their consumption in the United Kingdom has been calculated to be fifteen hundred millions annually, and at the cost of one halfpenny each, the value of this consumption is estimated at three millions a-year, quite a respectable figure, and enough to make our henwives proud and aristocratic. The Irish hen-roosts and duck-houses are considered to produce five hundred millions of eggs, or one million of pounds worth annually—the kingdom of Great Britain has the credit of nine hundred millions, and from foreign countries are imported one hundred millions; but this importation has greatly increased of latter years.

In France the egg produce is still greater, the smaller division of the farms in that country encouraging and stimulating this branch of industrial effort. In Paris the consumption of eggs is greater than in any other city of Europe, and has been shown to be at the rate of one hundred eggs annually to every living soul. But the consumption in the country districts is far beyond this, as in many places junkets composed of milk and eggs are the principal items of food. The egg produce of France has been estimated at from seven to eight thousand millions yearly, or a quantity sufficient to make a string of beads which would go twice round the world, and at the value placed before by us upon this article of food, that produce is worth fifteen millions a-year. The trade of France to England in eggs has been very considerable since the year 1815, the facilities for transmission and their cheapness of production having increased in a great degree. As an article of commerce the French are pushing a large business in eggs, which is extended every day. At Bastoign there is a farm of two hundred acres devoted to the production of eggs for the London market alone. From Cherbourg to Calais the boats take in cargoes of eggs at every port for despatch to Dover.

The late Isaac Weld, in his Statistical Survey of Roscommon, describes a curious system by which eggs were collected there for the Dublin market, by the persons who traded in them in that neighbourhood. A number of runners—little boys from twelve to fourteen years old—were employed by those persons, called higgler or egg dealers. Each boy had a certain route, extending to about fifteen statute miles over the country. Within this district they went round every day to those farmers or cottiers from whom they knew eggs were to be had, and having collected them, returned to the depot of the higgler in the evening, with their load of eggs in their baskets. For every six score thus brought in, the boys received one shilling. This manner of collection prevailed over the county. The dealers then despatched the eggs collected in crates containing ten thousand, and forwarded them to Dublin or England, and Mr. Weld estimates the sale of those eggs at £70,000 per annum. Before the opening of the Holyhead Railway, the London and North Western Company sometimes received at Liverpool, from Ireland, one million of eggs in a single day, for conveyance to the metropolis. Their trade is still considerable, but the Holyhead line causes a large division by that route.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY IN PARIS,

OR HOW THE SHAMROCK FARED WITH THE FLEUR-DE-LIS.

At the eventful period which saw the downfall of Louis Philippe, and the dominion of a Provisional Government consisting of Lamartine, Louis Blanc, Ledru Rollin, Cremieux, etc., I was invited by one of the most distinguished writers and journalists in London to accompany him to Paris, whither he was bent on a mission of benefit to a weekly paper which had recently made its appearance under the auspices of his all-powerful name. His object in visiting the metropolis of France was to write a series of articles on the disturbed state of affairs at that time, and his motive for asking me to join him was, that I might collect reliable information for him, while he occupied his time in the sedentary duties of the desk. As a natural consequence, I witnessed many scenes, and had the opportunity of chronicling many events which have long since gone forth to the world; but the incidents I am now about to relate, having occurred subsequent to the departure of my esteemed and now deceased friend from the French capital, did not form part of the stock of "news" which I from time to time conveyed to him. I make no attempt to write a "sensation" story, as I have not the power to do so; my sole intention is to state, in simple terms, precisely what fell under my own vision concurrently with circumstances which have since become historical.

With these preliminary observations I proceed to narrate what took place within my personal knowledge, apropos of St. Patrick's-day, during the period of the Revolution of 1848. A deputation of the English residents in Paris having already presented themselves to the Provisional Government, at the Hotel de Ville, the natives of the "Emerald Isle," who had taken up their abode in the city, determined to follow so laudable an example; and accordingly advertisements were circulated with a view to collect a meeting of Irishmen at the Place de la Concorde, on St. Patrick's Day. Being anxious, amongst others, to see Mons. de Lamartine and his colleagues, and to gain all the experience I could of passing events, I began to consider whether I had sufficient Irish blood in my veins to justify me in joining the deputation, when the recollection most opportunely came to my mind, that one of my ancestors was a native of Cork, and that my name, as I had often been informed, was of "Hibernian extraction." To the Place de la Concorde, therefore, I betook myself at the time appointed, when I found the entire space occupied by various disunited mobs of people, who had assembled there for the purpose of taking part in a popular demonstration to be made that day in favour of the Provisional Government. The difficulty, therefore, was in discovering my compatriots amongst such a rude and heterogeneous mass of beings, all bent upon the accomplishment of one common object, but without any distinct plan or organisation. At length, however, I discovered a "broth of a boy," with a sprig of shamrock, and on my accosting him in very polite French (for fear of making a mistake), he turned suddenly round to scrutinize me. "Monsieur, vous êtes Irlandais ?" said I, whereupon he exclaimed. "Faith, I am so, sir, more luck to the old country!" This was surely quite sufficient for my purpose, and I proceeded to address my fellow-countryman in his own tongue, asking him "Where is the deputation?" "Sure it's here, sir," said he, when it comes! Being now satisfied that I was in the company of a conspicuous member of the intended Hibernian deputation, I asked my friend to give me a piece of his shamrock, for I desired to look as much like an Irishman as he did. "By my soul, I'd divide any thing wid you," said he, with a good-natured wink, and he divided his shamrock with me. Thus we formed the nucleus of the deputation, and were soon joined by numerous Knights of St. Patrick, who were quickly attracted by the decorations in our button-holes.

When we arrived in the open space fronting the Hotel de Ville, the dense mass of people assembled there was sufficient to cause some little alarm, the more particularly as we were in the midst of a difficulty from which we could not extricate ourselves, except by making our way through the crowd. We were wondering how we should accomplish this desirable object, when a red-hot republican, mounted upon a very powerful horse, rode up to us (for the mob had been obliged to make way for him in order to save their necks), and demanded, in the least complimentary language he could employ, to know the object of our daring to display the shamrock on such an occasion?

"It is Gustave Beauvallon!" exclaimed a hundred voices, as he seized the flag which we had with us, and almost crushed the leaders of our deputation beneath his horse's feet.

"I care not who it is, he shall suffer for this insolence," said one of the National Guards, who, it appeared, was a native of Ireland, and whose Celtic blood, like that of the equestrian Frenchman, was now excited to such a degree that he could no longer brook the indignity which had been offered to the unoffending emblem of his country. Uttering the above exclamation, Denis O'Connor (that is the name by which I think it right to introduce him in these pages) darted forward, and seized the horse's bridle.

"Dare to touch my horse," cried Beauvallon, "and he shall trample you to pieces! For your life, let go my horse's head and explain the meaning of this procession, or my desperation will instantly resolve itself into something more perilous than words." As he uttered this menace, he still held the flag with one hand, while he grasped a whip with the other—a position so exasperating to O'Connor, that, utterly regardless of the consequences, he endeavoured to dislodge the enraged Frenchman from his horse, whereupon the latter gave him a blow with the butt-end of his whip, which would have felled him to the ground, but that the pressure of the crowd was such as to render that result impracticable. Suffering somewhat from the injury he had received, he was at length carried into the interior of the Hotel de Ville, exclaiming, as emphatically as his weakened condition would allow him, that his assaulter should give him immediate "satisfaction" for the base indignity he had offered him.

As to the deputation, it ceased by this time to be a deputation, for its members were all disbanded, and the majority were fain to betake themselves to a "more removed ground." Though stunned by the blow he had received, O'Connor was soon sufficiently restored to feel, in all its humiliating force, the consciousness of the degradation he had been subjected to; and all sense of pain and inconvenience was absorbed in the one deadly passion of revenge. Whatever might be the position in life of Gustave Beauvallon, he should, on the following day, stand before him, face to face, and answer, at peril of his life, for his insolent tenacity. The place should be the Bois de Boulogne—the weapons, swords. A challenge was accordingly sent to Beauvallon, and promptly accepted, it afterwards transpiring that he was an experienced duellist, and rather pleased than otherwise at having an opportunity of exhibiting his death-dealing skill. I undertook to be O'Connor's second; and I shall not easily forget the condition of mind in which, for the first time in my life, I went to the scene of a murderous encounter. I had endeavoured, with all the enthusiasm which was natural to me at such a moment, to form part of a harmless deputation in honour of St. Patrick, and I now found myself second in a duel, which I had no more anticipated than I expected the revolution to bring about the millennium! It was a bleak, cold morning when I rose, and the ride through the Champs Elysées to the Bois de Boulogne, generally so gay and cheerful, was, perhaps, the most dismal and dispiriting journey I ever experienced. But O'Connor's determination to be revenged had taken so firm a hold of him, that he felt confident of victory, and he went on his way, rejoicing in the anticipation of this hoped-for result.

Arrived at the place appointed, we found Beauvallon already there, with two friends, one of whom held a pair of swords, whilst I supported another pair on the part of Denis O'Connor. The weapons being chosen, the two men stood forth for the encounter, when I discovered that Beauvallon carried a pistol in his left breast. This I thought it my duty to make known to O'Connor, and the moment the latter had confirmed my statement by his own eyes, an overpowering sense of the murderous intent of his antagonist took possession of him, and he almost lost his self-control. "Coward!" he exclaimed "you have provided yourself with a firearm in order that, should you be worsted, you might take my life by a deliberate aim! Be mine then the task to put your cowardice to the test." Saying this he made a desperate lunge at Beauvallon, which was immediately returned by him, and in the conflict that ensued, the pistol fell to the ground. Beauvallon, intent upon recovering the weapon, was about to stoop for that purpose, as O'Connor made another thrust, and in an instant the former was a lifeless corpse! The whole party immediately surveyed the body to be quite satisfied that the tide of life had ceased to flow, and the sad truth being too apparent, Beauvallon's second, regarding O'Connor with eyes of fire, exclaimed,

"Villain! he was off his guard when you gave him his death-blow."

"Dare you call me villain," said O'Connor. "He would have murdered me with the pistol which lies there. Perceive, it is loaded!" and O'Connor, snatching the pistol from the ground, discharged it in the air. The enraged second of the vanquished duellist, thinking that the shot had been fired at him, immediately seized a sword, and called upon O'Connor to defend himself.

O'Connor, deeply stung by the insulting bravado of his present foe, was for the moment unmindful of the catastrophe in which his hand had played so prominent a part, and, leaving the prostrate body for the while untouched, he was again engaged in a combat for life or death. His antagonist this time was Ernest Vandermont, a man somewhat older than himself, and bearing in his form and features traces of a life not spent in the calm pursuit of the most healthful virtues. A very few moments had elapsed, ere the two closed, and it was soon evident to me, as also, no doubt, to the friend of Beauvallon, who now stood in the position of second to the other, that the Frenchman was much too excited to have the "chances of war" in his favour.

"You have slain my best friend," he exclaimed, placing himself in an attitude from which it would be difficult to decide whether he meditated attack or defence, "and if my power has not deserted me, your dust shall be mingled with his." Saying these words, he became so violent and ungraceful in his movements, that O'Connor, who had no desire to send him to his account, deeply though he had insulted him, began to entertain fears for his safety, and resolved to do no more than parry his ill-aimed blows. At length, however, Vandermont endeavoured to strike him on the head, and in the almost superhuman effort he made to accomplish this dread purpose, he lost his grasp of the sword, and fell upon its now blunted edge. The contempt which O'Connor felt for him at this moment, prevented his regarding him any longer in the light of an honourable antagonist; and turning to me he exclaimed:

"I will fight with him no more;" whereupon he threw down his sword with haughty disdain, and thus the two weapons crossed each other.

"There," said he, "in the dust let your sword cross mine, and do not provoke me to a revenge which has already cost a life."

I then found that Vandermont was severely wounded, and was unable to rise. He contrived, however, to mutter a few incoherent words, which, though they were doubtless intended as a threat, O'Connor did not heed, but instantly proceeded, with my assistance, and that of Vandermont's friend, to assist him into a façes which was awaiting us at a contiguous spot. This being done, the appalling spectacle of Beauvallon's dead body, to which we now returned, shot like lightning through O'Connor's brain; and for a moment, the power of utterance was denied him. He bent over the prostrate form, and invoked the mercy of Heaven on his repentant head, uttering at the same time a cry of despair which I was fearful might bring witnesses to the scene. It was still early morning, however, and we saw no signs of moving vitality, save in our three selves, to contrast with the cold and lifeless corpse before us. To remove the body was of course our first duty, and having executed this painful task, O'Connor, prompted by a sudden impulse, said in a subdued tone—

"Bear witness that I am guiltless of any sinful design in this unfortunate affair; and that what I did yesterday was to protect the emblem of my country from disgrace."

To relieve the reader's suspense, I need only further inform him that the injury which Vandermont had inflicted upon himself did not prove mortal, and that, as regards the unfortunate Beauvallon, Denis O'Connor was not called upon to answer for the death of a man who had visited with contempt that which it was the duty of a true patriot to protect.

DUN-GARBRY CASTLE.

UN-GARBRY CASTLE, or more correctly Dun-cairbré, the Dun or Fort of Cairbré, is situated on a hill in the vicinity of the mouth of the river Drowis, a stream very celebrated in the Irish annals, county of Leitrim. It was erected by the chief of the Mac-Clanchy, a sept who possessed the ancient district called Dartree, the present barony of Rosclogher. The name of its founder and the date of its erection are not preserved, but, according to Dr. Petrie, the latter may with probability be referred to a period anterior to the reign of Henry VIII., as the Annals of the Four Masters record, at the year 1538; that "Cahir (the son of Feradach, the son of William), the son of Mac-Clanchy, heir-apparent to the chieftainship of Dartree, died in that year, in Dun-Cairbré." From an inquisition taken at the Abbey of Croveela, on the 24th of September, 1603, it appears that Cathal Oge MacClanchy died in January, 1582, seized of the castle and manor of Dun-carbry, and of the entire district called MacClanchy's country, leaving a son and heir, Cathal Duff, then aged twenty-eight years. On the maps made in the reign of Elizabeth, the castle is marked as an important fortress, but its ruins are now of little note, consisting only of a side wall, perforated by an arched doorway. "But, trivial as these vestiges are," says the erudite author of the "Ecclesiastical Architecture of Ireland," "they impart some historic interest to scenery of the most delightful character, by which they are surrounded, and are valuable as a memorial of an ancient Irish family."

THE BLACK DOCTOR.

CHAPTER III

HE same night that Frederick Foster was sitting before the fire, in company with Tony Johnson, at the "Three Jolly Travellers," in a two-pair back room of a wretched lodging-house, in a remote part of the city, two females were seated before a miserable fire that glimmered in the bottom of an old-fashioned grate. There was scarcely any furniture in the apartment, save a few old chairs, a small deal table, and a contrivance for a bed, composed of a bundle of straw, covered over with coarse ticking. No one could be mistaken in forming a notion of the character of one of the persons in that squalid room, inasmuch as there was an ease and dignity, combined with tenderness, in her manner that bespoke the lady, or rather that which parvenus imitate but can never achieve. Her voice was low and musical, and, although her dress betokened the extreme of penury, there was a dignity and self-possession about her that revealed good breeding, and the fact that she had been more in the habit of being obeyed than doing service. She was above the middle height, but looked taller, owing to her attenuated condition. Her hands were beautifully formed, and the broken shoes, which rested on the old rusty fender, could not conceal her small foot and gracefully-turned ankle. Her face, even in suffering, was still eminently handsome, and whenever it was lit up with a smile, it was one so tender and thoughtful, that its melancholy was greater than tears. Her dark brilliant eyes, arched forehead, and exquisitely chiselled nose and mouth, were shown off to great advantage by the extreme fairness of her complexion and the dark luxuriance of her hair, which hung dishevelled over her shoulders, now covered with some portion of her bad clothing. She looked as if she had not only been suffering from deep privation, but from great mental anguish, and the feverish restlessness with which she would listen for a foot upon the stairway, showed that her heart was ill at ease, not for herself, but for some one absent. The other person in the room was of a very different character; she had a round jolly face, surmounted by the mob-cap of the time, which gave a kind of comical expression to her red, honest countenance, into which a red, small, little nose had been stuck for the purpose of enabling her to breathe, as she was so much in the habit of using her mouth for talking, that it was almost always required for that purpose. She was nearly as broad as she was long, and some people went so far as to say that it was her good nature made her fat, because few persons ever saw her eating or drinking, unless a quiet cup of tea, as she was wont to call it, but which was anything but quiet when she had anything to do with making it for other people, inasmuch as her tongue, on such occasions, went like the clapper of a mill. She was unlike most great talkers, as she seldom spoke uncharitably of any body, and was famous for being a great peacemaker, and the settler of many a family quarrel.

A knock came to the door, when the lady rose to open it.

"Can't you lave that to me, Mrs. Foster," said the fat little woman.

"Don't mind, Nelly," said the lady, "I would not like a stranger would see the state of misery to which he and I are reduced; I will go myself." Mrs. Foster partially opened the door, and asked the person who had knocked what was required?

"Tell Nelly Delany, ma'am," said a little girl, "that all the mangle is done, and may I go home?"

"No," said Nelly, who had overheard the conversation, "go up stairs, and I'll be up after ye; put the kittle on the fire; I want to send you a message. This is a terrible bad night for poor Mr. Foster to be out, God help him! I don't think 'tis the cold wether will be troubling them Jews and hatheens that robbed him out of his rights, when they dies," continued Nelly.

"I always heard," said Mrs. Foster, "that you were most charitable in your observations."

"An' so I am, ma'am," said Nelly; "sure it is charity to give them their due, after they robbed you and Mr. Foster, they knows you are in the worst of want, and they would not give you a bit or a sup to put in your mouth, if you were gasping, achushla."

"Hush, Nelly, hush," said Mrs. Foster; "this kind of language is not right. Oh! what a terrible night it is—poor fellow, his has been a sad and bitter fate, to which Heaven does not seem inclined to extend some kind reversion. How have I prayed for strength, and hope, and courage, to meet his trials and mine own, and but for him I do not believe I could resist the temptation to put a speedy period to my wretched life, and trust in God for forgiveness." Mrs. Foster, who was scarcely able to walk from exhaustion, caught Nelly by the arm, "Here," said she, "this is the last," drawing a jewelled locket from her breast, "take this, and pawn or sell it. It is all I have. A mother's dying gift, which she told me never to part with; but my husband, as he walks the streets, is famishing with hunger. He, once so proud, so noble, hospitable, and still so good; and shall I keep this bauble and leave my poor Fred to starve? No; take it, Nelly," and the poor lady resumed her seat by the dying embers of the fire.

The storm seemed to have a special object in throwing all the sleet against the windows of the house in which Mrs. Foster lived. It used to go away for a while, and then come back as if to make another attempt to force the windows open. It would run down the chimneys and drive out the smoke into the rooms, and perform all kinds of practical jokes on the old house. In the midst of that storm poor Frederick Foster wended his lonely way to his miserable home, and he arrived weary, exhausted, and wet to the skin, as Nelly had arranged the supper on the small deal table where Mrs. Foster was sitting.

"Welcome home, sur," said poor Nelly, "you're drowned wet entirely."

"Indeed I am, Nelly, it is a fearful night;" and Nelly beat a retreat up stairs to get tea, while Mr. and Mrs. Foster were eating their first meal for forty-eight hours.

When they had partaken of their humble fare, the latter said, "I can't tell you, Fred, how kind that poor Nelly has been to us; only for her we could not have lived."

"She is a good kind creature," observed Foster, "and we will soon be in a position to reward her for all her kindness."

A ray of hope illumined the face of Mrs. Foster, as she asked, "Have you come to any settlement with Jacob Isaacs, and are we to expect that our days of misery and privation are drawing to a close?"

"Barman is our only hope," replied Foster. "He is a good honest fellow, and will do his best for us. You must make a will, leaving the money to your credit in the English Courts to me, and by that means we will be enabled to realise funds to save us from death and ruin. In a day or two I will get the means to enable you to leave Dublin, and once more, Laura, we shall be free of those hell-hounds."

"And shall we be again, Fred, what we used to be before your kind heart led you to trust in those who call themselves your friends? Do you remember when first you won Laura Saville, did she not tell you that in life or death, nothing would estrange her love from you, and has she not kept her promise? If she had kingdoms to will away, she would give them all to you as freely as she did her heart, and if any sacrifice of hers can give one hour of happiness to her poor Fred, all shall be made."

Foster tenderly embraced his wife, but, being much affected, and not wishing that his emotion should be observed, he said nothing.

"Our early life," continued the lady, "was too happy to last, or perhaps, when we were in affluence and power, we were not thankful enough to Providence for His goodness; but I trust that our many sufferings will atone for our former faults."

"Our sufferings will soon be over, and bright days are yet in store for my poor Laura," said Foster. "I am to see Barman to-morrow night, when I will have good news for you."

Nelly entering with a crude tea-service, put an end to the conversation of Mr. and Mrs. Foster, who retired to rest shortly after midnight.

The morning was far advanced when Quill was awoke from his sleep in the hall, by some inmate of the house falling over him.

"Sixpence damages and sixpence costs," said Quill, as he raised himself on one elbow.

"To the deuce with you!" said the gruff voice of some person lying on the floor beside him; "you have nearly dislocated my shoulder; what brought you there?"

"That is more than I can tell you," said Quill; "but I hope you are not hurt."

"To be sure, I am hurt," said the owner of the gruff voice, as he walked into the street.

After divers efforts, Quill succeeded in regaining his feet, but he was so stiff from the cold, that he could hardly stand. "So the Black Doctor left me to my fate. Such is friendship!" said he, as he ran his right hand through his matted hair, striving at the same time to collect his thoughts, and wondering where was his hat, which, after groping for a long time, he found, collapsed like the bellows of an accordion. He searched his pockets, and found all his money consisted of an old rusty knife, a piece of tobacco, and a latch-key. "I never will be able to get the change of these," said Quill, "till the bank is open." Having made up his mind to appear in public, he fixed his battered hat on his head as well as he could, and proceeded on his way. His attention was attracted by a churn standing at a shop-door, and the thought immediately struck him, that a drink of buttermilk would do him great service. He entered the shop and addressed the dairy-woman, by informing her that it was a very fine morning, and that the locality was a most dangerous one, inasmuch as he had been knocked down and robbed.

"Was there much taken from you, sir?" inquired the woman.

"Fortunately," said Quill, "not much, only my purse and a trifle of money, my watch and chain, and a diamond ring!"

"You ought to inform the watchmen of the district," said the dairy-woman.

"The watchmen, indeed!" replied Quill "I would not have my name brought into question for twenty times the amount I have lost. Give me a quart of fresh buttermilk," said the legal scribe, which, on being handed to him, he drained with an energy which rather took the woman by surprise. When he had sufficiently recovered:

his breath, he enquired, "What do I owe you for that drink—I suppose a half-crown?"

"No," replied the woman, "only two-pence."

Quill affected to laugh—"Is that all? I am an apprentice of Mr. Barman, the celebrated solicitor, and I will send the hall-porter down to you with the amount when I go to the office."

Having delivered himself of what he had to say, he made off as fast as he could to be at Equity-row before his master should arrive. On getting to the hall-door leading to his place of business, he began to make explorations for his latch-key in all kinds of secret pockets, which were distributed in the most ingenious manner over divers parts of his costume. After several failures he succeeded in finding what he sought in one of his boots.

"Strange," said Quill, as he opened the door and proceeded to perch himself on his stool to wait his master's coming. After having made a melancholy attempt to whistle a tune, he commenced to carve the initials of his name on the cover of the desk at which he was sitting.

"Come in," said Quill, in reply to a knock which had been given at the door. "Is that you, Wisp?" continued the scribe. "That was a great spree we had last night—who paid old Brunt? because I know I didn't, as it will be 'in re Quill' with me soon. I was thinking of imagining a schedule and keeping it in my hat, so as not to be taken by surprise when coming to a settlement with rapacious creditors."

"You are nearly as great a fool as your master, who could make a fortune for himself and me," said Wisp, "if he would only mind his business. I am after putting a fellow hiding in the sheriff's prison who has been hunted for debt for the last two months," continued he, as he balanced his hat on the front of his head.

"You arrested him, you mean?" inquired Quill.

"Not a bit of it," replied Wisp. "The best place in the world to hide from one of my cloth is in the 'jug.' No one will tell on him; but the fever is very bad there just now, and it is a terrible place to be. Four poor debtors died there this morning, and I think, Quill, they died of starvation. I know Green-street sheriff's prison for a long time, but I never knew it to be so bad as it is now."

"You are up to your eyes in doing nothing—are you going to arrest anybody to-day?" asked Quill.

"No," replied the bailiff, "unless Jacob Isaacs gives me the parchment for the special edification of Stammers. I tell you what, Quill, it will be a case of sudden death with Stammers if the Jew is not settled with to-day. Tell your accomplished master that Wisp will do himself the honour to look into this elegant place of business in the course of the day, or I will see him at old Brunt's to-night, and perhaps you will favour us with your company at the same time and place?"

Quill affected to be undecided as to the course he would pursue, and throwing his arms outwards and upwards as he pretended to yawn, he said:—

"If I can I will look over."

When Wisp took his departure Quill took his hat out of a drawer, and, with the assistance of some paper and paste, he proceeded to strengthen the sides of his head-dress, and to remedy, as far as possible, the results of the severe collisions it had sustained on his homeward journey.

The cold, sharp air of the early morning did not appear to affect the Black Doctor as he walked along in the direction of Newgate. Though it was long previous to the time fixed for the execution of a wretched culprit, who had, in accordance with the savage custom of the time, been tried, found guilty, and sentenced to die within forty-eight hours of his arrest, crowds of miserable-looking creatures began to pour in to the one centre where a terrible scene was to be presented. Old and young, the strong, the weak, in all the eccentricities of rage, were to be seen making for the one point. Some were singing snatches of coarse songs, and others laughing heartily at their own levity or that of others. On they pressed through the cold, wet mist, all anxious to get a good place from which they could best see the last throes of the death agony of a wretch most unfitted to die. Above the gate of the prison the old, black, iron cage protruded, the bottom of which being lifted, told to all that the fatal arrangements had been made. Through this motley crowd the Black Doctor forced his way to the principal entrance, where he was immediately recognised by the warder, who admitted him

"Are you come for the pöst mortem, doctor?" said a grey-headed little man, with a red face. "I have turned off a number in my time, and I should now be allowed to retire into private life. How is Tabby?" continued the executioner, for such was the calling of the person who addressed the Black Doctor.

"She is well, Tim," replied Bramble, evidently not relishing the familiarity of Tim, who had become a part and portion of the prison in which he had resided for many years. "I want to speak with Jerry the Lift," said the Black Doctor.

"Come this way," said Tim, and he led him up a circular staircase that opened on a dimly-lighted corridor. The guide stopped before a massive iron door which he opened, and Bramble was in the presence of Jerry the Lift, who in one short hour would cease to exist.

The murmuring of the thousands of busy voices in the street could be heard by the condemned man as he sat crouching in a dark corner of his dungeon.

"Don't you know me, Jerry?" said the Black Doctor, approaching him.

"Well," said Jerry, who knew Bramble's voice. "This is a bad business; and that housebreaking affair, which brought me to this, would never be found out only for Brunt. He was afraid of me because I knew too much about him—he and I were deep in crime for years and years together, but his was all the profit, mine the loss. I was an honest man when I first met him—but I will have revenge. I will ask you, doctor, as a request from a dying man, to do what I ask you. Brunt and I killed Hawksworth, and buried him. We made short work of the exciseman. He is now dead nine years," said Jerry, thoughtfully. "He was kind to Brunt when he was poor, and he was one of those who gave the name of the 'Three Jolly Travellers' to his house. It was Brunt killed him, I only helped to bury him. Nelly, the old servant, found it out, and, I think, told Tony Johnson all about it. Brunt made Hawksworth drunk on that terrible night, and strangled him. We buried him in the old back kitchen, near the grate. The dead man had much value in his pockets, but Brunt and I were afraid to touch it when the deed was done. We buried him money and all. Tony Johnson will show you the place, and aid you in getting revenge for Jerry the Lift."

"He has told me enough already," said the Black Doctor; "and on this night I will begin to keep the promise which I now make you, to have satisfaction out of John Brunt."

"I have made heaps of money for Brunt," said Jerry; "but I will trust in you for revenge. If you were to know the way he contrived to make Hawksworth bring all his money the night he killed him, you would say that he was a designing, bloodthirsty ruffian."

The entrance of the sheriff's deputy and Galvin, the executioner, was the signal for the Black Doctor to take his departure from the condemned cell. He bade Jerry a cordial farewell, and after having shaken hands warmly with him, he hurried back into the street, which was now densely crowded. The windows and doorways of the houses opposite the prison, or commanding a view of it, were filled by men, women, and children, while the waving sea of heads in the street were swayed about as if acted on by a tempest. In the crowd the Black Doctor recognised the white hat of Tony Johnson, who, as well as Wisp, with whom he was in company, seemed to enjoy the excitement of the scene. Bramble, by hard pushing, succeeded in getting to the place where Tony was standing.

"There you are, you young scamp," said Bramble.

"Yes, doctor," replied Tony, "here I am, and there you are."

"I want you," said the Black Doctor; "so keep close to me."

"I must be forsaking you, Mr. Wisp," said Tony to the bailiff, as he affected to bow with the greatest reverence. "There is no fear of you in the crowd, you are too innocent; nobody will do you any harm."

Wisp had to laugh at the comical appearance of his young friend, as he made off to keep as close as possible to the Black Doctor, who appeared to be quite indifferent to the scenes which were being enacted around him.

"Come this way," he said to Tony, as he retraced his steps to the residence of Tabby Masters.

"You have brought company with you," said the old woman, eying Tony, who showed that he was determined to make himself quite at home by seating himself at the fire. "Stammers is up and has been asking for you."

The Black Doctor, without replying, proceeded up stairs to a small, squalid room. On a miserable bed, a fashionably-dressed young man was sitting. A profusion of light-brown curly hair fell in disorder over a finely-moulded head and face. He looked dejected and care-worn, and as he rose gracefully, with his right hand extended to salute Bramble, his fine manly form and elegant bearing were strangely contrasted with the miserable room of which he was the occupant.

"Cheer up!" said the Black Doctor, "I think that awkward affair of yours will be all right to-day."

"Did you offer Isaacs to pay him all that he demands?" said Stammers.

"No," said Bramble; "but I will. You are safe here, and he believes that you are not in town."

"This suspense is fearful," said Stammers. "I would give worlds for possession of that accursed forged bill. I did not do it for the means to supply my real wants, but out of an idle caprice, and by a wanton act of folly I have placed myself in the fangs of a rapacious and relentless enemy. Have you seen my wife and sister?" continued Stammers; "for if you have not you must see them at once. Tell them I am away somewhere, and make the best case you can for me—but how are we to get this terrible bill? My life, my honour, my all, depends upon it."

"I will get it, or die in the attempt," said Bramble, "even if it was folded round the heart of Isaacs!"

"Oh, that I had it!" groaned Stammers. "You must," said he, catching Bramble convulsively by the arm, "you must call at my house with as little delay as possible, and you must make another attempt to soften the Jew."

"I will," said Bramble; "and I expect to be back here in a few hours."

The Black Doctor descended the rickety old stair-case to the kitchen, where Tony, after having tried several plans for tormenting a cat, was amusing himself by falling on the palms of his hands, and throwing his feet against the wall.

"I must lose no time in getting Stammers out of this," said the Black Doctor, as he prepared to take his departure, and was about to open the door. He had scarcely done so when Tony observed in a low whisper—

"Danger!"

"The window! the window!" said Bramble, as he dashed up stairs to Stammers' room, forced up the sash, and springing into a back yard, called on Stammers to follow.

A WOMAN OF THE MIDDLE AGES.

IN his "Pilgrimages in Switzerland," Louis Veullot who, as a writer of fiction, is occasionally entertaining, has strung together a collection of mediæval traditions, many of which read strangely improbable in this nineteenth century light of ours. At Berne, M. Veullot enriched his portfolio with a story, curiously illustrative of the social life and judicial processes of the Middle Ages. It runs in this wise:—Jorg de Fellis, and Pierre de Koepf, two eminent citizens of Berne, about the beginning of the fourteenth century, had been attached friends in early life. Political differences subsequently tended to estrange them; time only seemed to widen the breach, and ultimately they learned to regard each other with a ferocity which can be explained only by assuming, that the politics of the period appealed more to the heart, and less to the head, than do ours of to-day. About twelve years after the first rupture of their friendship, Mathilde, the daughter of Jorg de Fellis, a fascinating and accomplished maiden, who inherited much of her mother's gentleness, with a strong infusion of her father's determination, whilst dancing at a civic revelry, attracted the eye of Pierre de Koepf, and captivated his heart. He lost but little time in declaring his passion, and making her an offer of his hand and his ample fortune; but Mathilde firmly rejected his suit, and referred him for explanations to her father, from whom it would appear the passionate de Koepf experienced a rough reception, and an unequivocal repudiation of his pretensions. Wounded in pride and sore at heart, he returned home, and sat down to plot the ruin of De Fellis and his daughter. One morning the citizens of Berne were horrified on hearing that a couple of peasants had discovered the mangled body of Schieb, the Banneret, lying outside the walls. Thither they flocked in crowds, and many of them were seized with fits whilst gazing on one whom they had known so long. The Banneret's head had been cloven in two by his assassin, who seemed to have taken a devilish delight in mutilating the remains of their victim, for no less than sixty halbert thrusts were found on examination of his body. Pierre de Koepf was amongst the first who arrived at the scene of the tragedy. He moved from group to group rapidly, whispering as he passed. "What does Pierre say?" asked a venerable citizen of his nephew. "Pierre says, uncle," replied the boy, "that the murderer of the Banneret is Jorg de Fellis." A few moments later de Koepf had mounted the cross in the great market-place, and openly denounced de Fellis as the butcher of Schieb. The charge derived some colour from the notorious fact that the Banneret and the accused had been for many weeks on bad terms; and the populace, glad of having found some clue to the mystery which puzzled them, adopted the words of de Koepf, and marched through the town proclaiming de Fellis a murderer. The fearful story soon spread, and de Fellis, dragged from his home and from the embraces of his devoted daughter, was cast into prison. "What have I done?" he asked of the jailors who came to put him in irons. "You have murdered Schieb the Banneret," they said. De Fellis raised his hands as if to invoke Heaven to witness his innocence, when, to the terror of his daughter and the jailors, he was struck dumb. The popular imagination, which is always active in such emergencies, directly interpreted this incident as a proof of God's wrath, and a judgment on a would-be blasphemer.

Three days had elapsed since the terrible night on which the wretched prisoner had been torn from his hearth and sent to a dungeon. On the morning of the fourth day he was summoned before the judges and formally charged with the murder of Schieb. He could reply only by feeble gestures, and looks of voiceless agony. Foremost amongst his accusers was his old enemy de Koepf, who swore, that on the night of the murder he had seen the prisoner flying on horseback from the place where the Banneret's body had been discovered. Mathilde looked at the witness, and she well understood that implacable hatred and disappointed passion had made him the accuser of her father. "But," says the chronicle, "she held her peace and prayed." Additional evidence was then produced to shew that de Fellis and no other person could have been concerned in the assassination. For the defence, Mathilde swore that on the night of the murder, her father pressed by business, had remained at home—and further, that by no possibility could he have gone abroad without her knowledge. Under the pressure of such conflicting testimony the judicial mind wavered, and finally, referred the question of the prisoner's guilt or innocence to the verdict of the ordeal. Mathilde was overjoyed at this result. Rising in the midst of the court, she solemnly accepted the test, and turning to de Koepf she said—"I charge this man with having perjured his soul in accusing my father of the murder of Schieb, whom God keep in his mercy; and I am ready to prove what I say against him by the ordeal of single combat, wherever and whenever the judges shall fix." A murmur of admiration ran through the spectators, and all eyes were turned on the intrepid and devoted girl. De Koepf having accepted the challenge, Mathilde threw down her glove, and received his in turn. As he presented it, it was observed that his color turned ashy pale, and his strong frame quivered like a reed. The murmur in the court increased; never before had such a spectacle been witnessed in Berne, and the emotion of the people was profound when the challenger and the challenged were conducted to prison, there to await in prayer and meditation the day of the combat.

The anxiously-awaited morning came at last. The sun shone brightly on the streets and the roofs of Berne, and the town was astir from the dawn. Around the lists and enclosing them, was raised a temporary amphitheatre from which the citizens could witness the fight. At noon the heralds' trumpets sounded, and Mathilde clad in a suit of elastic chain-mail, stepped with modest confidence into the arena. The beautiful proportions of her figure were seen to advantage in her novel costume; and her long yellow hair, which had escaped the confinement of her casque, streamed down to her waist. Though many of the spectators pitied her as the champion of a bad cause, few there were who could refuse her their sympathy or their prayers, for her success. And now, de Koepf strode gloomily into the lists. As he stood before his frail antagonist the odds in his favour were so obvious, that every one trembled for her fate. There was a short delay in consequence of its being found impossible to comply with the law, which says "that the combatants in ordeal must be equal in every respect." "Bind the left arm of Pierre de Koepf," cried the spectators. "Hold," exclaimed Mathilde, "see that ye fetter him not. I am willing to fight the knight armed and free as we are; and so God judge me aright." The only condition she insisted on was, that the combat should be fought on foot, as she was unaccustomed to sit on horse-back; this was immediately granted. Then riding to the four corners of the lists, the heralds proclaimed aloud the penalties which the laws inflicted on any person obstructing the fight or favouring the combatants. When they ceased Mathilde and De Koepf knelt down. As the latter, in conformity with the usages of the ceremonial raised his vizor, his face, pale with the consciousness of his shameful position, was seen for a moment; and the strange contrast which offered to the countenance of Mathilde, radiant with innocence and hope, was looked upon as a good omen by all who sympathised with the brave maiden. Each having made a confession of faith, Mathilde, in a clear melodious voice, said, "Man, whom I hold by the right hand, and who hast received in baptism the name of Pierre, but who oughtest rather to be named after the fiend, I swear that the words you have uttered are perjured, and so may Heaven assist the justice of my cause!" De Koepf quailed beneath her eyes as he answered—"Woman, whom I hold by the left hand, and who hast received in baptism the name of Mathilde, it is false that I have wrongfully accused your father, so God judge between us!" This was the marriage ceremony of the ordeal, in which one of the two, at conclusion, was espoused unto death and infamy. When it was ended, both rose and retired, Mathilde to the east, De Koepf to the west, and prayed a little while. When Mathilde dropped on her knees hundreds of the spectators knelt also, turning their faces to the east. And now the trumpets breathed for the last time, and the combatants approached each other. For a moment they crossed swords and looked into each other's eyes, whilst a groan went up from the benches whereon the people were seated; another instant, and Mathilde's buckler was dashed from her arm by a dexterous sleight of her adversary's weapon. And now the steel hissed and clashed; but, despite all De Koepf's address, he had not yet sent a single thrust home to his antagonist. Well parried, or avoided with a backward spring, his blows fell harmless, until irritated by the skill displayed by Mathilde, he sprang forward and dealt her a blow on the crown, which brought her to the ground. The brave girl was stunned for a moment, but, rising to her knees and grasping her sword in both hands, she thrust it into De Koepf's side and wounded him mortally. As he fell, the judges rushed into the lists, and the people, overleaping or breaking down the barriers, followed them with a roar of exultation, to the spot where Mathilde, with her sword pointed to De Koepf's throat, asked him to choose between instant death or the retraction of the calumnies he had uttered against her father. The craven knight chose the latter alternative, and further confessed that he had devised the assassination of Schieb the Banneret, that he might compass the ruin and disgrace of Jorgon de Fellis and his daughter. On hearing these words the executioners were summoned, and, along with the accomplices whom he named, De Koepf was put to death. Jorgon de Fellis lived to enjoy the recovery of his good name; and Mathilde, after a long life, blessed with the esteem and sympathy of all good men and women, bequeathed her story to posterity, as one of the richest testaments in the traditions of Berne.

LIFE.—The sorrow of life elevates and refines our perceptions. We look back with tempered pity upon the unsubstantial dreams of boyhood, and cherish, as more truly desirable than its "vain, deluding joys," our passionate farewells, our communion with the dead, our wider but sadder horizons.

A VISION OF THE NIGHT.

On a gentle summer evening,
In a grey churchyard I stood,
With the rosy sun just setting
All around me, in a flood
Of such bright and golden glory,
As an angel's glance may greet,
On his heavenward pinions soaring;
All the earth below his feet.

But the stream of golden glory,
Fading, fading, fades away,
And the evening shadows, round me
Gather with fantastic play.
But all through the growing twilight,
Well-known forms keep flitting on;
Faces of fond friends departed,
Visions of the dear ones gone.

And my heart is wildly throbbing,
With a strange and burning beat,
And the graves are heaving, heaving
In confusion at my feet.
And my boyhood's friends are round me,
Boyhood's friends, so fond, so true;
Whilst my tongue for ever walleth,
Where, and yet, oh, where are you?

Darker, darker, grow the shadows,
Deep'ning o'er the lowly sod,
Where a brave young heart is sleeping
In the peace and rest of God.
Lo! his well-known face comes nearer:
Feel I not the kindly hand!
Fly ye shadows—lighter, brighter,
Glow the place on which we stand.

'Tis my boyhood's friend is with me!—
Now I strain him to my breast!—
Ah! the cruel shadows deep'ning,
Fall but on his place of rest.—
And my soul is longing sadly
For the friend so fond, so true;
Whilst my tongue responsive walleth,
Where, my boyhood's friends, are you?

Deeper, deeper grow the shadows;
As the sea-bird leaves her wing,
And the waves with ceaseless wailing,
Still their solemn dirges sing
O'er a sad heart, sadly sleeping
In the ocean's surging bed,
With no tongue to tell his praises,
With no eye to weep him fled.

Gather deeper, oh, ye shadows!
Scarce a smile e'er cheer'd his way;
Scarce was there a heart to miss him,
When his form had pass'd away.
Neath the ocean wave now sleeping,
None may know the sacred spot;
Yet one heart at least bewails him,
Weeping o'er his hapless lot.

Darker, darker. Gather deeper
O'er the dear ones who are fled!
Fall the hot tears, quicker, quicker,
In the presence of the dead.
None may take their vacant places,
Gone for ever is their smile,
And a lone heart, lonely waiting,
Bideth the appointed time!

THE GRIEVANCE PAPERS.

CHAPTER III.

RELATES A CERTAIN MEMORABLE ENCOUNTER BETWEEN MRS. SQUEEZER AND THE WRITER, RELATIVE TO A LATCH-KEY, AND THE IGNOMINIOUS DEFEAT WHICH THE LATTER SUFFERED ON THAT OCCASION.

RETURN to Mrs. Squeezer.—The subject is, I am ready to admit, uncongenial and unpleasant to a man, who, like myself, has no dearer wish than to live in peace and happiness with all mankind, and to pass through life with as little annoyance as is compatible with the established order of things amid which we find ourselves placed. I never could understand how some people are always making grievances and annoyances for themselves, fretting, fuming, and drawing trouble out of every little straw that may happen to cross their path, and obstinately shutting their eyes to the bright side of things, and to the real blessings which they enjoy,

“For it so falls out,
That what we have we prize not to the worth
While we enjoy it: but, being lack'd and lost,
Why, then we reach the value, then we find
The virtue, that possession would not show us
While it was ours.”

Being fully impressed with the sound philosophy contained in the lines of the immortal Bard of Avon, which I have just quoted, I have always, in my passage through life, endeavoured altogether to disregard these little straws which cross our path at every turn; and to remove the big stones, which are real stumbling-blocks, with as little difficulty and inconvenience as possible. Hence, kind reader, you will understand how painful it must have been to my feelings to have been obliged to fall foul of Mrs. Squeezer, and hold her up to public scorn and indignation, as I did in the withering article which appeared in this Journal, under the title of “Mrs. Squeezer and her Cat.” But duty has no choice. “Duty,” says Kant, the great German metaphysician, “is above all consequences, and often, at a crisis of difficulty, commands us to throw them overboard. Fiat justitia, perat mundus. It commands us to look neither to the right, nor to the left, but straight onward.” Strong in this feeling of duty, I have already endeavoured to draw attention to some of the misdeeds of Mrs. Squeezer and her abominable cat. Supported by the same strong feeling of duty, I shall proceed, without hesitation, on the path which I have marked out for myself. I shall ruthlessly crush the gentler instincts of my nature, which prompt me to spare even Mrs. Squeezer, and I shall not desist, until, heedless of consequences, I shall have “smashed” that amiable lady, as completely as it is in my power to do.

I am happy to believe that I have already given Mrs. Squeezer a stab, from the effects of which she will not soon recover, even if she be not wholly annihilated by the force of this present article. When I speak of Mrs. Squeezer, you must understand that “Squeezer” is not the real name of my landlady, but it is as near an approach as I could make to it, without putting myself within the clutches of the law for libel. I was, as you may imagine, very anxious to bring my article entitled “Mrs. Squeezer and her Cat,” under the notice of my landlady as soon as possible. I knew that all that was requisite was, to leave the number of the Journal containing it on my table, for I am quite convinced that Mrs. Squeezer (as with your permission I will continue to name my landlady) reads all my papers, letters, and books on which she can lay her hands. However, I determined to make “assurance doubly sure,” so, as I was leaving my lodgings in the morning, I tapped at Mrs. Squeezer's door, and was invited to enter the sanctum of that amiable lady. I did so, with the number of the “Illustrated Dublin Journal” in my hand.

“Good morning, ma'am,” said I, with my most fascinating smile, “I hope you are quite well this morning. Poor puss! poor pet!” (This is to that odious cat, who is glaring at me from under the table.) “I have brought you this new Journal, ma'am, thinking you might like to see it. I hear it highly spoken of”—I go on—“and should be glad to hear your opinion of it.” Mrs. Squeezer takes the Journal from me with her sweetest air, and I bid her “Good morning.” Just as I am closing the door, I return as if I had forgotten something. “By the way,” I resume, “I heard my friend, Jenkins, speaking of some article or other signed ‘Incog,’ which, he declared, amused him very much. Allow me to ask for your judgment on it. Good morning, Mrs. Squeezer—good morning, ma'am. I shall dine out to-day,” I add, not wishing to leave my dinner at the disposal of Mrs. Squeezer, after she has read the article to which I have thus delicately drawn her attention, and in a moment more I close the door, and am gone.

I went down to Kingstown to spend the day, and I am convinced that some of my fellow-passengers in the train must have come to the conclusion that there was something seriously wrong with me, I chuckled and laughed so, all the way down. During the whole journey, and, in fact, during the whole day, the vision of my landlady reading the article on “Mrs. Squeezer and her Cat” was continually present to my mind, and it was only by the most violent efforts, that I could preserve even a decent appearance of gravity. I returned home in due time, and rang my bell for tea. As Mrs. Squeezer brought in that beverage, I kept my eye upon her, and I saw at once that my shaft—poisoned shaft, if you will—had sped home. Her nose was redder than usual, and the expression of her features (which is vixenish at its best) was heightened to a degree that filled me with compassion when I thought of the late lamented Mr. S. Mrs. Squeezer placed my apparatus for tea on the table with a bang which seemed to make the whole room shake. Still I pretended to be unconscious, and proceeded to speak of the new Journal, and beg her opinion of it, if she had had leisure to look through it.

Mrs. S. turned sharply round as I spoke, and eyed me keenly, to see whether I was “funning” her or not. Fortunately, I preserved my gravity, and then, in truth, did Mrs. Squeezer launch out with a volley of abuse against the “Journal,” and every one connected with it, which I shrink from committing to paper—“A nasty, low, mean, filthy, abusive thing,” were among the very mildest epithets which were heaped upon the devoted Journal. I stared with feigned astonishment, said I was very sorry to hear such a bad account of the thing, which had, indeed, been highly recommended to me, and would take care not to obtrude such a very objectionable publication upon her notice any more. But, from all this, I concluded that my shot had had its due effect, and if I had spent the day in chuckling over my anticipated victory, you may imagine in what a state of rapture I spent the evening, now that my hopes had been so fully realized. I had but one regret, and it was, that Mrs. Squeezer's cat was incapable, from the constitution of his nature, of sharing in his mistress's feelings. I called next day at the office of the “Dublin Journal,” and gave orders that, for the future, the weekly numbers of that periodical, for which I subscribe, were to be kept until I called for them. I am convinced that, if the poor little errand-boy were to make his appearance at her door, with the obnoxious Journal in his hand, Mrs. Squeezer, assisted by her cat, would certainly “do” for him.

My sentiments in regard to Mrs. Squeezer are, I readily admit, of a bitter and vindictive nature; but, in order to justify myself before the public, I shall now proceed to lay some more of my grievances, at the hands of that female, before the intelligent and enlightened readers of this Journal, still bearing in mind that I have left the decision of my own case to them.

I have spoken of Mrs. Squeezer's cat, and I have detailed my grievances relative to shirt buttons. The next subject I shall bring before you, kind reader, is that of a latch-key.

My readers, and especially that large class in the same position of life as myself, will, I am sure, be astonished and horrified to hear that the strong-minded female who, for a consideration, takes me in and does for me, does not allow me the privilege of a latch-key. I do not mean to say that there is not a latch-key attached to the bunch which I carry in my pocket; but, what I say is, that the article aforesaid, is, through the machinations of Mrs. Squeezer, rendered of no use, and practically I might just as well be without it.

My first struggle with Mrs. Squeezer was on the subject of this latch-key, and I was ignominiously defeated, as you shall hear. Although a strictly moral young man, as I think I may venture to call myself, still I am a young man, and being a young man, I am naturally fond of society, and a reasonable share of amusement.

When I first took Mrs. Squeezer's apartments, in the rule of life which I laid out for myself, I fixed upon twelve o'clock (I have no occasion for rising very early in the morning) as the hour at which I would, as a general rule, retire to rest; and, as I contemplated spending my evenings, for the most part, amongst my friends, it followed that I should not reach my lodgings much earlier than that hour. Now, Mrs. Squeezer informed me, with her most intensely respectable air, that, in pursuance of certain rules which she laid upon the shoulders of the late Mr. S., (with what justice I know not,) she was in the habit of extinguishing the hall lamp, and retiring to her own apartment at 10 p.m. I ventured to suggest that 10 p.m. was a very early hour, especially for a gentleman whose dinner hour was six; but, as Mrs. Squeezer murmured something about "evening devotions," I could not, in decency, urge that point any further. Still I was determined to have my way, and at once, with great boldness and resolution, suggested the expedient of a latch-key. Mrs. S. resisted, and began at once to dilate with extreme volubility on several single young men, who had occupied her apartments, and who had never made such a request, and with whom, she went on to say, she had enjoyed the privilege of joining in nightly prayer at 10 p.m. I didn't believe a single word of what she was saying, and as I believe still less in Mrs. Squeezer's ideas of religion (as I may perhaps explain more fully some other time), I at once turned a cold shoulder to these hints, and persisted in the idea of the latch-key. When Mrs. S. saw that my mind was made up, she prudently gave in, and furnished me with the article in question, and I went out to spend the evening, gloating over the victory which I thought I had gained. Poor fool that I was! To suppose that I, with my youth and inexperience, had any chance against such a veritable old ogress as Mrs. Squeezer, with her vast experience in "doing" for defenceless young men! I returned home about 12 p.m., after a very pleasant evening. It was some time before I could find the key-hole, which, I must say, bears a very remarkable disproportion to the size of the door. However, I succeeded at last, and got the door open. Pitch dark! I grope about with both hands, but before I succeed in finding the matches, I run headfirst against something or other which falls to the ground with a heavy "flop," after nearly frightening me into fits. At length I procure a light, and then discover that I have thrown over an apparatus, (I don't know the technical name for it,) on which linen is hung before the fire to be aired. As I was convinced that Mrs. Squeezer had placed the article in question purposely in my way, I kicked it and the sheets and blankets with which it was covered, down the back stairs without hesitation, and with a degree of noise, which, I flatter myself, must have startled even Mrs. Squeezer's strong nerves. So far no great harm was done, and the victory was pretty fairly balanced.

But one unlucky night, about a fortnight after this adventure, I returned home about the same hour, and grope as I would I could find no matches—I am now convinced that that infamous woman had purposely removed them—I was proceeding to grope my way to the foot of the stairs, when—oh! merciful goodness—my leg came into violent collision with some hard and sharp projection, which brought me to a stand with a yell of mingled pain and execration. The next instant I struck out madly with my foot, and an article, which from the noise it made, I knew to be an iron pail, went rolling down the stairs into the back kitchen. This time Mrs. Squeezer put her head out of her room, and enquired what was the matter; but consigning her in my madness to the keeping of a certain gentleman, whose name is not usually mentioned in polite circles, I made my way up stairs, procured a light, and then discovered that I had grazed the skin off my leg bone, nearly from the knee to the ankle. To say that I heaped curses both loud and deep upon the head of Mrs. Squeezer would be as useless, as it might be unbecoming. Next morning I was confined to my bed. When Mrs. S. made her appearance to enquire after me, I at once broke out into violent exclamations of rage and indignation. I might have spared myself the unnecessary excitement, as that lady was not in the least discomposed by my attack. I charged her with having purposely left the accursed iron pail in my way, that I might fall over it, and lame myself for life. With the greatest calmness and serenity of manner, and with her most respectable air, she repelled and utterly denied my unfounded assertion. I could not say, even to Mrs. Squeezer, what was in my mind; but what was in my mind was this, "Either you did it, Mrs. Squeezer, and you are a liar for denying it (you will excuse the strength of the language when you reflect on the circumstances in which I was placed), or your accursed cat did it. Take which horn of the dilemma you wish! No doubt it was the cat! Oh yes, lay it upon the cat, by all means! Let it be the cat!" At all events, I was confined to my bed for a fortnight, and my doctor's bill was £7 10s. During the whole of this period I was at the mercy of Mrs. Squeezer, and I am bound to admit, that she made the most of her opportunity, and established over me a thralldom which I shudder to contemplate. I formed several plans on my recovery by which I hoped to meet Mrs. Squeezer on her own ground, but they all failed—ignominiously failed. My most favourite plan was this, viz.: To procure a small bull's eye lantern, such as those used by policemen, and to carry this with me whenever I might be out in the evening, procuring a light before I left my friend's house on my return home. However, the difficulty was what to do with the lantern until it was wanted. I couldn't keep it in the pocket of my dress coat, and have it bumping against my legs every time that I stood up to dance. Moreover, the oil with which these lanterns are supplied at once settled this view of the matter. Neither could I leave it with the servant. It would have been too absurd for a young man of six and twenty to carry a lantern about with him in broad daylight, in order to be able to find his way home again. I am sensitively open to ridicule, and as I know that the servants of the houses where I visit would have made me and my lantern the butt of their coarse jokes, I shrank from this plan. Nothing remained but to try the expedient of carrying a box of lucifer matches in my pocket on these occasions, in order that as soon as I reached home, and succeeded in opening the door, I might immediately strike a light. I succeeded in doing so once or twice, but I failed a great deal oftener, in consequence of the winds, which, at these times, rushed up the back staircase as if they were inspired by the genius of Mrs. Squeezer herself, and just as I thought I had succeeded, after innumerable stratagems and dodges, in coaxing my match into a blaze, with a vicious puff blew it out again, and left me hopelessly groping about in the dark. I persevered in this lucifer "dodge," however, (if I may so call it) until a very unpleasant accident caused me to give it up too. The accident to which I allude, was briefly this. One evening, after dressing for a party, I placed my box of matches in the tail of my dress coat as usual. During the course of the evening, having danced several sets, I became rather fatigued, and sat down to rest myself. Unfortunately I forgot the unlucky box of matches in the pocket of my coat, and seating myself with some little energy, down I came upon the box of matches, which immediately went off with a loud explosion, and with a stench which caused every one to rush precipitately from the room. The confusion was really dreadful—Fizz! fizz! bang! bang! went the matches in my pocket. The ladies screamed and rushed from the room. The gentlemen crammed their handkerchiefs into their mouths and hurried to my assistance. I struggled frantically to get rid of my coat, but before I could succeed in doing so, I give you my word of honour, that I began to feel very unpleasantly warm in the region where the matches were fizzing away like so many malignant demons; and when at length I succeeded in freeing myself from my coat, and pitching it out of the window into the street, the garment was all in a blaze. This very unpleasant accident completely cowed me, and I gave up the contest in despair. I went coatless home in a cab, and was received at the door by Mrs. Squeezer, who, with more than usual solemnity, began to preach to me about "Providence," and how thankful we ought to be for such merciful warnings, until she nearly drove me mad. However, she had gained her point, and she was gloatingly, though calmly, exultant. Since that night I rarely venture to remain out after 10 p.m., (but I never join Mrs. S. in nightly prayer). I sometimes am bold enough to go to an evening party, but it is very seldom. On such occasions, although I give Mrs. Squeezer clearly and emphatically to understand, that if my hand does not fall on the box of lucifers the very instant that I open the door, I shall leave her apartments without a moment's notice, still my presentiment of iron pails, and other such diabolical weapons of offensive warfare, is so great, that I cannot enjoy myself, and in fact, have almost entirely given up endeavouring to do so. I mentioned my unfortunate case in confidence to my friend Scroggins, some short time ago. Scroggins, you may remember, kind reader, is the party who suffers from the grievance of a German flute, addicted to continual performance of the Nigger melodies, over his head. Scroggins sympathised warmly with me. In a few moments his expressive features lighted up, and he warmly grasped my hand.

"Incoo, old boy," said Scroggins, "I have it. Take my advice. Get a cornopean, and practice every night from ten to twelve p.m., it isn't cheerful music, especially in beginners; and if old Squeezer don't come and beg of you to spend your evenings abroad, undertaking to leave the hall lamp lighted for you till you return, I'm a Dutchman, that's all."

I eagerly seized the idea, and rushing out, at once invested several pounds in the purchase of one of the above-mentioned instruments. For three nights I practised unremittingly. Mrs. Squeezer did not make her appearance, but between my performances, when I paused for a few minutes to take breath, I heard her groaning heavily in the room below, and I imagined that, at last, I had conquered her. My joy knew no bounds, and I believe that I laughed aloud in the excess of my exultation. On the morning following my third nocturnal performance, a note was handed to me by Mrs. Squeezer. I tore it eagerly open, not doubting for an instant but that it contained proposals for a truce at the very least. "Sir," I read, "I beg to inform you, that, unless you at once desist from making the hideous noises with which you have for the last three nights disturbed the repose of this hitherto peaceful neighbourhood, I shall forthwith take steps to have you indicted as a public nuisance—

JOHN MUGGINS."

Mr. Muggins, I may mention, is the gentleman who lives next door. A public nuisance! I stamped, and I am afraid that I swore. In my rage I forgot the presence of Mrs. Squeezer, who recalled me to myself by inquiring whether there were any answer. I don't remember what I said, but I remember that Mrs. Squeezer, upon hearing my words, uttered a loud groan, as if ineffably scandalized, and rushed hurriedly from the room.

For the present I have done—Not that I have exhausted my subject, for more of Mrs. Squeezer's atrocities remain to be unfolded, but that I am afraid of exhausting the patience of my kind readers. Moreover, kindly, genial human nature, such as is, I am sure, the attribute of the readers of this journal, won't bear too much of such repulsive details at one sitting. We shrink with horror from their contemplation. I have as briefly, and I trust, as impartially as possible, given you, my sympathising friends, a true account of my first pitched battle with Mrs. Squeezer, and of the ignominious defeat which, I candidly admit, that I suffered on that occasion. To you I leave it to decide, whether my relations with the female who has taken me in and is gradually doing for me, are of such a nature as to warrant you in coming to the conclusion that I am suffering under "a real grievance," in the person of Mrs. Squeezer. To you, too, I leave it to declare whether the measure of retaliation which I have taken by means of these papers, be, all things considered, excessive or not. To you I commit my cause with confidence. Let Mrs. Squeezer tremble, for I feel that justice will be done, since it is left to the kind, the intelligent, and the sympathetic readers of the "Illustrated Dublin Journal," to judge between me and my domestic persecutor.

"To poison the cause in Justice' equal scales, Whose beam stands sure, whose rightful cause prevails."

THE OLD HOUSE FAR AWAY.

I.

THE wild birds warble, the silvery rills
Sing cheerily round the spot,
And the peaceful shade of the purple hills
Falls dim on my mother's cot;
Its windows are small, and its thatch is low,
And its ancient walls are grey;
Oh I see it! I love it! Where'er I go—
That old house far away!

II.

The little clock ticks on the parlour wall,
Recording the passing hours;
And the pet geranium grows rank and tall,
With its brilliant scarlet flowers;
And the old straw chair so cosy and low,
Where mother sat knitting all day,
Oh I see it! I love it! Where'er I go—
That old house far away!

III.

Dear mother! how plainly I see her now
Reclining in that old chair,
With the sunset resting upon her brow,
That was once so smooth and fair;
With her crimped border white as snow,
And her once dark hair now grey,
Oh my heart is with her where'er I go—
In that old house far away!

IV.

Not all the treasure the world affords,
The riches of land and sea,
Not all the wealth of earth's proud lords,
Can blot from my memory
The roof that sheltered each dear, dear head,
And the humble floor of clay,
Where the feet I love! were wont to tread,
In the old house far away!

NATIONAL TINTINGS.

II.—WILLIAM CARLETON.

WILLIAM CARLETON was born in 1796, in the townland of Prillisk, parish of Clogher, and county of Tyrone. His father was a small farmer, with a family of fourteen children, the subject of our present tinting being the youngest. He was a simple peasant, his son tells us, of unaffected piety and unblemished integrity. The extraordinary knowledge of the customs, traditions, and pastimes of the Irish, which enriches Carleton's works, has been communicated to him by his father, while he seems to be indebted to his mother for the more poetical attributes of his genius.

From Prillisk the family removed to a place called Tonnagh, where he commenced his education under the tutorage of a Connaughtman, named Pat Freyne; but up to his fourteenth year his studies were of a very desultory nature, owing to the erratic habits of those hedge-school teachers, upon whom the peasant children were altogether dependent for educational knowledge in those days. He was placed under several of those country pedagogues and tyrants, among which latter was a classical teacher at Tulnavert, whose name he has refrained from giving, but who figures at full length in one of his most beautiful and popular tales, "The Poor Scholar."

Although possessed of a mind capable of imbibing knowledge rapidly, he made but little progress under those men in his education. We believe book lore to have been the least of it; but the life-pictures he has given us of this class of persons in his works, prove that his attendance upon them was not altogether purposeless, for even at that early period of life he was unconsciously noting those phases of character which they presented.

Notwithstanding that he possessed those powers of observation, he was, in his boyhood, more remarkable for simplicity of mind than precocity of intellect; in exemplification of this, we shall relate an anecdote that is told of him.

He once undertook to deliver a letter from a Catholic clergyman to a physician who lived some twelve miles distant from his residence. He proceeded on his way and returned in due time, or a little before it.

"Why, William, you've got back soon," said his cousin for whom he had performed the journey, as he saw him return.

"Yes," replied young Carleton, "but I didn't go the entire way, for I forgot the name of the gentleman to whom I was going, and had to come back to inquire."

"And where had you the letter?" asked the other.

"I had it here in my pocket," he replied, drawing it out.

His companion took it from him, and turning up the direction, handed it back—

"Wouldn't it have been better for you to have looked at that, and have saved yourself the trouble of coming such a journey?" he asked. We may imagine the blankness of the lad's face on discovering his blunder, which, we need hardly add, was for many a day made the subject of raillery among his schoolfellows whenever it was mentioned.

When he had reached his twelfth year, his parents, who designed him for the church, and who were, therefore, anxious as to his progress in learning, resolved upon sending him to Munster, to complete his education as there was no classical school within eighteen or twenty miles of Springtown, where they then resided. Accordingly, his simple outfit was prepared, the funds necessary to defray his expenses being supplied by his parents; but their scanty means would not permit of their adding to this sum as much as might enable him to travel in the ordinary way; so he was to trust to the hospitality of the peasantry for food and board on his journey.

It was a beautiful May morning, he tells us, when he took leave of his family, and set out, a mere child, lonely and heart-sore, to seek for knowledge; but he proceeded no farther than Granard, when his courage failed him. An ill-omened dream caused, doubtless, by over-fatigue, aroused his fears, and these, combined with the strong ties of domestic affections, deterred him from continuing his journey. He retraced his steps, and was received by his family with open arms and tears of joy, for they had suffered bitter pangs of remorse for having permitted one so young to go out upon the world alone.

Short as was his journey, it gave him an opportunity of forming a just estimate of the kindness and true delicacy of feeling of which the heart of the Irish peasant is possessed, and to which he has often paid grateful tribute.

An interval of about three years now elapsed before he was enabled to continue his scholastic career. Being designed, as we have said, for the church, he was not expected to labour upon the farm like the common herd; indeed his friends would have considered it exceedingly derogatory to a young gentleman who could give them a Latin or Greek quotation, and plenty of high-flown English, to take a spade into his hands, or to follow the plough. His own distaste for such occupations often prompted him, simple-minded as he was, to play upon the ignorance of his relatives, and to purchase exemption from such uncongenial tasks by exaggerating his literary acquirements, and, in the spirit of one of his own heroes, Denis O'Shaughnessy, he would not only give them a verse from the Greek Testament, but would translate it for them, and, in so doing, paraphrase it to such an extent, that it would require the wisest of commentators to discover its true meaning, or to explain it satisfactorily to the uninitiated.

During these three years the greater portion of his time was given up to athletic sports of every description, in all which he is said to have excelled. But the death of his father, and the declining circumstances of the family awoke him to a sense of the duties he owed to himself and his struggling relatives. He now saw that the course he had been pursuing promised no ultimate success in the career designed for him; and on learning, about this time, that the Rev. Doctor Keenan, a Catholic clergyman, and a cousin of his own, had opened a classical school at Glasslough, he sought him out, told him of the ties of blood which subsisted between them, and was received with kindness into the establishment. Here he remained for two or three years, at the expiration of which time he was obliged once more to return to his family, in consequence of the school at Glasslough having been removed to Dundalk.

When about nineteen years of age he abandoned the design of entering the church. No longer withheld by religious scruples, he now freely took part in all the sports and enjoyments of the people. Not a fair, wedding, christening, wake, or any other of those social pastimes of the peasantry, took place for miles around, at which he was not present. It was at this time, doubtless, that his mind became impregnated with that marvellous store of knowledge of Irish character, which has been transferred to the pages of his works. In tracing his career the reader will see that few other Irish writers ever possessed the same opportunities of studying the peasantry that were presented to him. Being one of the people, he was permitted to mingle freely in the various scenes of peasant life—the secret still-house, the fairs and markets, and their faction feuds, in which the darker passions of the Irish betray themselves. All these things were caught up and vividly retained by his impressionable mind for after-illumination. He has held up to public blame the vices of the people—for where is the national heart without its stain?—but this he has done more in sorrow than in anger, and with the design that the moral which invariably accompanies these shadowings of their darker passions, may work in some degree the desired reformation. Wherever, then, there are extenuating circumstances he has urged them in their defence. To their piety, domestic affections, and many other virtues, as well as to their ready wit and humour, he has borne ample testimony.

That personal vanity, and even foppery, are sometimes associated with greatness of intellect, the history of England's noble poet sufficiently proves. The following anecdote will show that at one time of his life our author was not altogether free from these harmless blemishes. It was customary with him to start on a Saturday evening to an uncle's of his, who resided at some distance, and who had a family of four sons and two daughters, with whom he would remain for several days. These visits were always looked forward to by him and his worthy relatives with mutual pleasure. The girls were fine, blooming damsels, but some unaccountable desire, nevertheless, should seize upon them to imitate their fadest sisters of fashion, and to exaggerate the rich tint which nature had bestowed upon their cheeks, by a liberal application of carmine, or some such colouring matter. It so happened that this fact became known to one of their brothers while their cousin was with them, and to him the secret was forthwith communicated. Now, as the girls considered this carmine to be a beautifier of their complexions, these two stalwart young peasants did not see why they also should not profit by it, as a portion of it had fallen into their hands. Accordingly, on the following Sunday morning, they metaphorically "painted lily, and perfumed the rose," or, literally speaking, they painted the roses of their own ruddy complexions, and set out in a very delectable frame of mind, reflecting upon the advantages their heightened attractions would give them over their compeers, in the eyes of the country maidens. But outraged nature was resolved to be revenged, and called the elements to her aid. A heavy shower, accompanied by a strong wind, which blew the rain remorselessly into that side of their faces exposed to it, came down, washing away all trace of the carmine from one cheek only. Had this been all, the vengeance would have been incomplete, and the fact of their having been guilty of such an egregious piece of vanity might never have transpired, as any change or improvement made by the carmine existed principally if not altogether in their own imaginations. It being washed from their faces, however, it was transferred to their shirt collars, of which there was no dearth in those days, and, therefore, the broad streaks which embellished them, and which could be justly traced to their source, made known the disparaging truth. Every eye was fixed upon them, and many found it impossible to restrain their laughter at the ludicrous appearance they presented; but it was while on their way home that the full power of their raillery was let loose upon them, and had the effect of putting them to the blush much more successfully than ever did the carmine. The only persons present who remained silent were those guilty bouncing females who had introduced the pretentious usage into simple peasant life.

As he had relinquished the idea of entering the church, his only alternative now seemed to be to fall back upon the resources of his forefathers, and become a tiller of the earth for his daily bread. This ill accorded with the spirit of romance which was springing up within him, or with the vague ambitious desires which were gaining strength with his boyhood. When he could succeed in procuring one of these novels full of startling and exciting incidents, which were rife in those times, work, food, and all such mundane considerations were disregarded, and he would sit or lie the whole length of a long summer day, in a green meadow under some shady, wide-spreading tree, in a perfect elysium, tracing, perhaps, the heart-rending career of some youthful damsel piteously afflicted with beauty and ardent adorsers, or wrapt up in the relation of striking historical events. The classics, too, at this time, were closely studied—indeed it is principally to self-culture that he owes his education, as that which he acquired at school was very limited in comparison. Among the works of fiction which fell into his hands, was that relating to the adventures of the renowned Gil Blas. The history of this hero inspired him with so unconquerable a desire to mingle in more emotional scenes than those which his present life presented, that he left his home without any settled purpose, but with the inward conviction, inspired by hope and self-reliance, that he would succeed in working his way to independence, and gratify his desire for adventure, at the same time. He directed his steps to the parish of Killanny, in the county of Louth, the Catholic clergyman of which was nephew to his own parish priest. This clergyman's residence was close to the celebrated "Wild Goose Lodge," where, some months before, the fearful tragedy was enacted by which eleven persons were committed to the flames, through motives of personal vengeance. The circumstances connected with this hideous crime made a deep impression upon him, and formed the groundwork of one of his most powerful tales, which he has named after the scene of the tragedy. He has made this tale the medium of conveying friendly warning to the people of Ireland against Ribbonism, showing how many innocent and unsuspecting persons were drawn into its dark vortex of crime, and by its system of chance election to the most guilty offices, forced, in self-defence, to comply with its sanguinary laws. Like the terrible confederacy which had its origin in Westphalia, it was fatal to divulge its secrets, or to attempt to gain freedom from its destructive bonds.

Owing to the exertions of his friend the clergyman, our author was engaged as tutor in the family of a wealthy farmer named Piers Murphy, where he was supplied with board, lodging, and a rather limited salary; but, becoming dissatisfied, ere long, with the uncongenial task of mentally cultivating the young Murphys, and feeling that he was fitted for higher duties, he gave up his situation, and proceeded at once to the metropolis, which he entered with just two shillings and ninepence in his pocket. In the short space afforded in a memoir like this, we cannot trace him in his wanderings through the city in search of employment, with anything like minuteness. Various and oft-times ludicrous were the mistakes into which he fell, owing to his ignorance of life—especially of city life. The following circumstance is related as having occurred at this time.

Seeing, one day, an advertisement upon the window of a certain establishment, by which the public were informed that a person well skilled in the art of bird-stuffing was required, he entered, and addressing himself to one of the persons connected with it, offered his services.

"Are you quite sure you understand bird-stuffing thoroughly?" asked the individual applied to.

"Well, yes. I venture to say I do; I ought, at least, for I have seen a good deal of it at home in the country, and profited by it, too."

"And pray, what may be your method, my friend?" asked the taxidermist, who suspected he was committing a blunder, and thought he would amuse himself a little before he should have done with him.

"Why," replied our author, "the materials usually employed for stuffing fowl, in order to make them fat, are potatoes and oatmeal, and food of that description, forced down 'will ye nil ye.'"

"Ah, my friend," said the other, smiling, "that sort of rough usage would never do for our birds; it would ruffle their plumage so much that the public would have nothing to say to them. They must have a respectable outside or it would little matter what was within."

"Ah!" replied Carleton, "I knew that hypocrisy was very general, but I never thought it was resorted to in bird stuffing!"

Another time, when driven to extremity, he thought of enlisting, but being above taking the shilling in the ordinary way, he wrote a long letter to the colonel of the regiment into which he designed to enter, informing him of his intention, and the circumstances that were driving him to take such a step. This epistle, which was written in very excellent Latin, was replied to in a spirit of kindness, expressive of the writer's regret that a person capable of writing such a letter should be forced to enter the ranks. The reply contained also an earnest admonition not to do so if he could by any possibility avoid it, which admonition was accompanied by a more substantial proof of kindness that gave force to the advice, as it enabled him to follow it.

It was owing to his knowledge of classics that he ultimately procured employment in Dublin. A few tuitions in private families, supplied him with just enough to subsist on. It was in one of these families that he first met with Mrs. Carleton, who resided with her uncle, father to one of his pupils. Although his means were so limited at this time, he attended the theatres constantly, and often denied himself a meal to spare the shilling that would enable him to indulge in the mental luxury of witnessing the performance of some theatrical star of his day, as in former times he had forgotten the demands of nature over some old time imaginings, or striking page in history.

It was impossible that a man of genius such as his should long be regarded as an ordinary person. His natural superiority and his attainments, so remarkable in an individual in his position of life, soon attracted the attention of men of education and intelligence. The graphic power, the brilliant wit, and the extraordinary humour and thrilling pathos which appear in his works evinced themselves in his conversation, and more especially in his recitals of events in his past life. It was therefore suggested to him by one of his friends to write of those things which he described with so much force in conversation. The result was his débüt as a depicter of Irish life and character. His success was instantaneous, and in a short time he reached the zenith of his popularity. It was by no ordinary amount of application, however, that he arrived at that ease and perfection of style which mark even his earliest works. The conceptive powers of the brain are a free gift, but it requires energy and assiduity to perfect them.

He was now married, and an increasing family, as well as a desire for fame was urging him on. Those works which compose the volumes entitled "Traits and Stories of the Irish Peasantry," appeared in quick succession. He wrote with wonderful rapidity, for his mind was teeming with fact and imagery. His astonishing memory, too, yielded up its stores.

Distinction ever brings worshippers. His society was now eagerly sought by the higher classes of Dublin. Being of a social temperament, he found it impossible to resist the importunities of his friends, and was often obliged to sit up half the night to pursue his literary occupations in consequence of his remissness during the day. Among literary men, more especially, no convivial meeting was considered complete if Carleton were not present. In the full vigour of his intellect he must have contributed in no slight degree to the brilliancy of those assemblings. Superiority, however numerous its admirers, will always attract a certain degree of envy, and it was hinted by some, that although Carleton's sketches and short stories were admirable, it was more than probable he would fail if he attempted works which would call for greater inventive powers. He had other kind friends who did not fail to communicate those remarks to him, and in a very short time after, the work which is by many considered the master-piece of his genius, "Fardorougha, the Miser," the first of his novels, appeared, and those who had predicted his failure were silenced.

Carleton, on leaving the north, made, as he says himself, a solemn resolution never to return unless with a name that should reflect honour upon himself and the place of his nativity. About fifteen or sixteen years since he visited the north, and was received by all parties and creeds with a fervour of affectionate acclamation almost unparalleled. On market days crowds of the people of every creed and denomination assembled before his hotel windows to catch a sight of him. On those occasions he went out into the town, and it is scarcely necessary to say that he drew nearly two thirds of the market after him.

Such of our readers as have read the "Poor Scholar," will remember the character of "Yellow Sam." Now, Yellow Sam was the actual nickname affixed upon that person in consequence of his bilious complexion, which was almost the colour of saffron. He was the most detested and detestable land agent in all that country, and his nieces were very angry, and heartily abused Carleton for having gibbeted him with such terrific and relentless satire. But what is strange, his nephew, the late Captain Miller of Daisy Hill, a most perfect, liberal, and honourable gentleman, had Carleton a frequent and welcome guest at his hospitable table. Dr. M'Nally, the present Catholic Bishop of Clogher, remarkable alike for his piety and his learning, also had him as his frequent guest. Gentry and peasantry received him with proud enthusiasm, negativing in this case the aphorism, which says that a prophet is without honour in his own country.

Many of Carleton's works have been translated into French and German. He has been told that some of them are translated into Italian, but of this he is not certain. A French version has recently appeared from the pen of the accomplished Leon De Wailly, under the auspices of Dentu, the bookseller and publisher who lives near the Palais Royale. "Valentine M'Clutchy" was translated into French fourteen years ago.

In private affairs Mr. Carleton is an indolent man, and very negligent of his own interests. His friends saw this, and came to the resolution of forming themselves into a committee, which they did, and held several meetings upon the subject of procuring him a pension. Two honorary secretaries were appointed. One of them was Stewart Blacker, Esq., nephew to the late Colonel Blacker, the author of that most spirited piece called "Oliver's Advice." It was

Stewart Blacker who established the first Art Union in Ireland. In the true spirit of friendship and generosity, he applied himself to carrying out the design to benefit Carleton, when a pension of two hundred a year was granted in compliance with the request of the memorialists. No person out of Carleton's own family rejoiced more than he, at the success of the undertaking, in which he had himself so powerfully aided. The other honorary secretary was Thomas O'Hagan, the present Attorney-General, who omitted no exertions to promote Carleton's interests, as indeed did all the most distinguished and influential Irishmen and women of every creed and party. It was said that a memorial so numerous and respectfully signed never was presented to a British minister. First on the list was the name of Lord Charlemont, who said: "Well, I never thought I should ask a favour from any government; but I look upon this not as an act of favour, but an act of justice." The late Maria Edgeworth, not satisfied with merely signing her name, suggested that if it were possible the memorial itself might be transmitted to her, and she requested that, if it were not too late, a space at the foot of it should be kept to enable her to give expression to her sentiments with respect to him. The memorial was immediately sent to her, and she wrote at the bottom of it as follows: "I have read all the works which Carleton has yet written, and I must confess that I never knew Irish life until I had read them. I have but little space to write what I wish to say; but my fervent desire is that Lord John Russell will take into earnest consideration the claims of this great but neglected man of genius."

For many years Carleton has given up society, and confined himself to the retirement of his own family circle. The Edinburgh Review of October, 1852, speaking of him, says:

"It is among the peasantry that Mr. Carleton is truly at home. He tries other characters, rarely, however, and not unsuccessfully. But the Irish peasant is his strong point: here he is unrivalled, and writes like one who has had nothing to look out for, to collect by study, to select, to mould; who merely utters what comes spontaneously into his thoughts; from whom the language and sentiments flow as easily and naturally as articulate sounds from the human lips, or music from the skylark. Those who have in early life dwelt among the peasantry, and since forgotten that period in other and busier scenes of existence, meet again, in the pages of Carleton, the living personages of long past days, like friends returned from distant lands after an absence of many years."

"The primary and essential value of Mr. Carleton's sketches of Irish peasant life and character unquestionably consists in this—that they are true, and so true to nature; but it is enhanced by a circumstance similar to that recently recorded and lamented by Lord Cockburn in reference to Scotland. The living originals are disappearing; some of them have already disappeared. In Ireland, since our author's youth, changes, rapid and deep, have taken place, which, according to diversity of prejudice, and of the other causes that generate diversity of opinions, will be referred to different sources, and be brought to illustrate different political and social theories. Unless another master-hand should soon appear like his, it is in his pages, and in his alone, that future generations must look for the truest and fullest pictures of those who will ere long have passed away from that troubled land, from the records of history, and from the memory of men for ever * * * That field," adds the Edinburgh Review, alluding to Irish literature, "in which he stands without an equal among the living or the dead."

DRAUGHTS—The game of Draughts is to Chess what Arithmetic is to Algebra. Antiquarians are not quite agreed, however, whether Draughts is the elder or younger brother; and while some are inclined to support the former proposition, based, among others, upon the ground that the savage tribes of the interior of New Zealand were found to be playing the game, others assert, on etymological basis, that Draughts is nothing but an offshoot of Chess. It is the Chess of ladies, they say. True it is, no doubt, that in nearly all European languages Draughts is called the "Game of Ladies." With the French it is the "jeu des dames;" the Germans, "Damenspiel;" the Italians, "il giuoco delle dame;" the Portuguese, "o jogo das damas;" and so forth. In Gaelic there is but one word, "Taileag," both for Chess and Draughts; and the Scotch call the Draught-board a "dam-brod," evidently from the German "Damenbrett," or ladies' board.

AMONGST ODD PEOPLE.

URING my chequered career I have read somewhere, without entirely understanding it, the theory of vegetable circles. I found it explained, in the book which puzzled me, as the distribution and limitation of positive species of plants, within certain defined boundaries. A palm, the book affirmed, had its own circle—a sort of prescribed fireplace, at which it spread out its hands and warmed itself; and even mosses unable though they be, or fronds and antennae or localities. It was further to be understood, by the all the denizens of those circles were related, nexions appeared rather me, by family analogies and that nature had so ordered this arrangement who travel abroad never missing up a date-tree in Lapland or a Kerry Pippin in Japan. Though, as I have candidly admitted, I do not comprehend the details of this pretty theory as much as I could wish, still I did not fail to see that it is rich in advantages, which might, with some propriety and no little profit, be extended to the great human family, of which you and I, and the Marquis Ducobé, as well as John, the baker's carman, are members in common. The crab and shrimp, the scavengers of the sea, decline to live on visiting terms with the more fastidious cod and dolphin. Oysters have their own beds and pleasure grounds, where they resent all intrusions of the ill-bred cockle. Why should not we be influenced by the same wise laws of distribution, the same economy of space and classification of rank, taste, and passion—why?

I suppose it will be readily conceded that a large share of our daily unhappiness arises from the constant and inevitable contact of opposite dispositions. Let us take a case in point. I travel down to Drogheda by the mail train, with Jones and his portmanteau, and, feeling the confined air hot and oppressive, let down the window. It is a hundred to one that Jones will indignantly remonstrate, and, shivering, through all his rugs and wrappers, peremptorily demand that the window shall be drawn up. This is a wholesome illustration of the hardship of being confined within the same circle with a gentleman whose temperament and constitution are as different from mine as a sixpenny piece from a tornado. If the window is down his teeth chatter dreadfully in the fresh draughts; if the window is up, I am a victim to headache, sore throat, and incipient dyspepsia. A gentleman of my acquaintance once happened to get into the same carriage with Jones, on the line to Howth. The latter insisted that the window should be closed; and my friend, who loved fresh air too much to sacrifice it to a consideration, tilted his umbrella through the glass, to the tune of seventeen and eight-pence! How much pleasanter it would have been had nature subjected the human species to the circular arrangement—located my friend near the northern edge of the temperate zone, and sent Jones to bask in the tropics. Under such intelligent conditions (I borrow the phrase from the book I could not understand), Jones might have enjoyed a reputation for courtesy and self-denial; and his companion been saved the expenditure of seventeen and eight-pence.

It will be observed, I trust, in the instance quoted, that the repellent instincts of the Jones and gentlemanly natures were strictly physical. They emanated from irritated skin surfaces, operating on sensitive nerve organs, and had little or no sympathy with the intelligent powers. It is when these latter agencies, or seats of agencies, come into collision, that benign tempers explode, and hiss and sparkle. I refer to a case in point:—This is Mr. Smith's holiday. He has been looking forward to it, over the counter and through the opposite houses, all the way up to Rathmines, for a round month. Mrs. Smith, too, has had her eye on it, but that organ has been turned in the direction of Grafton Street, and along the several short cuts to the right of that thoroughfare. The happy morning has arrived, and the lady, looking at Mr. Smith across the breakfast-cloth, asks if he has yet made up his mind. "Where shall we go?" asks Mrs. Smith with nervous energy. "Go! my dear," returns Mr. Smith, "why where should we go—where do holiday folk always go—where do foreigners fresh from Dublin go—where?" Suddenly the adverbial link is rudely broken by Mrs. Smith, who, resting her elbows on the table, with a cup to her lips, placidly inquires—"Yes, dear, where do they go?" "No where but to the Botanic Gardens," replies Mr. Smith, with a strong effort to look placid. Now the lady has an idea, which, I am sorry to think is the common property of a numerous body of my readers, that the Botanic Gardens are a vulgar place on holidays, because thrifty mechanics, and even intelligent costermongers, take their wives and children there. It behoves a grocer's wife, Mrs. Smith thinks, to be chary of her position in society, and to draw the line of non-association as high as her rank will tolerate. She is possessed with the notion that the Museum of the Royal Dublin Society is a very genteel place, and has set her heart upon mummies, saurians, and odd marbles. To Howth she will not go; for the Museum and its marvels Mr. Smith cares little. The morning has been wasted in idle altercations, the evening follows, with sulks and silence, and the night is embittered by the thought that a pleasant day has been lost for ever. Mr. Smith asserts, through the perverse temper of his wife; Mrs. Smith declares, through the coarse tastes of her husband. I want to know if it would not have been much pleasanter had Mr. and Mrs. Smith, at the start, been born in congenial circles, in which one could go on for ever, poking dead Egyptians, and the other indulge in glass-blowing and botany. Such a system should indubitably, (the word is not mine, but I like the ring of it,) secure equanimity of temper, a balanced ebb and flow of spirits, an observance of holidays, and the abolition of domestic feuds.

But, if you wish for a touching example of the miseries which must attend a solidarity of opposite dispositions, step up with me any evening of the week, between ten and eleven o'clock, to Briar-root Terrace, Drumcondra. I say "any evening of the week," for accuracy sake, as the house does not afford the example on Sunday, being solely occupied on the Sabbath by a maid of advanced years and a contemplative tortoiseshell, who were positively born within the same circle, judging from the tenderness and confidence which control their intercourse. In the front drawing-room of the house, No. 54, there assemble every evening three ladies and three gentlemen. When I tell you that two of the ladies wear blue spectacles, and that the third promenades Sackville-street twice a day, in a green eye-shade; when I state that one gentleman carries a snuff-box presented to him (vide the inscription) fifty-seven years ago; that a second gentleman largely depends on bolstered crutches; and that a third carries a wooden arm in a cloth sleeve, you need no assurance that they do not meet to flirt, to sigh, to ogle, and mix toes under the mahogany. Benevolence is the magnet which attracts together the little group, evening after evening, around the polished table and under the sparkling chandelier of the front drawing-room in Briar-root Terrace. They examine books, docket accounts, disburse grants to the indigent, and draw up appeals, as the job-printers say, "with neatness and dispatch." I must be just, and admit that they get on with tolerable good humour and forbearance. But, once the minutes are signed, and the secretary retires, each individual relapses into his or her special idiosyncrasy. To understand this, you must know the six benevolents differ so largely in disposition, in method of observation, and description, that if there were no poor in the world, by no possibility could they agree on the same topic.

Captain Scarr, the gentleman on the crutches, is a specimen, and a very rare specimen indeed, of a sailor. He has been all over the world, and registered soundings in every latitude between the poles. He talks of Greenland villages and Turkish cemeteries as you might talk of Sandymount or Clontarf. His watch-peg is the carved tooth of an Esquimaux dog, and his tea-slippers were made of the skin of a platypus, caught on an island of unmentionable name, in a very indefinite part of Oceanica. The captain's idiosyncrasy is a deadly horror of tea. Sitting with his back to the windows, his great shoulders thrown out in monstrous relief against the crimson curtains, you may see his square forehead leap into fifty wrinkles as he hisses, "Say what you like, indulge it as you may, indulge it as you wish, I hate tea! Ladies and gentlemen, I do hate tea! It is effeminate; it makes women nervous and men foolish. Bah!" It is generally understood that the final bleat is intended to represent a vast quantity of expressionless invective. When the captain has finished, (and this is his usual way of concluding,) every body looks at every body, and exclamations of horror circulate freely. In pecuniary matters, it is but fair to mention, Captain Scarr is liberal to a fault. His wife drives a handsome britzka, and her jewellery would command reverence, should it ever go, in the capacity of hostage, to Donegan's. She enjoys every rational luxury but one—the anathemised tea. I have been told, in confidence, by Miss Paletip, that the captain, suspecting Mrs. Scarr of drinking it in his absence, adopted the following plan to test his suspicions. On quitting home every morning, for his "four-miler," he carefully imprisoned a fly in the only teapot in his establishment—retained solely because of its sanctity as a family heirloom. On his return, he lifted the lid and released the captive. The insect was never missed, "for," adds my informant, "Mrs. Scarr quickly discovered the cruel expedient, and always kept a fly ready."

That gentleman, with the wooden arm in the cloth sleeve, is Mr. Sylvester Buckler. He sees Miss Paletip home every evening, uniformly insisting on her taking his wooden arm, which that little woman bears along the street as a lamplighter carries his ladder. They quarrel all the way, for he objects to crinoline, and she retorts with a commentary on the vanity of having a stick stuck in one's side, as if the wearer were a beer barrel or a roast gigot. Then, he hates Captain Scarr, and declares that people who are unable to support themselves have no right to assist others. "I hate every body," remarks Mr. Buckler; "come on." Jilted in early life, by "a wicked little sneak," (so he designates his first love,) Mr. Buckler went abroad, and buried his disappointed passion in the north of Madagascar. Whilst cruising about Cape Maltie, in a squadron of observation, his vessel was attacked by pirates, and, being cut off from the rest of the expedition, he and his companions were made prisoners, and carried to a villanous stronghold, on the west of the island. Efforts were made by his friends to ransom him, and the sum demanded by his captors having been paid, he was offered his liberty on one condition, "You shall visit us once every year, Inglese," said the pirate, "a lofty man," observes Mr. Buckler, "with long whiskers, a very Dutch face, and pistols in his girdle!"

"Was he a corsair?" asks Miss Paletip, nervously.

"Perhaps 'twas the Flying Dutchman," growls Captain Scarr. "He knows them latitudes, he does."

"Or it might have been Lara," suggests Miss Paletip.

"Lara!" ejaculates the captain, contemptuously. "Lara! who the deuce is Lara?"

"I said I should be most happy," continues Mr. Buckler, not heeding the interruption. "'Then,' he said, 'we shall require this as a hostage for your good faith,' and he touched my arm. 'This,' said the ruffian, 'will make a fine fetish to keep away the devil.' I shivered, but there was no use in grumbling. The limb was chopped off with a sabre, and the stump was dressed by a native with a ligature of date-leaf. I was set at liberty."

"Did you ever go back for your arm?" asks Miss Trumain, with a little shiver.

"No, madam; but I regret that I didn't. I have seen almost every phase of life between Madagascar and Drumcondra, and I pronounce in favour of the modest and least polished. Ladies and gentlemen, spare your smiles, and pay homage to reason. In savage life we suffer none of the inconveniences which make civilisation a bore, and convert your best society into a bedlam, repressed by the action of cold-baths and strait jackets. They smoke, dance, tattoo their bodies, decorate their noses with bones, and hang fish-skeletons in their ears, all for nothing. We paint, but the rouge costs half-a-crown a pot—"

"A small pot only costs two shillings," smartly observes Miss Paletip, with unhappy ingenueness.

"Ugh!" exclaimed Scarr—"ugh! Then you've been to market, it seems. Now, what would a four-shilling pot cost?"

Here the laugh is turned against the captain, who indignantly demands to know the company's motive for "grinning so."

"We dance," continues Mr. Buckler, "at three guineas a quarter, besides pumps. We bejewel ourselves at five guineas an ounce, except people choose to wear paste and pinchbeck," then the speaker glances significantly at the captain's shirt studs. Scarr, failing to see the allusion, looks at them too, and contents himself with asking:

"Not your's—are they?"

"As for fish skeletons, the ladies will tell you they're not to be had for nothing," adds Mr. Buckler. "And only fancy the absurdity of a woman going about with a bundle of bones in her skirts—all ribs like an unsheathed three-decker—why the poorest Madagascar squaw would refuse to go abroad, her person lashed together with the remains of a defunct whale. Ah, how that makes the women glare! Glare away, old girls! As for me, I cry hurrah for a savage life, and nine pair of thick lips to call me pappy! Whew!"

During the delivery of this philippic, the wrath of the ladies gradually increases, until it culminates in a simultaneous expression of "disgusting." Miss Paletip eyes the speaker aghast, and turning her back to him, fidgets spitefully with her mittens.

"Sir," cries Captain Scarr, "you rail against the vices of civilisation; pray, how was your pet pirate dressed?"

"Coolly enough," replies Mr. Buckler. "He wore an odd Wellington boot, and a cocked-hat."

"You shocking man!" cries Mrs. Slink—"you shocking man!"

Mr. Slater thinks the gentleman has gone mad; premonitory grumbings of a coming explosion, issue from the deep chest of the Captain. Bless my heart, what miserable bitterness! And all through the lack of a circular arrangement.

Poor Miss Paletip! she is a little morsel of an Englishwoman, with a small, placid, expressionless type of face, which is so common in the grand quarters of London. Her hair, which is of an ashen hue, is tortured into four attenuated curls, disposed with melancholy grace alongside her sad cheeks. Her complexion is that of a bibulous water-melon; and her voice is sharp enough to slice it. Crinoline had raged in the fashionable world better than three years before the little woman would consent to wear it; for so conservative are her ideas of dress, that she deemed it her duty to apologise the other evening for appearing in a Swiss band and a sugar-plum hairnet. She still wears rosettes on her slippers, and tassels to her stockings with black silk sandals; and it is her invariable rule, when going out, to carry an apron, a pair of scissors, a needle case, and a black and white spool, in her reticule. She hates the modern novels, and clings with romantic fidelity to Mrs. Radcliffe, Jane Porter, and Monk Lewis. Her educational tendencies are strong, and her arguments in favour of cultivating the minds of the masses, are conscientiously accompanied by illustrations of the imperfections to which her own is subject. Of her age we all entertain different opinions, and I must admit that the lady never disturbed herself in the capacity of judge of our disputes on that delicate topic.

"Were you ever in love, Miss Paletip?" says Captain Scarr, fiddling with the snuff-dish.

"Well, not to say in love as is depicted in romance," replies the lady. "But I do confess that I got rather goodish sentimental about concerning one or two individuals which was somehow fascinating, and which I rejected, because as they required education. 'Education,' I says, 'is the food of millions, and are the hope of humanity.' I once knew a young gentleman which played divine on the concertina, and took in the latter days of his decline to a hair-lip. His forehead were elevated, so high; and auburned his hair. He smoked dreadful, and spent alarming figures on meerschaum and other sorts of tobacco. When I first did make his acquaintance, my eyes were closed to his intellectual deficiencies; and I took him, as it might be, for an Apollon. Love, as the poet says, is blind; and, in my opinion, should have been sent long ago to the asylum. Never did my eyes open until one day, which is ever alive to remembrance. We used to go to the Round Church, as is burned down now. Now, sitting, as it was, in the one pew, and reading from the one common-prayer book. Heighho! One day, as the sexton comes round with the plate, he says to me (which aint the sexton but the youthful individual), 'Clara Maria,' he says, out aloud, raising his index finger, which were the fore 'un, to my bonnet. 'Clara Maria!' he cries. 'Charles Albert Smith,' I makes reply, 'what can you mean? Do you take,' says I, with lady-like coolness, 'my bonnet for a mousetrap, or is there a cobweb in my feathers?' 'Clara Maria,' he makes answer, 'it is far, far more serious, which,' he says, 'is a'—and here he mentioned the insect from which is detracted the verb 'to flee'—'which,' he says, 'is a-hopping over your artificials. There it goes,' he cried, 'a skylarking amongst your fuschias;' and, suiting the action to the word, he makes a snatch at my bonnet, and looking in the palm of his hand, exclaims—'I have him.' Of course I faints, and falls on the sexton's plate, a-scattering the copper and three-penny bits, which were silver. I arises, bruised but not broken, and, with a beating heart, says to him—'Charles Albert Smith, the schoolmaster is abroad, like a roaring lion,' I says, 'seeking whom he may educate. Go,' I adds, 'and seek him. As for me, your brutal conduct, the result of no education, has trepanned you for ever,' I says, 'of my addresses.' 'Clara Maria,' he replies, as cool as a sherry cobbler, 'go be hanged! I contracted,' he says, 'to see you to church, but I had no idea that I was escorting a bee into the bargain.' I retired overwhelmed, not noticing in the least his insolent protestations. 'And therefore it is,' say I, 'educate the people; give them food—mental food as will refine them. For me, I hates young men without learning; and I never could forgive Eliza Seabright for encouraging the ungrammatical, not to say unpolite, addresses of her husband.'

On the moral climax in which Miss Paletip's discourse culminates, the company split up; and then ensues an uproarious discussion on the merits of young men, "educated" or otherwise, in which every one opposes the bitter little woman. Goodness me! how I long for the circle arrangement.

Look at Mrs. Broadgear, relict of a retired tax collector, a lady of few words and abundant grievances. She abhors talk, and never opens her mouth in company to enunciate more than a "yes" or "no," or "very well;" she wears false teeth, and has a weakness for silvered poplins. She has a critical passion (only indulged at home) for comparing people's feet. On one occasion she is reported to have said that her Balmorals were an inch too long for her. "Bless me!" says Captain Scarr, "that woman never opens her mouth but she puts her foot in it!" Don't we hate her!

Do you remember the story of the Arabian voyager who was shipwrecked on an island in which the people were all petrified, and no voice arose from the numbrless cities that studded the land? Why should not Mrs. Broadgear have been born in that circle, and mated eternally with congenial companions? Why?

For my own part I hate Mr. Stephen Slater, the great temperance orator. Mr. Slater is an Irishman, and so am I; yet my ill nature gets the better of my nationality, when I hear that man roar like a first cousin of Athenian Bottom. "Cold water, give me cold water!" roars Slater. "I love it, and it loves me in return."

"Curse cold water," exclaims Captain Scarr. "Why, your doctrine would make every man and woman a walking reservoir!"

"Well for them they were, sir," replies Slater. "Well for them they were. Sir, I was suckled on cold water, reared on cold water, educated on cold water, and —"

"Do you hear him," cries Miss Paletip. "Does he mean he was nursed on Dublin milk, I wonder?"

Slater gets excited.

"Dear it is," he cries, springing from his seat, and waving his hand around his head. "Dear it is to die for native land, or as the Latin poet has gracefully expressed it—Arma virumque cano qui primus.' But dearer still, (melior) to die in the cause of temperance. Be mine that fate—Non est disputandum—and when I die (moriunt) and am buried on an Irish hill, with the daisies at my heels—arbor crescit,—and the oak o'er my head, the milkmaid as she trips past in the morning, balancing her pail upon her head (ex imo pectore,—and the mower as he returns in the evening, shall pause by my grave—(hic jacet,)—and exclaim, whilst the dew is falling around, and the stars begin to twinkle on the heavenly battlements—(ad fresco)—'Here lies the young hero who laid down his life for temperance—here lies the patriarch of his country.'

Of course we all laugh loudly at Mr. Slater's eloquence, and of course Mr. Slater exhibits deep disgust, and alludes to the rejection of prophets in their own country.

To give you anything like an honest description of our six or seven odd people would occupy more space than I have a right to. I must close by exclaiming—"Why don't we have the circle arrangement?—why don't we have it?"

CÆVIARE.

A TIMELY ARRIVAL.

It was in the month of October, 18—(but why be too particular as to dates?)—that business or pleasure—or rather a combination of both—called me into the neighbourhood of —, within a few miles of Westport; for, understand, reader, that I am by profession a lawyer, or, in more respectful language, an attorney; and you know that an attorney must not be over-scrupulous as to the journeys he performs—though sometimes his mission is not of the most agreeable kind. But business is at the root of it, and pleasure is the fruit which springs from it; for if I am employed to legalise a death-bed confession, do I not receive a heavy per centage on every word that is uttered? Hence I say, that the object of my visit to — was a combination of business and pleasure; but it is not to be inferred from this observation that on the occasion alluded to I had been engaged—no, “instructed” is the proper legal phrase—to take down a death-bed confession. My attention was directed to a much more agreeable purpose; and without further preface, I at once avow that the reason of my being summoned to the village of — was that I might prepare a marriage-contract between a young squire in the neighbourhood and the daughter of a poor clergyman in a distant county.

It was late at night when I arrived at my destination; but having previously written to the landlord of the inn, at which I intended to stay, giving him notice of my advent, I found the necessary preparation had been made for my reception, and the host welcomed me with genial good humour—not a cloud upon his brow to disturb his wonted serenity, and nothing in his manner to indicate that he was displeased or discomfited by being kept from his bed far beyond his usual hour for retiring.

Peter Moylan, the name of mine host, formerly held the responsible appointment of boots at a large hotel in the south of Ireland, where, by his punctual attention to business, and his persevering determination to make others punctual, he rose high in the estimation of the travelling community, and his name became a topic of conversation amongst people who had stories to tell, and who wanted a convenient stalking-horse for a comic anecdote or an absurd adventure. Peter's great peculiarity, as I have already hinted, was an overpowering sense of the sacred necessity for punctuality in all the concerns of life, and many of the most amusing events connected with his name had their origin in this very laudable but equally uncommon speciality. If a gentleman gave instructions to be called at an unusually early hour in the morning, he might safely forget to wind his watch up, for at the very moment fixed upon for the tap at the door, Peter would unceremoniously walk into the room, and persistently remain until the would-be riser had jumped out of bed, and commenced the first stage of his toilet. It was in vain to say to Peter, “All right!” “What o'clock is it?” “Come again in ten minutes,” or to make any of the numerous convenient excuses for not getting up at the time which, on the previous night, had been impressed upon Peter as of such paramount importance that his inattention to it would be subversive of the entire commercial interests of the kingdom. “No, no,” thought Peter, “I am not going to be dragged out of bed (did he ever go to bed?) at these hours for nothing. If there is to be a ‘fool for his pains,’ it shall be the callee, not the caller.” If Peter had received orders to prepare a traveller's luggage in time for a certain train, it was needless for the traveller to say he would “go by the next train.” Bag and baggage were all packed and comfortably stowed away on the roof of the omnibus, and the wavering passenger was thrust into the interior without even paying his bill, which Peter knew would be duly honored at the railway station, and (but this was no part of Peter's reflections), much more to his personal advantage, than if the account had been deliberately scrutinized and settled before the moment of departure. This species of philosophy influenced Peter Moylan in all his movements, and hence he did that which many an unsuccessful man could also do if he would only follow his example; that is to say, he contrived to accumulate a sum of money, sufficient to enable him to transform himself from the grub-like condition of boots to the butterfly condition of landlord. To this purpose he very prudently devoted a portion of his well-earned gains, and having (notwithstanding his habitual activity), amassed a tolerable amount of flesh, as well as specie, he became the burly, good-tempered, well-to-do landlord of the best village inn which, according to my experience, Ireland can boast.

I had told him of my mission to the village, and, faithful to his long-tried trust, he promised to call me early in the morning, so that I might reach the house, to which I was on business bound, at the hour I had appointed. Ensnconed in my bed-room, I was looking through a bundle of letters which were essential to the legal duty I had to discharge, when I saw the reflection of a light under the door-way, but supposing it to indicate nothing more than that my friend Moylan was about to retire, I paid little attention to it. Some few minutes afterwards, however, I heard the sound of voices, and then I naturally concluded that, late as it was, a customer had arrived, and that Peter, with his wonted good-nature, could not refuse him admittance. This proved to be the case, but I was not at all prepared for the sort of personage the new-comer turned out to be. I thought he must be some intimate acquaintance of Peter's, or, probably, one of the neighbouring gentry, who, not wishing to disturb his own household at a time when all were, doubtless, buried in sleep, had (which is by no means uncommon in many parts of the country) sought shelter under Moylan's hospitable and comfortable roof. But at length I found, from the tones of the voices in which a conversation was being carried on between mine host and his visitor, that I was evidently mistaken in these suppositions, and I was induced to descend into the kitchen, whence, it seemed, the sounds I had heard proceeded. I then discovered Peter dispensing the honours of the table to a poor, emaciated mendicant, who looked as if he had just escaped from a neglected workhouse, and whose general appearance, unprepossessing as it was, was certainly suggestive of poverty rather than crime; though many a man with a heart less open to melting charity than Peter's, would too gladly have formed the opposite conclusion, as the most convenient excuse for refusing to satisfy a claimant's wants. Peter's “customer” had evidently suffered much from starvation, and the worthy landlord was now showing him as much attention as if he were really a most desirable visitor, with abundant means to liquidate his bill in the morning.

“Poor devil!” said Peter, taking me aside, “he told me such a piteous tale, and he reminded me so strongly of a man I knew well when my position was not what it is now, that I hadn't the heart to turn him away. I have given him his supper, and I will now prepare a bed for him. There is a comfortable sofa in the little room yonder, and he can sleep there.”

“I am too much distressed in mind to sleep any where,” said the mendicant (for such he appeared to be), but I can rest my weary limbs, and thank you for your Christian hospitality.”

Feeling somewhat interested in his dejected manner, and being fully convinced that he was a man who had “seen better days,” I endeavoured to draw him into conversation, Peter Moylan coming to my assistance, whenever he found that his local knowledge would be of avail in gathering information. Not to dwell minutely on particulars, I soon discovered that some few years previously the man whose brief history had thus unexpectedly come under my notice, had been apprenticed on board a vessel trading to the West Indies. He continued in that service for a considerable time, until at length the owner of the vessel disposed of all his ships, with the exception of two or three colliers, and he was compelled to take up his position in one of those grimy traders, rather than return to his parents, who he knew had not the means of supporting him. He had endured this humiliating life as long as his nature permitted him; but at last a quarrel with his captain, who was a coarse, overbearing, uncompromising north-country man, induced him to run away from the ship, and seek more congenial employment on shore. While in the West Indies he made the acquaintance of a family, in whose establishment dwelt an interesting young woman as governess, and when he found that she was a native of the same country as himself, he sought every opportunity which his occasional absence from duty afforded him, of seeking her society, and exchanging such sentiments with her as appeared to be warranted by national feeling, ripening by degrees into something more than friendship. He, however, discovered, rather to his relief than otherwise (for it was utterly out of his power to become the master of a conjugal home), that the lady was married, and had left her husband, in consequence of the ill treatment to which he had subjected her. But she expressed her intention to return in course of time, if not to her husband's dwelling, at least to the neighbourhood where he lived, in order that she might gain some particulars regarding his mode of life, and ascertain whether his heart had become softened towards her. She had given him an address where it was likely he would meet with her, and he had never seen or heard of her since. On leaving his ship he discovered that he was not very far from the locality which the lady had indicated; and his first determination was to ascertain whether she was to be found there. The few shillings he had in his pocket at the time, he had husbanded to the best of his very questionable skill in such matters; but his little exchequer was soon exhausted, and he had now been two days without food—a painful position for one whose family, though poor, was respectable. I observed at this moment a tear trickling down his care-worn cheek, and upon my questioning him in regard to his family, he told me that he had a sister to whom he was very deeply attached, and the thought of whom caused his mind to wander back to scenes of home, when his now chequered life was free from care or pain.

Instigated by that species of curiosity which prompts a reader to hasten to the end of a story he has eagerly commenced, I inquired of the stranger whether he had any objection to tell me his name? Having, I said, met him under circumstances of so peculiar a nature, I felt a desire to know more of him; for though I was too well aware that vagrants have generally an ingenious story through which they seek to win favour from the almsgiving public, I was equally certain that, in the present instance, the unfortunate wanderer was not practising deception.

His name, he replied, was Walter Butler, and his father was curate of—, in the county—.

"Gracious Heaven!" I exclaimed, almost involuntarily, "and are you the son of the Rev. Mark Butler, whose daughter is about to be married to a rich young squire in this neighbourhood?"

"My father," said he, "is the Rev. Mark Butler; but whether my sister has contracted a matrimonial engagement I am unable to say. Dear girl! it is many years since I last saw her; and I trust most sincerely that, if she has pledged her hand, she has not done so to one whose chief recommendation has been the possession of wealth. She is, or at least was, too gentle for the society of the great—too conscious of her own humility to attempt to shine amongst the refined luminaries of fashion."

"The identity of your father being established," said I, "there cannot be a doubt as to that of your sister. From all that I have learned, her disposition is precisely such as you have faintly shadowed; but nevertheless, she is about to become the wife of the heir to one of the best estates in this part of the country; and it happens that I am called upon to execute the marriage-contract to-morrow morning."

"For worlds," said he, "I would not that my sister should marry beyond her own sphere; but doubtless my father has taken care that she should not bestow her hand upon one who is not in every way worthy of her heart. May I ask who is the object of her choice, or rather who is it that has adopted her as his choice?"

"I have both names here," I replied, referring to my pocket-book.—"The bridegroom is to be Gerald Fitzmaurice; the bride, Emily Butler."

"What!" he exclaimed, with a degree of emphasis which his exhausted condition scarcely permitted him to employ. "Gerald Fitzmaurice, of Kilmornan Grange?"

"The same," said I. "Whence comes it that the mention of his name has produced such an effect upon you?"

"Villain!" exclaimed Walter Butler, "and would he sacrifice the affections of one who had placed her existence in his hands?"

It is indeed a happy intervention of Providence which has brought me here at this moment."

"What mean you, Mr. Butler?" said I, unable to conceive the cause of such unexpectedly violent language.

"I mean," he replied, "that Gerald Fitzmaurice is a wretch of the deepest dye; and I thank Heaven that an opportunity has been afforded me of exposing him in time to save my sister from destruction!"

"How?" said I. "Destruction! Pray, explain."

"He is already married," he exclaimed, tottering towards the window, and looking out upon the shining moon. "Aided by yon silver beam," he added, after a moment's reflection, "I will at once proceed, weak and debilitated as I am, to his residence, and unmask his treachery before another night hushes him to rest."

"Good sir, do not be so rash, but remain here till the morning," said Peter Moylan, who had not hitherto joined in the conversation, but who, seeing the desire on the part of his mysterious visitor to go forth into the high road in the dead of night, thought it his duty, as a good Samaritan, to prevent his adopting so unwise a proceeding.

"But," said Butler, resuming his seat, "why has he chosen my sister—dear Emily—as the victim of his treachery?"

"Are you sure he is married?" I inquired.

"Let us hope he is mistaken," said Peter Moylan. "The world was never yet so bad as it has been painted."

"I am not mistaken," said Butler; "Gerald Fitzmaurice is a married man, and his wife is the identical lady I met in the West Indies. I believe her to be in this country at the present moment, and I was making my way towards the address she had given me, when a light through this window tempted me to seek refuge for the night."

"This is most important information," I remarked, "and as a lawyer, it is my duty to sift it to the bottom, in order that I may show the strongest grounds for declining to execute a marriage-contract between these two parties."

"At present," exclaimed Butler, "I can say no more; but I have already told you enough; and, with your permission, I will now follow the good landlord's advice, and endeavour to get a few hours' rest."

"That's right," said Moylan; "you may, perhaps, be able to see the lady from the West Indies in the morning, and in that case, this legal gentleman can satisfy any doubts he may entertain."

No further persuasion was necessary to cause us to separate for the night; and in the morning I accompanied Walter Butler, at his own request, to the spot he had described as the residence of the lady, who, he confidently assured me, was the lawful wife of Gerald Fitzmaurice.

It was too true; for the lady had returned to this country, and seemed overjoyed to see her old acquaintance Walter Butler, who at once explained that I had come into the district to draw up a marriage-contract between her husband and his sister.

"Heaven be thanked!" said she, "that he has not been allowed to add this last act to the injuries he has already inflicted upon me."

The cruelty of Fitzmaurice being thus revealed and established, I supplied Walter Butler with the means of journeying homewards; and as for myself, instead of executing a marriage-contract, I could not but meditate upon the singular dispensation of fate, by which the charitable conduct of Peter Moylan had been the medium of averting so much intended evil.

OLD BARRACK BRIDGE.

PRIOR to the erection of the present iron bridge over the Liffey, connecting Ellis's-quay and Usher's-island, which was opened for traffic during the recent visit of the Queen to Dublin, when it received the name of "Victoria Bridge," the river here was spanned by a structure properly called "Barrack-bridge," but more popularly known as the "Bloody-bridge." It was originally of wood, and was built in the year 1670, but being found, according to Harris, to interfere with the interest in a ferry which had previously plied in the same locality, a number of the city apprentices assembled riotously, for the purpose of destroying the new erection. Twenty of them were seized and committed to the Castle, but as a military guard was conveying them to Bridewell, they were rescued, and four of their number killed in the fray, from which accident it acquired the name of the "Bloody-bridge." Shortly after this occurrence, the stone bridge shewn in our illustration was erected, consisting of four semi-circular arches, of a very rude character. At its south-western extremity, on the road leading to the Royal Hospital, Kilmainham, was a military gateway, designed by the late eminent architect, Francis Johnston, and built in 1811, under his superintendence. It consisted of a square tower, having smaller square towers projecting from three of its angles, and a circular one of greater diameter and altitude at its fourth or north-eastern angle. It lent a most picturesque effect to the old bridge, but when the quays were extended from this, it was found necessary to remove it. This was carefully done, and it now forms the entrance gateway to the grounds of the Royal Hospital, Kilmainham.

THE BLACK DOCTOR.

CHAPTER IV.

RAMBLE had scarcely reached the yard when Stammers fell heavily on the pavement, by his side.

"You are not hurt?" inquired Bramble.

"I am," replied Stammers. "I fear that I have broken my left leg."

"We are worse off than ever, now," remarked Bramble, "surrounded by those walls—caught in our own trap." One chance remains," said the Creole, lifting his friend in his arms, "that old chimney will do till I come back; but no, poor fellow, you cannot stand in it with one leg." The Black Doctor gave a low shrill whistle, for the purpose of calling Tony, when a crazy-looking door, half covered by a heap of rubbish, opened, and a young girl in rags presented herself. "Halloa!" said the Black Doctor, in a subdued tone, "come here, for God's sake, and help me." The girl complied, and in a few minutes Bramble bore the maimed and despairing Stammers to a place of safety.

The door had been scarcely closed when a rough-looking, fat man, about forty-five years of age, presented himself at the window through which the fugitives had jumped. He was Horseman, the detective, who knew every thief in town, and hated stupid rogues with such an intensity of hatred, that he got rid of hordes of them when he found they could not serve his purpose. He took a great fancy to Squint, the cripple, and was on the most familiar terms with him; indeed, out of pure gratitude, he gave him a much greater latitude than he would give to other boys in the same line of business. Horseman got information of Stammers' whereabouts from Squint, at the execution of Jerry the Lift, and was now present to effect a capture for the Jew. The detective saw that he had been foiled, and he descended the stairs for the purpose of holding further conversation with Squint, when the Black Doctor stood before him. Bramble threw his dark vengeful eyes on Squint as he observed,

"Horseman, what brings you here?"

"I came looking for a precious pigeon," said the detective, "but he has flown."

"Indeed," remarked Bramble; "do I know him?"

"I don't think you do," was the reply. "Between ourselves, his name is Stammers, and he belongs to a high up family."

"I asked you if there was any news," said Bramble, frowning.

"If that's all you want to know, I'll tell you, doctor. He forged a bill of Abraham Isaacs, who told me to arrest him without a writ or warrant, and that he would pay anything before he run the risk of the gallows."

"That is no wonder," remarked Bramble, "he must be a clever fellow to have evaded you. Tell me how he did it?"

"I can't for the life of me discover," replied Horseman; "he must have had hard work to get over them walls in the old yard, but I have no doubt of his being not far off."

"I have my own notion on that matter," said Bramble, "and to be candid with you, I must say that I know Stammers, and would wish to see him in your clutches. I will give you a hint. You need not mind doing anything more than to be at the 'Pigeon House' when the packet sails for Holyhead to-night. I will be there, and will assist you."

Squint, who had overheard the conversation, made several attempts to get between Bramble and the detective, for the purpose of giving a hint to the astute Horseman, but in vain. The Black Doctor turned on the cripple like a wolf, and threw him violently on the ground. "That will do for you," said he, looking at the prostrate Squint, and, turning round to the detective, he observed, "that young robber was trying to overhear all that we were saying for the purpose of defeating our plans."

"The thieves that are going now are as knowing as jailors," said Horseman, "and a person can't depend on one of them."

The detective soon left in search of more information, after promising that he would meet Bramble in the evening at the packet.

"Tony," said the Black Doctor, "keep close on that fellow's track, and watch where he goes and who speaks to him. Tabby and I will remain and settle with Squint, the informer." The Black Doctor looked terrible, as he laid hold of the cripple, who loudly called for mercy. "The world would not save you," said the Creole, as he clutched the maimed wretch in his iron gripe.

Tabby, who saw by the Black Doctor's manner that he would have killed Squint, hobbled from the seat on which she had been sitting, and, seizing the arm of Bramble, said, "One death in the family in the day is enough. Jerry the Lift was his father, I am his grandmother. His mother is no more, and for her sake I would save the fellow, bad as he is; let him go, doctor, don't soil your hands with the informing rascal."

The Black Doctor forcibly shoved the despairing Squint from him, and his head coming in contact with an old table, the cripple fell senseless on the floor.

"If you choked him, it would be only his due," said Tabby. "I don't think he will inform again. Where did you hide Stammers?" she continued.

"Don't ask me," said Bramble. "I do not know what to do. His leg is broken."

"That's bad, indeed," observed Tabby, "but where is he?"

"At Joey Dix's," replied Bramble, "where he cannot remain long. I must stay here till Tony returns, as that Horseman might watch me. If you were to know the stake that is to be played for my friend's life, and the honour and happiness of his young wife and sister! Do you think he is safe at Joey's?"

"I do not know that either," remarked Tabby. "Mud Island is the place for him," continued the old woman; "give him in charge to the 'king' and he will be safe from the law. Don't hurt that wretch on the ground," said the old woman, as she saw the Black Doctor observed the cripple had placed himself in a position in which he could hear what was passing between Bramble and herself. "Leave him alone," continued she. "I can recognise in him something that reminds me of the time when his mother was young and beautiful. In his father's death I see that he has paid the full penalty for all that he can do to me, or all that he has done to you. Lift him up, and bring him here, and I will tell him something."

The Black Doctor placed the cripple upright face to face with his grandmother.

"Come here," said she, catching the limping creature, who shivered with fear as Bramble cast his big, luminous eyes upon him.

"I was told by Jerry the Lift an hour before he died," said Bramble, "that it was John Brunt who informed on him."

"No," said Tabby; "Jerry was always a fool."

"And it was Squint that informed on him?" inquired Bramble, musing; "if so my vengeance is disarmed."

"Here, boy," said Tabby, catching Squint by the hand, "you have done enough of the informer for your life. You were the means of bringing your own father to his death. If fault there was in it, it was mine."

Perhaps for the first time in his life Squint felt something like remorse, as he placed his chin between his two hands, and looked straight in the face of his grandmother.

"I think we can trust him now," said the Black Doctor, "as it would appear that he has had enough of informing for the remainder of his life. Go see your friend Horseman; and wait with him at the 'Pigeon House' to-night, and watch Stammers as he goes on board the packet. Give him his crutch, Tabby," continued Bramble.

In a few minutes after, Squint hobbled on his way in search of his friend the detective.

"I wish Tony was here," said the Black Doctor, "as there must be something up or he would have returned before now."

The words were scarcely out of his mouth when Tony entered.

"I walked after Horseman till I am tired," said Tony, "and as he had to call on a great number of thieves for information on one another, I had to wait till he was ready to go to a late breakfast—he is now in bed asleep like a king."

"John Brunt will be the death of you for being out so late," said the Black Doctor, laughing.

"Then, aren't you coming home to him?" asked the boy; "I am dying with the sleep."

"No," replied Bramble; "I want you to come with me."

The Black Doctor and Tony were soon in front of a wretched, tumble-down old house, that seemed to be waiting for the signal to fall. Bramble and his two companions were at once admitted into a kind of a yard, which had been the site of a portion of the premises occupied by Joey, which had fallen in; and if a person was to judge of the broken spine of the portion of the roof on the section inhabited by Joey and his dogs, a person would be inclined to believe that it was out of pure respect for Joey that it did not fall down and kill himself and his canine associates.

Joey was a long, gaunt man. He was an honest creature, and never stole anything but any amount of dogs, which he was wont to sell and steal again from a purchaser when an occasion would offer. Such an adept was he in dog stealing, that he would sell a dog before he had stolen it, or sell a dog within an hour after he had sold it, so thoroughly was he up in his art. He was, indeed, a rare dog-fancier, and so great was his love for the canine race, that he knew the address of every one of them worth stealing. Joey was past the middle age. He generally wore a kind of coarse shooting-coat, a waistcoat that lapped over his hips; knee-breeches, leather gaiters, and big hob-nailed shoes. His upper man was covered with a round felt hat, and he always carried a small dog-whip in his pocket. He had no fear of hydrophobia, as was evidenced in his hands, which bore the marks of divers bites from his pupils. In the dull season he used to catch rats alive, for the purpose of selling them to officers to amuse them in their leisure hours. It was generally said that he had made money, and was the owner of a number of horses and "vehicles." He was a convivial soul, and knew the watchmen well, and for that reason Bramble did not trust him. Joey led the way into his wretched hovel, followed by the Black Doctor, and Tony.

"I thought you would not come to-night," said Joey, "and that poor gentleman inside is so anxious; you said that you would not be more than an hour away, and it is now, I suppose, two o'clock."

Stammers was lying on a heap of straw, in agony with his broken limb, but on seeing Bramble he forgot all his pain for the time, and seizing him by the right hand, shook it warmly.

"How deeply grateful I am to you, Bramble," said he. "How can I ever repay you for all your kindness?"

"Business now," said the Black Doctor, "poetry after—how do you feel the leg?"

Bramble did not wait for a reply, but, taking out his knife, he cut off the boot of his miserable patient.

"Have you anything that would make a bandage," said Bramble, addressing Joey.

"No," replied the dog-fancier, "there is nothing in the house that will answer that purpose."

"Get me three or four laths out of the rubbish in the yard," said the Black Doctor.

The dog-fancier was not long procuring the laths from the heaps of rubbish, and Tony's shirt was made ribands of in a twinkling to serve the purpose of a bandage.

"Don't mind, Tony, I will give you shirts enough," said Bramble, as he bound up the leg of his friend. "That will do for the present," he continued—"until I come back. Is there anyone here but ourselves?"

"Nobody," replied the dog-fancier, "but my daughter, who let you in this morning."

"A moment, Joey," said Bramble, as he waved his hand for him to retire. "I am going to see your people and the Jew. It will not be safe for you to remain here much longer."

"God bless you!" said Stammers.

"All right," said the Black Doctor, and turning to Joey, he said: "You come with me. Tony and you remain here till I return. You know me of old," he continued, to the dog-fancier. "I don't fear you, but I do not trust you. Prove but false to me now, if it was only for a minute, and you will not live long enough to regret it. There are friends of mine in a house not far off, and I will leave you there till I come back."

"Very well," said Joey, evidently not pleased. "I don't care where I stop."

The two pedestrians walked on at a hurried pace till they came to a small door beneath something like a stable loft. Bramble knocked, and as a man in the dress of a servant opened the door, he asked:

"Are any of the gentlemen above?"

"Yes, sir," was the reply, and Bramble and Joey ascended to the upper storey by something that appeared to be a kind of compromise between a step-ladder and a stairs.

Leaving the dog-fancier with the company whom we found here, and whose character it may be stated was none of the most respectable, Bramble hired a chaise, and drove to a stately mansion in one of the fashionable quarters of the city.

AUTHORSHIP AND £ S. D.

NOW-a-days it must be a subject of congratulation for litterateurs that authors—at least those having any pretension to the title—do not illustrate the old popular idea of what a writer should be; a miserable dyspeptic wretch, out of elbows, out of toes, out of credit, and more than half out of his wits. It has been said that poor Otway, the dramatist, was choked by a morsel of crust which he swallowed quickly, to allay the pangs of hunger, but we believe this version of the cause of his death to be erroneous. To be sure, though, J. Howard Payne, author of "Home, sweet home," has complained—and complained truly—how frequently he had been in the heart of London, Paris, Berlin, or some other city, and heard persons singing, or hand-organs playing "Sweet home," without a shilling to buy the next meal, or a place to lay his head. "The world," he remarked on one occasion to a friend, "has literally sung my song until every heart is familiar with its memory. Yet I have been a wanderer from my boyhood; my country has turned me ruthlessly from my office, and in my old age I have to submit to humiliation for bread." Fortunately, however, for the sake of the universe of letters, such cases as Payne's are isolated examples of the world's neglect of its men of genius, as a few examples of how some litterateurs were and are rewarded will tend to prove.

Dryden received £1300, for his translation of Virgil, and Pope nearly £6,000 for his Homer. By the 'Beggars Opera,' Gay netted £1600. Churchill, the poet, realized almost fabulous sums by his satires. Fielding received £700, in all, for his "Tom Jones," and £1,000 for "Amelia." For his "History of England" Smollett received upwards of £2,000. The second part of Gibbon's "History of Rome" produced him £5,000. Dr. Robertson received £4,500 for his "History of Charles V. of Spain." Hume was in the receipt of immense sums for his historical writings. By his "Ossian" and "Great Britain" Macpherson cleared no less than £4,200. For his "Dictionary" Dr. Johnson received £1,575, and his biographer, Boswell, £1,000 for his life of the "leviathan of literature." One can scarcely credit the fact of Hannah More receiving for her writings, from first to last, the enormous sum of £30,000. The immortal "Vicar of Wakefield" only produced Oliver Goldsmith £60, while in a single year he netted £1,800 by his comedies. For his "Seasons," from first to last, Thomson received about 600 guineas. For four separate books of travel Sir John Carr (alluded to in "Half an Hour at Ringsend," in our last number) received the sum of £1,900. Thomas Moore was paid £1,000 for the "Loves of the Angels," and not less than 3,000 guineas for his "Lalla Rookh"—a neat little edition of which has just been published in Dublin for fourpence. For many years he was in the receipt of £500 a-year by the sale of the "Irish Melodies," and it was understood that for some years preceding his decease, the Messrs. Longman paid him an annuity of £300 for his entire copyrights. The "Pleasures of Hope" only contains eleven hundred lines, yet Campbell received in all for it the sum of 900 guineas. He had £600 a year for the editorship of the "New Monthly Magazine." Southey received £100 for each review article he wrote for the "Quarterly," and, according to his own account, he could write one in a few days. Sir Walter Scott received from £5,000 to £8,000 for each of his best novels, and £12,000 for his "Life of Napoleon," which was at the rate of £33 a day for the entire period occupied in its composition. After his failure he realised by his pen £70,000 in four years! For one of his smaller poems, written in three nights, Byron received from Murray 500 guineas. For her "France in 1839," the late Lady Morgan received 2,000 guineas. Bulwer received £1,600 for his "Harold," and the same sum for his "Rienzi," written in two months. Captain Marryat acquired, in all, fully £2,000 from "Peter Simple," and from £1,000 to £1,500 for some of his other fictions. Harrison Ainsworth got £1,000 for his "Jack Sheppard," and a similar sum from the proprietors of the "Sun" for his "Old Saint Paul's," before they had seen a line of it. For "Nicholas Nickleby" Charles Dickens received £5,000, and for one of his "Christmas Carols," written, according to literary gossip, in a fortnight, £1,500.

There is no doubt that John Milton, blind, and penniless, sold "Paradise Lost" for five pounds, but, after the above list of what rich prizes fall to the lot of authorship, who will say that men and women of genius have any reason to complain that literature is a barren pursuit? What a modern book can cost may be gleaned from some statistics related by Mr. Black, M.P., of Edinburgh, in the course of a speech made at a dinner given by him to the contributors of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," not long since. Throwing aside shillings and pence, he stated that he had expended on the seventh and eighth editions of that work:—To authors, £40,970; cost of paper, £52,503; printing and stereotyping, £36,708; copperplate engraving and printing, £18,277; binding, £22,613; advertising, £11,081; sundries, £2,269. The paper duty on the two editions, calculated at 1½d. per pound, was £8,573, or about 17s. 3d. per copy. Altogether, a total of £184,425 11s. 4d. Rather a tidy sum this for one work to cost!

THE MALIGNED.—This is one of the world's mysteries, that one walks among us who seems to have a ban set upon him or her, without any positive reason which can be assigned. All have something to say about them; none can bring any proof of ill; yet on they toil to the end of their pilgrimage, unknown and misjudged. Then it is that Heaven, which has known, judges them, and perhaps may say: "Well done, thou good and faithful servant."

THE RESCUED BRIDE.

A LEGEND OF THE CUMMERAGHS.

HERE is not in all Ireland a range of mountains grander, more savage, and, at the same time more abounding in the elements of the picturesque, than the Cumberagh— that gigantic tier of summits, which, beginning in abrupt bluffs and swells beside the "lovely sweet banks of the Suir," stretch southward through the county Waterford, to the very seaboard in. The wild terrain in this range is an the tourist. Yet here contemplated in all its a traveller who ventures wild scenes, when comfortable hotel in it towns, will scarcely satisfaction at what Commencing at the romantic valley of Glenpatrick, near

Clonmel, should he make a circuit round the entire range, he will meet about a dozen lakes or tarns, some of considerable extent, and each with a name suggestive of its own peculiar characteristic. Over these solitary lakes the mighty crags rise in perpendicular ridges, in many cases to the height of several hundred yards, and throw their black shadows upon the still and lifeless water beneath. Nothing can be grander than to stand upon the desert shore, strewn with its naked boulders, and gaze up to the stony pinnacles overhead, where the hawk whistles shrilly as he prepares to dart upon his prey, and the gray eagle expands his strong pinions, and floats majestically upward through the blue, silent, summer sky.

The wanderer who wishes to obtain a true idea of solitude has only to ascend to the highest point of one of those giant summits and look around him. There nature seems entirely dead. No sound will break upon his ears upon a calm day save the drowsy hum of the mountain bee, rising like the low tone of a fairy trumpet in the distance, and dying away again over the golden moss or purple heather, only to render the solitude more silent than before. But a calm day is of very rare occurrence in those elevated spots. When the wind is strong, wild and indefinable impressions of vastness, awe, and loneliness will crowd through the tourist's brain, as he sits upon some fragment of rock looking at the black volumes of cloud flying before the gathering storm, and listening to the blast booming amid the fissured crags, and whirling and bounding from the sharp edge of the ridge down upon the lowland moors and deserted valleys.

This region is rich in legendary lore and tradition. The enchanted prince O'Donoghue is said to hold state beneath the blue waters of Killarney, the great earl, Garret of Desmond, abides with his spell-bound knights and barons in a cave beside the sunny waters of Lough Gur, amid the broad champaign of Limerick, and according to the same popular belief, O'Brien of the Silken Bridle has made his home in a vast pinnacled crag that rises like some ancient and barbaric castle at the entrance of Coum Airach, a savage, rugged, solitary, and basin-shaped valley, containing three small tarns or lakes, and appearing as if it had been scooped out by the hand of some Titan of old from the breast of Moneyvolla, or the Boggy Summit, one of the most elevated mountains of the great Cumberagh range. Many a strange tale is told of this enchanted prince. The peasantry still firmly believe that on certain nights he rides down the mountains at the head of his mailed warriors, as if to make a progress through his principality, and, not content with this, many of them will tell you that they have had actual ocular demonstration of the reality of these nocturnal pageantries.

"What's the name of that rock?" said I one day to a young peasant girl, whom I met by the shore of the Clydach, a stream that has its source amid the steep Cumberagh valleys. I pointed to the huge crag at the entrance of Coum Airach.

"Sure, sir," answered she, "I thought everyone knew that. That's the palace of O'Brien, the fairy prince o' the Cumberaghs."

"Is he ever seen in these parts?" I asked again.

"Wisha, faith, he is, sir," she replied; "an' I have good reason to know, for I seen him myself wid all his men, last November eve!"

"That's more than I thought anyone in the whole county could say. Where did you see him?"

"I'll tell you how it was, sir," she resumed. "Myself an' Nancy Power, our servant girl, went down to the ford, beyant there, late that night, to bring home a can o' water. I was just goin' to raise the can upon Nancy's head, when we both heard a sound upon the lonesome road that lades down from the mountains to the ford. It was for all the world like the tinklin' o' bells. You may be sure we got afeard the minnit we heard it, an' both of us ran into the grove beside the ford to see what would happen. We waited there for some time, till the tinklin' an' jinglin' became louder an' louder, an' at last what did we see comin' down the road in the moonlight but a long string o' horsemen, like an army, with the most beautiful young man in the world ridin' in front o' them, his sword in his hand, an' a mighty lot entirely of darlin' blue feathers wavin' on the steel cap he wore on his head. The horsemen that followed had also their swords drawn, an' every man o' them—the young gentleman an' all—wore blue cloaks, on dher which, as they passed the ford, we could see their bright steel jackets glittherin' in the moonlight. Their brides an' trappings were all jinglin' an' ringin' wid grandeur, as they came down an' began to cross the stream. Nancy an' I were shiverin' wid fear as we looked out upon them, but they spoke never a word, an' they looked neither to the right nor to the left, but passed on till they were all across the ford. They then wound up the bridle path to the mountains, towards Coum Airach, an' when they reached the mouth o' that valley we lost sight o' them altogether. I suppose they shut themselves up in the Palace till next November Eve!"

There are, however, stranger tales even than the above connected with O'Brien's fairy palace.

Many and many a year ago, as the story-tellers have it, there lived at the foot of the Cumberagh mountains a rich farmer, named Dunlevie, who had one daughter. Mary Dunlevie was a very beautiful girl—just as good as she was handsome—and as she was known to have a good fortune, her hand was sought in marriage by many of the richest young farmers in the barony. But it was hard to please her in a husband. At last, however, a wooer came in the person of Tom Power of Glenora, who pleased both father and daughter. The match was soon made, the wedding-day came on, and they were married. Tom Power was the happiest man in the county, and when the day of the "Hauling Home"—in other words, the day of the removal of the bride to her husband's dwelling—there never was such a "let out," as the peasantry call it, in the pleasant valley of Glenora.

Three days after the "Hauling Home" Mary disappeared mysteriously from her husband's house. None knew whither she had gone, or what had befallen her. Search was made throughout the whole county, and even her distracted husband went across the Suir to search for her through the fertile plains of Tipperary, but still no traces of her could be found. At last poor Tom, in his despair, paid a visit to a celebrated Fairy-man, or herb doctor, who lived in Glenpatrick, and asked him for tidings of his missing bride.

"If you came to me before," said the Fairy-man, "you'd have but little trouble in finding her; but now I fear it is too late."

"Why is it too late?" asked Tom. "Just tell me where she is—you'll be paid well for it—for if I once knew, no mortal man would keep me from bringing her back!"

"Alas!" answered the spæman, "she is at present in no mortal hands. Tom Power," he added solemnly, "your wife is at this moment in O'Brien's palace, nursing the young fairy prince that was born the other day; it is now the first of March. You'll have to wait I fear till May-eve before you'll get a chance of bringing her back. Meantime, take this little purse. It is full of the dust of a certain kind of blossom that has great power. If you can throw that dust upon your wife's head, she will be restored to you, so you had better watch near the palace as often as you can. You may see her even before May-eve!"

It is needless to say that Tom watched the rock incessantly for many a weary day and night. At last, although May-eve had not yet come, he began to despair of seeing her, and to place less faith in the story of the spaeman. He was soon convinced, however, of its truth. One morning at sunrise, while sitting upon a crag in front of the fairy palace, he saw a small, but intensely bright rainbow resting before him, upon the surface of the outer turn of the valley. Underneath this, a figure, at first shapeless, rose into view, and becoming at each successive moment more and more substantial and distinct, at length assumed the lineaments of a young female of surpassing loveliness. She was wrapt in a light robe of blue, all spangled over with bright glistening little spots like stars. Her long, golden hair fell down in glossy ringlets upon her shoulders, and her face—nothing that Tom's imagination ever bodied forth appeared to him so beautiful. He sat spell-bound, half-conscious of having seen the lovely face before. And yet the glamour of enchantment was upon him, for he could not recognise it. The figure still stood lightly upon the glassy water. At length turning towards him, she advanced a few steps, stretched out her arms to him, as if imploring his aid, and then began to recede. When she had reached the middle of the lake, the rainbow slowly melting away, mingled with the light morning vapours. Once more she turned, stretched forward her arms, and then gliding over the water, disappeared beside the fairy rock. In an instant Tom's recollection returned.—

"My wife! my wife!" he cried in a frantic tone, as he now stretched out his arms unavailingly.

But his beloved one was gone, and he was fated to watch many another weary day and night ere he caught a glimpse of her again.

But Tom was duly grateful to the spaeman. He paid a visit to Glenpatrick, and gave the wise old fellow a round sum of money, saying at the same time, that should he succeed in recovering his wife, he would more than double the amount there and then.

"Watch well," said the spaemen, "and you will bring her back."

Tom did watch well, and the day before May-eve caught another glimpse of his wife, still more blooming and beautiful than ever, as she stood beneath another rainbow on the lake. The night gave new hope and energy to his heart, and that day he paid another visit to Glenpatrick, and gave the wise man twice the amount of money he had given before.

"Now," said the spaemen, "to-morrow night it will be impossible for you to see the fairy palace without my help. When you go up to the mountains take the path that leads by Lough Mora, and never show a faint heart at what may happen you on your way."

May-eve came, and in its dim twilight Tom took the path the wise man had told him of to the mountains. As he reached the shore of Lough Mora, a boundary ditch between two estates stretched before him. He climbed the fence, and gave a bound to reach the green turf at the other side, but instead of reaching the ground, alighted upon the back of a huge black horse, which seemed as if it had arisen from the solid earth beneath. And now by the glaring eyes of the animal, and the thundering sound of its hoofs, Tom knew that he was on the back of the Phooka, or phantom horse of Lough Mora. Remembering the parting advice of the old spaeman, he kept up his heart, stooped forward, clutched the long flying mane of the phantom steed, and thus holding on, prepared himself for the terrible run that he knew was before him. Away darted the Phooka, now doubling and rearing, now floundering and splashing through the quagmires of the low grounds, now rushing quick as lightning up the hills again and across the giant crags, or plunging through lake and torrent, till, after what appeared almost an age to his rider, he stopped suddenly, reared on his fore legs, and pitched poor Tom into a dark, damp hollow in what seemed to him the midst of a wide and unknown forest. With a loud neigh of triumph he then disappeared.

Tom sprang to his feet, shook himself, and finding himself unhurt, looked around him. Above him still towered the savage crests of the mountains, with their yawning valleys between. Up to one of these latter, which Tom recognised but too well, he saw a bright and noble road leading through the sloping forest, and down this was walking at a stately and leisurely pace, a withered little atomy of a man, with a cocked hat and a beautiful bagpipes under his arm. Tom waited in wonder till the little man had reached where he was standing.

"A happy May-eve to you, Tom Power," said the little fellow as he came, with a dignified and polite bow.

"The same to you, sir," returned Tom. "May I ask you where that road leads to?"

"Why you omadhawn," answered the little atomy, much hurt, 'oughn't you know by this, that it lades to the palace of O'Brien of the Silken Bridle. Howsomdever, come on. I'll lade the way, and the devil may care who pays the piper!"

With that he put his instrument in order and marched up the bright road, Tom following.

"What tune do you like?" asked he, turning suddenly round.

"The 'wind that shakes the barley,'" answered Tom, scarcely knowing what he said.

"'Tis a lucky tune!" rejoined the atomy, and with that he struck it up with a joyousness, that made Tom as if he could fight all the fairy princes in the world for the sake of his lost wife.

"Now," said the little piper, as he finished the tune, "I'd play you up the tidiest moneen you ever heard in your life, only I havn't time. Look up. There is the palace afore your eyes. One you know bid me to tell you to stand in the porch, an' wait till the company comes out upon the lawn. You'll see your wife comin' out with them. A word is as good as a sermon. You have the purse o' Lusmore dust in your waistcoat pocket. All I can say is, use it when you see your wife!" With that he struck up the "cricket's rambles through the hob," on his instrument, and marched straight back again down the road, on which he soon disappeared.

The fairy palace was now blazing in all its splendour before Tom's astonished eyes. He ran over to the ground porch, and concealing himself behind a tall pillar, stood waiting for the revellers within to make their appearance. He had not long to wait, for in a few moments a splendid train of lords and ladies began to make their exit from the palace, in order to have a moonlight dance upon the green lawn outside. Tom's heart bounded, as he at last saw his wife with the baby prince in her arm, walking out in the midst of the procession. He had emptied the contents of the purse into his hand, and now waited cautiously till his wife came opposite to where he stood. Then in an instant he cast the whole handful of Lusmore dust upon her head. The moment he did so, a wild and angry yell burst through the hollow chambers of the palace, the fairy babe was snatched away, the bright throng disappeared, and Tom Power and his wife found themselves standing alone and clasped in each other's arms at the foot of the mighty rock that guards the entrance to Coum Airach!

There was joy once more in Glenora, and it need not be said, that Tom Power did not forget his promise to the successful spaeman.

R. D. J.

"SAVE THE MARK!"—The origin and precise meaning of this phrase have been explained as referring to archery. When the archer was seen to have aimed and shot well, and while the arrow was speeding on its course, the spectators in their excitement, exclaimed, "Save the mark!" or "God save the mark!" intimating thereby that the mark was in imminent danger of being hit. And on the contrary, when the archer was but a novice, and shot wide, they shouted, "Save the mark!" derisively and ironically. It is, we believe, in an ironical and derisive sense that the phrase at present is usually employed; for instance, in expressing dissent from a strange opinion, or exaggerated statement. It is to be observed, that a hawk, "when she waited at a place where she had laid game," was said to keep her mark; and the sign placed on houses to indicate the presence of the plague was termed God's mark; and from either of these expressions conjecture might deduce a plausible explanation of the phrase.—Notes and Queries. [We incline to the belief that this expression originated from the ancient coin known as a "mark." Any one actuated by a penurious spirit might be said to have done this or that, but (derisively) to have "saved the mark."]

THE GRIEVANCE PAPERS.

CHAPTER IV.

WHICH WAS INTENDED TO HAVE CONTAINED AN ACCOUNT OF A CERTAIN LITTLE DINNER PARTY, BUT WHICH IN REALITY TREATS OF VERY DIFFERENT SUBJECTS—LITERATURE IN GENERAL AND THE "ILLUSTRATED DUBLIN JOURNAL" IN PARTICULAR—MRS. JONES'S GRIEVANCE—TOGETHER WITH SOME ELOQUENT REFLECTIONS AND STRIKING CONSIDERATIONS THEREUPON.

BEFORE I return to a further consideration of the interesting subject to which I have already several times presumed, courteous reader, to draw your attention, I must first, with your kind permission, devote a few, a very few, words more to Snobbins.

Shortly after my second paper, in which you may remember that I spoke of Snobbins, made its appearance in the columns of "THE ILLUSTRATED DUBLIN JOURNAL," I happened to meet Snobbins in the street. He immediately came up and shook hands, quite friendly; but I saw that something was wrong, he looked so cross; and you may easily imagine that I made a very shrewd guess what it was that had disturbed the equanimity of my friend's temper.

"Going this way?" says Snobbins, pointing down Sackville-street.

"Yes," says I, whereupon we linked and went on together. After some unimportant remarks on the very beautiful state of the weather, and the very foul state of the Liffey, (we happened to be on Carlisle Bridge at the time, and as the day was hot, you can imagine the rest), we walked on for a few seconds in silence.

"Seen this new Journal?" inquires Snobbins, in a very grumpy tone of voice.

"Yes," says I.

"Low thing," says Snobbins.

"Hum!" says I.

"Know any of the writers?" asks Snobbins, in the same grumpy voice.

"Intimately," says I, whereupon Snobbins pulled in a little.

After a while he goes on again:

"Who's this 'Incog'?" asks he, with an assumed carelessness of manner, which, however, didn't in the least deceive me. "Don't happen to know him, do you?"

"Why, yes," says I, "I happen to know him rather intimately," which you, dear reader, who are in the secret, will at once admit that I was quite justified in saying.

"Oh, indeed," says Snobbins, pricking up his ears, (again I beg your pardon for using such very homely expressions), who is he? what's his name?"

"Sworn to secrecy," says I; "bound not to mention."

"Oh, it's of no consequence," says Snobbins, with the same assumed carelessness. "Low fellow—decidedly low—a mere buffoon."

"Beg your pardon," says I, with some little warmth. "I beg your pardon, Snobbins, but as I said just now, I happen to know the gentleman, and I can safely say that he is one of the most gentlemanly fellows with whom I have the happiness to be acquainted."

This you may think was coming it "rather strong," but just call to mind the circumstances, and you will readily make allowance for what might otherwise appear a somewhat vain and complacent mode of expression. Moreover, you know that it didn't become me in such a case to cry "foul fish," and I wasn't going to do it either.

"Perhaps so," answers Snobbins in the same contemptuous manner. "At all events it's of no consequence—not the least."

"Glad to hear it," says I, and again we walked on in silence for some few seconds.

I knew what was on Snobbins's mind, and so made all due allowance for the excited state of his feelings. It was but natural that I should, for the moment, feel a little annoyed to hear myself spoken of as "low—decidedly low—a mere buffoon;" but, remembering the provocation which he had received, I made, as I have just said, all due allowance, and contrived in a very short time to smooth down my ruffled feathers.

By this time I fancy it had begun to dawn upon the mind of Snobbins that I might myself be one of the writers for the "Journal," for he turned round quite suddenly and looked me in the face.

"I say, old fellow," said he, calling me by my own name, which I need scarcely say is one of a much more euphonious character than "Incog." "I say, you don't write for the thing yourself, do you?"

"Why, yes," I made answer, "I write an odd little thing now and then, when I have a little spare time, which, as you know, doesn't often happen."

"Well," said Snobbins, with a deeply sympathising, but at the same time, somewhat disgusted air, "well, I am surprised," (he didn't know, poor fellow, that I was aware of the fact of his having written an article for the identical Journal, which had been rejected; still less did he guess that I was the veritable "Incog," whom he had been so thoroughly abusing.) "Well, I am surprised," he repeated shaking his head despondingly the while, "that you should have lowered yourself so far as to write for a common penny paper. With your talents, too, and after the success of your last work. If any one had told it to me, I shouldn't have believed the report—give you my word, I shouldn't have believed it possible," and he wagged his poor old head harder than ever.

I longed, I must confess, to "smash" him at once, by asking whether he had ever heard of "sour grapes," but I restrained myself, and condescended to argue the point with him, with, I think I may safely venture to say, considerable good temper.

"Well, now, Snobbins," said I, putting my argument into shape, "why shouldn't I write for this Journal? Just tell me that. I know from my own experience that there are countless numbers of readers, who are wasting their time, even if they are doing no worse, upon literature, if indeed it may be so called, which proposes to itself no other end than the excitement of unholy passions, and the gratification of a morbid and enervating taste. Remember what Blanchard Jerrold said, viz.: "that up to this time, the new journals which cheap paper has brought into existence are weeds rather than flowers." Whilst I am certain that countless thousands of readers are giving themselves up to the allurements of false literature of this kind, I am equally sure that there are thousands of them, who, could they easily and cheaply procure literature which would be amusing, while its tone would be healthy and moral, would readily forsake the false stimulant for the wholesome fare, but who will cling to the drug so long as the genuine article is not brought within their reach. Now, I believe, Snobbins," said I, warming into my subject, "that in contributing to the columns of "The Illustrated Dublin Journal," I am contributing to a Journal of this healthy tone which we so much require. In devoting my few spare moments to this purpose, I firmly believe that I am contributing to the rational amusement, instruction, and I humbly trust, with the help of God, edification, of the hundreds of thousands of readers whom I am proud to know that the "Dublin Journal" already numbers; and if this be true, and deny it, if you can, Snobbins, I must say that I am not aware of any law, either divine or human, forbidding my co-operation in such a work as this; and if you are aware of any such impediment, I should be glad to hear it—that's all."

Snobbins hadn't a word to say, so he only wagged his head harder than ever, and directed his attention to the caricature of poor Tommy Moore, erected close to Trinity College, and which we were just passing.

He began again, however, in a minute or two. "Incog," said he, "I didn't say anything about the "Dublin Journal" not being a healthy and strictly moral publication. I don't know enough of the thing," he went on, poor hypocrite, "to presume to pass judgment upon it. It may be all that you say it is, or it may be quite the contrary. I know nothing about that. What I said was, that it is a low thing to write for a penny paper, and that I was astonished to hear that you were doing any such thing. Of course, it's all a matter of taste, I merely give you my opinion, and you can take it for what it is worth."

"Snobbins," said I, withdrawing my arm from his with a sudden jerk, and turning round face to face with him, "Snobbins," said I, "don't be a muff. If I can do good to my readers, and at the same time put a few pounds into my own pocket, (and I brought this latter point forward, because I knew that it would "touch" him in a tender place, and by this time, I confess, that I was becoming "vicious") what matter does it make, in the name of goodness, whether it be through the medium of a really good paper, which can afford to be sold at a penny on account of its enormous circulation, or of some more pretentious article which is consecrated to a limited number of worshippers of pomposity and stupidity, at the rate of half-a-crown a month. Look at Wilkie Collins," cried I, indignantly. "Look at Charles Dickens himself! Look at all our giants of literature! Are they not all writing in cheap papers? and when such giants as they are not ashamed to lead, is it any disgrace for pignies like you and me, Snobbins, to endeavour to follow at an humble distance? Snobbins," cried I, more indignantly than ever, "I am astonished to hear a man of your common sense talking such utter 'bosh'—I wish you good morning, Sir."

We shook hands sulkily enough, and parted. At that very moment the demon of mischief, I am sorry to say, overcame me to a certain extent, and caused me to behave in a very ungentlemanly manner towards Snobbins, to whom I now offer this public apology.

Just as Snobbins had turned his back, I called after him, and he stopped. "Snobbins," said I, with an appearance of cordiality, which, of course I couldn't, at that moment, and after the provocation I had received, be expected to feel. "Snobbins," said I, "take care of your health, old boy. I hear that there's a good deal of cholera morbus stirring. Beware of sour fruit—sour grapes, especially," I added, I must confess, maliciously. Mea culpa. "I am afraid they might injure you. Sour grapes, I have been told," I went on, "are peculiarly unwholesome. Beware of them."

Snobbins answered not a word, but he became very red in the face, and I knew that he understood and felt the allusion. My triumph, a wicked and malicious triumph I admit, was complete. Poor Snobbins turned hastily away, muttering something between his teeth about people minding their own business, and I went home in such a very good humour, that I so far forgot myself as to invite Mrs. Squeezer to take tea with me that very evening—an invitation which I repented of almost as soon as I had given it. I need scarcely say that my invitation was graciously accepted by Mrs. Squeezer, who knocked at my door punctual to the moment, and entered, followed, of course, by my mortal enemy, the cat, to which I have had occasion feelingly to allude more than once in the course of these papers. The nasty animal, after eyeing me in a disdainful and contemptuous manner for a moment or two, at once took possession of my hearth-rug, where he remained the whole evening, warming himself at my fire, with the exception of some short intervals during the course of the meal to which I had invited Mrs. Squeezer, (but not her cat,) when he was plentifully regaled with my muffins by his loving mistress. When he had been thoroughly gorged with muffins and cream, he lay down to rest before my fire with a kind of an "I'm the monarch of all I survey" air; and, judging from the gyrations of his enormous tail, I have no reason to doubt that his dreams were of a pleasing character. I thought ever so often during the evening that I would willingly give a considerable sum to see a good large live coal start out from the grate, and fall upon him in some tender part of his carcass, as he lay extended at full stretch upon my new hearth-rug. No such accident, I am sorry to say, occurred during the evening. Having been so rash as to invite Mrs. Squeezer, (but not her cat, I again emphatically repeat,) to tea, I was bound to play the civil and polite to my guest. The task was an irksome one, but I trust that I discharged it in a gentlemanly and becoming manner. Mrs. Squeezer partook during the evening of brandy and water, which I took care to prepare, "hot, sweet, and strong" and remained until the clock struck ten, when murmuring something about "evening devotions," she rose to her feet, (and so did the cat,) and bidding me "good evening," (Mrs. Squeezer I mean, and not the cat; he only whisked his tail, and gave utterance to several of his contemptuous purrs,) my amiable landlady graciously retired with 7s. 6d. in her pocket, of which she had cheated me during the evening at cribbage.

But, to return to Snobbins, and his parting exclamation, "Let people mind their own business"—oh! there it is—if people would but mind their own business; but the misery is, that they won't, and no amount of argument seems sufficient to bring about this much-desired result. Oh! what an Elysium this hum-drum old world of ours would become if people would but mind their own business! How happy Mrs. Jones would be, if Mrs. Jenkins would but leave her alone, and not criticise her new bonnet, and the general style of her dress. Poor Mrs. Jones isn't so well off as Mrs. Jenkins, and Mrs. Jenkins's maid has, by direction of her mistress, learnt from Mrs. Jones's cook, that her mistress is in the habit of having her silk dresses cleaned, and of practising other pieces of economy, which Mrs. Jenkins considers "ow," but for which I, taking into account the struggling circumstances of poor Jones, and their large family of young children, admire and honour poor Mrs. Jones, for she is striving, poor thing, to keep up decent appearances, and she finds it a very hard fight; and yet, I know, that one day when Jones met me at an auction, and took me home to dinner, without notice, Mrs. Jones ran up stairs, and put on her best cap, and came down to their little drawing-room with a pleasant smile upon her face, and a kindly welcome for her husband's friend. I knew well enough that she couldn't help being anxious about the dinner, so I said, "Now, my dear Mrs. Jones, I beg that you won't put yourself to any inconvenience on my account. Jones insisted on my coming home with him, but I would never have consented to do so, if I hadn't been convinced that you would make no stranger of me. What is good enough for you and Jones, my dear madam, is quite good enough for me; and I have nothing at home but a piece of cold beef steak." She gracefully murmured some little apology, and, taking my arm, we went down to dinner. There was no attempt at false display. We had the shank end of a cold leg of mutton, and a nice juicy beef-steak, with vegetables ad lib. Then followed a tart, which had evidently come from the confectioner's round the corner. Jones brought out a bottle of his cheap claret, telling me, like a man, that it was cheap, but adding, in his own honest, manly way, that it was the best he had, and that if he had better he would treat me to it; and after this, do you suppose that I cared about its being cheap, or that I made dry faces over it, because it was not so good as that which I got at other men's houses? I insisted upon the children being allowed to dine with us, and when, in due time, poor little things, they came and put up their innocent young faces to be kissed before they went to bed, I felt that Jones, spite of his poverty and struggles, had a right to be a happy man; and, when at length I took my leave, after some pleasant music from Mrs. J., I went home in a very 'genial frame of mind, and feeling that I had seldom spent a more cheerful and happy evening. And yet, because Mrs. Jenkins has, meanly I consider, discovered some of poor Mrs. Jones's endeavours to make "ends meet," and has retailed these discoveries, with her own additions, to all the gossiping ladies whom she visits, poor Mrs. Jones has in consequence been rendered miserable and unhappy. Oh! if people would but mind their own business, how much happier we should all be? What an amount of misery would be avoided!

But, Mrs. Jones, don't you mind. Don't you allow yourself to be rendered unhappy by these malicious or idle twaddlers. Think of your husband, the honest, manly, generous-hearted fellow! Think of the dear little children who nestle round your knee, and look up into your face as only children can look into a mother's face; and your little ingenious contrivances to "make ends meet," shall be sanctified and blessed with a blessing, of which all the poison of a thousand Mrs. Jenkins's tongues can never rob them; and I give you my word of honour as a gentleman, that I would rather ride down Sackville-street in a common cab with you, nay, even on an outside car, than with Mrs. Jenkins in her chariot, though it is lined with silk, and though her flunkies are bedizened within an inch of their lives with gold lace and such gimcrack finery.

Oh! if people would but mind their own business, as Snobbins remarked to me. If Snobbins had minded his own business, he wouldn't have introduced the conversation which I have recorded at the beginning of this paper. I shouldn't have retorted about the "sour grapes;" and instead of parting, as I am sorry to say we did, we might at this moment be smoking the calumet of peace, as we often did together in days of yore, but which, I am inclined to think, we shall not again do for some time to come.

Well might the poet so feelingly sing—

"What, shall I need to draw my sword? the paper Hath cut her throat already. No, 'tis slander;
Whose edge is sharper than the sword; whose tongue
Outvenoms all the worms of Nile; whose breath
Rides on the posting winds, and doth belie
All corners of the world; kings, queens, and states,
Maid, matrons, nay, the secrets of the grave,
This vip'rous slander enters!"

Oh! again I repeat, if people would but mind their own business. Mrs. Jenkins says, if I had minded my own business, I shouldn't have penned my nasty, slanderous lines about her; but she understands it all. She remembers the day when a nasty fellow was taken home to their house by Jenkins, without her permission, to dinner, and when the said fellow was sent off again dinnerless; and she despises both him and his observations, and she will do as she pleases, and criticise her neighbours as she thinks fit, without asking his permission, and let him mind his own business, and a great deal more to the same effect.

Oh! Mrs. Jenkins, I apologise, I humbly beg your pardon. I am prepared to do anything but retract; but I cannot retract, partly because what I have said is true, and partly because my article is already printed, and the copyright belongs to the conductor of this magazine, whom I cannot prevail upon to give it up to me, that I may destroy it. Snobbins, old fellow, here is my hand. Come to my heart. Forget and forgive, and I will even go so far as to speak a good word for you to my friend the Editor of the Journal. I confess that I have been in fault. I haven't minded my own business—mea culpa.

But, courteous reader, I must stop. When I sat down to write this paper, it was with a full intention of devoting it to a true, unvarnished account of a certain little dinner which I gave, or, to speak more correctly, which I tried to give, when I first took up my abode with Mrs. Squeezer, but now see whither the few introductory remarks which I intended to make have led me! As I don't exactly know what I might have said in the paper which I intended to write, I can't, of course, inform you with any degree of certainty whether it would have been more interesting than the one which I have written; but, as the young gentleman who is familiarly known as the printer's devil is waiting at my door for the article which is due from me, and as I know by the noise he is making with his knuckles on the panels of my "oak," that he is becoming somewhat impatient, I must beg of you to accept the present instalment in place of what I intended to give you, and I promise that you shall have, at my earliest opportunity, a full, true, and circumstantial account of my first dinner party under Mrs. Squeezer's hospitable roof.

INCOG.

P.S.—Mrs. Squeezer is evidently reading every number of the Journal as it comes out. She has, in a highly inflamed state about the nose, just looked into my room to say that she sees that that vile fellow is at his dirty work still. She knows whom he is alluding to, with his rignmarole stories about cats, and latch-keys, and such like trash, but he had better mind what he is about. A nasty fellow! (feller she pronounces it!) Although she is only a poor defenceless widow, she will let him know that she is not to be trampled upon with impunity, and if there's law to be had on him, she will have it, though it cost her her last farthing. She'll teach him to mind his own business at all events, and a great deal more to the same effect.

I sympathized deeply, of course, but ushered out my excited landlady as soon as possible.

EILEEN BÁN.

I.

My dear little Eileen is sweeter to me
Than the odorous flowers of the May-thorn tree;
She has hair golden fair, she has skin like the swan,
And what shall I say to my Eileen Bán?

II.

My dear little Eileen in coarse garb is drest,
Yet it looks ever new, and it seems ever best,
For she's fair, neat, and bright, in whate'er she has on,
And what shall I say to my Eileen Bán?

III.

My dear little Eileen has a heart full of love,
And I scarce think of earth or of heaven above,
But the grace of her face, from the night to the dawn,
And what shall I say to my Eileen Bán?

IV.

I think she's an angel that dropt on the earth,
With her soft sunny smiles and her sweet laugh of mirth,
And I've oft thoughts of fear that she'll some time be gone,
And what shall I say to my Eileen Bán?

V.

I'll meet her next Sunday by fair Avondhu,
When I'll ask her to love me, and marry me too,
And to rove in the grove till the twilight comes on—
And that's what I'll say to my Eileen Bán!

LORD ULLA'S LESSON; OR, THE VOLUPTUARY CURED.
BY GERALD GRIFFIN.

Hang thieves, but I think a nobleman of pleasure would deserve hanging better. The poor pilferer in a dwelling-house may be in a state of starvation at the time when he lays a trembling finger on a silver waiter; but the nobleman plunders at his ease, against his own interest, and that of his country.

She has permitted him to hold a quantity of wealth, sufficient to enable him to spend his life in the study of her laws and government—to travel through other lands, and render himself master of all that is worthy of imitation in their customs and institutions. She has, moreover, invested him with a rank and title that shall confer dignity on all his proceedings, and assist him in filling, with the due effect, his place in the legislature, while they enable him to exercise that influence on the minds of the people, which is necessary to keep them in awe of justice. Conceive, therefore, what is the honesty of a man, who, born to the inheritance of those honours, and those duties, neglects the one, and compromises the other, by a life of indolence and inaction. Yet such, and worse than such, is, I believe, the life of a large portion of the aristocracy. All, or nearly all, the great benefits which are rendered to the State proceed from the body of the people, while a great body of the aristocracy scarcely fill a more useful place than that of shining at a court gala, or drawing room—snirking and cringing in the train of a hired opera singer—filling up half a column of a newspaper, for the amusement of those who take an interest in the migrations of butterflies—and serving the purpose of a mighty outlet, through which the tide of the nation's existence ebbs rapidly away.

The young Lord Ulla was one of those negative plunderers of the State. He had passed his majority without effecting any benefit either to his country or to himself, and did not then seem anxious to repair the time which he had lost. Unfortunately for his own peace, his wealth was so excessive, as to leave no enjoyment, that he cared to indulge in, beyond his reach. From the highest scenes of dissipation, to the lowest of profligacy, he had left none untried, and all alike had ceased to gratify him. He became indolent and apathetic, and found himself, before the beard was yet black upon his lip, in the condition of a man satiated with the enjoyments of sense, and possessing no relish for, or knowledge of, any other of a higher order.

"SCARCE AND GENTLE, SIR, SCARCE AND GENTLE IS THE WAY WITH US."

"I lead a most miserable life," he said to his physician.—"I have tried every species of recreation that the world can afford, and I am tired of them all. It terrifies me to think that I have yet a long life before me without a single object to interest or amuse me. I detest vice: it has disgusted and sickened me, and there is no harmless or useful employment that has the power of affording me a moment's stimulus. What a strange, fantastical body is this in which I am confined! Everything tires and annoys it; even repose itself, the only enjoyment that I now ambition, has become a labour and a torment. But that I think it a base, a cowardly, and ungrateful thing, to fling away a gift that God has bestowed upon me, I would be tempted "To play the Roman fool, and die

On mine own sword."

"I do not know," the medical-adviser replied, as he lifted his brows and tossed his head, "why a man should become tired of answering the ends of his existence. Will you pardon me for intimating that there are diseases wherein the patient must minister to himself, and with this advantage, that his practice, if vigorously put in execution, is certain to be successful. There is a feeling in our nature, which, if judiciously cultivated, would furnish a certain and radical cure for the sense of uncomform which you describe."

"If you mean to hint that I should join the saints,"* Lord Ulla, rejoined, with a frown and a yawn, "I have only to say that I hate cant and hypocrisy."

"And so do I," replied his friend; "you quite mistake me, if you suppose that I would recommend to you to undertake the correction of others, without being invested with the necessary authority. A man has enough to do, who regulates the little moral commonwealth within his own mind, without extending his dominion, unwarrantably, to that of his neighbours. But are there not active duties, which should furnish you with occupation?"

"I have no object to stimulate me to exertion; and labour for labour's sake—you know the apophthegm. Ambition, I have none; I can feel no gratification in the prospect of hearing a few thousand tongues wagging with the sounds of my praise. Why should I care for regulating the affairs of an empire? What is it, but providing for a more numerous family? and what has the nation done for me, that I should pretend to father it?"

The doctor smiled, and remained for a few moments in meditation. "To be candid with you," said he, "I know of no power in medicine that can be available in your case. But if you could prevail on yourself to travel a few hundred miles, I am acquainted with a mineral water on your own estate of Ulla, which I am almost certain would effect a beneficial change in your constitution. Go there, and when you have found the spring, I will send you directions how to use it."

"Go there!—go to Ireland? Is it to be shot from behind a hedge, or have my throat cut in my bed?"

"I do not think there is such manifest danger of that; and even if the journey were not without risk, would it not be better meet death at once, than be frittered out of the world by colds, and indigestions, and nervous idiosyncrasies?"

"I protest you are right," replied the young lord; "but then to leave London now in the blaze of winter—and Pasta and Sontag in town!"

"I thought you said that both had tired you—that there was nothing in London that could supply you with a moment's amusement. The trip will at least have novelty to recommend it."

"I protest you are right again," replied the young nobleman; "I will certainly undertake the journey."

"And if you do so," continued his adviser, "you would do well to perform it incognito, and take with you no other articles of value than are necessary for your expenses on the road. It will be the safest course, and when you arrive in Ulla, you can send to your banker for remittances."

The plan was embraced and executed. Under the unassuming name of Mr. John Johnson, the young Lord of Ulla took his seat in the Bristol coach. He admired (not for the first time) the glories of Bath, as he entered its gloomy vale late at night, when the traveller imagines he is passing through a city of stars; and lights twinkle through the darkness above, around, and beneath him. He grew rapturous on the Avon, bought bookstones and copper ore at the foot of the lofty Clifton hills, felt queer for half a night on board the Nora Creina, and landed safely on the Waterford quay, all wonder, interest, and terror.

Although there was a great crowd of Irishmen upon the quay, he had the good fortune to arrive with life at a small hotel in a retired part of the city, where he immediately hired a postchaise for the interior. He drove rapidly by

"—that lake, whose gloomy shore Skylark never warbles o'er"— and arrived, late on the following day, at the principal inn on his own estate, in a remote and mountainous country.

He was met in the ruinous hall of the house of entertainment by a shrewd-looking man, whose bows and smiles seemed to announce him as the proprietor of the establishment. In compliance with Mr. Johnson's desire, he was shown into a parlour, the dreary regularity and discomforting finery of which chilled and depressed him.

He observed, as he entered, a peculiar and penetrating expression in the landlord's eye; it vanished, however, the instant their glances met.

"You appear not to be troubled with much company here, landlord?" said Mr. Johnson.

"Scarce and genteel, sir—scarce and genteel is the way with us," replied the host, tossing his head.

"Whose is the estate, pray?"

"It belongs to young Lord Ulla, please your honour."

"A good landlord, I suppose?"

The man lowered his face as if to hide a smile.

"Middling, sir," he answered; "middling, as we say, like the small potatoes."

"Why, does he oppress his tenantry in any way for his rents?"

"As for himself, sir," replied the inn-keeper, "we can't say what he is, for our two eyes never perched upon him yet, since the day he was born. But whatever he be himself, the man that does for him† here is no great things."

"You mean his agent?"

"Why, then, I'll not tell you a word of a lie about it, it's the very man I mean."

Mr. Johnson said no more on this subject, but ordered dinner, and gave particular directions about the cookery. After enumerating a long string of dishes which he could furnish, only for something, the landlord named a pair of chickens, together with "the best potatoes in Europe." On this Mr. Johnson thought he could contrive to sustain life for one day.

But he was doomed to fare still worse, for the chickens were overdone. He rang for the landlord, who, it appeared, was his own waiter.

"These chickens are overdone," was Mr. Johnson's first exclamation.

"Overdone, sir!"

"There is not a morsel fit to eat upon the dish, except the liver."

"In earnest, sir?" said the man with apparent concern.

"Take it away," said Mr. Johnson.

"Will I kill a couple more for your honour?"

Mr. Johnson stared. "Are you a cannibal," said he, "that you would kill and eat a chicken on the same day?"

The landlord, looking quite perplexed, removed the chickens, and the young nobleman ordered him to send in tea as quickly as possible.

At this order the landlord remained for some moments as if hesitating about what he should say.

"Please your honour, sir," he exclaimed at length, "what kind of tay would your honour wish?"

"Good green tea, if you have it; I don't suppose I can expect anything better from you."

"Oh, no, sir, 'tisn't that at all I mean, only it's what I mean is, is it rals tay-tay your honour wants, or coffee-tay, or cat-male tay?"

"Tay-tay! coffee-tay!" ejaculated the guest; "I don't understand you. I want tea. Don't you know what tea is?"

"Oh, yes—I see its the tay-tay you mean. I'm sorry to say I can't give you any to-night."

"No tea!" sighed Mr. Johnson; "well, then, send me in coffee, or coffee-tay, as you call it."

† Transacts his business.

* A cant term for public and unauthorised conservators of religious decorum.

"I can't promise your honour that neither," said the landlord, shaking his head; "but if you'd like a drop of the oat-male-tay, an' a fine thing it is, I could give you some of the best in the county."

"Will you answer me one question, friend?" said Mr. Johnson, after pausing for some moments to gather patience.

"As far as my knowledge goes, sir," replied the landlord, with a quiet bow.

"On what do you support your guests in this house?"

"On what heaven gives me, sir, surely, day after day, taking the fling as it comes."

"Leave me these potatoes," said Mr. Johnson; "I see I have nothing better to expect."

"Why then 'twould be droll if you had," said the landlord, "for the whole parish gives it up to them, that they're the best potatoes that was ever dug out of the ground."

In a few minutes Mr. Johnson's bell again summoned the landlord to the parlour. The latter made his appearance, with the same courteous bow, and the same obsequious "What's wanting, please your honour?"

"Have you any listen in the house?" was the query of the guest.

"Listing!" exclaimed the landlord, in a grave and rather lofty tone. "Oh, no, sir, there's none o' my people listing. It's not come to that with us yet, anyway."

"Psha!" replied Mr. Johnson, "I don't mean listing for soldiers; but cloth listen to nail on that door, there's such a draught."

"There's nothing of the kind in the house, please your honour," said the host, shaking his head.

"Well, then, throw on some more turf on the fire, and shut the door after you, which, I perceive, nobody in this house ever thinks it necessary to do."

The man obeyed, and Mr. Johnson began to read a provincial paper which lay on the table. In a few minutes the chimney puffed clouds of smoke, and again the housebell summoned the landlord to the room. He entered at this time with a smile of peculiar mischief and shrewdness.

"Oh! murder, murder!" he exclaimed, "what a mortal sight o' smoke!"

"Well, what's to be done about it?" said his guest.

"Oh, then, I don't know sir," he replied, with much apparent concern, and yet with something like an inclination to smile; "but if your honour would leave the door open—just the weeniest little peep in the world, it will all clear in a minute."

"But then the cold draught, friend—it would be the death of me."

"Well, a dawning piece of the window, then?"

"You stupid man, wouldn't the draught be as bad from the window as from the door?"

"Oh, then, dear knows," exclaimed the man, tossing his hands up in despair. "I'm fairly lost between the whole of 'm. I don't know what I'll do with your honour, nor where I'll put you."

"Give me a light," groaned Mr. Johnson, "and show me to my sleeping-room."

This was done; but a hard bed and scanty covering rendered it only an exchange of one suffering for another. Mr. Johnson resolved that his first measure in the morning should be to change his quarters. What was his astonishment and consternation, however, after he had dressed, to discover that his pocket-book, containing all the money which he had brought with him, was not to be found! Inquiry was fruitless; and the landlord threw out more than one hint of his doubt as to whether any loss had really taken place. This doubly incensed the young nobleman, and made him regret his having ever trusted himself, thus unprotected, in such a land.

Still, however, wishing to preserve his incognito, he resolved to remain for some days at the inn, until he should obtain a remittance from his banker. He wrote accordingly, and gave the letter to the landlord, that he might send it to the nearest post-town. By this awkward circumstance Mr. John Johnson was reduced almost to his last sovereign, and the appearance which he chose to assume for the preservation of his incognito rendered it improbable that any person would be willing to afford him a long credit.

He spent several days within the cover of his apartment, talking with his landlord on the state of the country, and listening, with that fascinating curiosity which attracts interest even while it inspires apprehension, to numberless tales of Rockite murders, post-boys shot from behind hedges, and houses burnt about the ears of the inmates. These narratives contributed, together with the terrific accounts put forward in the alarmist newspapers, to increase his fears a hundred fold, and to make him regret that he had ever ventured his life among so murderous a generation.

He regretted it still more acutely, when, after a second application to his banker, he received no answer, nor acknowledgment of his letter. This circumstance was peculiarly annoying, as, during his sojourn here, he had not rendered himself a favourite with the people of the inn. The air of superiority which Lord Ulla was accustomed to assume, sometimes unconsciously manifested itself in the demeanour of Mr. John Johnson, and the landlord began to feel indignant at his complaints of smoking chimneys, and draughts, and undressed dinners. "Set him up with cookery, indeed!" his guest heard him say, as he left the apartment on one occasion; "I wish I was sure of getting my money for what's past and gone. What I'm thinking is, that the nobles are down to fourpence with him."

One morning, Mr. John Johnson was seated at the breakfast table, on which was placed a quantity of material sufficient to make a considerable company contented. This profusion has always a strange appearance in the eyes of an Englishman, who is accustomed to the Lilliputian frugality that is manifested in the service of a London coffee-house. The door suddenly opened, and the landlord advanced to the table.

"I'd take it as a favour, sir," he said, "if you'd oblige me with the loan of five pounds. There's a neat cow below street at the cant, and I'll want beef against the gentlemen come to the races."

Mr. John Johnson could not conceal his confusion.

"I should be most happy to accommodate you," said he, "but, upon my honour, I—I am quite drained at present. If a few days would answer—"

"No, sir—'twould not answer," the man replied gruffly; "who ever heard of a cow being canted for a few days running?"

"Perhaps," said Mr. Johnson, "if you send your man to the office he would find a letter there for me?"

"Long ago this morning, sir, my man was at the office, and there's nothing for you. I'm tired of sending to the office for you. I'm sorry to say it, Mr. Johnson, but I'm afraid 'tis humbugging me you are, sir."

"Humbugging, fellow!"

"Fellow!" the landlord shouted out, glad of a quarrel; "no fellow for a rogue or a sponge, Mr. John Johnson."

"Why, you scoundrel, what do you mean to insinuate?"

"I mean to insinuate that I have my doubts if you're anything better. That's what I mean to insinuate. And I'll tell you what's more again; I mean to insinuate that there's company coming here to the races, and that I'd be obliged to you if you'd make yourself scarce in these rooms; there's the long and the short of it now."

"Stay, my good fellow," said Lord Ulla, conscious that he was likely to profit little in a contest of this nature; "the fact is, I have written twice to my banker, and, by some mischance, I have not yet been able to obtain an answer."

"Poh! that's the old story always. I declare, look—it sickens me to hear you talking of yourself and your banker. I believe he might put all you ever lodged with him into his waistcoat pocket in small change. You have as much bankers as I have prime ministers, and that isn't one."

"You are an impudent rascal!"

"Cut out of my house now this moment, since you call me an impudent rascal. There's the door open for you."

"Why, you inhospitable fellow, you would not turn me out alone, now, and the country in such a state!"

"Country in a state! And what state is it in Mr. John Johnson? How mighty genteel you are, indeed! Why, then, you may go from this to Cork, and if you'll meet a greater rogue than yourself on the way, I'll give you leave to call me another for company. Pack away with yourself now, if you please."

"Very well! I tell you I can make you repent this."

"You're welcome, as soon as you like. That's what vexes me entirely, now, is the airs you take upon yourself. If it was Lord Ulla himself was there, he couldn't speak prouder, nor give more trouble."

"Why, fool that you are—I tell you that I am——"

"Well, what do you tell me?"

"Nothing. Give me my hat—and take care of my valise until I send my servant for it. What do you sneer at, you scoundrel?"

"Nothing. Only some thoughts that were coming into my mind when you talked of your servant. Why, then, you're the foolishest young man I think I ever saw. Good morning to you. Here, although you didn't behave so well, still I declare you have a touch of a gentleman about you that I like. Here's a paper of sandwiches, and put 'em in your pocket against the road."

Without condescending to return any other reply than was conveyed in a look of fierce anger, Mr. John Johnson left the door of the hotel, and took his way across the mountains, towards the residence of his own agent, which was about fifteen miles from the spot where he stood.

Necessity taught him the art of walking upon the ground, in which, until now, his education had been very deficient. He discovered, also, that he was capable of standing upright in the face of a tolerable gale, by the mere force of gravitation; and actually sustained two severe showers of rain without melting away. Fifteen miles in one day, however, for a person who had not practised walking, was a little too much; and it was with dismay that Mr. Johnson saw the sun go down behind him, while he was yet pacing wearily along the side of a lonely mountain, over which a few wretched cabins were scattered at long intervals. The night threatened to be stormy, and its threats did not prove vain, like those of a bully. His long abstinence had induced him to bestow more reflection on the rejected paper of sandwiches than his pride would have willingly permitted; and the fear of not being able to procure some equivalent formed no small part of his anxiety. Indeed it was unreasonable to suppose that he could procure anything fit to be laid even before Mr. John Johnson, in such a wilderness as this.

The night advanced, and his apprehensions increased with the darkness. He would not venture to ask for a lodging in one of the mountain huts, for how did he know but it was there the Whiteboys lived? And yet, was it so safe to be out on such a night? Who knew but he might run full butt up against a rebel, in the darkness? Horrible! And even if he were fortunate enough to escape, what a terrible thing it was to pass the night out in such a place, with a thorough draught running from the east to the west, enough to give a man his death of cold. He thought of passing the night, like Julius Cæsar, under the shelter of one of the cabin walls; but after leaning in that position for a few minutes, he discovered that he and Julius Cæsar were different men. While he was deliberating, he found himself staggering through a sink of stagnant water, which lay unseens on his path, and arrived with a pint of the liquid in each boot on the opposite side. This made him jump to a conclusion.

The slough in question formed a sort of ornamental lake, in front of one of those mountain villas before mentioned. No other course was now left him than to apply for assistance at the cottage; and, reversing the principle of Hamlet, he chose rather to fly to ills he knew not of, than to bear those ills he had.

The door was opened by a meagre-looking man, in wretched attire, who held a rush-light in his hand, and looked with an expression of surprise and half-forgotten sorrow on the stranger. The squalidness of his appearance caused a coldness to fall on the heart of the young nobleman, who would have preferred damp feet to the chances of a night's lodging beneath the same roof with so ill-looking an individual.

"'Twould not be worth our while to refuse you a lodging," said the man, in answer to his request, "in a house that won't be our own to-morrow. Walk in, and welcome."

Mr. Johnson entered, and showed by his countenance, as he stared round the apartment, that he did not think there could be much hardship in being ejected from such a dwelling as this. A few crazy hay-bottomed chairs, and a small table, constituted nearly all the furniture; and the floor, which was of clay, was moistened into a puddle in most places, from the dropping of the roof.

"Put down the rest of the faggots, Mary, honey," said the man; "let us have the benefit of them for this night, at any rate, since it is to be the last, and there's no use in sparing them, when we can't take them with us."

Two little girls, as pale and squalid as their father, proceeded to re-ignite the expiring embers, by heaping on fresh fuel, and stooping forward on their little hands to illumine it with their breath. This picture, coupled with the surrounding misery, reminded him of the lines in the magnificent poem of "Darkness:"

"They raked up
And shivering scraped with their cold skeleton hands
The feeble ashes, and their feeble breath
Blew for a little life—and made a flame
Which was a mockery; then they lifted up
Their eyes as it grew lighter, and beheld
Each other's aspects!"

The man bade them to put down their supper—a small pot of potatoes which lay near—saying that he supposed "the gentleman had no objection to eat a little, any more than themselves."

Mr. Johnson made as cheerful a reply as he could, under the circumstances, and after making an unnecessary apology, was preparing to draw off his wet boots, when a faint moan from an inside room struck on his ear.

"Is it anything that you'd want, Mary, darling?" said the man, pausing, and holding in his hand the boot which he was about to place in a corner near the fire.

"Nothing, only the rushlight, Ned, until I'll hear little Milly her lesson."

The man asked Mr. Johnson's pardon for leaving him in the dark, saying that his wife was lying sick in the room. When he entered, the young nobleman overheard, with some misgiving, a half-whispered and broken conversation, in the course of which the sick woman, he perceived, was endeavouring to prevail on her husband to grant her some request which he was unwilling to concede.

"But listen here, Ned—can't you, now? what good is it for you? can't you be said by me?"

"Ah! hold your tongue, woman, you'll drive me crazy!"

"But I see by you, now, that you are harbouring something bad in your mind against him. Ned, don't add to my sickness—don't bring down more sorrow on my head."

Mr. Johnson felt very uneasy.

"You poor, foolish woman," the man replied, "I don't know what to say to you. The world would not make you murmur. What chance have we at all of anything but starvation, now, and you don't look as if you thought it."

"I don't think it, I tell you—and if I did what good would it do us to have such thoughts? You say yourself that the rich people have a great deal to answer for, that feast and drink all their days, and fly the face of all suffering; but what would be said of us, when the Almighty sends the means of salvation to our hands, if we refuse to use them? We can't help being poor; if we were to harbour all the revenge, and spite, and envy in the world—if we were to murmur and be sick of discontent, it would not make us one penny richer; it might be a hard thing, and sore against nature to tie ourselves to sorrow, but when we are bound to it by the Almighty's will, surely it is easy to be content with what He ordains. The rich man has a better excuse for not inflicting self-denial, than we have for not enduring it. I declare there's nothing so surprising in the world as that poor people should murmur at all, when it is so easy for them to earn a great reward just by being silent. Now, if you ever loved me, Edward, show that you loved me with a right heart and intention, by bearing every thing to-morrow with patience."

"Listen to me, what I tell you, Mary; I'll do what I can, and what can I do more if I was the Pope himself? Ah! you poor saint, it isn't there you ought to be lying this night. I wish, Mary, I left you where I found you first, in your father's house, and never asked you to suffer such misery as this."

"That's the unkindest word you ever said to me yet," said the woman; "I never repented it yet, and why should you? I had rather be sorrowful and patient with you, than gay and thoughtless with another. Do this for me, and I am satisfied."

The husband re-entered the outer apartment, and took his seat, with a pleased though troubled aspect, by the now blazing fire. He seemed totally forgetful of the stranger's presence, and continued to turn the roots in the simmering water, while his thoughts were evidently bent on another subject. The sick woman, in the mean time, instructed the child in her lesson, which consisted of that beautiful and consoling passage from the Sermon on the Mount, which is distinguished by the name of the "Eight Beatitudes." The lesson was so appropriate in this scene of tears and affliction, that a deep sympathy of mingled hope and pain fell upon the heart of the young lord, while he glanced from face to face of the silent group, and heard the lips of the innocent child echo the cheering promise, that "they who mourn are blessed, for they shall be comforted!"

"The Lord relieve you, poor woman," the husband said, at intervals, as he listened, "and direct them that brought you to that pass, and teach them better. The Lord forgive young Lord Ulla, this day! Five pounds couldn't be so much to him that he'd turn a poor famishing family out on the road in weather like this on account of it. Come, Mary, child, lay the table, and throw out the potatoes before the gentleman."

Mr. Johnson endeavoured, but in vain, to prevail on them to sit down with him, but the peasant was resolute in keeping what he thought his distance. In the course of the entertainment, he made his guest acquainted with the story of their distresses, which threw a considerable share of blame upon the shoulders of the young nobleman's agent, the little holding being situated on his estate. The grievances and oppressions detailed, though common even to staleness, were new and shocking to the ear of the sensitive and not ungenerous voluptuary.

"Indeed he has laid a hard and heavy hand on our house," the man added in conclusion; "but, as the woman within says, there's no knowing what compulsion might be on him to do as he's doing, and we have no right to judge."

The delicate Mr. Johnson was astonished to find that he, whom the refinements of a scientific repast frequently failed in tempting to a cheerful meal, was able without an effort to dine heartily on a plate of plain potatoes, sweetened with a grain of salt. They tasted more sweetly, he thought, than any delicacy he had ever before partaken of. To his great surprise, moreover, he found an armful of dry straw, placed at some little distance from the fire, a more luxurious resting-place than all the upholsterers in the empire could have afforded him.

He was awakened, late on the following morning, by the sound of loud and angry voices in the house. On looking out from behind the projecting partition that separated him from the fire-place, he perceived that the work of spoliation had already commenced. The scene which met his eyes was touching in the extreme. Near the door stood a fat, red-faced man, with a shot-belt round his shoulder and a note-book in his hand, in which he was making some memoranda.

"Come, come, bundle away, Hanrahan, as quick as you can, there's no use in keeping us all day, since you are to quit, and I want to have some cocking in the wood as I go home."

The man was standing at a little distance from the door, the early sunshine falling on his features. His wife, a pale and sickly, but calm-eyed and handsome young woman, hung with both her hands upon his shoulder, while their children, unconscious of the mournful consequences of their ejection, gazed with innocent wonder on the stranger and his attendants. The man exchanged glances with his wife at the speech above written. His look was one of smothered passion; her's was one of affectionate entreaty. He tossed his head; resigned his indignation; and smiled a mournful acquiescence.

"Ho! ho; what have we here?" exclaimed the agent, stirring something that glittered on the floor. "A silver cigar-box! How came you by this, Ned?"

"I don't know," replied the man, "if it doesn't belong to the strange gentleman that was benighted with us last night."

Mr. Johnson here advanced, and claimed his property, mentioning at the same time, in brief and polite terms, the circumstances which compelled him to seek the shelter of so humble a roof as this. While he and the agent were interchanging mutual civilities, a dreadful shower of rain fell outside.

"I'll tell you what, sir," said the poor man, as he bent an anxious eye on his wife, "leave us in the house for a few days, or for this day itself, until we try to get some sort of a lodging. My poor Mary, here, can never stand the weather."

"I can't do it, Hanrahan. I have Lord Ulla's positive directions not to let it go beyond this day; and I have no choice left."

"The Lord forgive that young man," said the husband. "If he's as hard on you as you are on us, you are to be pitied with him. I'll tell you what it is, sir," he added, after a pause, and with a totally altered voice, "I'd consider it nothing less than murdering my wife to go out to-day; and neither for Lord Ulla, nor for you, nor for any other man, will I stir one step, until I have provided a lodging for her at any rate."

"Come, drag them out at once, now," said the agent, snatching his gun.

The man, springing from his wife, who shrieked in terror, caught up a pitchfork that lay on the floor.

"Leave the house," cried the man of power, cocking his piece.

"Never while I live," shouted the peasant, "you'll take me out on a door first! Stand back, woman! I say you shall not go."

"But I am able! I am well, well able!" cried the woman, walking across the room. But the effort disproved her words. She staggered from weakness, and would have fallen, but that her husband caught her in his arms. He looked with a smile of bitter reproach on the agent, while he held her forward, as if by way of appeal to the spectators. The agent understood the action.

"I can't help it," he said; "come, turn them out!"

"Hold!" exclaimed Mr. Johnson. They all held their hands accordingly, obeying they knew not what of authority in his voice, that charmed them.

He requested a word apart with the agent, who followed him into the inner room in some surprise. The rest gazed on one another in silence. In a few seconds Mr. Johnson returned with the step of a lord, and the agent followed him pale and agitated.

"Hanrahan," said the latter, "I have changed my mind about this business; you can remain here for the present, and here is some money for your present use. This gentleman has brought me word that Lord Ulla—that—there was some mistake about his wishes."

The man darted a shrewd glance at Lord Ulla, but perceiving some reproving expression on his features, continued silent, bowing his head down in unaffected reverence, and almost trembling with the agitation of joy and gratitude. Not a word was spoken, until the cabriolet of the baffled deputy drove to the door, and its owner, accompanied by Mr. Johnson, took his seat in the vehicle.

Both sat for some time, the one in embarrassed, the other in meditative silence. At length Lord Ulla asked, in an indifferent tone, whether there were not a certain mineral water in the neighbourhood, much resorted to by valetudinarians?

No such thing had ever reached the ears of the obsequious gentleman who sat beside him. The young nobleman remembered the sharp looks and secret smiles of the landlord, the words and character of his medical friend, and a strange suspicion darted into his mind. The whole had been a scheme concerted between the physician and the innkeeper. The latter had never forwarded the cheques on Lord Ulla's banker, and probably knew more of the abstraction of the pocket-book than he had pretended.

"I hope," the agent resumed, in some trepidation, "your lordship will not attribute the fault—"

"I attribute it where it was due, sir," replied the nobleman.

"The fault was mine."

"Yours, my lord! I think the very last—"

"You drive too slow, sir. Imagine that gray mare to be one of Lord Ulla's tenants, and, if I mistake not, she will be driven faster. You know you want to have some shooting in the wood."

The agent coloured, and discharged his vexation on the sides of the animal. When they arrived at the "great house," Lord Ulla called for ink and paper, and penned the following note to his physician:—

"I have found the spring of which you spoke, and derived so much benefit from the draught I have already taken, that I stand in no need of the code of directions you were kind enough to promise me. It is my intention to remain on my estate during the summer, for the purpose of completely establishing the beneficial alteration which has been already effected. Yours, etc.,

"ULLA."

"P.S.—The English do not know how to dress potatoes. They should be boiled in the rind, and eaten with salt."

On the next morning the suspicions of the young nobleman were verified by a visit from the inn keeper, who came to restore the pocket-book, with all its contents, and the two letters, which, as Lord Ulla had conjectured, never had been forwarded.

"Please your lordship's honour," said the landlord, with many obeisances, "if your lordship blames anybody in this business, 'tis the doctor you'll blame, and not me, for 'tis his bidding I was doing. He wrote me word a few days before you came to do all that I did after, and I made no work about doing it, for I knew that I was safe as long as I was said by the doctor. And this much I'll say for my house, please your lordship's honour, that if ever your lordship comes the way again, you'll have the best of all good treatment, tay-tay, and coffee-tay, and green tay too, and yellow, if there's such a thing to be had, high or low; for 'twas only by the doctor's orders we gave your lordship such poor usage the last time. As for the chimney, it never puffed before nor after, (which is saying a deal,) only that once I just slipped a weeny piece of a tile upon the chimney above, thinking to please the doctor. Indeed, it went sore against my heart to see you cutting away with yourself that morning, please your lordship, and 'tis what the wife I have said to me, and you going out of doors, was, that you'd get your death by it. But as I said to her—Ah! hould your tongue, you foolish woman, says I, do you think you know better than the doctor? Indeed, I'll tell your lordship no lie, 'tis the word the doctor wrote me was to do something to make Lord Ulla feel what poverty was! Is that the way of it? says I to myself; why then, let me alone for giving him a taste of it:—as I did, I'm sure, please your lordship, and more blame to those that put me up to it."

The history informs us, that Lord Ulla prolonged his residence beyond the summer, and discovered, by personal experiment, that the only way to enjoy the real comforts of life is by bestowing them wherever they are needed.

THE FATAL MISTAKE;

OR, THE MARCHIONESS DE VICO.—A TALE OF NAPLES.

ANY of my readers may have been in Italy; and if so, it is ten to one that they have visited Naples, that sunny, quaint, idle, dirty, but magnificent city, filled with fishermen, barbers, lazzaroni, and students; a city which sits like a queen upon the bay called after its own name, under the brightest of bright blue Italian skies.

A few years ago, during a visit which I paid to that city, I met at the house of an Italian friend, the celebrated Marchioness de Vico,—a lady known far and wide through Naples and Castellamare for her piety and charitable works. The elevation and self-command which marked her reserved but dignified manner, while her countenance and expression showed evident traces of a life of silent and secret suffering, inspired me with a restless wish to learn the particulars of her early history. When my Italian friend one evening became more than usually communicative, and relieved my anxiety by telling me the lady's "antecedents," the sum and substance of which I have put into the form of a story.

"I see the mild and quiet melancholy of the Marchioness de Vico," said my friend, "has struck you as it has a thousand other strangers. All who come here wish to learn something of her early life. I will not—I must not—tell you her maiden name, so you must be satisfied if I call her by her Christian name, Rosalie, which she bears after her patron saint, as is the custom of this country. She is now only about thirty years of age, though the trials through which she has gone have added deep lines to her cheeks and years to her face, and to her character as well. She was the only child of one of the first houses in this country, whose name has since become extinct, and the idol of her late father, the Count D'Arpino. She was brought into the world with every advantage, and was educated at home under the tender care of one of the most amiable of mothers, who died about fifteen years ago. As the only child of a wealthy family, and the heiress of a considerable estate, her parents did not wish her to enter into a convent; so while she was still of very tender years they selected as her future partner a youth in every way fitted for her—the young Count de San Carlino, who died a year or two ago. It seldom happens in this country that young people are allowed to form before marriage any very intimate acquaintance with the object of their own, or their parents' choice. But this was otherwise with the young Count and Rosalie, whose childish acquaintance had gradually ripened into intimacy, and had become a strong attachment when she was scarcely fifteen years of age. The young count's mother, however, was of a high and violent character, excessively proud and ambitious, and she desired that her son should ally himself with one of the wealthiest families of Castellamare; and accordingly, though she did not openly oppose the intended marriage, which was settled to take place not very long after the death of Rosalie's mother, still she showed but little partiality towards her future daughter-in-law.

"Every thing, however, went on smoothly till a few days before the marriage; great and splendid preparations were made for the joyous event at the country house of the widowed father, and a life of happiness secured within the reach of Rosalie's intended husband. As is the practice in many countries, the young people were separated for a few days prior to the marriage ceremony. One dare hardly glance at the feelings with which they parted, to meet again, as they fondly thought, in the happiest of unions; love and hope blinding their eyes to every possible chance against the completion of their happiness. But a storm was nearer than they fancied. The very evening before the wedding day, the young Count's mother came to his house, which was already prepared for the reception of the bride, and said, that for reasons, which she would afterwards explain, it had been arranged by herself and Rosalie's father, that the marriage should take place that night privately. Upon his asking what was the meaning of the change, the Countess assigned, as a sufficient ground, that all had been done to spare the feelings of his lovely Rosalie, who shrunk from the public solemnity, and assured him that all the preparations were nearly completed, and that at the appointed hour he would be sent for by Rosalie's father.

"As the clock struck ten that evening, a carriage drove up, and the young Count entered it, and proceeded to the church, supposing that it was his father-in-law's carriage which was in front. He entered the porch, and at the further end, before the dim-lighted altar, he beheld his mother and the bride, the latter covered with a thin veil of silver tissue; and as soon as he reached the altar, the ceremony proceeded. Whether the Count's thoughts were so fully fixed on his present and future happiness, or whether his soul was engrossed with devotion, we cannot say; but he distinguished no one, and though he missed the sight of his intended father-in-law, he received his wife in full confidence from the hands of a friend of his own mother. She was silent and tranquil; and his mother took her home. The cortège parted, and he followed to his house, there to receive, as he fancied, the treasure of his heart.

"He found the saloon illuminated; and his brother and sister, who, on some pretence, had been kept away from the ceremony, seemed to be waiting impatiently with his mother beside the bride. As the door closed after him, his mother withdrew the silver-tissued veil, and revealed to him that his wife was not Rosalie, but a beautiful idiot girl, whose large and princely estates she had long coveted, and whom she had taken this wicked and desperate effort of obtaining for her family. The anguish that followed on this sudden surprise brought the unhappy bridegroom very near the gates of death, and the total loss of her son's reason was very near being the price which the unfeeling mother had to pay for the success of her cruel and diabolical plan. After finding that no means were left to set him free, his sister soothed him at last into a calm submission to his hard fate and to the loss of Rosalie. Of the mother and the idiot-girl I can say nothing. The young Count never saw either of them from that hour; and though one only was guilty, public hatred followed them both with such severity, that they were glad to take their departure from the kingdom of Naples. The guilty artifice prevailed so far, that the mother eventually inherited, the princely wealth of her idiot daughter-in-law; while Rosalie's fate drew more tears than any event in real life ever drew before, even among the passionate and susceptible people of Castellamare.

"Next morning, after the fatal marriage, public proof was brought by the Countess and her friends to the father of Rosalie that his intended son-in-law played the traitor; but, though his faithlessness was admitted, yet, the bride being veiled, none could tell her name. Remedy there was none; and in all the anger which a father's heart can feel at the injury done to a beloved daughter, he took her to his villa, and there explained to her, with as much tenderness as was possible, what he deemed to be the treachery of her former lover. The death-blow—for such it was—to all her hopes of happiness, was such as even fifteen years have not effaced from her interesting countenance; and for two years or more her life hung by a very slender thread. At length the real story was made known to this father, but as her intended was now the legal husband of another, he did not choose the fatal truth to be immediately told to his Rosalie, who, he resolved, if possible, should still return to the world under the protection of a husband, on account of her large property and his own increasing years, in addition to the feeling so widely prevalent in this country, that a young woman should not remain unmarried, except in a convent.

"This matter was easily arranged, as every one knows who is acquainted with society in this country. When she found out her father's real wishes, so strictly in accordance with what had always been put before her as a religious duty, Rosalie consented to enter on a second engagement of marriage; and, accordingly, before she was nineteen years of age, she became the wife of the Marquis de Vico.

"After she had been the wife of the Marquis for about a year, and was already a mother, he unfolded to Rosalie the entire truth—and she only discovered her lover's innocence after she was herself another's. This was, in one sense, the hardest part of her trials; but its effects were far different from what might have been expected; instead of souring or irritating her temper, or rousing in her breast any feelings of disappointment, the cup of misery seemed to have overflowed, and she received the intelligence from her husband's lips as a relief from the bitterness of her early sorrows. Grateful to him for his tenderness and sympathy, she owned that it was both wise and kind to place new duties after her, after making her acquainted with the real source of her misery; and from this nobleness and greatness of mind she never deviated.

"She filled the station of a wife with exemplary fidelity, and was rewarded by the love and respect of her husband, so long as he lived. Now that she is—may we not say twice?—a widow, there is an elevation in her sorrow which attracts the notice of the world; and her griefs being virtuous, and shared by others, there must be support; and this she merits and obtains. In England, doubtless, much sympathy would have been shewn to the husband, but, I think, with less cause; in Naples, there was not a man who had better reason to be proud of his wife; and he chose the lot for himself with his eyes open, and when he could not guess that his choice would end so well.

"As for the unhappy Count, who was the sufferer by the 'Fatal Mistake,' he lived in solitude for several years, but has lately married his sister to a Venetian, and devotes his time to her and her family in the North of Italy."

DON'T FORGET ME, MARY DEAR.

WHEN the summer morning breaking,
Tipt with gold each quivering spray,
And the pretty flowers awaking
Fling their odours to the day;
When the lark on pinions airy,
Chaunts his matins loud and clear;
Don't forget me then, my Mary!
Don't forget me, Mary dear!

When the evening dew is falling
On the sleeping, folded flowers;
And the little birds are calling
To their mates from leafy bowers,
While their sweet notes swell and vary—
Notes that once we loved to hear—
Don't forget me, darling Mary!
Don't forget me, Mary dear!

On our favourite seat reclining,
Where the river ripples by,
As you watch the bright stars shining
In the silent summer sky;
Oh, may some kind, gentle fairy Whisper in my darling's ear—
"Don't forget the absent, Mary!"—
Don't forget me, Mary dear!

E. F.

AN EYE FOR AN EYE.

O you think she will love me less, Tibbot?"

"Well," answered Tibbot, leaning back in his seat beside the bed, whereon his young companion in arms, Walter de Berminghame, lay pale and ill from the wounds he had got in a recent tourney; "well, that depends much, I think, on the way she has loved you heretofore. If Maude le Poer be the girl you have often pictured her to me, she will be true; but then, if she be like those light-hearted dames we met at the last revel in Dublin Castle, I fear for you, Wattie."

"She is light-hearted enough, truly," said Wattie, raising himself uneasily, and looking sadly upon his companion with one eye—he had lost the other in the tourney—"but, then, she has always been leal and good, and will not forsake me for this sad accident—if accident I may call it—for all know that it was done falsely and treacherously by my antagonist."

"It surely was," answered his companion; "for I saw the deed done myself, and can speak fairly on the matter."

"Yes!" resumed the other, darkly, falling back upon his couch, as a twitch of pain shot across his still feverish brow. "Ah! Tibbot, it was an unmanly blow—to strike me when I was unhorsed and helpless on the tourney ground. But, by the good faith of my body, John de Lacy shall pay dearly for it, when we next come face to face!"

"That," said Tibbot Burke, "may occur soon enough, if you are well in time to join the march of my Lord de Berminghame and his army northward. The De Lacys have all joined the standard of Edward Bruce, and there will soon be a battle. Stir up your heart, man, and get well once more, and when we stand side by side in the onset, the best De Lacy of them that comes in front of our spears we will make pay for the unknighly blow."

"I care not to meet anyone but him," resumed Wattie. "From him I have sworn to take what he has taken from me, whenever we meet, be it in peaceful hall or on field of battle. But it is hard for me to get well with this trouble on my mind about Maude le Poer. I have not seen her since that luckless tourney day, but when I do, I fear me that the loss of this poor eye of mine will make a sad difference in her favours. And yet we are betrothed, Tibbot. Surely, she cannot break her vows. And yet," continued he, with a sigh, "I have known others to break them for a far slighter cause."

"Think not upon it," said Tibbot Burke, cheerfully. "Why, man, if a poor fellow depended on his mere good looks now-a-days for getting a wife, he would have but little chance of matrimony. Your Maude will stick to you while you have the money, even had you lost both your eyes."

"I hope so," said Wattie, in a more cheerful tone. "And now, Tibbot, I will pluck up my heart, and who knows but I may be well enough to undertake a journey in a few days. An' I be, my first care will be 'boot and saddle,' and off to Dublin to see Maude."

"Good," answered Tibbot Burke, "and I will accompany you, for I see no use in loitering here any longer, when the whole community is up in arms to repel the Bruce. We can then go both together into the coming battle, where you may meet De Lacy and repay him for the blow that has cost you so much."

A week after, and the two young knights were riding across the Pale, attended by a stout clump of spears, and bound for Dublin, where the army of Lord de Berminghame lay, before commencing its march to the north to meet Edward Bruce, brother to the renowned Robert Bruce, King of Scotland. Edward Bruce at this time, after proclaiming himself King of Ireland, was supported by several native princes, together with many of the most powerful Anglo-Irish lords.

It was a bright autumn evening as Wattie de Berminghame and Tibbot Burke, at the head of their spearmen, approached the western gate of Dublin. The two young knights were what was called brothers-in-arms. That is, a mutual friendship was sworn between them, and each, by his vow, was bound to defend and aid the other in all straits and misfortunes with his worldly gear, with his sword, and with his very life in cases of extremity.

As the two young knights rode onward by the Liffey shore towards the ancient city, they beheld the whole sloping plain from the river to where Philaborough now stands, covered with tents, amidst which many a bright spear-point glittered in the rosy light of the descending sun, and many a gay banner fluttered that bore the arms and cognisances of the stout lords and barons of the Pale, who were then gathered with their strongest muster, waiting for Lord Bermingham to lead them forth to battle.

"Lead the men forward, and procure them a place to camp for the night," said Wattie Bermingham. "Meanwhile, I will push on for the city, ere the gates are closed."

With these words he rode down the busy streets of the city, his mind in a strange tumult at the thought of meeting so soon with the lovely Maude le Poer, who was one of the handsomest and richest dames of the Pale. At length he halted before a huge stone mansion, and there, giving his horse into the care of his gilly or squire, he entered beneath the massive porch, and was soon in the presence of his lady-love.

"How did she greet you, Wattie?" asked Tibbot Burke, as his companion joined him after next morning's reveille.

"I faith, agreeably enough," answered De Bermingham—"pleasanter than I thought, notwithstanding my disfigurement."

"Tush!" said Tibbot. "Call it no disfigurement, man. I warrant me that your other eye will be sharp enough to pick out your foe from the Bruce's ranks during the battle, which they have told me is sure to take place."

"Doubtless, but it will," returned his companion; "for I think, an' I were stricken blind altogether, I could still pick him out amongst a thousand, for two reasons."

"Methought," said Tibbot, "that you had but one reason for encountering De Lacy—namely, to avenge yourself for the loss of your eye."

"An eye for an eye I surely will have," answered De Bermingham. "But I now have another reason for trying a mortal tilt with De Lacy, and that is Maude le Poer's command!"

"Good!" said Tibbot Burke, in high admiration of the warlike parting-word of Maude. "May heaven send me a high-spirited wife like that. But—ha! there sound the clarions warning us to prepare for march. You will soon have an opportunity of executing the command of your lady-love."

In the centre of the camp was a large pavillion, in front of which stood the great standard of Lord John de Bermingham, general of the Anglo-Irish army. Before this standard the general, in full armour, was seated upon his horse, his principal knights and barons around him, giving the various orders for the march. The tents were soon struck, and the followers of the different leaders arranged in stern array behind their various ensigns. It was a splendid scene. The fresh morning sun glittered on numerous spear-points, and flashed incessantly from polished corselets and plumed helmet, and the early breeze, as it blew up the plain, wafted upon its wings the farewell cheer of the thousands who thronged the strong ramparts and battlements of Dublin, as the army, after extending itself into one long line, with a last wild burst of pipes and clarions, took its way northward to the battle-field, whence many of those who filled its numbers were never fated to return.

Wattie Bermingham and his brother-in-arms, with the spearmen they led, marched on with the centre body, which was commanded by the general in person.

"As for me," said Tibbot, "I expect my spurs at last, for I am sure it will be a gallant fight."

"And I also," returned his companion. "I will either win my spurs or die."

It was a calm, sultry noon when the two hostile armies came in sight of each other at a place called Faughard, near Dundalk. The Scots were inferior to the Irish in point of numbers, but then they were led by experienced and renowned generals, and expected a complete victory in the contest, which soon commenced. Lord de Bermingham, who was also a brave and practised general, had taken up an advantageous position at the foot of Faughard hill, and, when the first line of the Scots rushed obliquely upward to attack him, his heavy-armed knights and spearmen drove them back with considerable loss into the hollows. By a simultaneous movement on the part of the two leaders both the armies, wings and centres, at last came together with a terrible shock, and mingled in the confusion of a general battle.

As young de Bermingham and his friend passed out to the front in order to seek some opportunity for distinguishing themselves, they beheld an Anglo-Irish knight, named John de Maupas, several spear-lengths before them, riding in full tilt against Edward Bruce, who, according to his wont, fought in the van of his army. Bruce and some of his knights were at the moment engaged in a hand-to-hand encounter with the Irish general and a few of his principal leaders, when de Maupas, coming up, struck his spear through the neck of the Scottish prince, and bore him to the ground, where he was trampled to death by the raging horses. Alan, Lord Steward, who was by the side of the Bruce, whirled round his huge two-handed sword, and with one blow slew De Maupas, who fell over the body of him he had so lately vanquished.

"Look! look!" exclaimed Wattie Bermingham, eagerly, as the combatants now swayed to and fro and grappled with one another man to man. "See Tibbot! There goes the De Lacy's banner beneath in your boggy hollow. Follow me, for I must find him!" and with that he spurred downward, and was just in time with his friend to join in an attack which the Irish were making on foot, upon the left wing of the Scots in the swampy hollow. And now his heart bounded with a fierce delight, as soon after dismounting he was brought in the rushing a tack almost face to face with his hated foe young De Lacy, kinsman to the earl of that name, who was that day fighting on the part of Edward Bruce. About three paces in front of him stood Tibbot Burke, engaged in a deadly struggle with a gigantic Scottish knight, who seemed to be the comrade of young De Lacy. Poor Tibbot went down with a loud clang, mortally wounded before the Scotaman, who in turn was brought to his knee and slain by the heavy sword of De Bermingham, as the latter bestrode the body of his brother-in-arms.

"Yield thee, thou blind dog!" shouted young De Lacy, tauntingly, as Wattie now turned to him.

The answer was a heavy blow upon the shoulder and then a thrust in the eye from De Bermingham's long sword. The weapon went right through the brain of De Lacy, who fell dead almost without a groan.

"An eye for an eye!" shouted De Bermingham, "and now God and my lady love assist me in earning my spurs!"

He dashed quickly into the thickest of the enemy, and performed such deeds of valour, that, ere night, when the Scots were completely routed, he was knighted by his kinsman, Lord de Bermingham, in the presence of the assembled leaders of the army, amongst whom was the father of Maude le Poer. To the latter he was married some time after, and the only regret he felt on the bridal day was, that his faithful brother-in-arms, the gallant but luckless Tibbot Burke, was not alive to be a witness of his happiness.

TERMON MAGRATH CASTLE.

THE Castle of Termon Magrath, or Termon, as it is more usually called, is situated at the northern extremity of Lough Erne, about half a mile to the west of the pleasant little town of Pettigo, county of Donegal. Like most of the edifices of the kind erected in the sixteenth century, it consisted of a massive keep, of great strength, with circular towers at two of its angles, and encompassed by outworks. During the Parliamentary Wars it was besieged by Ireton, who planted his batteries on the neighbouring hill, and did it considerable damage. According to popular tradition, its foundation is ascribed to the celebrated Malmurry, or as he was usually called, Myler Magrath, and Dr. Petrie says there is every reason to believe this tradition correct. The lands on which the castle is situated anciently constituted the Termon of St. Daveog of Lough Derg, of which the Magraths were the hereditary termoners, or custodians of the church lands. Of this family Myler Magrath was the head. He was a churchman of distinguished abilities, and according to a tradition amongst the peasantry was the handsomest man in Ireland in his day. He died at Cashel, of which see he was archbishop, in the year 1622, at the age of one hundred, and was interred in the choir of that ancient cathedral, where the monument to his memory still exists, with a Latin inscription penned by himself. The scenery in the immediate vicinity of the Castle is very beautiful, the shores of the lake being fringed with the plantations of the glebe of Templecarn, and those of Waterfoot.

THE BLACK DOCTOR.

CHAPTER V.

AFFLICTION, when it comes on the wealthy and opulent, is a terrible disaster, because they are not prepared for it. It is not en suite, and furnishes too strong a contrast to the refinements and luxuries by which they are surrounded. Death and sorrow are more keenly felt by the affluent than the poor, and misfortune in any shape to those whom "fortune" has favoured, is regarded as a thing that should be elsewhere, and only fitted for places where poverty and indigence have made their home. The residence of Colonel Stammers had been for the past two days a house of mourning, as within it were two whose hearts were "full and heavy" of great apprehension and terrible suspense. They were the wife and sister of Robert Stammers—the nephew of the old colonel and the boon companion of the Black Doctor. There was a kind of a quiet, drowsy solemnity about the houses in the street in which Colonel Stammers resided, and it would appear that all the people who lived in this fashionable neighbourhood sought to make themselves as miserable as possible in their efforts to differ as much as they could from less fashionable persons living in other localities.

They dined when other people were taking their tea, and very often concluded their supper when other people were thinking of having their breakfast. To differ from parvenus was regarded by the dwellers in Elm-place to be one of the duties of their lives. The servants spoke with that subdued gravity that becomes the domestics of "distinguished circles." The men who delivered milk and bread, seemed to recognise the importance of the place when they drove into it, and even the vendors of bog oak, firewood, turf or free-stone, sang piano, when within the influence of the high massive houses, that shut out the sunlight as a kind of vulgar intruder, that had no right to be in Elm-place. Beneath large flights of steps leading to large hall doors, with ponderous knockers, were deep pits, something like the places in which members of the Bruin family are kept, in zoological collections. This illusion was sustained by the huge iron railings, by which the foundation storeys of the houses were guarded from intrusion, and many looking at the substantial character of the iron work, would be led to suppose that the lower department of each house was intended for the safe keeping of members of families who may get demented. The house in which Colonel Stammers resided, was even more solemn in its external appearance than the other mansions in the locality, and a person looking at it, would, from the apparent absence of life within it, be led to suppose that it had been furnished for a family who had not come to dwell in it.

The Black Doctor drove up to the footway, and telling the driver of the chaise to wait for him, he ascended the steps, and knocked at the door. A prim-looking servant dressed in black, and wearing a white cravat, threw the hall-door wide open.

"Is Mrs Stammers at home?" said Bramble, as he entered, and placing his hat on the hall table; without waiting for a reply, he added, "Tell your mistress that a gentleman is here, a friend of Mr. Robert Stammers, and that his business is most urgent and important."

The servant, by his manner, showed that he felt he had made a mistake, as he bowed most obsequiously, while conducting the Black Doctor to an apartment, exquisitely furnished and decorated.

Bramble seated himself on a chair, and as he looked upon the magnificent works of art which adorned the walls, on the rich furniture and draperies, he said to himself, "What a queer world—this is Bob Stammers' home, he who is now lying maimed in the hovel of Joey Dix, the dog fancier." He rose from his seat, his eye having been attracted by a miniature of his friend, which hung over the marble mantel-piece. "Poor fellow!" soliloquised the Doctor, "you were not as you now are, when that was painted. What remains of this day and to-night will decide your fate." While he was turning over the leaves of one of a number of elegantly-bound volumes that lay on a table, two ladies entered the room. Bramble bowed respectfully, as the elder of the two approached and said:

"I am Mrs. Stammers, and I have heard that you are a friend of my poor husband's. Where is he? tell me. This is his sister," continued Mrs. Stammers, as she pointed to her companion. "You need not fear telling me anything you know of him, as I am already aware of the fearful position in which he has placed himself. What folly or madness could have driven him to commit a crime so great, he who I believed was the soul of honour! His uncle knows nothing of this matter, and his sister and myself are all, save yourself, within the house who know the fearful truth. Be seated, Doctor Bramble," continued the lady, as she proceeded to close the door. "Although I have never seen you before, I have heard my husband speak of you as his friend. He has also written to me to say that you are aware of all."

Mrs. Stammers was apparently not more than a few years past twenty. She was eminently handsome, and there was a feminine grace in her manner, which was most prepossessing. Her complexion was exceedingly fair, and her light brown hair hung in wavy ringlets from beneath a silk band, fastened with a diamond clasp. Her soft expressive blue eyes bore evidences of recent weeping, and as she stood in the presence of Bramble, he thought that he had never seen anything so lovely in his life.

Charlotte Stammers was a charming-looking brunette, just approaching the years of womanhood. On her exquisitely-formed face there was an air of subdued sadness, and from time to time, she would fix her dark luminous eyes on Bramble, for the purpose of seeking if she could read anything that spoke of hope for her brother, to whom she was deeply attached. Both ladies were dressed in all the simplicity of elegance, and in the prevailing fashion of the time.

"Tell me, I entreat you," said Mrs. Stammers, addressing Bramble, "all that you know of my poor husband. Conceal nothing from me; I am prepared for the worst. His has been a hard fate. Without the temptation of poverty or urgent necessity, he has committed a fraud which I know imperils his life. He had home, friends, and all that could make life dear to him in his two children. Doctor Bramble, the mother of these two children will go mad, if some means are not pointed out to remedy this terrible misfortune. How is he? Where is he?" asked the half-distracted woman, as she rose from her chair, and approached the Black Doctor.

"I have come," said Bramble, "to tell you that he is well, and safe from all fear of detection. Some means must be adopted to get the bill out of the hands of the Jew."

"I have written to Isaacs," replied the lady, "and offered him twice the amount of that terrible bill, but he refused to give it up."

"Give him all the jewels which my poor mother left me when she was dying," said Charlotte—"give him everything to save poor Bob."

"Mrs. Stammers," observed Bramble, "do you come with me to the Jew, and perhaps, by making personal application, he may consent to the terms which you have offered him. I have a chaise at the door, and we can drive to his house."

Mrs. Stammers readily assented, and in a few minutes the Black Doctor and the lady were on their way to see Abraham Isaacs, the money-lender.

In a small dingy parlour behind a toy shop, in a leading thoroughfare, sat a thick-set, heavy-looking man, who seemed to be about thirty-five years of age. His hooked nose, short upper lip, and pursy mouth, betrayed the fact that he was a Jew. He wore a profusion of gold ornaments and jewellery. However, there was a slovenliness about his dress and manner that showed that he was not long accustomed to the possession of wealth. He commenced life as a purchaser of old clothes. Day after day he amassed money until he had acquired sufficient capital to open a shop, in which he sold toys and mock jewellery. He eventually became a money-lender, and those whose follies or vices embarrassed them, always found their way to the shop of Abraham Isaacs, where bills were accepted, and cashed at a fabulous amount of interest. The shopkeeper or trader, as well as the spendthrift, had recourse to Abraham in their need. In all his money dealings there was nothing he would sooner become possessed of than a forged bill. He made well by forgeries, as he could always make his own terms before he would give up the fraudulent documents to the drawers. He was now seated on a high-backed chair at a table, over which were strewn heaps of law papers. He was examining the contents of a long black pocket-book, when he was disturbed by the entrance of Mrs. Stammers and the Black Doctor. Abraham having bowed the visitors to chairs in his best style, inquired of the lady what he could do for her?

"I am the wife of Mr. Stammers, whose bill I hear you hold."

"It is not his bill, ma'am," said Abraham, "it belongs to the law. He tried to cheat me, but he can't. It is a forgery."

"Even so," said the lady, "I will give you twice the amount if you give it to me."

"No," said the Jew, "that would be compromising a felony. I tell you what I will do. Give me a thousand pounds, and there shall be no more about it. If you don't like to do what I say, I will hand this bill which I have here to the sheriff as a forgery."

While Abraham was delivering himself of these observations, he slapped the big black pocket-book with his right hand.

Bramble thought what he would give to have an opportunity of seizing the document, on which the life of his friend depended. At last some sudden thought seemed to strike him, and he fell into one of his old contemplative moods.

The Jew followed up what he thought was an advantage, and he pointed in the most glowing colours the certain arrest and conviction of Mr. Stammers, until the lady was wrought up to the frenzy of fear for her husband's safety.

"Give me only a week, and I pledge myself to you, that you shall have what you require. I will give you twice the amount of the bill now, and the rest in the time I tell you. Give it to me, and have mercy on me, who never did you wrong. I would let you have this day what you demand, but I am afraid to tell his old uncle of it." The lady caught the hand of the Jew as she looked imploringly in his face and said, "You will not be so hard on the unfortunate as to refuse me the request I make."

Abraham was inexorable, and he coldly answered the lady by saying, "I told you what I will do, and I will do nothing else."

"Then we are lost!" said Mrs. Stammers, bursting into tears.

The Black Doctor, who had calmly listened to the conversation, said, "There is no help for it; the thousand pounds must be paid, and it is better to pay it to-night."

"I think so," observed Abraham.

"My friend will have the money for you. Do you know the 'Three Jolly Travellers,' a house kept by a man named Brunt?"

"I do," replied Abraham. "I know it a long time."

"Then, be there at nine o'clock to-night," said Bramble, "and you shall get the thousand you demand."

"Where, doctor, is the money to be got?" asked the lady, "particularly at this hour of the day. Perhaps Mr. Isaacs will give us until to-morrow evening?"

"No," said Bramble, "it must be paid to-night," as he looked knowingly at the lady. "A practical joke has been played on you, Mr. Isaacs; and, while I admit that you are levying a large fine, you must be paid. Now, what do you say to striking for seven hundred and fifty?" asked the doctor.

"I know you to be an honourable gentleman," replied the worthy addressed, "but I will take nothing less than a thousand."

"I suppose it must be so," observed the Black Doctor. "Stammers is in your power at any time, and he is getting off cheaply enough. It will be a lesson to him while he lives. Mind, Mr. Isaacs, nine o'clock, at the 'Three Jolly Travellers.'"

"I will be there, with the bill," said Abraham, "at that time," as he opened the door leading to the shop. Mrs. Stammers and the Black Doctor took their departure for Elm-place.

While the chaise was driving rapidly along the streets, Mrs. Stammers, who was quite astounded at the off-hand and independent manner assumed by Bramble when addressing the Jew, said, "Doctor, where is the money to come from, which you have promised to pay this night?"

"It shall be paid, and in full, if I can help it; and, as time presses, I will now leave you at your house. You will see Mr. Stammers soon, and will you give my best respects to his sister?"

The lady having alighted from the chaise in Elm-place, Bramble drove quickly in the direction of the residence of Joey Dix, the dog-fancier, where Bob Stammers was anxiously inquiring for him. On arriving at the corner of a secluded street, he told the driver of the chaise to wait for his return. It was now fast approaching night-fall, but, notwithstanding, Bramble observed the greatest caution as he went his way to the residence of Dix. He knocked at the door, which was opened by Tony Johnson.

"I want you particularly this night, Tony," said Bramble; "you will have a great job to do for me."

"All right," said Tony, as his eyes sparkled with delight.

"You say that you know Isaacs?" said the doctor, addressing him. "You must bring me a large black pocket-book which he will have about him when he will be coming to the 'Three Jolly Travellers' to-night. Watch him from his own door until you get him into a lonely place, and make off with what I want. He generally carries it in his side coat pocket, and I must have it this night. Go," continued the doctor, as he handed him some money, "and get something to eat and to drink, but don't tell your business to any body. You are not to say when you return to John Brunt's that you have seen me this evening. You may go now, and I expect that you will do your work well."

Tony pulled down his white hat over his eyes, and taking the long skirts of his coat under one of his arms, scampered away.

Bramble then entered the wretched apartment where Stammers was lying, in the extreme of mental torture and physical suffering.

"I have been anxiously waiting for you for some hours," said Stammers. "Have you seen my wife and sister—have you any news—what about that accursed bill? I have died twenty deaths since you have been here. Oh! how I have suffered for my folly. Look around you, and say in this a place for Bob Stammers. Let them drag me to jail—who was the cause of it?" The sick man laughed hysterically as he threw his right arm across his aching head. "I would be up before now," continued he, "only for this maimed leg."

"Hush, Stammers," said the doctor, "don't be a fool. We will leave this within a quarter of an hour. You will be acting wisely if you do my bidding. Mary, come here," said he, addressing Joey Dix's daughter. The girl came from the corner of the room in which she had been sitting and approached Bramble, who said to her, "Go down the lane and turn to the right, you will see a man in charge of a chaise, tell him to bring it to the door."

Bramble went to work actively for the purpose of making his patient fit to go the journey from a lane in the south liberties of Dublin to Mud Island, situated at the other extreme of the city. The rumbling of the wheels in the lane soon told the Black Doctor that the girl had found out the place where he had left the chaise.

"Not a moment is to be lost," said he, as he raised his friend from his bed, and taking him in his arms he bore him to the vehicle which was in waiting at the door. "Tell your father I was asking for him," said Bramble, addressing the girl, as he jumped into the chaise, and told the coachman to drive to Dudley-lane, a locality which recent improvements have obliterated.

"I was unjust, Bramble," said Stammers, "when I spoke cross to you, but my mind is distracted, and I am in great pain."

"Every thing will be right soon," replied Bramble; "but you must 'rough it' for this night, at least, among the denizens of Mud Island. I know the King. In Mud Island you will be safe; Joey Dix's was surrounded by dangers."

THE BOTANIC GARDENS AND THEIR NEIGHBOURHOOD.

HERE is no fairer village in the land than Glasnevin, of old and classic memory; none shall there be more frequented of the footsteps of our city toilers, thanks to the relaxation which has made them free of its beautiful Botanic Gardens, on that one day which must be perforce, from their necessities, at once their day of rest and their day of recreation. Sometimes it may be when they have journeyed to this spot of popular pleasure, they may go beyond the gate of those gardens, ere they enter within, for the sake of a walk along the quiet road which has not been disdained by the tread of Swift, of Addison, of Stella, which has echoed the caustic aphorisms of the gloomy Dean of Saint Patrick's, which has rung to the lighter sarcasm of Parnell, and gave back the gentle and graceful accents which dropped from the lips of the author of Cato.

We must confess to an old habit of loitering on the bridge which spans the Tolka, just at the foot of the village, and which separates Old Glasnevin, on its further side, from New Glasnevin on its higher bank, and we must plead guilty to a desire that others should do the same. Since the first time we have lingered there we have wandered to the origin of the brawling stream, which frets and flows beneath those arches, and saw it as it rose clearly, bubbling from its springs amid the green cattle pastures of rich Meath. So, often as we look across the parapet wall down upon the pellucid waters, our thoughts retrace its devious course back to many a far meadow, where the lambs are bleating at eventide, and herds of cattle low softly along its banks. Thus as we hear the murmur of the river, fancy rises in the ascendant, and imagination sways its way even into Dreamland and realms of Faëry. Said not the German poet well when he exclaimed under the influence of some such spell—

"But what do I say of a murmur, Which can no murmur be—
'Tis the water-nymphs are singing
Their roundelay to me."

We are beguiled by the invisible syrens far from Glasnevin in such mood, but retrace our roving, once more to remember its peculiar sublimary associations.

The "Annals of the Four Masters" have record of Glasnevin, in detailing the death of its abbot Berchan, in the year 544. Berchan was a poet, and wrote sacred songs. He also penned a record of Saint Bridget. We have puzzled our brains many a day, to think where his Abbey stood, of which there is not now, nor for many a hundred years has there been, one stone standing upon another. Where does the dust of Berchan lie, we marvel? In what spot amid all those undulations of mead and cornfield, of wood and wold, is the abbot laid with his monks? Somewhere by the river-side no doubt, where the plash and drip of the water make most sweet lullaby for the sleepers, among the dead and gone.

In 1178, we find in the same annals that St. Laurence O'Toole, Archbishop of Dublin, made a grant of a third part of Cloghnei, a third part of Killalen, Lealuan, Glasneodan and Magdurnia, to the Church of the Holy Trinity, to enjoy and possess for ever. By a bull of Pope Alexander this grant is confirmed in the year 1179, and in the bull we find this old place particularized as "Glasneodhen of the mill." 'Woe worth the day! the clatter of the mill is long silent, though the stream that turned its wheel goes by dancing as gaily in the sun, or surging as roughly to the wind as in the days when Pope Alexander memorialized Glasnevin by its mill. Gone is the miller—gone his household—gone the mill, and the river is witness of the change; whilst the church of the Holy Trinity still possesses the land whereon the mill ground the corn of the Irish denizens of the neighbourhood, in those quaint old times.

From the bridge where we gossip thus, the distance to the little church is not far, and here it was that Dr. Delany, the friend of Swift—his host and companion—officiated in days when Irish land revered no name more sincerely than that of the erratic Dean. The little grave-yard of the church contains the bones of Delany, and a wall divides his grave from his former residence—Delville. Delville has been commemorated by Swift in verse, and it yet contains memorials of him and his. A little temple stands amid its walks inscribed with the motto "Fastigia despicit urbis." Opposite the entrance within it is a medallion of Stella, injured and worn by time. The living Stella herself has trod amid those garden paths, bearing in her heart of hearts that grim secret of her peculiar connexion with Swift, which wore her life out at last. What must it have been? Did her thoughts run like those of that fair dame in the lowland ballad—

"Proud Maisie is in the wood,
Walking so early;
Sweet Robin sings on the bush,
Singing so rarely.

Tell me, thou bonny bird,
When shall I marry me?
When six braw gentlemen
Kirkward shall carry ye.

Who makes the bridal bed,
Birdie, say truly?
The gray-headed sexton
That delves the grave duly.

The glow-worm over grave and stone
Shall light thee steady;
The owl from the steep's sing—
Welcome, proud lady!"

Well! the Dean of St. Patrick's and the fair Stella have been united long ago,—the grave has joined them, and their dust has mingled in its union. Peace to their memory; the one was a great soul somewhat warped by circumstance from its greatest purpose; the other was a true woman—very fair—loving much and sorrowing greatly. For the sake of the patriot we reverence her he loved—but for the sake of her patient tenderness in all the bitterness of her mysterious fate, we must have a feeling deeper and holier for that womanly nature, so fond, and so incomprehensible in its fondness.

Leaving the bridge and its associations, let us return to the Botanic Gardens. Pleasantly falls the sunlight of the Sabbath evening on tree and flower, and more pleasantly still, on the gathered groups along the walks. Here on this rustic seat let us tell the story of the institution of this "pleasance," as old Chaucer would call it.

In the year 1790, the members of the Royal Dublin Society first conceived the idea of a Botanic Garden, and having made application to the Irish Parliament, received from it an annual grant up to the year 1794, of £1,700, for the purpose of providing and maintaining a Botanic Garden. A committee, composed of members of the Society, having been appointed, pursued this object until 1795. In March of that year, the Lord Bishop of Kilmore, on behalf of that committee, reported that after examining several sites they had found none so eligible as ground at Glasnevin, held by Major Tickell from the Dean and Chapter of Christ's Church Cathedral. The demesne had belonged to Tickell the poet, and the house on the ground was that in which Addison resided when he came over to this country as private secretary to the Marquis Wharton in 1714. Tickell was assistant secretary, and afterwards, on Addison's death, became the literary executor of that eminent man. The professor's house was his residence, and in one of its apartments he composed his poetical piece of Colin and Lucy. Further up through the garden—if we pursue the walk by the river to its termination—we pass into that memorial as the favourite of Addison. Here he has passed many a quiet and thoughtful hour pacing its boundary "with solemn step and slow," indulging in those musings which have left the most graceful impress upon English literature. If ghosts revisit this orb, as men have said, in "the pale glimpses of the moon," what spot could be more grateful to the wandering shade than this! Shadowy trees over-arch it solemnly—voice of falling waters murmurs near with mysterious cadence—and the winds drift in fitful gusts through the whispering leaves above.

In consequence of the report of the Committee of the Royal Dublin Society, this ground was obtained as desired. In the years 1798 and 1799, Parliament appropriated a further sum of £1,800, and in the year 1800, it assigned £1,500 for the garden, and for its purpose of giving agricultural instruction. With this intention it appointed a professor of botany, and Dr. Wade was the first who held the appointment. The prospectus was issued about the same time, and it details the divisions or classification of the departments of the Garden. Those were, as we find them in this plan, the Linnaean Garden, the Scientific Garden, the Botanic Garden, the Cattle Garden, the Hay Garden, the Irish Garden, and the Dyer's Garden. So far we find that the establishment had become an accomplished fact. In its progress to this point, it owed most of its success to the efforts of a man whom Ireland yet remembers—Mr. Speaker Foster. He it was who sat in the Speaker's chair of the House of Parliament on the evening when the Union was carried. In the creation of this establishment, for public benefit, we have yet a standing memorial of his desire to advance the elevation and progress of his countrymen.

In 1802 we have the first published catalogue of the Botanic Gardens. It contains a plan of the hot-houses and conservatories then erected. They were five in number, and were divided into a centre and wing-houses, and they stood on the site now occupied by the walk which leads from the entrance gate to the Octagon house. They were built facing the west, and remained until the year 1817, when having been reported faulty, they were removed. In the year 1804 the committee reported that a sum of £9,746 had been expended on the arrangement of the gardens during the four preceding years. The first necessary arrangements may now be considered as being made complete, and we find that the business of the gardens was carried on without much extra cost until the year 1815, when Mr. Thomas Pleasants, a member of the Dublin Society, built the two gate lodges at his own private cost. A report was made soon after to the Society, that the construction of the principal range of hot houses was very imperfect for their object, and their removal was recommended. This was effected during the two years 1817 and 1818, and in the year 1819. The Octagon house was built in 1819 to accommodate a splendid specimen of the Norfolk Island Pine, which plant unfortunately was lost in the process of its removal. In the year 1826, Doctor Wade, the veteran professor of botany, and one of the zealous founders of the institution, died, and Dr. Litton was appointed in his stead. The principal departments of the garden remained still under the same arrangement as at the time of the prospectus issued in 1800; but in 1834, owing to the advanced age of Mr. Underwood, the curator from the commencement of the establishment, Mr. Niven was appointed to that duty, and on his assuming office, the old plan of the garden was broken up.

In consequence of the new arrangement, the splendid range of curvilinear wrought-iron conservatories were built, at a cost of upwards of £5,000. Four thousand pounds were contributed by the Government, in two sums granted for the purpose. The plan of the first house was drafted by Mr. Ferguson, the head master of architectural drawing in the Government School of Art. All the other houses were designed by Frederick Darley, Esq. The workmanship of all the houses planned by Mr. Darley, was carried out by the eminent iron-founder, Mr. Turner, of the Hammersmith Works, except the first, which was constructed by Cloney.

In 1846, Professor Litton died, and his chair has since been occupied by Dr. Harvey, who delivered two courses of lectures annually, one at the House of the Royal Dublin Society, Kildare-

Street, and the other at the Botanic Gardens. This arrangement continued until 1854, when a change was made by the Government respecting the professorship and his lectures of office. At present they are delivered by Professor Harvey, partly at the Royal Dublin Society's house, partly at the Botanic Gardens, and partly at the Museum of Industry, Stephen's Green.

The funds for the support of the Botanic Gardens were mainly supplied out of the sum annually voted for the Royal Dublin Society, until the year 1854. Since that time it has been included in the vote for educational purposes in connection with the Board of Trade. When the vote for the Royal Dublin Society was reduced from £10,000 to £5,300, this institution suffered from the retrenchment in common with the other establishments under that Society. However since 1854 it has been more prosperous. The gardens cover an extent of ground, in the gross, amounting to thirty-one statute acres. The exquisite taste and fortunate arrangement in which it is laid out, need no encomium from us. The soil is favourable for the growth of most plants, except, perhaps, to some species from the American continent, being mainly extended on that geological strata, known as calpe limestone. The abundance and variety of the vegetable productions, fostered within its limits, will be soon a matter of common notoriety, as the gardens become more and more familiarized to our people. We are of those who augur the best results from the facilities which they afford to our working-classes, in the new arrangement which throws the gates open to them on Sundays. We not only believe that the toilers in our city will derive health and pleasure from the concession to their necessities, but we are certain educational improvement must follow. The stimulus which is afforded to the working man by the opportunity to study the science of botany in its very seat, will not, we are assured, be lost by him. In other countries, from the working-classes have issued some of the greatest names in the repertory of knowledge, simply because of the opportunities afforded them for obtaining it. France has her Cuvier, second to none in comparative anatomy; America could boast of her Burrit, distinguished in philology; Scotland tells, in her rugged genius, of the geological research of Hugh Miller, the mason of Cromarty; and England has a thousand memorials of the efforts in mechanical science of all those hard-handed, large-brained sons of labour, who have issued from her factories, from the days of George Wedgewood down to those of the last and greatest—George Stephenson. Perhaps in days to come, our own land may have to speak of some name with pride, from the same ranks as those distinguished men, which may be symbolical of the enlargement of our ideas in the circle of that science which preaches of the wisdom of God, in the teachings it draws from the flowers in our path or the grasses at our feet, more wondrous, in their exquisite organism, than all the art of man hath created, or all his brain hath conceived in its most fertile impulse of production.

POWER OF THE TIDAL MOVEMENT.—There is a vast reservoir of mechanical power existing in the ocean. We do not refer to the noisy dash of the waves as they break upon the beach, but to the infinitely mightier, although silent and progressive, energy exerted in the gradual rise and fall of the tide. Compared with the stupendous power capable of being utilized of man's benefit, and present in the rise or fall of millions upon millions of tons of water through a space of ten or twenty feet four times a day, all the steam, water, or wind power in the world, together with the united muscular force of every living being, human and animal, sink into utter insignificance. We will try to form some idea of this power. Let us suppose that by the action of the tides the difference of level of the surface of the ocean at a certain spot is 21 feet between high and low water: omitting for the present all consideration of the power of the subjacent liquid, what is the mechanical value of a space of 100 yards square of this water? 100 yards square by 21 feet deep equals 70,000 cubic yards of water, which is lifted to a height of 21 feet, or to 1,470,000 cubic yards lifted to a height of 1 foot. Now, since one cubic yard of water weighs about 1,683 pounds, 1,470,000 cubic yards weigh 2,470,010,000 pounds, which is lifted in six hours. This is equivalent to lifting a weight of 412,335,000 pounds in one hour; and since one horse-power is considered equivalent to raising 1,800,000 pounds per hour, we have locked up in every 100 yards square of sea surface, a power equal to a 230 horse-power steam-engine.

SOME GOLD SEEKERS OF OLD.

INGS, queens, princes, philosophers, poets, and peasants, have, during every recorded epoch of the world's history, sought for gold with avidity. Thousands have perished in the search; bloodshed and reckless rapine have characterised the chase; and the fierce play of human passions exhibits itself, unveiled, and hideous in its nakedness, amid the gold regions of the world. The chase the nations of antiquity is recorded in pride with which they manifested in their most daring with which abroad in the search of in the quantities they caused various parts of the sanctuary to be overlaid with the precious metal. The art of working it, in which the Hebrews at the time of Moses were undoubtedly skilled, they are said to have learned from the ancient Egyptians. Two gold regions are mentioned in the sacred writings, which geographers have vainly endeavoured to fix with certainty; these are Ophir and Tarshish. The ships of Solomon, piloted by Phœnicians, took three years to perform the journey to Tarshish and back, importing peacocks' feathers, gold, and silver. Ophir, it has been asserted, is the Peru of modern maps; but Tarshish was obviously an Asiatic locality, since, with the gold and silver, Solomon's vessels brought home ivory and other eastern produce. Tarshish has been explained variously; by some as the general name of the Phœnicians for the ocean—by others as a corruption of the Sanscrit word Tar-desa, a silver country. Marks of anciently-worked gold mines, however, have been found in various parts of the world. In the gold districts of the Ural and Altai, unmistakable evidences exist of the former presence of ancient miners. In the museum at Bernaul is a stone sphynx, discovered in an extensive excavation for gold, which must have been carried on long ages ago, near the silver mines of the Schlaugenberg. This and other relics are conjectured to throw a light upon the passage in Herodotus, where he describes the gold mines—guarded by monsters—of the Eastern Scythians, called the Arimaspeæ. May not these mines have yielded some of Solomon's gold? The vast quantities of gold collected by this monarch have been variously computed; but some idea of the great total may be arrived at from the fact related in "Kings," that in a single year six hundred threescore and six talents were collected.

When gold first played a part in human affairs is, in truth, lost in the remote past. As a popular writer has remarked, its indestructibility was appreciated almost as soon as it was discovered, and it quickly became the coveted possession—almost the god of men. Then the folly of hoping to create, by human skill, this precious product of nature, soon seized upon avaricious minds; and of all the patient labours performed with the hope of seizing gold, those which the alchemists performed deserve a pre-eminent rank, as they led the way to many great chemical discoveries. After having eulogised gold as the most perfect, the most unalterable, and the simplest of metals; after having crowned it with the vain title of king over the metallic world, they compared it to the glory of the sun, and represented it by the same emblem. A circle represented its perfection and its indestructibility; it was to them the summum of metallization; and in their delirium, they were almost inclined to place it at the head of creation.

The gold mines of the ancient Egyptians, described by Agatharchides, a writer who flourished in the reign of Ptolemy Philometor, were situated near the coast of the Red Sea; according to D'Anville, on the site of the second or golden Berenice, and according to others, on the site of Hamamy. The spot now laid down in modern maps as Jebel Allaka is D'Anville's locality. "The kings of Egypt," writes Agatharchides, "compelled many poor people, together with their wives and children, to labour in the gold mines, wherein they underwent more suffering than can well be imagined. The hard rocks of the gold mountains being cleft by heating them with burning wood, the workmen then apply their iron implements. The young and active, with iron hammers, break the rock in pieces, in straight lines, but following the direction of the vein of gold, which is as irregular in its course as the roots of a tree. The workmen have lights fastened on their foreheads, by the aid of which they cut their way through the rocks, always following the white veins of stone. To keep them to their task, an overseer stands by, ready to inflict a blow on the lazy. The material that is thus loosened is carried out of the galleries by boys, and received at the mouth of the mine by old men and the weaker labourers, who then carry it to the epoptæ, or inspectors. These are young men, under thirty years of age, strong and vigorous, who pound the broken fragments in iron mortars with a stone pestle, till there is no piece larger than a pea. It is then placed on grinding stones, or a kind of mill-stones, and women, three on each side, work at it till it is reduced to a fine powder. This is then passed on to a set of workmen, called sellangeis, who place it on a finely polished board, not horizontal, but sloping a little. The sellangeis, after pouring some water on the board, rubs it with his hand, at first gently, but afterwards more vigorously, by which process the lighter earthy particles slide off along the slope of the board, and the heavier parts are left behind. He then takes soft sponges, with which he presses on the board rather gently, which causes the lighter particles to adhere to the sponge, while the heavy shining grains still keep their place on the board, owing to their weight. From the sellangeis the gold particles are transferred to the roasters, who measure and weigh all they receive, before putting it into an earthen jar. With the gold particles they mix lead in a certain proportion, lumps of salt, a little tin, and barley bran, and putting a tightly-fitting cover on the jar, and smearing it all over, they burn it in a furnace for five days and nights without intermission. On the sixth day they cool the vessel and take out the gold, which they find somewhat diminished in quantity; all the other substances entirely disappear. These mines were worked under the ancient kings of Egypt, but abandoned during the occupation of the country by the Ethiopians, and afterwards by the Medes and Persians."

Cambyse carried off a rich spoil from the Egyptian temples; afterwards, in the ashes of the palaces of Persepolis and Susa, three hundred talents of gold, and two thousand three hundred of silver were collected. Jacob, taking Diodorus Siculus as his authority, estimates the annual yield of the ancient Egyptian gold mines at six millions sterling. The quantity may have been as great as this, if the produce of the neighbouring countries—of Nubia and that from the interior, from the Macrobian of Herodotus, who obtained rich stores from their rapid streams—be included in the calculation.

Rosellini proves that the ancient Egyptians had attained to great perfection in the art of working the precious metals to shapes generally grotesque, but not seldom graceful and highly finished. The statue of Aziz, which stood in the Monolith of Memphis, was made of gold, with two precious stones for the eyes. The Egyptians possessed the art of gilding wooden and other images, but the most remarkable specimen of the art as practised by them has been found upon their mummy-cases. Pliny even asserts that they were acquainted with the art of amalgamating gold with other metals, to form a yielding paste for gilding.

Agatharchides, to whom allusion has been already made, in noticing the manufacturing skill of the Sabeans, says that they had a vast quantity of the precious metals garnered in their capital. He describes their drinking vessels of pure gold and silver, their furniture with silver feet, and the rich ornaments of gold on their colonnades and the fronts of their doors. The Assyrians also possessed vast quantities of gold. Diodorus states that Ninus, the founder of Nineveh, possessed himself of all the gold and silver of Bactriana; and Semiramis is said to have erected for a Babylonian temple three statues of beaten gold, one of which weighed eight hundred talents.

Gold holds a conspicuous place in the mythology of the ancient Greeks. According to it the Golden Race was the first race sent by the gods to people the earth. The goddess of discord threw a golden apple in among the deities, at the marriage of Peleus and Thetis, bearing the inscription: Η καλὴ λαβέτω—"let the beauty (among you) take (me)." All are familiar with the circumstance that Paris was nominated umpire, and adjudged the prize of beauty to Venus. Apollo rode in a golden chariot; Atalanta lost her race with Hippomenes by stepping aside to pick up the golden apples he intentionally let fall in her path; Bacchus presented Ariadne with a golden crown. The story of King Midas illustrates the antiquity of the auri sacra fames. A party of Phrygian shepherds having found the drunken Silenus in his accustomed condition, conveyed him before that sapient monarch. He entertained him for ten days, and then sent him back to his foster-father, Bacchus, who, in return for the king's hospitality, requested him to name the reward he coveted. Midas requested that every thing he touched might be turned to gold. To this request Bacchus acceded, and the monarch was speedily delighted to find the stones he touched become a mass of precious metal; the very water in which he bathed became liquid gold. But when he began to eat, his bread and meat became solid bullion, and when he lifted his goblet to his lips, his wine became metal. In despair, he besought Bacchus to cancel his absurd wish, when the god directed him to immerse himself in the river Pactolus, which is fabled to have forthwith run over golden sands, and Midas was no longer so terrible an alchemist!

The third labour of Hercules was to convey to Mycenæ, the hind with the golden horns, sacred to Diana, while the eleventh task of the same god was to get the golden apples of the Hesperides, which had been given to Juno by Earth on her wedding morn. Then there is the famous expedition of the Argonauts in quest of the Golden Fleece, nailed to an oak in the grove of Mars, and the Golden Collar worked by Vulcan, which Cadmus gave to his daughter Harmonia.

The stories of the modesty of the wise men of old, in regard to the acceptance of the Golden Tripod, which Helen as she sailed from Troy was supposed to have cast into the water, in compliance with an ancient oracle, is well known to the readers of Grecian history.

The fabulous wealth of Croesus, to which so many references are made in the writings of the ancients, and whose dismal fate has been taught to trembling children as a warning against the indulgence of pride, has led to the adoption of a phrase now current throughout the civilised world, that the millionaires of the present day are "as rich as Croesus." In his "Life of Solon," Plutarch pleasantly introduces the hero whose reputed wealth has excited the envy of all subsequent races of men. "As to his (Solon's) interview with Croesus, some pretend to prove from chronology, that it is fictitious. But since the story is so celebrated, and so well attested, nay, what is more, so agreeable to Solon's character, so worthy of his wisdom and magnanimity, I cannot prevail upon myself to reject it for the sake of certain chronological tables, which thousands are correcting to this day (the first century of the Christian era), without being able to bring them to any certainty. Solon, then, is said to have visited Sardis at the request of Croesus; and when he came thither, he was affected much in the same manner as a person born in an inland country, when he first goes to see the ocean; for, as he takes every great river he perceives for the sea, so Solon, when he passed through the court, and saw many of the nobility richly dressed, and walking in great pomp amidst a crowd of attendants and guards, took each of them for Croesus. At last, when he was conducted into the presence, he found the king set off with whatever can be imagined curious and valuable, either in beauty of colours, elegance of golden ornaments, or splendour of jewels, in order that the grandeur and variety of the scene might be as striking as possible. Solon, standing over against the throne, was not at all surprised, neither did he pay those compliments which were expected; on the contrary, it was obvious to all persons of discernment, that he despised such vain ostentation and littleness of pride. Croesus then ordered his treasures to be opened, and his magnificent apartments of furniture to be shown him; but this was quite a superfluous trouble; for Solon, upon the first view of the king, was able to read his character. When he had seen all, and was conducted back, Croesus asked him, "If he had ever beheld a happier man than himself?" Solon answered, "he had; and that was one Jellus, a plain but worthy citizen of Athens, who left valuable children behind him ; and who, having been above the want of necessities during his whole life, died gloriously fighting for his country." By this time, he appeared to Cæsar a strange, uncouth kind of rustic, who did not measure happiness by gold and silver, but could prefer the life and death of a private and obscure person to so much dignity and power."

M. Licinius Crassus, surnamed, on account of his opulence, the "Rich," is a very celebrated personage in Roman history. He was made a consul by Pompey (with whom and Cæsar he formed the first Triumvirate) and in this exalted office displayed his wealth by entertaining the people at ten thousand tables. His love of riches was so predominant that, not satisfied with the revenues of the province of Syria, and influenced by an uncontrollable desire of extending his possessions, he crossed the Euphrates, and hastened to make himself master of Parthia. Betrayed, however, by the treacherous delay of some of his allies, he was defeated by the Parthian forces under Surena, by whom, after his surrender, he was put to death, B.C. 53. He was afterwards decapitated, and in derision of his avarice, molten gold was poured down his throat. Alas for the auri sacra fames!

In a future number we shall have something to say concerning metallurgic craft in Ireland, from the days when Cred, a Tuathade-Danaan artificer in gold, and "very curious in the working of metals," fabricated a silver hand for King Nuadh, (who was the first monarch of that dynasty, and who was called Airíod lamh, or "of the Silver Hand,") as a substitute for the natural member which that sovereign lost at the battle of Moytura, (that is, Magh Turriodh, "the field of towers," on the borders of Lough Masg,) and something anent Irish mines, from the era of the discovery of that Lagenian one where now

"Sparkles of golden splendour
All over the surface shine ;
But if in pursuit we go deeper,
Allur'd by the gleam that shone,
Ah ! false as the dream of the sleeper,
Like Love, the bright ore is gone."

A GREAT HUMILIATION.

IHAVE a grudge of long standing to settle with Mrs. Radcliffe, Miss Jane Porter, Horace Walpole, and a few other lights of the "School of Artificial Sentiment." The "Romance of the Forest" ruined me for a boy ; and my maturer years were uncomfortably embarrassed by dreaminess and aversion for the practical business of life, resulting from profound studies of the "Scottish Chiefs." I had scarcely turned the corner of my ninth year when I began to astonish my friends by the extraordinary facility with which I interlarded conversations of the barrenest interest with florid and affecting quotations from either of the aforesaid romances. I was incapable of discussing any subject, from fried ham to electricity, in a sensible, common-place way. Indeed, so deeply had I imbibed the conventional tone and manner of Miss Fitzclarence, and the persecuted Adeline, that I soared invariably above the familiar level of social conversation into a species of comatic moonlight. My habits, cast of thought, and person, rapidly acquired a fictitious dignity and aplomb from those refining influences, which not unfrequently exposed me to the ridicule of my companions. My ambition aspired to a free life in the Albanian mountains, with fifty retainers, in goat-skin capotes, to answer the sound of my horn and stand by me whilst I chivalrously snapped my fingers in the face of the constituted authorities. But when a consideration of the refining element of such a life engrossed my fancy, I felt too buoyant to tread the earth, and allowed my imagination to riot extravagantly in the realms of Beauty and Romance. I pictured to myself the partner of my existence reclining on cushions of Persian down, in some out of the way cavern, with a thousand ministering slaves, theatrically disposed around her couch. From a hundred museums and art galleries I gathered materials for her face and form. She was to dine daily on amber and sherbet ; take the air in silver slippers, and receive the Magasin des Modes once a month. It was also arranged that she should call me her lord, and fall at my feet whenever I made my appearance ; and that I should reply, "Arise, O, Fatima, and deign to smile upon your slave." Fatima, by the way, was never to grow old or ugly ; and when she should die, her death was to be accepted as a sarcasm on the pretensions of the medical profession.

The peculiar character of my reflections, generally illustrated as they were by excursions through the damp grass in the moonlight, and prolonged midnight sittings at an open window, visibly affected my health, and, on my eleventh birth-day I was packed up in a very ordinary way by my father, thrown into the interior of a vehicle known as the "Flying Post" (it carried the mails, and ran nine miles in two hours and a half), and despatched in search of health to the house of my uncle at Pettigoe. I felt grieved at the treatment to which I was subjected ; but, as the Scottish Chiefs invariably expressed their indignation by silent contempt, I held my tongue, and looked carving-knives at my father.

My uncle, who had been looking out for the "Flying Post" half an hour before the ordinary time of its arrival, met me at the little garden-wicket, and welcomed me in.

"This is Miss Snaffle," said my uncle, as a lady, much about my own age, with large dark eyes and pale cheeks, and abridged petticoats, entered the apartment. "Miss Snaffle, my nephew, Mr. Pop—Mr. Pop, Miss Snaffle."

Miss Snaffle and I bowed to each other. I think she blushed slightly, but I was too much of the hero to be guilty of such a weakness. As I sat, facing my new acquaintance, with my back to a nest of drawers and my face to the fire-place, I thought that if ever a human being was formed to realise my ideal of a genuine, unadulterated heroine, that individual was Miss Snaffle. Our acquaintance ripened precociously, and we were quite familiar before half-past ten o'clock, the invariable hour for retiring in my uncle's household.

I learned to love Miss Snaffle, and the passion was reciprocated. We compared notes of our readings, and I was overjoyed to find that they were much on a par. Often in the long autumn nights, when the wind whistled "the spirit ditties of no tone" through the yellow shrubberies—when the glass was low, and the clock ticked thickly in the hall, and my uncle and Mr. Snaffle sat before the fire, legislating, perhaps, for the republic of Hayti, have we breathed deep sighs over the distresses of Theodora, and shed tears of unalloyed sympathy for the unhappy Medora—then we had garden walks in the moonlight, and noontday rambles in the fields and woods, when we explored all the ruins in the neighbourhood, and returned home in a high state of mediæval excitement. One evening as we were crossing a meadow on our way home, Miss Snaffle started a little difficulty.

"Dear me, Mr. Pop," she said, "is it not singular—I never yet asked you for your Christian name?"

My heart leaped up to my throat, as I replied:

"Did you not, Miss Snaffle? My name is Peter."

"Peter Pop!"

"Peter Pop, Miss Snaffle; an ugly name, isn't it?"

"Not ugly, but not romantic enough," said my companion, with a slight spice of sarcasm in her indirect affirmative. "My name—but, of course, I can't be blamed, for I was not consulted about the choice—my name is Judith!"

"Judith Snaffle!"

"Judith Snaffle, Mr. Pop," said my imperturbable friend. "Now, couldn't we manage to have nicer names—more musical appellations? Our parents have wronged us; let us repair the injury!" exclaimed Miss Snaffle, with a good deal of spirit, and a flourish of her father's umbrella.

"Romeo and Juliet?" I suggested.

"Pah! Mr. Pop; don't you remember how they turned out—Romeo became a tide-waiter in Venice, and Juliet married an apothecary. We'll have no such thing. What do you say to Theodore and Adeline?"

The new version of the drama had shaken me a little, so I said:

"Very pretty, indeed," but recollecting myself in a moment, I exclaimed: "O, did you ever read the story of Heloise and Abelard? They loved, alas! not wisely but too well; cruel destiny separated them, but now they sleep soundly side by side within the hallowed precincts of Père la Chaise. It is a beautiful story."

"I like it—I like the names. I'll be Abelard."

"You can't, Miss Snaffles."

"Now, don't be selfish, Mr. Pop. It's the nicer name of the two you know."

"But you forget," I said, "that Abalard was the gentleman, and Heloise the lady."

"Oh, indeed," said Miss Snaffle, "then I will call you Abalard; and you shall call me—"

"Dearest Heloise!" I exclaimed, raising her hand to my lips, and impressing a chivalrous kiss on her odd kid glove.

I sat up late that night, and with the assistance of a botanical dictionary, and my fingers as enumerators, contrived to compose a love-poem to the object of my affections.

If anything could have increased my heroic stature in the eyes of Heloise, it was this spontaneous tribute to her beauty and goodness. She told me confidentially that she always knew there was something in me.

Time sped joyously over our heads. Day after day Heloise's love increased, and my passion ripened. But we were parted. I shall never forget that day, and the agony it brought us. Heloise wept; but as my stately dignity would have been compromised by an effusion of tears, I only clasped my hands convulsively, and blubbered.

"Heloise," I whispered, "I abhor the fate I cannot control; but, dearest, whilst memory holds a seat"—

"Oh, don't, Abalard, don't," interrupted Miss Snaffle. "If I could afford to doubt you for a moment, existence would be a void, and—and; there, there—go," she exclaimed, with a gesture of superb authority and resignation, "better to have loved and lost than never to have loved at all; farewell!"

"Bless me," cried my uncle, (he had a queer fancy for pronouncing his own benediction.) "What can ail the children? Shake hands and off with you."

The mean insinuation conveyed in the epithet "children," stung me to the quick, and I was preparing to utter a vindictive retort to my relative, when that gentleman, suddenly seizing me by the collar and ankle, deposited me like a bale of coarse goods in the Enniskillen mail, whilst Heloise was marched up stairs in the custody of her father.

I returned home with a heavy heart, and was immediately placed as an extern pupil in the classical academy of the celebrated Dr. Kruk. New associations failed to banish the remembrance of the old; I pined inwardly, and wasted away to such an extent, that my friends feared I should fall a victim to atrophy. Every morning I chose Heloise's name for my headline; a thousand times I sketched her profile on my slate, with a few artistic corrections of the style of her hair and bonnet. Meanwhile I became morose and stupid, and was popularly known by the title of "Pop the muff." Dr. Kruk, indeed, seldom chastised me; but his daughter, Miss Seraphina Kruk, more than made up for the parental dereliction of duty. One morning when I had failed in answering one of her interrogatories (and she did put such odd ones) she slapped the grammar in my face with such force, that my nose tingled and the blood mounted to my temples. A high sense of chivalry prevented me striking her, but I retaliated by administering a kick to her favorite lap-dog, "Beadeyes," which caused that inoffensive animal to ascend suddenly in the direction of the ceiling, and execute a variety of acrobatic exercises on his return to the floor. The dog howled, the boys cheered and stamped their feet; Dr. Kruk rushed down with a mahogany ruler in his hand, and Seraphina, selecting a suitable place for depositing herself, fainted.

"Come, up with you Pop; up, sir!" said Dr. Kruk.

There was a tragic pause. I folded my arms, clenched my teeth for a moment, and cried out, "No."

"What! mutiny under my own roof," exclaimed Dr. Kruk. "You won't go up, sir? won't you?" and as he pronounced the last words I received a blow of the ruler on that portion of a schoolboy's person, scholastically known as "the nob," which elicited my immediate compliance. One of the boys grappled me to his back "with hooks of steel." I contracted every muscle to receive the coming shock with propriety, and gave the preliminary roar customary on such occasions. Its echo had barely subsided when I heard strange voices behind me in the room, and Dr. Kruk's ponderous accents assuring some heaven-sent visitor, that I was beyond all hope of reformation. I contradicted the ungentlemanly assertion by a fresh war, which stimulated the stranger to intercede for my pardon.

"Poor lad!" said the benevolent voice; "pray do forgive him sir, and I shall guarantee his future good conduct."

I was struck by a supposed familiarity with the voice; but my reflections were cut short by Dr. Kruk's replying: "He's incorrigible, sir; he's stupid, sir; he's idle, sir, and badly inclined; and for my part, I'm afraid his examinate remains shall never be interred with the proper christian solemnity." I thought of shipwrecked mariners, and the story of Harry and Tommy.

"Well, trust me, he'll improve," insisted the voice of benevolence. "Do order his release, doctor; you will greatly oblige me."

"Then, only on one condition," said Dr. Kruk. "He shall go down on his knees, and beg Miss Kruk's pardon; he shall subsequently beg the lap-dog's pardon. Is he ready to do this?"

"He is, sir," said I, "he'll do anything."

"Drop him, Bulbeye," (the name of the boy on whose back I was held.)

Master Bulbeye obeyed the minister of war with such alacrity, that I nearly lost my balance whilst descending. I turned to thank my intercessors, when, shade of Radcliffe and Horace Walpole! who stood before me—who had been witnesses of my ignominy but Mr. Snaffle and my adored Heloise, with three quarters of a cambric handkerchief stuffed into her mouth to stifle her laughter. The tableau was one of tremendous interest.

"Heloise," I exclaimed, "Heloise, falsest of women, you—you to smile at Abalard's agony—farewell, and if for ever, fare thee well!"

"Abalard, adored Abalard!" screamed Miss Snaffle, as she threw herself into a Siddonic attitude—"Stay, hear me, oh!"

I heard only a scream; three springs carried me into the open street. I rushed home in a state bordering on distraction, consigned my library of artificial sentiment to the flames that night, and departed for New Zealand the following morning.

P. S. Would any one have the goodness to oblige me with the address of Miss Heloise Judith Snaffle?

THE INVASION.*

A NATIONAL TALE. BY GERALD GRIFFIN, AUTHOR OF THE "COLLEGIANS; OR,
THE COLLEEN BAWN."

ALTHOUGH the gifted author of the handsome volume before us remarks in his preface that it would be erroneous to regard it in the light of a historical novel, and that its "most ambitious aim is that of presenting a correct picture of the surface of society in part of England, in Ireland, and in northern Europe, at an obscure period of the history of mankind," we must confess that we attach no faith to the theory insinuated by him. A historical tale it unquestionably is, as well as a national one, and, as we have already remarked in our sketch of the writer's life, the only Irish story of the class ever attempted. The plot of "The Invasion" is as follows:

O'Headha is the chief of the Ithians, in the reign of Nial Frosach, King of Ireland, about the beginning of the ninth century—that is, in the time of Charlemagne. The story opens with the ceremonies attending the marriage of the O'Headha with Macha, daughter of O'Driscol, ceann-sinny, or head, of the sept of that name. Among the guests present is one who takes no part in the ceremony, and we learn that this is the chieftain of the "Hooded People," a Druid race, so named from their singular costume. Hence an altercation ensues between him and the bridegroom, which, but for the interposition of the bishop of Ross Ailithir, and O'Driscol, would have terminated in mortal combat. Before the end of the year occurs a skirmish between the Ithians and the Druids; the latter are defeated; O'Headha, and Baeag, his brother, and the tanist, or successor to his rank and power, outstrip their men in the pursuit, when, most mysteriously, the victorious O'Headha is slain. The effect of this disaster upon the mind of Macha is as poignant as it is sudden. She is conveyed in a state of unconsciousness to her apartment, and becomes in the same day a widow and a mother. Baeag, the tanist, should now succeed to the chieftainship of the sept, but he is unpopular with it, and is suspected of plotting against his kinsman's life. After an ineffectual attempt to enforce his claims, he is obliged to fly, and, to the consternation of all, takes refuge with the Druids, by whom he is received with ready welcome. Such are the circumstances which usher in the birth of O'Headha's posthumous child, who is the hero of the tale.

THE CONFLICT ON THE CLIFF.

* Dublin and London: JAMES DUFFY.

The story then traces the education of the young Ithian chief, first at home, then at a famous abbey on the shores of the Senan, or Shannon. Griffin takes this opportunity to interweave a graphic and highly interesting sketch of the early history of Erin, which gives us a glimpse of the Abbey of Muing-baridh, or Mungret. We are then introduced to the second hero of the tale, in the person of a new scholar from Inismore, or Great Britain. The author gives us the history of the new hero, whose name is Kenric, whereby, for a chapter or two, the scene is transferred to England. At sixteen years of age, Elim, the young Ithian chief, is transferred from the college of Muing-baridh to the military school at Teamair, where for two years he learns the art of war. In fine, at twenty he returns home to Rath Aedain, an accomplished prince, and is greeted by his clansmen with the devoted and enthusiastic attachment of an Irish sept for their chief. On closing his five-and-twentieth year he is invested with its government, to the duties of which he devotes himself in an enlightened spirit.

Next, we have an adventure. The young O'Headha, in a military affray with the "Hooded People," is drawn on to pursue them alone into their own fastnesses, into the wild and beautiful Cúim-na-n-Druadh, where he arrives in the midst of the annual pagan festival of Samhuin, and is made prisoner. We witness the ceremonies of the Druids, and are introduced to the heroine, Eithne, niece of the Ard-Drai, or Druid chief, but herself a Christian. While the Druid ceremonies are proceeding, we get at the mode of educating a young Christian princess in those times, and also we accompany Eithne on a visit to Réilic-na-Riogh, or the "Sepulchre of the Kings" of Inisfail. In conversation with Eithne, on whom the task of entertaining the stranger devolves, Elim, of course, falls in love—as the reader does—with the charming and highly accomplished Irish princess. The Druid ceremonies are strange, picturesque, and beautiful; in the midst of them returns Tuathal, son of the Ard-Drai, who recognises Elim as the slayer of one of his followers in that morning's raid. The Ithian is seized and condemned to die. Leaving him in this predicament, our author resumes the history of Kenric. In this character, which is one of Griffin's best drawn, he satirizes with great force and effect the infirmities of the literary aspirant. The story of Kenric is told with an artful naturalness that shows the writer to be at home in it. After pursuing it for some chapters we return to the captive, Elim, who is suddenly liberated by the intercession of Eithne, on the conditions that all the prisoners of the "Hooded People" who remain in his hands shall be restored unharmed, and that he shall depart at once, as, if he were to wait until morn the relatives of the deceased might render his homeward journey dangerous. The death of the old Ard-Drai, the ceremonies of his burial, the election of Tuathal as his successor, the wise administration of O'Headha, and the love-passages between himself and Eithne, come next in order. As yet we hear nothing of an "Invasion."

Returning to Kenric, the Northumbrian, we have an adventure in which the tanist, Baseg, is introduced, still yearning for vengeance, and the recovery of his inheritance and power. Kenric, who is travelling in England with a wandering book-vender—a Swede, named Inguar—is encountered by Elim, who was on his way to Iona to obtain the consent of an abdicated Ard-ri, the friend of Eithne's father, to his marriage with her, and accompanies him back to Inisfail. Eithne, after the death of her protector, has placed herself under the protection of Tuathal's mother, an aged Druidess. On the return of Elim and Kenric they happen upon the Feis Teamhrach, or national parliament at Tara, which is described with a picturesque splendour that really rivals any similar scene in the Waverley novels. Eithne is present, and adds her feminine charm to the description, into which is introduced a little melody which, for the lesson embodied in it, we are tempted to re-produce.

THE PHANTOM CITY.

I.

A story I heard on the cliffs of the west,
That oft through the breakers dividing,
A city is seen on the ocean's wild breast,
In turreted majesty riding.
But brief is the glimpse of that phantom so bright,
Soon close the white waters to screen it,
And the bodement, they say, of the wonderful sight,
Is death to the eyes that have seen it.

II.

I said, when they told me the wonderful tale,
My country, is this not thy story?
Thus oft through the breakers of discord, we hail
A promise of peace and of glory.
Soon gulfed in those waters of hatred again,
No longer our fancy can find it;
But woe to our hearts when we see it in vain,
For ruin and death come behind it!

The occasion of the Feis is also seized to introduce a discussion between Elim and Kenric on the ancient Irish laws, to which the former traces the "unhappy spirit of disunion" which has unfortunately ever distinguished Ireland. It is now in fact that the true action of "The Invasion" commences. Inguar re-appears on the scene, and attempts to corrupt Kenric. The latter falls in love with Eithne, and is tempted to betray his friend. The Viking, or Norseman, appear in the Cúim-na-n-Druadh, and Baseg, acting as their high priest (for he has apostatized from the Christian faith) causes Eithne to be condemned as a virgin-sacrifice to the bloody gods of the ruthless invaders. In this crisis Elim invades the Cúim, to rescue his love. A battle ensues between the Ithians and the Norsemen, the latter are defeated, and Eithne is rescued by the repentant Kenric, just as Baseg (recently discovered to have been the murderer of his brother, the O'Headha) is about to sacrifice her to Odin, at the foot of the iron altar. Elim and Eithne are eventually united. Kenric dies; is interred by his friends in accordance with his last wishes, and the curtain falls upon the tale of "The Invasion." Some objections may be taken to the minute antiquarian learning with which the story is overlaid, but to our mind it injures its dramatic effect but slightly. The plot is admirably contrived. Of all the characters, that of Kenric in particular is a psychological masterpiece, and conveys the most exalted ideas of the author's capabilities. The following excerpt from the work, descriptive of the contest between the Ithians and the Norsemen, in the Cúim-na-n-Druadh, forms the subject of our illustration (the frontispiece to the volume), which is from the clever and facile pencil of Mr. Edmund Fitzpatrick.

"Meanwhile the stoc sounded in the camp, the war-cry of the sept was iterated far and wide among the hills; the gallóglaachs seized their helms and heavy battle-axes, the horses neighed in the defiles far beneath, and the kerna, starting from beneath the coarse grey coat of frieze, which was their tent at night, and covering by day, arranged in haste their brazen scians, their slings, and slender javelins. The war-cry of O'Driscoll was mingled with that of the Ithian sept, and soon after deep silence sunk again on either camp, which was only interrupted by the bustling of the troops, and the occasional voices of the commanders, as they sought to put their companies in order.

"On a sudden, the sound of a goll-trompa, or Danish trumpet from the Cúim, showed that the Northmen were preparing to receive the onset; and Elim, placing himself at the head of a body of well-armed gallóglaachs, ran down the crags in the direction of the temple (the place of Eithne's confinement), turning at intervals and waving his sword by way of summons to his followers. They were met on the borders of the stream by the Bay-kings, whose habitual readiness for action rendered no more time necessary to transport them from their revels to the field. Before a blow was struck, Elim despatched a messenger to O'Driscoll, to inform him that he might direct his assault with more advantage on the Dun, where, as the deserters had let him know, Inguar and Tuathal were stationed with the native troops. When both parties came in sight, the Ithians slackened their speed, in order to advance in battle order, and gazed with wondering eyes on the immovable and well-armed force who stood awaiting them on the further side of the river. The wood of gleaming battle-axes, where scarce a movement was visible, except the fluttering of the Reafan standard in the gentle morning wind, the gigantic persons of the Northmen, and the steady discipline with which they seemed to await the charge, seemed to strike the native forces with astonishment and awe. Presently, as was their custom, the scalds of the Northmen raised a hymn to Odin, in which, soon after, the whole army joined. The Ithians descended to the onset with shouts of defiance, while their minstrels played the most inspiring strains, and the Roag-catha, or Battle-song, was chaunted by a poet of the sept.

"In their attempt to ford the stream, the Ithians were repulsed with dreadful slaughter. They did not, however, lose courage, but returned to the charge with vigour, and after much effort succeeded in dislodging a portion of the foreign force. This slight advantage was followed up so strenuously that the bank would have been gained in a short time, but for a reinforcement, consisting of Baseg and his adventurers, with a large body of the allied tribes. The Ithians were wholly unable to resist this new accession of force, and, after suffering severely, gave way, and fighting step by step, (till the stream was dyed with blood,) retired to the bank from which they had set out, and along the rocks in the direction of those cliffs which overlooked the Dun. On the crags the Ithians again had the advantage of the ground, and their chieftain was urging them by voice and gesture to another onset, when, bursting through the crowd of mountain warriors who stood before him, he beheld the huge and mailed figure of the infamous mover of the war—his rival, and the murderer, Baseg.

"Hold back!" cried Baseg to his troops, as they were passing forward; "back, on your lives! This prey is mine alone!"

"Around the persons of the rival chieftains the inferior warriors stopped short, as if by mutual consent, and lowered their weapons, while Elim and the long-oxled taniat perused each other's person with the intensest curiosity.

"Thou art but a stripling," said Baseg, resting his ponderous sword blade on the open palm of his left hand, while he surveyed, with a grim smile, the slender frame of the Ithian, "but thou hast the air, the shape of him to whom I owe the first poison-draught that made my whole life healthless."

"And thou," said Elim, "thou fittest the horrid tale that, even in childhood, I have heard of thee with shuddering and with abhorrence. I knew thee even before I heard thy voice. — I know the purchaser of Einhur's skill and Conall's blood."

"Stand to thy weapon then," said Baseg, furiously, "for our acquaintance shall be brief and bloody."

"So saying, he addressed himself to combat, while Elim, fixing his eye steadily on his assailant, received him with the coolness that was habitual to his character. They were not, however, long permitted to maintain the contest single-handed. A sudden onset from the Northmen forced the Ithians from their ground, and, by ill fortune, separated Elim from the main body of his troops. A few close followers only remained beside him, all of whom he had the grief to see perish one by one beneath the battle axes of the sea-kings. Still parrying with unabated vigour the blows of the vengeful Baseg, and seeing it impossible to rejoin his friends, he retreated step by step towards the brow of the cliff which overlooked the Dun, and reached the rock from which Duach had cast himself two days earlier; at the moment when the raven standard vanished from the Dun and amid tremendous shouts of triumph, the banner of O'Driscol was planted in its place. Here Elim, finding himself alone, and pressed by a host of foes, whose battle-axes had already hacked his shield, gave up the useless contest, and dived, accoutred as he was, down the dizzy height, and into the deep basin of the widening stream beneath.

"A cry of dismay burst from those of his own sept who witnessed his disaster from the height, but their fears were allayed when they beheld him emerging from the tranquil waters, and still keeping his shield upon his arm, pursue his way, with vigorous strokes to the opposite shore, amid a shower of javelins, arrows, and battle-axes, from the disappointed Northmen. Their exultation was complete when they saw him received on the other side by a party of the troops of Cleir, at whose head he was soon seen hurrying to the captured Dun.

"To the temple," cried Baseg, hastily re-ascending the crags; "that villain Inguar has betrayed his post! The coward! See the coward where he lies across the ford! To the temple! Though he has escaped my weapon, I know where I can cut him deeper yet!"

"In the meanwhile, Elim joined O'Driscol at the Dun, where Inguar had set the first example of dismay. He beheld the latter crossing the bridge, amid showers of brazen balls and darts, not only from the enemy but from his own indignant friends, the Northmen, who had been left to aid him in preserving this stronghold, and with whom, as courage was the deifying virtue, so cowardice was the last of vices. He entered the copee by which Duach had effected his escape, and was not again seen in the valley."

"The Invasion" (which, it is but just to add, is most admirably brought out, as regards typography and illustrations,) contains several exquisite poetical morceaux, from which, as an example of the graceful facility with which Gerald Griffin could interweave Irish words in English songs, we select the following:

Cead mílé fáilté! child of the Ithian!

Cead mílé fáilté, Elim!

Uisceach, thy temple in ruins is lying,

In Druin-an-Druadh the dark blast is sighing,

Lonely we shelter in grief and in danger,

Yet have we welcome and cheer for the stranger.

Cead mílé fáilté, child of the Ithian!

Cead mílé fáilté, Elim.

Woe for the weapons that guarded our alubmers!
Teamair, they said, was too small for our numbers;
Little is left for our sons to inherit,

Yet what we have, thou art welcome to share it.

Cead mílé fáilté, child of the Ithian!

Cead mílé fáilté, Elim.

Carman, thy teachers have died broken hearted;

Voice of the trilitheon, thou art departed;

All have forsaken our mountains so dreary;

All but the spirit that welcomes the weary.

Cead mílé fáilté, child of the Ithian!

Cead mílé fáilté, Elim!

Vainly the Draí, alone in the mountain,

Looks to the torn cloud, or eddying fountain;

The spell of the Christian has vanquished their power,

Yet is he welcome to rest in our bower.

Cead mílé fáilté, child of the Ithian!

Cead mílé fáilté, Elim!

Wake for the Christian your welcoming numbers!

Strew the dry rushes to pillow his slumbers:

Long let him cherish, with deep recollection,

The eve of the feast, and the Druid's affection.

Cead mílé fáilté, child of the Ithian!

Cead mílé fáilté, Elim.

SCIENTIFIC JOTTINGS.

THE GLYCERIC LIQUID.

OW frequently it happens that a child's toy becomes, in the hands of the experimental philosopher, an agent by means of which some of the sublimest truths of nature are revealed. Perhaps the soap-bubble has been pressed into philosophic service as much as any childish bauble. Indeed, since the time that Sir Isaac Newton made use of them to investigate and verify the laws and properties of light, these delicate films, almost reduced to mathematical surfaces, have become as much the property of the experimental philosopher as the school-boy, and scarcely any popular lecture on chemistry is brought to a termination without their aid being invoked with the object of confining, and at the same time setting afloat into the atmosphere, the detonating gases extracted from water. The more the subject of the soap-bubble is contemplated, the more mysterious appear the agencies at work within it, and the forces which hold it in equilibrium. An infant can produce or shatter it at a breath; but the life of the oldest philosopher is insufficient to exhaust the study of its mechanism.

Professor Plateau, who has for many years been occupied in researches on the figures assumed by a liquid mass when the action of gravitation is removed and it is in a state of repose, has recently made the curious discovery that a film of soapy water is so thin that the action of gravity upon it can generally be regarded as inappreciable in comparison with that of molecular forces. He has arrived at the curious result that, with a liquid acted upon by gravity and in a state of repose, he can obtain, on a large scale, all forms of equilibrium which belong to a liquid mass without weight. This is effected by forming the liquid into thin films—by making soap-bubbles, in fact. Floating in air these bubbles are spherical, and acting as if they were devoid of weight, offer a far more simple and convenient process for investigating these phenomena than the old method, which, moreover, requires a certain amount of manipulative skill in order to arrive at perfectly regular results.

A philosopher cannot, however, be occupied all his time blowing bubbles, if he wishes to investigate their properties. The very short existence of the films obtained from common solution of soap (rarely lasting two minutes), rendered it essential that some better liquid should be found; and the Professor has at last been fortunate enough to discover a liquid (called the glyceric liquid), which furnishes in the open air bubbles of great durability.

FACTS ABOUT FUNERALS.

HERE are few we should say who have not read Addison's exquisite "Reflections in Westminster Abbey," and there are as few who have not felt an interest in the condition which gave rise to them, the most certain of all certainties—the state of death. There are some nations—the Chinese, for instance—where a man's burial is considered to be the most important event of all those consequent upon his existence. Death itself is in the eyes of a Celestial, a mere trifle; but the qualities of his coffin, the ceremonies of and the choice of his burying-objects of his most anxious solicitude. Abbé Huc tells us, that in they keep their dead for one decade, in order to do them funeral observances; and Confucius, great philosopher of the joined his countrymen to such as half their fortune on that of their dead. But although the customs of other countries are less extravagant in their ceremonial for the dead, it will be interesting to the readers of the DUBLIN JOURNAL, we have no doubt, to con with us the varied observance upon such occasion in ancient and modern times, and in different nations.

Amongst the Hebrews the mode of burial was an important duty. The deceased, immediately after death, was placed upon a cloth on the ground, and the face was covered, as it was no longer lawful to behold the human countenance. The body was then bathed in warm water, after which, being carefully dried, perfumed oils and tinctures were rubbed over it, and it was robed, often in a very sumptuous manner. After this it was sometimes customary to burn wood and sweet spices over the corpse. Of Asa, King of Judah, it is said, "that they laid him on a bed which was filled with sweet odours and divers kinds of spices prepared by the apothecaries' art, and they made a very great burning for him." In the East this practice is still continued; but in Italy the Jews only mingle the water with which they bathe the dead with dried roses and chamomile. For some time before burial the body was wont to be exposed, and a candle lighted near its head, to ridicule an assertion of the sorcerers that a lighted candle near the dead body caused violent pain to the parted spirit.

The Jews used no coffin for the dead. The body was placed on a bier or narrow bed, consisting of a plain wooden frame, upon which it was carried to the tomb. The coffin was used only in Babylon and Egypt.

Funeral processions amongst the Orientals in the far-off ages were on a grand scale. In the account of the funeral of Jacob we read:—"And Joseph went up to bury his father: and with him went up all the servants of Pharaoh, the elders of his house and all the elders of the land of Egypt; and all the house of Joseph, and his brethren, and his father's house; only their little ones, and their flocks and their herds, they left in the land of Goshen. And there went up with him both chariots and horsemen, and it was a very great company." It appears to have been a practice amongst many nations at the period to throw pieces of gold and silver along with other precious articles into the grave immediately after the body was deposited there.

In very early times the dead were buried in caves or in recesses amongst cliffs: but from the difficulty in most places of finding suitable caverns, the more humble classes were buried in pits dug in the earth, and the rich were laid in subterranean vaults. The entrance into the latter burial places was by a descent of a number of steps, which led to several apartments. Niches were appointed along the walls, and the bodies were placed in them. Curious it is to relate, that the family tombs of the Jews were generally near their houses, and often in their gardens. At Jerusalem there was a separate burying-place for the Jewish kings, and it was a great insult to exclude any of the monarchs from this appointed and final resting-place.

In ancient Egypt the inhabitants, believed in the metempsychosis, or the transmigration of souls—that is, that after death the soul of the deceased, having performed a certain cycle of life in bodies of the animal kingdom, would re-enter and animate again the human body in which it first had existence, if it were preserved free from decay and in its entirety. Such believers naturally sought to conserve the human remains from corruption. They embalmed them, and built catacombs, tumuli, and mausoleums in which to deposit them. This practice of embalming was common in most oriental nations, and has been found even amongst the American Indians. The red men of North America were accustomed to deck the bodies of their dead in the richest costume; they painted their faces and limbs with different colours, and laid aside provisions for them in their tombs. An old traveller gives a very interesting account of the manner in which the native inhabitants of Virginia were in the habit of embalming their chiefs, whose details show the excellence which they attained in the art.

The Greeks of ancient times considered it a most sacred duty to bury the dead. If a dead body was found unburied, any individual who might pass was accustomed to cover it with earth. If a relative were left without interment, those who neglected his burial were considered to be guilty of a most heinous crime, and the earlier that arrangements were made for consigning the dead to the tomb the greater the honour paid to the departed. In some of the Argive cities the funeral took place on the day following the decease; but it was the most usual custom to follow the law of Solon, which decreed that the dead should be carried out for burial early on the morning of the third day before sunrise. Hired mourners accompanied the funeral procession, playing melancholy airs upon musical instruments. The corpse was preceded by the men and followed by the women. Arrived at the place of interment, although bodies were buried sometimes, yet they were more usually consumed by fire. If the latter mode was that adopted, the corpse was placed on the top of a pile of wood, and a torch being applied, it was consumed to ashes. Animals, and even captives or slaves, were sometimes buried along with the dead, where special respect was designed to be shown to them. When the pile was burned down the fire was quenched by pouring wine upon it, after which the bones were carefully gathered by the relatives of the dead, and having been washed with wine and oil, were deposited in urns, which were made of marble, alabaster, or annealed clay. In some instances even the more costly material of gold was used for this purpose. If the body were not burned it was placed in a coffin, which was constructed of baked clay, and borne to the place of interment outside the town, where sometimes a simple mound of earth, or a cairn of stones, marked the place of burial. After the close of the funeral ceremony a feast was held at the house of the nearest relative.

In Rome all funerals took place at night, for a period of many hundred years; afterwards this practice prevailed only in the case of the poor. Eight days were usually allowed to elapse between decease and burial. In the funerals of the wealthy a conductor usually arranged the order of the procession. In front marched musicians, who played plaintive strains of music, and behind those followed female mourners, who sang a funeral hymn called nenia, in praise of the deceased. Then came mimes, one of whom imitated the action and even the gestures of the deceased. Lastly came the slaves who had been liberated by the dead, each of them wearing the cap of liberty. In the instances of the poor, the body was carried on a bier or placed in a coffin. When the deceased was a person of rank or opulence, the corpse was placed upon an ivory couch, covered with gold and purple, and borne to the tomb on the shoulders of his relatives or freedmen. The other friends of the dead followed immediately behind the body uttering loud wailings, and offering every demonstration of grief. All the sons of the deceased walked in the procession with their heads veiled, and the daughters wore their heads bare, and their hair dishevelled. It was an ancient custom to bear the body into the forum, where the funeral cortege halted for a time, and in case the departed was a man of note, a funeral oration was pronounced above his remains. When this ceremony was over the procession wended its way to the place of interment outside the city walls. The practice of burning the bodies of the dead was abolished by the spread of Christianity, and ceased about the fourth century.

Under the impulses of the Christian religion the ordinary ceremonial of respect towards the dead attained a newer and more graceful development. There was a solemn procession, at which the relatives and friends of the deceased officiated as mourners. Palm and olive branches were carried before the coffin in token of victory. Earlier even was the practice of bearing lamps and tapers in sign of a future resurrection. Every symbol of mourning was rejected, and the grave was strewn with flowers. It was customary to deliver a funeral oration over the dead, and the corpse was laid down with the face toward the east as if to watch the light of morning.

Amongst the Mahomedans the dead are always buried about twelve hours after decease. Before interment takes place the body is carefully washed, then it is swathed in cerements and placed on a bier covered with a shawl. Coffins are not used by the followers of the Prophet. The procession to the grave is generally headed by six blind men, who march at a slow pace, intoning the Mohammedan profession of faith. Next in order come the male friends of the deceased, with a number of dervishes, who carry the flags of their order, then advance some boys, who bear the Koran and chant a poem in reference to the day of judgment. The bier is borne next with the head of the corpse foremost, the bearers being the relatives of the deceased—behind come the female relatives and mourners, wailing and shrieking loudly. The female friends have their heads bound round with a strip of linen or muslin, usually coloured blue, tied behind in a knot, and the ends hanging down a few inches. At the funerals of the wealthy several camels laden with provisions precede the cortège, and at the tomb the provisions which they carry are distributed to the poor who gather to such places.

In China the dead are enclosed in air-tight coffins, and in some instances kept above ground for several years. The burial places are made upon barren hills and mountain sides; in many cases the dead are placed in vaults. Deceased members of the same family may be sometimes seen laid side by side in open sheds to the extent of twenty. The chief mourners among the Chinese are the women, and it has been described by European travellers in that country as most affecting, to see them kneeling and weeping in the lone and silent places where their husbands and children are buried.

Dying persons in Japan express their wish to be burned or buried after death, and it is in accordance with their desire that either mode is adopted. After death the body is washed by a favourite servant. The head is shaven and the body is clothed, according to the state of the weather, in its best apparel, as in life. The only exception made is that the sash which girds the robe around the waist is fastened by two knots, to indicate that it will never be loosened more. It is then covered with a piece of linen folded in a peculiar manner, and is placed on a mat in the middle of the hall, with the head towards the north. Food is prepared and offered to the deceased as in life, and all the family lament. After being exposed thus for forty-eight hours, the corpse is placed on its knees in a tub-shaped coffin, which is again enclosed in a square oblong box called a quan. Two slabs bearing the inscriptions relative to the character of the deceased are placed within it. Then the body is borne with flags, lanterns, and mournful insignia to a neighbouring temple, whence, after formal ceremonies, it is borne to the place of interment. The body is then taken out of the quan and laid in the grave, which is filled up with earth, and covered with a flat stone, over which more earth is heaped, and above the whole is placed the quan. At the end of seven weeks the quan is removed for the purpose of making room for the tomb-stone, and this ceremonial concludes the funeral rites of the Japanese.

Perhaps the most stern of all funeral forms were those of the old Northern warriors. "When a hero or chief," as Mallet tells us in his book of Northern antiquities, "fell gloriously in battle, his funeral obsequies were honoured with all possible magnificence. His arms, his gold and silver, his war-horse, and whatever else he held most dear, were placed with him on the pile. His dependents and friends made it frequently a point of honour to die with their leader, in order to attend on his shade in the palace of Odin. Nothing, in fact, seemed to them more grand and noble, than to enter Valhalla with a numerous retinue, all in their finest armour and richest apparel. The princes and nobles never failed of such attendants. His arms, and the bones of the horse on which Childeic I. supposed he should be presented to this warrior god, have been found in his tomb. They did in reality firmly believe, and Odin himself had assured them, that whatever was buried or consumed with the dead, accompanied them to his palace. The poorer people, from the same persuasion, carried at least their most necessary utensils, and a little money with them in case of death, not to be entirely destitute in the other world. From a like motive the Greeks and Romans put a piece of silver into the dead man's mouth, to pay his passage over the Styx. The Laplanders to this day provide their dead with a flint, and everything necessary for lighting them along the dark passage they have to traverse after death."

In Western Africa, funerals are carried on with strange ceremonies. Mr. Wilson, in his relation of the customs of that region, gives a full description of the treatment of the dead. The corpse is washed, painted, and clad in the handsomest clothes. The greatest profusion of beads, which can be procured, is placed around him; he is then put into a rude coffin in some conspicuous place, while the ordinary funeral ceremonies are being performed. The character and pomp of these ceremonies depend upon the rank and age of the deceased. If he has been a person of importance in the community, his friends and the towns-people assemble, at an early hour, in front of the house where the corpse reposes, and form themselves into a circle enclosing a large open space. A live bullock, tied by the four feet, is placed in the centre of the circle, and is to be slaughtered at the proper time, nominally for the dead, but really for the visitors who come to participate in the ceremonies. Every visiter is expected to bring some kind of present for the dead, which may be a string of beads, a knife, a plate, a pipe, or a looking-glass; all of which are laid in the coffin or by its side to be taken to the grave. Most of the men are expected to bring with them a good supply of powder, and testify their respect for the dead by the number of times they fire their guns in the open square, and the amount of ammunition with which they are loaded. Sometimes fifty or a hundred men are discharging their muskets at the same time, not only stunning the ears of all around, but enveloping themselves so completely with the smoke as not to be seen except by the flash from the fire-pan. The only precaution observed is merely to elevate the muzzles of their guns above the heads of those in the circus with themselves.

When these ceremonies are concluded, two persons take up the coffin, which is usually the section of a canoe boxed up at the two ends, to carry it to the grave-yard. Sometimes the dead refuses to leave the town, and the bearers are driven hither and thither by a power which they affect not to be able to withstand. They go forward for a few moments, and then are suddenly whirled around and carried back at the top of their speed. The head man of the family then approaches the bier, and talks plaintively and soothingly to the corpse; inquires why he is unwilling to go to the grave-yard, reminds him that many of his kindred and his friends are already there, and assures him that every attention will be given by his surviving friends to his future wants.

Under the influence of this persuasion, the restraints which were imposed upon the bearers are relaxed, and they set out once more to the place of burial. They have not gone far, however, when they are thrown violently against some man's house, which is tantamount to an accusation that the proprietor, or some other member of the household, has been the cause of the death. The suspected person is at once arrested, and must undergo the "red-water ordeal."

The corpse, after this, is borne quietly to its resting-place, when the bearers rush to the water-side, and undergo a thorough ablution before they are permitted to return to the town. Guns are fired, morning and evening, for some months afterwards, in honour of the dead, provided he has been a man of prominence and influence in the community. Food is occasionally taken to the place of burial for months and years afterward, where a small house is built over the grave, furnished with a chair or a mat, a jug to hold water, a staff to use when he walks abroad, a looking glass, and almost every article of furniture or dress that a living man would need. All blood relations are required to shave their heads, and wear none but the poorest and most tattered garments for one month. The wives are required to come together every morning and evening, and spend an hour in bemoaning their husbands.

Such is an account of some of the customs with which the human race, over the world, pay the last duties to their dead, and make that final deposition of the worn-out relics of their fellows, whose observance is a testimony of affection or respect toward the lost and gone. We have only touched here on the funeral forms observed amongst the principal races or nations, and have not at all exhausted the interest of the subject, because the space at our command would not permit any fuller detail. However, we trust that what we have collated from many sources for our readers, will possess an interest which will wile away the tedium of a weary hour, or beguile, by these facts about funerals, the "idleness" of some leisure time, which might otherwise hang heavy upon their hands.

BLIGHTED HOPES.

A STORY OF TROUBLOUS TIMES.

THOSE who feel an interest in works of art beyond that which is momentarily suggested by an inspection of the works themselves, must be well acquainted with the strange vicissitudes and mutations to which both art and artists have been from time to time subjected. Many instances in point occurred in England, during the revolutionary times of Charles the First, when foreign artists received an amount of encouragement, greater, perhaps, than has ever been accorded to them since, and which happily resulted in some of our public buildings being decorated by the productions of the greatest masters known in the history of pictorial art. Unfortunately, however, the rebellion which characterised those times was turned to sad account against artists who had been induced by the king to try their fortunes in England, and many whose hopes were in the ascendant, were doomed to disappointment and despair through that dominant spirit of destructiveness which influenced the proceedings of Cromwell and his followers. Amongst the various young artists who had been promised the royal support was Pierre von Gerlstein, a native of Belgium. He had been commended by the great Vandyck to the notice of his Majesty; and his ability was such as to promise for him a rapid and prosperous career.

In course of time he was employed in painting a large historical picture, representing the death of William the Conqueror; and during the execution of that work it was his wont to receive visits from people who had been informed of its progress, and who felt it no slight privilege to be admitted into the studio of one who was honoured by the royal patronage. On one occasion it chanced that a distinguished baronet and royalist of those times, Sir Walter Sedley, accompanied by his daughter, entered Pierre's studio, and was so pleased with the picture then in course of painting, that he frequently repeated his visits, and at length invited the aspiring artist to his own mansion, at Woodfield Manor, where he had not long commenced the formation of a gallery of pictures.

Left to his own reflections, Pierre quickly conjured up the idea that this unexpected and undesired visit to the mansion of Sir Walter Sedley might exercise a considerable influence over his fate. He had not wanted for patronage; but he had never before found himself the object of so much personal interest in the eyes of those who took pleasure in witnessing the progress of his works.

Pierre had no sooner entered the hospitable doors of Woodfield Manor than he was struck by the baronial magnificence of everything around him. The massive oak carvings, the Holbein portraits of Sir Walter's ancestors, the superb though solid furniture, the quarterings, the halberds, cuirasses, scimitars, and the various instruments of war which adorned the principal rooms and the staircase—all these presented such charms to the artistic eye of Pierre as caused him to feel that he was indeed fortunate in being the inmate of so instructive and interesting an establishment. The room which had been especially prepared for him was at some little distance from the main staircase; but it was most pleasantly situated, and commanded just such a view of the surrounding park, with its overhanging hills and rippling waters, which an artist would desire to paint. The "light" was, moreover, admirably adapted to the peculiar requirements of a painter; whilst the walls of the room were covered with engravings, all more or less of an historical and suggestive character. There were also two portraits in the Vandyck school—the one an admirable likeness of Sir Walter Sedley's daughter, and the other a full-length figure of a handsome, classic-featured, elegantly-formed girl, some few years her senior. This he discovered to be the portrait of a young lady, who, it afterwards transpired, was a niece of Sir Walter's, but whose father being in embarrassed circumstances, she had been induced to enter her uncle's household as preceptress of his youngest children. She was, of course, treated less in that character than in that of a member of the family; and the handsome apartment which had just been allotted to Pierre was formerly the school-room. Under all circumstances, it was very obvious that, for the brief period during which Pierre intended to sojourn at Woodfield Manor, he had every prospect of being most indulgently cared for, and of enjoying the most perfect isolation, should he feel so disposed.

At dinner time that day the hoped-for honour was assigned to Pierre of sitting next to Mistress Sedley, who, upon enquiry, he found, was the only daughter of Sir Walter (though his family consisted of four children) and whose christian name was Laura. Opposite to Pierre was seated Sir Walter's niece, Mabel Vernon, to whom he had just been formally introduced (though, as far as identification was concerned, the portrait had rendered that ceremony unnecessary), and next to that lady was a Captain Spoffer, a staunch and not very amiable adherent of the king's, but, who, although appearance justified the belief that he was a valiant son of Mars, was evidently a worthy disciple of Cupid; for his attentions to the lovely lady at his side were marked by a degree of emproisement which betokened something far beyond meretricious politeness. Pierre quickly remarked, however, that Mistress Verdon did not reciprocate his attentions, nor was she disposed to enter very freely into conversation with him; but, on the contrary, whenever she saw a fitting opportunity, she pointedly directed her notice towards Laura Sedley and himself. This was especially humiliating to Captain Spoffer, and not particularly agreeable to Laura. For it must be borne in mind that Pierre was young, handsome, animated, and chivalric, and that Laura was still younger, of quick intelligence, with bright piercing eyes and an impressibility of soul, which pointed her out as one who, though of gentle nature, knew well how to assert the dignity of her position, and who felt (but I must not anticipate) an inward conviction that her father's newly-arrived visiter was one day destined to achieve greatness—a greatness which, according to the promptings of her heart, far transcended all titles and distinctions of hereditary descent. The character of Mabel Vernon, though not cast in the same mould, resembled that of Laura in many particulars. The form and features of Mabel were, perhaps, more masculine than those of Laura, but in disposition she was less energetic. Mabel was fair, Laura was dark; the former was tall and commanding, the latter was commanding, without being tall. Each had dark blue eyes; but those of Mabel lacked the lustre which imparted to Laura's expressive countenance a charm of the most enduring and endearing kind.

Both were beautiful, and both, though in a different degree, possessed that captivating grace which speaks the language of the heart. True, that one was the daughter of a wealthy baronet, and the other was only his niece and the governess of his children; but it should be noted that she occupied the latter position, simply because her natural pride forbade her accepting a favour without affording some equivalent.

Such, then, were the two ladies into whose society our young artist was thus unexpectedly thrown; and it need hardly be said that already had it become manifest that he was by no means unheeded by either of them. A few days after his arrival at Woodfield Manor, he had scrutinized minutely the two portraits which, as I have said, ornamented the walls of his apartment, and it was not long ere he came to the determination of copying one of them. He would throw other work aside for a duty of so agreeable a nature; and if he succeeded in this first attempt, he would direct his pencil to a re-production of the other portrait. We are unable to say by what operation of the mind (or heart) it was that he made choice of his first subject; but it is quite sufficient to state the fact as it occurred—viz. that the portrait which commended itself to his immediate attention was that of Mabel Verdon. The canvas was prepared, and Pierre was soon engaged in copying the lineaments of Mabel's delicate but classical face.

While thus occupied he was disturbed by a tap at the door, which caused him instinctively to conceal the surface of his canvas, as he did not wish any of the household to see the work until it had advanced towards completion. On his responding to the sound, he was no less confused than surprised, to see the lovely Laura enter the room.

"I fear I have disturbed you, Mons. Von Gerlstein," said Laura, seeing the effect which her unexpected presence had produced on the bewildered artist. "Pray, accept my apologies, and believe that I was tempted to intrude upon you solely by the desire that I might witness another of your triumphs."

"No apology is necessary," replied Pierre, "from one who pays me a compliment by visiting my apartment. I thank you deeply for this mark of attention, fair lady; but as to another triumph, I fear your generosity has suggested that which it is not in my poor power to accomplish."

"And may I not have the pleasure of seeing the result of your occupation this morning?" said Laura, looking towards the easel, somewhat perplexed to find that the square of canvas which rested thereon presented the back instead of the front.

"Believe me, Mistress Laura," said Pierre, "believe me, I have nought to show you but a few rugged lines which very ill become the smooth brow they are designed to portray."

"But you will not deny me the privilege of witnessing those lines?" said Laura, entreatingly.

"Mistress Sedley," exclaimed Pierre, with becoming emphasis, "I can deny you nothing, and the less so when you make a request which involves an honour to myself."

So saying, he turned the canvas with its face forward, and exhibited a portrait, already sufficiently advanced to betray the likeness of Mabel Verdon.

"In truth you have laboured hard," said Laura, eyeing the picture attentively, "to make such progress in a few short days; but the work has been a labour of love, and hence your pencil has derived additional strength."

"You are indeed good to say so," said Pierre; "but my labour of love is the pursuit of my art; and I require no special incentive from the subject immediately before me."

"You have commenced it admirably," said Laura, still surveying the portrait, and afterwards turning to the original picture. "Poor dear Mabel!" she continued, in a somewhat plaintive tone, which it was impossible for the perplexed artist to account for, "I feel assured that the likeness will be better even than the existing one."

There was a something so disinterested and amiable in the language of the young lady—something so entirely free from any approach to selfishness, that the youthful artist regarded Laura with an expression of delight which he could not hope to conceal. "Mistress Laura," said he, "how can I ever thank you for such proofs of your goodness?"

"I shall be anxious to see the portrait when completed," said Laura, unmindful of the last observation which had fallen from Pierre.

"It shall never be completed!" exclaimed Pierre, as he expunged every trace of the physiognomy which had cost him some days to produce. "It might have been a labour of love, Mistress Laura; but, oh! let me assure you how little I knew the error I was committing—how little I thought, when my untutored mind wandered to Mistress Verdon, that your goodness would ever beam before me with such lustre as it has done to-day."

"If the approval of so humble a judge as I am," replied Laura, "be deserving of such language, it is indeed profitably bestowed."

"May I not hope," said Pierre, "to inspire you with a warmer interest in me, than is likely to be suggested by the fruits of my pencil?" So saying, he seized her fair hand convulsively, and was about to raise it to his lips, when Sir Walter Sedley entered the room.

"Heyday!" he exclaimed, haughtily, "my presence would seem to have caused some little uneasiness here. Laura, how is this?"

Fixing her large bright eye full upon her father's face, she exclaimed, "I would ask your forgiveness, dear father, but that a kiss will amply atone for all the wrong I have committed," and she threw her arms round her parent's neck, in a tender and affectionate embrace.

In another instant Laura had quitted the apartment, and Sir Walter being now alone with Pierre, the latter was constrained to acknowledge to the baronet the sentiments which his amiable daughter had inspired in him. "He knew," he said, "it was presumption on his part to encourage the hope that such sentiments could ever be requited; but, at least, he should be pardoned for showing how deeply he appreciated those amiable qualities which had contributed so materially to his happiness, during the brief period he had enjoyed the high privilege of knowing Laura Sedley."

Sir Walter calmly remarked that "his daughter was, doubtless, deserving of the eulogistic terms in which Pierre had spoken of her; but he must not disabuse his mind of the wise reflection that, if his feelings towards Laura were other than those of friendship, they would not be requited."

Pierre did not presume to enter into any discussion with Sir Walter; but enough transpired to show that he had conceived an attachment for the worthy baronet's daughter; and were we to say that the attachment was, in some measure, reciprocated, would it appear that the reader had been very seriously misinformed? We think not. From that time it was too obvious to Pierre's mind that his departure from Woodfield would not be a source of regret to Sir Walter; but in proportion as the causes which led to this conclusion became more and more apparent, did Pierre feel desirous of prolonging his stay. One evening, however, an event occurred which materially influenced Pierre's future movements, and taught him that the time had now come when his pride alone should lead him from the spot where he had spent so many happy days.

According to usual custom, Sir Walter had permitted some rustic games amongst his tenantry to take place in the park attached to the demesne, and a select party of friends had been invited to witness the pastime. Sir Walter suddenly observed that Mabel Verdon was unaccountably absent from the scene; and perceiving that Pierre was in deep conversation with Laura, the baronet approached him somewhat austere, and begged to know whether "either the lady or the gentleman could inform him why Mistress Verdon was not amongst the company?"

Both replied that they knew not the cause; but that they regretted her absence profoundly, and Pierre eagerly volunteered to hasten to the mansion and endeavour to bring Mabel into the park. He was proceeding on that innocent mission, when he encountered Captain Spoffer, who told him that he need not be at any pains to seek Mistress Verdon, as that lady was confined to her chamber, and could not be interfered with by strangers.

Pierre calmly replied that he did not know by what right Captain Spoffer took upon himself the task of questioning his line of conduct; but he begged him clearly to understand that his words and his actions were alike disregarded by him.

"The time may come, Mons. Von Gerlstein," said Spoffer, "when you will be disposed to adopt a different tone, for you should understand, sir, that your position here may be brought to a conclusion when you are least prepared for it."

In due course it transpired that the cause of Mabel's absence from the revels was that she had received tidings that her father had been taken prisoner by Cromwell's party, and rather than disclose the fact at the time of merry-making, she had sought the solitude of her own room, where she might, unobserved, give vent to the feelings which agitated her breast. That night was one of gloom in the mansion of Sir Walter Sedley, for news had arrived which too painfully confirmed the report regarding the father of Mabel Verdon, and which stated, moreover, that Cromwell was collecting his forces at Naseby. Sir Walter knew too well the sad import of this intelligence, accompanied as it was by a solemn appeal to the valour of every true royalist who had ever held arms in the service of his country; and it was his duty, at whatever sacrifice, to abandon his home for the field of battle. Intimation to this effect having been conveyed throughout the household, the night was passed in lamentation and sleeplessness, one and all regarding the summons to arms as the death-knell to the hopes of those who dwelt in Woodfield Manor. In the general gloom Pierre strongly participated, and the more so that he felt that the climax to his happiness had arrived. He must now go forth into the struggling world and fight the battle of rivalry and discontent, away from all he held most dear, and from scenes which had imparted new phases to his life.

The disastrous consequences which followed the wars of Cromwell are so well known that the briefest reference to them will be sufficient for the purposes of this story—and that merely with the view to point out the effect which was produced by those wars upon art and artists in England. Great works which had been begun by illustrious painters, under the authority of the king, were left unfinished, and many ambitious and promising students whom the royal patron had caused to come from distant parts to achieve a position, now found those channels to success on which they most depended entirely closed against them. No one felt this adverse pressure of affairs more keenly than Pierre, upon whom the sad fatality had fallen at a moment when the paramount object of his life was so to improve his fortunes as to render him a fitting suitor for the hand of Laura Sedley. But it was otherwise ordained; for he soon found that the small amount of patronage which remained to him was rapidly dwindling away; until at length he was reduced to a condition bordering on absolute dependence. His healthful and manly appearance, set off, as it always was in more prosperous times, by well-appointed attire, was now changed for one of poverty and and wretchedness. His apparel, in short, so conspicuously betrayed the extremity to which he was reduced, that he had seldom the courage to walk abroad; and he often confined himself to his studio for many days at a time, striving to work, but not working, for his mind was too much agitated by thoughts of the happy days he had once passed in the company of one whom his prospect of seeing again was becoming more and more remote; and, moreover, his energies received a powerful check from the conviction that his labour was in vain. The very spider which had been building its web in a corner of the room could gain some reward for its industry; but he, the once prosperous, but now forlorn, artist, must toil and toil without encouragement and without hope. But a brighter day might be approaching, and he would endure with fortitude the decrees of Providence. One evening, on his return home, after a fruitless endeavour to dispose of a small picture, he found on the table a roll of canvas, which, on unfolding he discovered to be the portrait of Laura Sedley—the identical portrait which had adorned his room at Woodfield Manor! Great was his astonishment, but greater still his delight, for he now saw that he had not faded from the remembrance of Laura, and that (brightest of all earthly joys!) there was a prospect of his meeting her again. But his rapture was yet to be still further called forth; for turning his eyes to the ground he observed a letter which had fallen there, and on opening it, a piece of money was revealed, accompanied by these words—

"From one who has heard of your distress, and who entrusts to you her portrait to save it from marauders."

"Generous girl!" he exclaimed. "The devotion of a life can never repay such goodness. And has Woodfield Manor fallen a sacrifice to the revolutionary spirit of the times? Laura is, perhaps, homeless; and her thoughts turn to me in sympathy; for it is clear that the condition I am in has come to her knowledge, and her generous disposition makes her lean towards me with increased ardour."

On making inquiries, which he did without delay, Pierre discovered that Laura had indeed good cause to be in fear of marauders, her father's estate having become "the prey of the spoiler," and all the blessings of a happy home being cast to the merciless winds. Pierre had been occupied at his easel, and was preparing to put aside the implements of his art, when he saw on the open waste-land which fronted his window, the slender and youthful form of a female who appeared to be in doubt as to the direction she should take. It was late in the day, and, the weather being unpropitious, there were few people to be seen, and indeed the only object which now met his view was the simply-clad and fragile form alluded to. His thoughts ever recurring to the one beloved being who had now become a part of his existence, the idea for a moment struck him that the figure might be that of Laura; but on reflection he felt that the supposition was an erroneous one, for it was hardly probable that she would be alone on that cheerless spot towards night-fall, and moreover neither the dress nor the carriage of the lady was such as he could associate with the beauty of Woodfield Manor.

Suddenly his ears were startled by the sound of muffled drums, which roused him from his reverie, and caused him to totter to the window, when he descried a detachment of infantry coming across the open space.

Without an instant's delay he descended into the road, and there discovered that the soldiers were carrying an officer who had been severely wounded in a conflict which had taken place that day between the Cavaliers and Roundheads. He speedily found himself in front of the detachment, and had turned aside in order not to obstruct their free passage, when he observed the same delicate figure he had before seen from his window. What a world of rapture was concentrated in his shattered bosom at that moment, when he found that the figure was that of Laura Sedley, though so altered in every respect that he might well have failed to recognise her in the distance! In a paroxysm of joy he threw himself at her feet, ejaculating, "Laura!" and was struggling to rise as the soldiers approached, but was unable to do so, for the sudden revulsion of feeling (acting upon that condition of nervous debility which his weakness had produced) had snapt his life-strings, and his ears had just received from the lips of the faithful girl the gladdening words, "Through weal or woe, I am thine"—when a voice announced that the wounded officer was Sir Walter Sedley.

"My father!" shrieked Laura, in despair. "Give me your blessing, and (she faltered) your consent!"

"Both are yours!" muttered Sir Walter. But it was too late, for the stricken artist had spoken his last word ("Laura"), and he was carried from the ground a corpse!

The wound which had prostrated Sir Walter did not prove mortal; but, alas! the fates did not deal so lightly with his hapless daughter, for she received her death-blow in the untimely decease of her lover; and not many weeks had elapsed ere she also went to her last resting-place, a mournful but not a solitary instance of the disastrous doings of those troublous times.

HOLY-CROSS ABBEY.

HOLY-CROSS ABBEY, one of the most interesting architectural remains of antiquity in Ireland, is seated on the banks of that beautiful river,

The gentle Suire that, making way
By sweet Clonmel, adorns rich Waterford, about three miles from Thurles, county of Tipperary. As appears from the original charter, still in existence, the Abbey owes its foundation to Donald O'Brien, King of Limerick, in the year 1182, when it was richly endowed with lands for its support by its founder. These grants were confirmed four years later by John, Earl of Morton, then Lord of Ireland, and afterwards King John. He further directed that the monks of the abbey (who were of the Cistercian order) should be "free from all mulcts in his courts, for what cause soever they should be amerced, and also free of all toll whatever." In 1283 this charter was confirmed by Henry III., and again, in 1295, by Richard II. Like most monastic structures of any importance, it was cruciform, and consisted of a nave, chancel, and transept, with a lofty square belfry at the intersection of the cross; but is distinguished from other structures of the kind in having in both transepts two distinct chapels, beautifully groined—a feature which imparts much picturesqueness to the effect. The steeple rests on four beautifully-groined arches, and the roof of the choir, as well as those of the side chapels, is similarly enriched. The windows, generally, are of very elegant and tasteful design.

THE BLACK DOCTOR.

CHAPTER VI.

UD Island is that portion of the northern outlets of Dublin bounded on the east by the sea, and on the north and south by the river Tolka and the Royal Canal. Strictly speaking, it is a promontory, as it is not divided by water from the main land on the western side. This so-called island was governed by a king, named M'Donnell, in whose family the crown of "Mud Island" remained for many generations. On the death of one monarch another took his place, and the funeral games in honour of the departed sovereign were generally celebrated in a public-house in the neighbourhood, as were also the coronation ceremonies of each succeeding M'Donnell. The King of Mud Island had absolute sway in this locality, where a sheriff's officer, unless backed by a troop of dragoons or a sergeant's guard, had not the remotest chance of escaping with his life, provided he attempted the capture of any person who sought sanctuary on "the Island." At the time to which our story refers it was a rare place, when a more vigorous administration of the law and the introduction of a civic police had not interfered with its privileges, or before efforts were made to introduce improvements. Long rows of mud cabins, like Indian wigwams, were the residences of the liege subjects of the King, who lived by pillage and violence, and who, it was generally remarked, were never known to sleep but in the broad daylight. The approaches to Mud Island from the city were always well guarded, and scouts well trained to their business quickly gave information at head-quarters when danger was at hand.

It was a pitch-dark and foggy night when the chaise occupied by the Black Doctor and Stammers stopped opposite the house or rather cabin of the King of Mud Island. The approach of the visitors had been announced, as his majesty stood in the centre of desperate-looking men, dressed in all varieties of costume, and all armed with sticks, knives, or bludgeons. His majesty was a tall, burly-looking man, whose age might be about fifty, and in the dim uncertain light his huge proportions made those by whom he was surrounded appear most diminutive. As the chaise drove up he approached the door, which was at the back of the vehicle, and asked, in a deep voice, "Who goes there?"

"It is I, King," replied the Black Doctor, "and a subject who was wounded in the wars with the law, and who wants to stop with you for a while."

"Your dog would be welcome to Mud Island," said the King; "bring your friend in, and he shall be safe."

Stammers was conveyed to a room in the back part of M'Donnell's palace, where the poor heart-broken and maimed outlaw was placed on a wretched apology for a bed.

"For this night and to-morrow," said Bramble to the King, "nobody but yourself or me must see your guest, and above all things beware of a surprise."

"I know what you mean," observed M'Donnell. "Not a hair of his head shall be hurt while he is here."

"That is well," said Bramble. "I will now bid him good night, as I have to see a few patients." He then took his departure for the "Three Jolly Travellers."

Tony, after he had partaken of anything but a ceremonious dinner, scampered off to the locality in which Abraham Isaacs resided. He took some time to reconnoitre, and when every thing, in the shape of danger was sure to be out of reach, he approached the shop window, and satisfied himself that Abraham was within doors. Long and anxiously did he wait for the Jew to make his appearance; but at length he did come forth, well muffled up, never dreaming of the pair of lynx eyes that were anxiously bent on his movements. On he went on his way with Tony closely following him. Over the paved footway he plodded, dreaming of the "thousand" which he was to get for giving up the forged bill. Every move he made was watched, and as he drew near to the less-populated parts of the city, his anxious watcher drew further back. It was a long way to go on foot that hour on such a night, Abraham Isaacs. At length he turned down a kind of bye-lane, which led into an open space where a market was held twice in the week. He had proceeded about half way down this lane when Tony ran cautiously behind him. The young thief stooped and threw the Jew heavily on his back in the heaps of mud through which he had been wading. Abraham was stunned by the fall, and before he had time to recover himself Tony thrust his hand into the side pocket of his coat, and succeeded in capturing the precious black pocket-book, which was now a treasure beyond price to him.

The young worthy then ran off as hard as he could, as he saw the Jew slowly attempting to rise. He muttered some half-dozen oaths as he resumed his journey, never dreaming that the pocket-book and its contents were as lost to him as Paradise was to Cain.

The Jew, as he growled and trudged along, was covered over with black greasy mud, but the prospect of the rich reward which he was to receive consoled him in his trouble. Tony ran through every bye-way and turn that he could find on his way to the "Three Jolly Travellers." On arriving near the door panting for breath, and in a fever of excitement, he observed the Black Doctor in close conversation with John Brunt. Seeing that all was right, he boldly entered, and, after giving a knowing wink at Bramble, he seated himself on the stairs.

"You imp," said the landlord, "where were you all day? I will settle you. Why did you tell me that you saw Jerry the Lift in this street two days ago?"

"It was a lie I told you," replied Tony, "after your own fashion."

"Don't mind him now, Brunt," said Bramble, "as I want him to go to a place for me."

Brunt nodded assent, as the Black Doctor and Tony withdrew to the street.

"What news?" asked Bramble, as he trembled with excitement.

"Here it is," said Tony, producing the black pocket-book out of his hat.

The first impulse of the Black Doctor was to seize Tony and embrace him. "You are worth your weight in gold," continued he; "and from this night forward, Tony, your fortunes and mine shall be the same." Having placed the pocket-book inside his vest, he returned with Tony to the "Three Jolly Travellers," to await the arrival of the Jew.

"This is a nice young gentleman," said the Black Doctor, as he re-entered the bar, addressing John Brunt, holding Tony as he did so by the collar of his long-tailed coat. "You must regard him now as my prisoner, and in my custody he must remain for the remainder of this night and to-morrow."

"Let him mind his business," replied Brunt. "I am walked off my legs between this bar to upstairs and downstairs answering customers all the live-long day. Don't keep him longer idling, doctor," continued Brunt, as he threw his leaden eyes on Tony, who, from his recent excursions into life, showed by his manner that he did not much care for the pecuniary advancement of John Brunt.

The Black Doctor threw his hat back on his head, and in an assumed tone of the greatest submission, said, "Perhaps, Mr. Brunt, you would be kind enough to allow me to have my own way. It is a caprice of mine to ask you to permit Tony to do my bidding; but suppose you do not consent—what then, Brunt?"

"Bravo, Doctor," said Tony, "he is more in the habit of talking to people than of hearing people talking to him."

"Is there light above stairs," inquired the Black Doctor; "if not, Tony, get it, for I am tired waiting for that Abraham Isaacs, who should have been here half an hour since. Remain up stairs," he continued, addressing Tony, "until I go up to you."

Bramble walked inside the rickety counter, and eyeing Brunt from head to foot, said, "John Brunt I have a message from the grave for you—not exactly from the grave, because the man who gave me the message for you was never buried, although he is dead. Jerry the Lift told me to have revenge. He told me how you killed Hawks-worth by strangling him after you had made him drunk—how you buried him in the back kitchen, money and all. If you have not taken up that money since, it is there still in safe keeping, under the flags near the old grate. Don't look so frightened, Brunt, I want the most of it this night, and you, Tony, and myself will be the exhumers. Surely, you did not kill the exciseman for nothing, and it is a pity to leave your reward so long buried."

John Brunt grew faint, and he staggered backwards to the chair on which he was in the habit of sitting behind the bar of "The Three Jolly Travellers."

"Tell Mr. Isaacs when he comes that I am waiting for him," added the Black Doctor, lifting his hand significantly, as he ascended the stairs.

John Brunt's many customers in the tap were astonished at the abstraction of the landlord, inasmuch as nearly all that had been regaling themselves were allowed to walk off without paying their reckoning.

The barking of a dog and some loud words in the street, arrested the attention of Tony, who was recording for the edification of the Black Doctor, the mode which had been used for stealing the pocket-book from the person of Abraham Isaacs.

"As sure as I live," said Tony, "that's the Jew."

"Go down, and be as busy as you like," said Bramble. "Tell him I have been waiting for him ever so long, and mind—caution!"

Tony arranged his hat, and seizing a few empty pewter measures which were on the counter, ran to the door with the apparent purpose of ascertaining what was the cause of the disturbance. In a few minutes Abraham Isaacs made his appearance covered over with mud. When he arrived he was pale with rage, as he entered the bar, and after taking off his hat and wiping his forehead with a yellow silk pocket handkerchief, he turned to Tony and asked him if Dr. Bramble was in the house.

"Are you the gentleman he is waiting for?" said Tony. "He is here this hour."

"Show me to him at once," said the Jew, and as Tony lighted him up stairs, he had to laugh until he crowed again at the result which his work had produced on the garments of the Jew.

The Black Doctor came forward to salute Isaacs as he entered the room. "Dear sir," continued he, "I hope you are not hurt, as I see by your clothes that you have got a fall."

"I am not hurt," said the Jew, "although I have got an upset. This is a most unruly place. A boy who was amusing himself as I came along ran against me, and threw me head over heels, and then ran off. I hope I did not keep you waiting too long," observed he, as he drew his chair nearer to the fire.

"By no means," replied Bramble. "I will give you the money you demand for Stammers' bill this night; but, perhaps, instead of the thousand, for the sake of his wife and children I could induce you to accept the seven hundred and fifty which I offered you this day."

"On principle I will not take a shilling off what I said. I have the bill with me, and you shall have it, provided you give me one thousand pounds. If you do not, there is no harm done, and the sheriff shall have the document in the morning," said the Jew.

"If you are so decided on the matter, I may now fairly tell you that I am instructed by Mrs. and Miss Stammers to give what you require for the forged bill."

"Tony, come here," continued Bramble; "tell your master that I want him, and do you remain in the bar until he returns."

In a short time John Brunt made his appearance, looking the picture of intense misery.

"Won't you take a chair, Mr. Brunt," said Bramble. "I just called you up for the purpose of telling Mr. Isaacs here that you were going to influence the estate of a rich exciseman for the purpose of giving a thousand pounds, which a friend of mine owes him on—a forged bill," whispered the doctor, in a tone that the Jew could overhear.

"All right," replied Brunt, mechanically.

"As you will take nothing less than the thousand," said the Black Doctor, "let us have the bill."

"It is here," replied the Jew, "in this pocket-book," as he put his hand into the pocket of his coat.

Bramble stirred the fire, and remarked, "even for winter it was very severe weather."

The Jew rose from his seat and walked to the other side of the room. He looked upon the floor as he rummaged his pockets. He went to the chair upon which he had been sitting, pulled it aside and looked under the old table. His face bore the expression of a person who had been attacked by fire in a burning house, from which there appeared to be no means of escape. He ran his hands through his hair as he exclaimed, "I would have sworn a thousand oaths that I had placed my large pocket-book here—here"—slapping his left breast with his right hand.

"Have you lost anything, Mr. Isaacs?" asked Bramble. "I fear that you have."

The Jew returned no answer, but continued to pace up and down the room like one bewildered.

"All is lost," said the Jew, "if I did not leave it at home. Not alone that bill, that brought me here, but much more—very much—all my earnings, all my thrift made on the prodigality of others."

"I tell you this," said Bramble, springing from his seat, and affecting to be in a fearful passion, "if you have broken faith with me and my friend by any paltry excuse, and that you have handed over this bill to the Crown, I will make the remnant of your wretched life a curse to you."

"I am honest in what I say," replied the Jew, mournfully. "All my trading with Gentiles is gone for nothing. I am undone this night!"

"You must have left it at home," said Bramble, whose kindly nature was struck with a feeling of pity for the Jew.

"Get some one for me that will restore that pocket-book, and I will make you a present of the forged bill, and you can have the luxury of hanging or saving your friend. There is one assignment unregistered in that small book which is 'all-in-all' to Abraham Isaacs."

"Go home at once," observed the Black Doctor, "as I am sure in your hurry you must have forgotten at your residence what you seek. In the mean time I will make every inquiry; but, above all things, I will trust you not to play false with my poor friend."

"I won't," said the Jew, despondingly, as he slowly took his departure, with a heavy heart, for his home.

Tony, having been relieved from his official duties behind the counter by his master, after putting all the money that he had received for drink into his pockets, rejoined the Black Doctor at the fire.

"Quill, Wisp, and other pupils will be here soon," said Bramble. "Don't say a word about the pocket-book. I had not time to open it since you gave it to me. Return to the shop."

Tony obeyed the instructions of his patron by going down stairs.

RECOLLECTIONS OF IRELAND.

I REMEMBER a beautiful land far away,
An Isle by the blue sea caressed,
And the fields were so green and the mountains so grey,
In this Isle far away in the West.

There rocks grim and hoary and stately old hills,
Still echo the peasant's sweet song:
And broad shining rivers and murmuring rills,
Go flashing and dancing along.

And many a dim grotto and weird lonely dell
Peeps out from her emerald breast;
Oh! well may the fairies continue to dwell
In this beautiful Isle in the West.

Oh, land ever lovely! tho' many long years
My feet have a stranger's soil pressed,
Thy memory comes with a gush of fond tears—
Sweet home of my youth in the West!

And often I dream I'm a bare-footed child,
And sit at the old cabin door,
With a head full of fancies romantic and wild,
And a warm heart with love brimming o'er.

In the glens thro' the green tangled bushes I roam,
And, oh! I supremely am blest,
As ever in spirit again I'm at home—
At home in the beautiful West!

Still as life's troubled day to its close draweth nigh,
Like some poor little bird to its nest,
This heart worn and weary right gladly would fly
To its own darling Isle in the West.

Oh, Erin! the heart that has felt the deep spell
Of thy beauty and witching romance,
Can never content in a stranger's land dwell,
Tossed about by the billows of chance.

For ever the souls of thy wanderers crave
To return to the land they love best,
That their wings may be folded at last in the grave,
In their own blessed Isle in the West! E. F.

THE MANY AND THE FEW.—The world can pry out everything about us which it has a mind to know. But then there is this consolation, which men will never accept in their own cases, that the world doesn't care. Consider the amount of scandal it has been forced to hear in its time, and how weary and blasé it must be of that kind of intelligence. You are taken to prison, and fancy yourselves indelibly disgraced? You are bankrupt under odd circumstances? You drive a queer bargain with your friends and are found out, and imagine the world will punish you? Psha! Your shame is only vanity. Go and talk to the world as if nothing had happened, and nothing has happened. Tumble down; brush the mud off your clothes; appear with a smiling countenance, and nobody cares. Do you suppose Society is going to take out its pocket-handkerchief and be inconsolable when you die?—W. M. Thackeray

SOMETHING ABOUT FINE THINGS.

FORLORN bachelor, on £200 a-year, in London, is a poor man. He has no home in the social sense of the word, unless a three-pair front, and the society of a latch-key, be presumed to represent it. Bilious and stupid he rises in the morning, slinks down to his office, dines in the afternoon in boxes larded with the steam of thirty thousand dinners: flies after business hours to the theatre, and returns about midnight to find his candle and matches on the hall slab, and the family gone to bed hours before his arrival. If to check the monotony of his life, up a flirtation with the cat (if the cat is at home), or provokes the parrot to sing, and scream in diabolic harmony. He takes a long time to pull off his boots, and examines the soles with a critical eye to their condition. Then, up stairs through the silent house, apast the rotten geraniums on the landing, and the shabby clock on the second lobby. And the room cold, musty, damp-smelling, with the clouded looking-glass betokening fog, on the table, and the thin, white-curtained bed standing frigid and fearful in the corner; he looks around, and after a profound pause, sinks into his easy chair. Lighting a pipe at the candle, he puffs languidly, and begins to turn over in review the events of the day. He has dined liberally, he has had a box at the St. James's; he has suppered at the Windsor—not alone, be it observed—there was that little affair of the gold locket, and—and oh, hang it. But 'twon't do to hang it; for whilst his income is about thirteen shillings a day, his expenditure is close upon twenty; and if he go on in this way for another quarter, he may qualify himself for an introduction to the "Belvidere Hotel," alias, the Queen's Bench Prison. So he frets and worries himself. Then calculating the details of his "house-keeping" (vile sarcasm!) he thinks that they will bear some reduction; couldn't he do without that pickled salmon for breakfast? Yes, by the Monument, yes; and more than that, desert the boxes of an evening and retire to the pot. Pulling a little bill, written with faded ink, from his pocket, and drawing the candle some inches nearer, he becomes absorbed in a profound study of the docket. "Ha!" he cries, with a fierce scowl that might grace a melo-drama, "I have it. Only look at that item for washing; three and seven-pence for one week! three and seven-pence! confound it. And only think of putting in nights up, this weather, when a fellow sleeps with the windows up, fanning himself with a hand-screen. Three and seven-pence!" Filled by the discovery of so gross an imposition, the wretched bachelor makes a strong resolution. He will cut off the laundress and wear paper. "For," he thinks, "I can get paper collars, white and glossy in Holland for six-pence a dozen, shirt fronts, (do. do.) at three-pence a-piece; white vests, all sorts of patterns, barred and creamed, and dotted, at four-pence each; and even a passable hat for a shilling." He glances over his anticipated triumph, and feels almost inspired to promulgate the apotheosis of paper. Won't Mrs. Soda, the laundress stare, won't she? And only to think of night-caps! When I sat on Titbat in the morning he looks serious. The laundress have entered into his mind, and he tells me he feels ashamed to be so long the patient, unsuspecting victim of the heartless imposition practised by the London laundresses. "Don't mind it," he says, and he gravely taps the sugar-bowl with the silver spoon, "I am not at all at fault. Let us take to paper." I see him, as he walks across the table, but he smiles. "Mac, my dear fellow, see that fur, and try to put a little faith in it. The fur is good; henceforth it will be possible for a man to be decently dressed, with the snowiest of linens, and the warmest of furs, for the average charge of eight-pence halfpenny a night. That incredulous look again! Well, can you be convinced? Look here"—and he tots up the figures on the tips of his fingers—"shirt, 3d., vest, 4d.; that's seven-pence; tie, 1d., and collar, 1d.—eightpence halfpenny. Can any thing be plainer?" I grumble out an affirmative, accompanied by a doubtful shaking of the head. Titbat is indignant.

In dressing-gown and slippers, eyes yellow-cornered, lips dry, complexion pale and languid, sits Titbat drinking deeply of aromatic coffee, eating sparingly of ginger nuts, he lolls back in his chair, throwing sleepy glances now and then at the Times, supported against the side of the milk jug.

"Sick after last night, Tit? I knew you would."

"You were right. Very."

"And how did the party come off?"

"Nicely. But the champagne would not fly, and the claret was corky. And some fiend put salt in the lobster salad. Bangh!"

"Hang the wine and the salad; you danced—didn't you?"

"Yes, my boy. I did dance. Do you know her?"

"Who's 'her,' in the name of all that's heavenly?"

"Her?—very true, how should you know?—why, Martha Whittle!"

"Yes. Isn't she a lively little thing?"

"Very," says Titbat, with a deep sigh. "Very lively—too lively for me, Mac."

"Oh, she suggested an elopement I suppose; or asked you tie up her hair, or kick her tiger, or—"

"Mr. Mac," exclaims Titbat with unusual ferocity, "she asked nothing so absurdly ridiculous."

"Well, don't lose temper over it, old fellow. What did she do?"

"Faith I'll tell you, the story is all over the town by this; and if you don't hear it from me, you will from somebody else. Those infernal paper things:—"

"Yes—ha! ha!—yes."

"Sir, on going out last evening, I arrayed myself in the whitest of paper fronts and collars, the sweetest of paper ties, and the most gorgeous of paper watered-silk waistcoats. You should have seen the chaste aspect of the apparel—it was superb, sir. All remained perfect to the conclusion of the opening quadrilles, when Martha honoured me in a waltz. Swaying about in the glorious movements of that fascinating dance, I became lost to everything but a dizzy sense of happiness, and the presence of the dear being in my arms. Round and round and round, till the room swam about us, we whirled and whirled. At last the dancers dropped off, and we sat down. I heard a titter behind me, and on turning round with that rude impulsiveness, which is one of the misfortunes of my character, I observed that Martha's mouth was stuffed with something white and shiny. Concluding that she had occasioned the laugh, and knowing that she is liberal of sacrifices to merriment, I composed myself. Ten minutes later I was in the refreshment room with my charming partner. As I apprehended that my tie might have been torn in the crush, I put up my hands to straighten the ends, when,—would you believe it?—I found that one extremity had been bitten off.—Eaten off, sir, by that mischievous girl, whilst I was in the pleasures of that divine waltz. Keep down that mischievous wicked sneer, if you please."

"But forgive me, Titbat; it is impossible I should be serious."

"Sir," continues my friend, "I was naturally provoked, and spoke rather sharply about the matter, and threw out one or two hints about delicacy and fine breeding, which were received only with peals of laughter."

"Miss Whittle," I said, "you have chosen a rather questionable mode of making your friends merry,—you—"

"Now," she cried, "why do you talk nonsense? what was it but a bit of paper?"

"There was a fresh roar at my expense. I retired to the ball-room, and found the company engaged in the polka. You know her?"

"Titbat, my dear fellow, do you think I'm a seer? you're strangely apocalyptic, you are."

"True. But haven't you heard the story already?"

"No—honour."

"Well, sir, the second 'her' was Miss Emma Bradford. Nice little thing, but subject to tooth-ache. I apologized for the disarrangement of my toilet, and engaged her. Do you like polkaing? I love it. Fancy the reverse—a whole storm of spinings to the right, with your hair flying back from your forehead, and your pulse at ninety. I did enjoy it thoroughly, except when we passed Miss Whittle, who had accepted a new partner, and who giggled audibly, as she swept round us. She was dancing with a long cavalry fellow whose legs were getting in everybody's way, seriously interrupting them. All on a sudden his wretched boots became entangled in Emma's tarlatan, and the poor thing stumbled and would have fallen to the ground had not she grasped at my waistcoat, one side of which she carried clean off. You should have seen me then; a portion of my miserable shirt-front had followed the detached piece of waistcoat, and, as I stood in the middle of the room amongst the crowd which had hurried to my partner's assistance, my position was deplorable. Marius amid the ruins of Carthage—psha! there was nobody there to poke fun at him. "What do they laugh at?" asked a voice behind me. Some snob replied—"Only a gentleman in a paper shirt, and the same description of waistcoat." "Theap and naashy," was the observation of an Israelite, "let me shee him, goah!"

An old bustard from Somerset House next approached, and fixing his eye-glass, surveyed me with impertinent deliberativeness. I couldn't stand that. "Sir," I exclaimed with some spirit, "your attention to me is insulting."

"Probably it is, my poor friend," he answered, "but we are so frequently misunderstood. I am sorry that your paper has had so short a circulation. It wasn't up to the water mark, I presume."

"If you are a gentleman" I cried, "you shall afford me satisfaction for this outrage."

"Most happy, my poor friend—most happy. Let me see—say, coffee and paper pellets for two."

How they roared.

"Ladies and gentlemen," exclaimed, Smith, the linen-draper, fixing his thumbs in the arm-holes of his waistcoat, and turning to the company with distended chest and flushed face. "Behold this here young man; what has he come to? From the bottom of my heart I do pity him.—And yet I don't; for when a man goes and wraps himself up in paper, like a cheap sausage, or a bit o' pork as it were, who can pity him?—Nobody. If he would recover his respectability, what should he do? Plain is the answer;—he must return to linen."

I glared at the scoundrel, as, ending his speech, he stalked down the room; and I inwardly registered a vow that if ever he came across me, he should repent his impudence. Then a new impulse seemed to move the company; every one glided away, and I was left standing alone, overwhelmed with rage and confusion. "This could not last; I made for the stairs, and descended to the hall. The two housemaids and the one footman were standing under the lamp, chatting over the paper incident."

"Go, you're a cheffin, you are," says the maid in blue ribbons.

"Pon honor, I don't," replied John. "Is a cove as got no flax, and had, as if so be, to take to stationery. His front was of cream note, and his vest of foolscap."

Fancy me passing through that smirking insolent rabble! Taking my hat from the rack I walked out, came home, spent a sleepless night, and here I am."

"Poor fellow!"

"Devil take your compassion! Is that all the consolation you can afford? Now, if a fellow told me this story, I should say—"

"What?"

"I should say—Look here, my boy, we must be patient. The pioneers of civilization in every age have had to suffer calumnies and affronts. Imitate them (I would say), and, though the day be far distant, you must triumph."

"Ah!"

"Ah! What do you mean by Ah? Leave me. I could rail against all the first-born of Adam. There—no apologies—forget me, and go."

I go, of course.

Titbat and I cannot fall out. I like the fellow, and the knowledge of this fact encourages him frequently in pushing his insolence to the limits of endurance.

It is a glowing autumn night. The skies, as seen from the two-pair window of my friend, are gorgeously draped in amber clouds. A small section of white moon looks down on the quiet square; and although dusk has long set in, we do not light candles, but sit and sip our grog in the blessed twilight.

"A gentleman as wants to see you, sir, is below," is the announcement of our maid, Mary, as she enters the room, and curtseys to host and friend.

"Show him up," says Titbat, anxiously.

Enters to us a sad-complexioned gentleman, parcel in hand.

"Have I the honour of seeing Mr. Titbat," asks the new-comer.

"That's my name, sir," says my friend. "Can I be of service to you?"

"Thinks you can," replies the other, looking uncommonly sharp at Titbat. "I has come from Sloppem, the pawnbroker's." Titbat grows white—with shame, not guilt, be it observed. "And what message does my relative send?" he asks.

"Nuffin partikler," says the pale intruder, who opens the parcel, displaying some bundles of collars, vests, and shirt fronts, which I immediately recognise as the cheap paper purchases of my friend. "Nuffin partikler; but he says as when a gent is hard up, and as to pop his drapery, he needn't be too wide-awake, and palm off paper uns instead of ones as is linen. Now, look at this—whiff—paper; and this—whiff—paper. Mr. Titbat, where is your conscience—where?"

"You scoundrel!" exclaims Titty, choked with rage—"you scoundrel!"

"Will you be quiet?" asks the impudent visitor. "Steady, as the guard said to the passenger when the trains were a galloping into each other. You know you daren't deny 'em. Look at your name—look"—and the wretch held up the counterfeit linen to the window.

Titbat jumped from his chair, oversetting a flower-stand. "Where did you get those?" he shrieked.

"Lor' bless us!" ejaculates the sad gentleman, "do you think rabbits are hatched in walnuts? Where—where but from your maid."

We call the maid, who reports, with many condemnatory comments, that she has been in the house only since the day before; that her predecessor was dismissed for various acts of dishonesty, including the wearing of her mistress's embroidered petticoats, at the three-penny dance, at Sluice House, High-gate; that the said predecessor had pawned right and left; and that she hopes she will be soon caught, and brought "afore a coroner's jury."

The murder is out—the case is clear. "And how much did she swindle you out of?" asks Titbat.

"Sixteen and three-pence," responds the pale man; "sixteen and three-pence, sir; the willany of this world is shocking."

"I shall pay your demand," says the other, "but spare your morality." He hands over the money, and the pawnbroker's agent disappears.

"How much is the lot worth?" I inquire sadly.

"Three and eight-pence."

"Whew!"

Another week has passed over, and Titbat is to be married. Down in the green country, across the channel, he has chosen an Irish wife, who comes over in a fortnight to sweeten his labours and superintend the making up of his linen. No more paper, no more make-believe. He has attained a definite faith in starch, and isinglass, and hot irons, and long-backed horses, staggering before mighty kitchen fires under loads of snowy raiment. He tells us that in wearing paper we deprive our wives of one of the noblest channels through which they minister to the peace and vanity of us men.

"Sir," he says, showing his Nicoll, "sir, I have been reading Ruskin—the 'Seven Lamps'—and a change for the better has been the result. Is it not criminal for a woman to wear paste diamonds and pinchbeck gold—machine lace, with the hope of passing it off as Brussels or Limerick, and cheap dogskins as a pretence for the legitimate kids? And if this be the truth, what enormity can exceed that which substitutes paper for linen, and strives, by a mean feint, to abolish one of the holiest household duties—the preparation of our drapery?"

It is a bachelor's breakfast, and the last at which Titbat shall sit as host and president. He is a little gloomy, as if he were about to change his lodgings, and had a warning of damp sheets in his nostrils. The viands embrace joints, conserves, and sweetmeats; and the wines are crusted port—thick as olive oil—and Bucellas, the very odour of which is contraband. When the heavier portion of the meal has been discussed, we, miserable fellows, draw back our chairs, light our pipes, and deliver great whiffs of smoke to the ceiling. Brains and wines sparkle simultaneously; bits of popular songs are trilled, and Benson gives us the famed lyric, "In the Strand," with hibulous energy.

"Blessings attend you, old boy," says Boulger, rising and filling his glass. "May you never have a sadder breakfast, or a worse companion."

"Hear, hear," cry we, and we jingle the glasses together. Titbat rises. There is a drunken splendour in his eyes; and a luscious indolence in the ease with which his mouth opens and the words are filtered through his lips.

"Ladies and Gentlemen—I—"

Of course, we scream—no women being present.

"I beg your pardons for saying gentlemen," continues Titbat—"from my soul, I do? When?"

"Question, question!" exclaim the bachelors. "Hang it, old fellow, don't be personal!"

"I tell you what," Titbat says, "when I said ladies, I assure you, I forgot—that is to say—yes—oblivious who was present. Very well. I have a word to say—haven't I? This is the last melancholy occasion on which we shall meet. After my nuptials—mine and my wife's—I may send you cards, and I may not—do you perceive?—I may and I mayn't. It's all the same, and it isn't—one way. H m!"

Long ago our host of the occasion married. His wife is pretty, his linen is superb, he shuns paper. He is no longer a bachelor; and when he takes his candle up to bed, there are two shadows on the stair-case.

CAVIARE.

THE GRIEVANCE PAPERS.

CHAPTER V.

TREATS OF SEVERAL SERIOUS AND INTERESTING MATTERS, WHICH THE READER WILL BEST APPRECIATE BY PERUSING, AND OF WHICH, CONSEQUENTLY, NO MORE IS SAID IN THIS PLACE.

HAVE already related, and, considering that the joke was rather against myself, with great candour and sincerity, how I was conquered by Mrs. Squeezer in our great battle about the latch-key. I admitted that I was fairly beaten, even ignominiously so, if you will, on that point. But do you imagine, courteous reader, that I at once gave in, and resigned the contest in despair? No such thing. Beaten on one point, I returned again and again to the charge. Shall I say to be again and again defeated? Well, no matter. What could I do, I should very much like to know? Mrs. Squeezer was, by courtesy at least, a lady; hence the unequal character of the war carried on, between us. Mrs. Squeezer might leave iron pails in my way at night, and by this means graze the skin off my shins, and yet what could I do? If Mrs. Squeezer had been a gentleman, which she wasn't, instead of a lady (which she wasn't, either), I might have kicked her. As it was, I could only kick the iron pail, and, after all, this was but poor consolation. If she had been a lady, no doubt she would have had "nerves," and she might have been frightened into a fit by the noise which the pail made as it rolled, with a crash like thunder, down the back stairs, and even this would have been something; and if Mrs. Squeezer had fallen down in a faint, I don't think that she would have found me tickling her red nose with a feather, or burning brown paper to bring her to. No, her friend the cat might have performed all these tender offices for her, so far as I am concerned. I would never have stirred a finger in her behalf. But then she hasn't nerves. She belongs to the same generation as the old lady who publicly thanked God that she was born before nerves were "invented;" and as she isn't troubled with nerves, of course she didn't faint, but on the contrary, coolly put her head out of her sanctum, and enquired, in the most provokingly cool tone of voice, what was the matter, and what did I mean by making such a noise? Mrs. Squeezer faint indeed! I should as soon expect to see her cat faint through the poignancy of his feelings, or the excess of his remorse, after he has absconded with the mutton chop which was preparing for my breakfast.

However, as I have already said, I didn't give in at once. I believe that many men of less strength of mind would have succumbed at once, and given themselves up to Mrs. Squeezer, and joined her in her evening devotions, as she called them, at 10 P.M. Whether

Mrs. Squeezer ever performs these devotions of which she talks so much, is more than I can say, but this I can say, and do say emphatically, that Mrs. Squeezer's prate of religion was utterly and absolutely disgusting to me; and although she conquered me on many points, I feel proud, and at the same time grateful, to think that on this point at least she never overcame me. I don't pretend to be a religious man—why should I pretend any such thing? I should be afraid to venture into my bed at night, without having first bent my knee to God my Maker, and I humbly trust that I endeavour to do my duty, both to my Maker and my fellow-men, as well as I am able; but I don't set up to be a religious man in Mrs. Squeezer's sense of the word. No. I know myself far too well for that, and instead of parading my religion, and my good acts, and my devotions, and my this and my that, I am fain to turn away and hide myself in a corner, and strike my breast like that poor Puritan of whom we have all read, and say what he said, in the same lowly and contrite spirit, in as far as may be. I don't quarrel with Mrs. Squeezer for her religion. God forbid. But what I quarrel with her for is for making a parade of her religion, and of endeavouring to force others to do as she does. Mrs. Squeezer seems to think that no one can be religious without carrying it about on his face like a sign-board; and I am convinced that as soon as Mrs. Squeezer puts on her religious air, or as I call it, her "chapel face," her expressive, if not amiable or handsome countenance, immediately becomes at least three inches longer than usual. Now, I must say that I don't like this sour style of religion. It may be prejudice on my part, but there it is, and I don't wish to deny it. I know some people (Mrs. Squeezer among them) who set themselves up for religious people, and the end of their religion seems to be to render themselves sour, gloomy, and discontented; a burden to themselves and all connected with them; and the worst of it is, that they can see no goodness in the cheerful heart which laughs and has its joke, but which, in due time, when no one is looking on, drops its mite into the widow's hand, or stoops to raise the little child who has fallen down in the street. No, it must be all sourness, all gloom, all heavy groans and writhings, or there is no religion. Now, what I should very much like to know is, where do these sort of people find their kind of religion prescribed and set down? I sometimes read, with humble reverence I trust, of Him who went about doing good to all, who used to gather those dear little children with their innocent prattle and their merry laughs around his sacred feet, and who, when the poor sinner came across his path, did not pass over to the other side with a frown upon His face, and a harsh word upon His lips, but took them kindly and lovingly by the hand, and led them gently back to the blessed peace and happiness of days long passed away—days which until then it had never entered into the poor wanderer's heart to believe possible could return. I read, I say, of these things, and I cannot find in them any of the sourness and the bitterness which Mrs. Squeezer tries to pass off as religion, and therefore it is that I do utterly repudiate and deny the correctness of her ideas on this point, and refuse to join with her in her evening devotions. Moreover, I always am inclined to suspect there is something wrong when I behold these long faces and listen to these groans and sighs. They make me feel as if cold water were running down my back; and it is a sensation which, I must say, I don't like. No; give me the cheerful laugh and the guileless joke, and the merry lightness of the innocent heart—the heart which is light because it is innocent—and I will back it for true religion against Mrs. Squeezer and all her tribe. I have some little experience in these matters, and I know some people who go about in the dark doing good, and visiting the sick, and performing a thousand works of mercy, and I know that Mrs. Squeezer would turn up her nose at some of them, and groan and sigh over them as poor giddy, thoughtless things; and yet I am quite certain that they confer more real benefit, and are of more use to their fellow-men in a week, than Mrs. Squeezer is in a twelvemonth; and although Mrs. Squeezer may perhaps pretend to disbelieve it, I give my word and honour as a gentleman, that the most cheerful, the gayest, and at the same time the politest man whom I happen to know, is a person of the strictest observance; and although he never bores me with his creed, I can safely say that I never leave his presence without a deeper and more profound reverence for religion, which he so elevates, and without a greater confusion and shame for my own short-comings. I never leave him without feeling thoroughly ashamed of myself, without feeling a desire to be a better man than I am; and I must say, and I do say, that this result is never produced upon me by Mrs. Squeezer or any of her class. I was going to say, that they make me hate religion, but they don't do that—God forbid; they only cause my soul to revolt from those who endeavour so to deface God's own blessed work, and who do their best to render his yoke, contrary to his own Divine assurance, anything but easy and light.

Away with you, then, Mrs. Squeezer—away with your sour face and your bitter sighs, before I lose my patience altogether, and break out into abusive language, which I might afterwards regret. Did you ever hear of 'Peter Pindar,' Mrs. Squeezer? Listen to him, if you please, and hear what he says of your sour faces:—

"To wear long faces, just as if our Maker,
The God of Goodness, was an undertaker,
Well pleased to wrap the soul's unlucky mien
In sorrow's dismal crape or bombazin."

And listen again to what another great writer, philosopher, and poet says of you:—

"But then I sigh, and, with a piece of scripture, Tell them—that God bids us do good for evil—
And thus I clothe my naked villany
With old odd ends, stolen forth of Holy Writ:
And seem a saint when most I play the devil.
Why, I can smile, and murder while I smile;
And cry, content, to that which grieves my heart;
And wet my cheeks with artificial tears;
And frame my face to all occasions"

I think you will admit, Mrs. Squeezer, without you are more prejudiced than even I take you to be, that the authorities I have cited for you are not much in favour of your sour faces, at all events.

But, as it is neither in my province nor my intention to write a paper on religion, I must now take leave of this subject. I have suffered so much from Mrs. Squeezer's sour faces, that I have been led, almost unconsciously, to speak thus much, but with all due reverence, I trust, on religion in general. I have, moreover, deemed it necessary to make these few remarks as some justification of my conduct in refusing so pertinaciously to join Mrs. S. in her evening devotions; and so, having disposed of this matter, I now return from Mrs. Squeezer's profession to Mrs. Squeezer's practice; and more especially to the investigation of how far Mrs. Squeezer's mode of acting towards me, may be considered to have constituted a "real grievance."

As I have already said, although I suffered a complete and ignominious defeat on the question of the latch-key, I did not give in at all once, and resign all idea of recreation and enjoyment. Seeing that so long as I remained under Mrs. Squeezer's hospitable roof, all idea of enjoying myself abroad was out of the question, I naturally enough determined to see whether I couldn't manage to enjoy myself at home. In other words, I determined to give a dinner party at my lodgings.

A bachelor's first dinner party is a matter of considerable moment, to himself at least, and feeling all the importance of the step which I meditated, I gave it due consideration before venturing to make up my mind. At length, however, screwing up my courage to sticking point, (does the sentence I have just penned constitute a quotation, I wonder, for I confess that I don't know, and yet the words seem very familiar to me) I determined that I would give an entertainment in my own apartments, and issued my invitations accordingly. I wrote three notes, which were something to this effect—

"Dear ———"

"Come next Thursday and take a slice of mutton with me at 4 P.M.—rough and ready in bachelor's style—no kick-shaws or French dishes—and you will confer a real pleasure on your faithful,

"INCOG."

These notes I despatched to Jones, the gent whom you may remember as having had the accident with his head of hair; to Scroggins, who suffers from a German flute; and to Jenkins, who suffers from a bad-tempered —. Well, don't mind what; we will leave the sentence unfinished—only if you are curious about Jenkins's grievance, I refer you to page sixteen of this Journal.

The next thing was to determine what I would have for dinner, and to broach the matter as pleasantly as possible to Mrs. Squeezer, from whom, I confess, I anticipated considerable opposition.

I was sometime before I could quite determine about the dishes which we were to have. You see, it was my first attempt at a dinner, and naturally enough, I was anxious about it. I was quite determined that I wouldn't have chickens and bacon. I am sick to death of chickens and bacon. I never go out to dine but I get chickens and bacon, and I do wish people would try and vary their entertainments a little. Chickens and bacon are a very nice dish, I readily admit; but then, one may get too much of them, and being heartily sick of them, I made up my mind that they should have no place at my festive board. I spent several sleepless nights before I could make up my mind, for I must confess that my experience in these matters was very limited, but at last I determined to have a quart of soup (turtle, to be procured at Jude's, and sent down in a tureen, five minutes before four) a small leg of mutton, and a brace of grouse, with confectionery, etc. The confectionery was to be sent warm from the confectioner's at a stated time, whilst I thought that I should not be expecting too much from Mrs. Squeezer if I relied upon her for the cooking of the mutton, game, and vegetables.

Having settled about my viands, the next step was to break the matter to Mrs. Squeezer. In order to propitiate her, I confess that I purchased a beautiful salmon trout, of which fish I know that both Mrs. Squeezer and her cat are particularly fond, and sent it down to her with Mr. Incog's kind compts, etc. When I returned to my lodgings in the evening, I found Mrs. Squeezer with an extraordinarily inflamed face, (she always takes a little brandy after fish, to settle the fish, she says, whatever that may mean) whilst the cat had gorged himself till he seemed nearly as large as a small mountain sheep. Judging from these appearances that Mrs. Squeezer had dined, I deemed the time favourable for breaking the ice, and after several compliments had been interchanged between us, as I was turning away to go up stairs, I carelessly, as it were, remarked, "By the way, Mrs. Squeezer, I expect a few friends, three at most, to dine with me at 4 P.M. next Thursday, and will trouble you to make the necessary arrangements. Leg of mutton and brace of grouse," I added more carelessly than before, but I confess, with a sinking heart, for my courage was rapidly evaporating.

The injured woman turned round on me before the words had fairly left my lips—not angrily—oh dear, no—no such thing! She was far too cunning to give me the advantage of getting her into a passion, but the severe expression which she at once assumed, was perfectly appalling, and I shrank into insignificance before the awful sternness of her glance, as she stood looking at me with an expression of countenance, of which it would be difficult to say whether indignation, sorrow, offended respectability, or reprobation, were the predominant characteristic. She looked at me in this manner for a moment or two, and then pressing her hand upon that part of her bombazin where her heart was supposed to be, she groaned heavily once or twice, and then sank into a chair, never for a second removing her eyes from me, whilst I remained standing near the door, becoming every moment more and more ashamed of myself, and repenting most heartily that I had ever ventured upon such a proposal.

She spoke at length, and whether it were the effect of her feelings, or of the brandy which she had taken to settle the fish, I won't undertake to say, but at all events, her voice was thick and husky.

"Do I understand you, sir," she said, with her most severe expression, and with her 'chapel face,' intensified to a fearful degree. "Do I understand you, sir," she repeated, still more severely, "and am I to suppose that you have so far forgotten what is due to the feelings of a lonely and disconsolate widow, as to intend to introduce your junkettings and your carousals into this abode of sorrow and retirement. Oh, no; since my dear Mr. S. was taken from me, this house has been a house of prayer and sorrow, and I should be wanting in my duty to the dear departed, if I allowed any such carousal as the one you propose to hold under this roof;" and again she groaned most fearfully. "No sir," she went on, like an old hypocrite, as she is—"no sir, never! never! never!"

I was so excited and annoyed, that my fear of Mrs. Squeezer vanished before these feelings, and I spoke out like a man.

"Mrs. Squeezer," I roared out at the top of my voice, "what do you mean by your injurious language? How dare you speak of a little entertainment which I propose to give to two or three of my friends, all men of the highest respectability and moral character, as a carousal and a junketting? I will not allow such language, madam," I continued more excitedly than ever, "and so you had better 'shut up.'" (Here Mrs. Squeezer's face grew longer and longer, and again she groaned heavily), "and as to the late Mr. S.," I went on, "all I have got to say is, that, if because he was taken to a better, I trust, and I am sure, more peaceful world, I cannot be allowed to entertain my friends, I shall at once leave you to the undisturbed contemplation of your dear departed, and shall retire from your house the very first thing to-morrow morning; and, if you can manage to exist upon the memory of Mr. S., I shall be delighted to hear it; that's all, and I wish you good evening, madam," and off I went, banging the door after me as loudly as ever I could.

I hadn't been in my room five minutes before Mrs. Squeezer tapped for admittance. The old fox saw that she had gone too far, and so had come to make her peace. She hoped that I wasn't offended, but my proposal had taken her by surprise; for, of all the young gentlemen towards whom she had endeavoured conscientiously to discharge a mother's duty, since the death of her dear departed, not one had ever made such a proposal before. However, if I was determined, she had no more to say, but would endeavour to make all due preparation. I could, for a consideration of course, have the use of her linen, plate, and glass, and she would be happy to hear of my intentions in regard to the cooking of the dinner. Of course, I couldn't expect that she would undertake that office. Before the lamented death of her dear departed, (oh, how sick I was of the dear departed), and when they had a proper establishment, there would have been no difficulty about it; but in her feeble health (she is as strong as a lion), and with her shattered nerves, she felt certain that I must see that it was out of the question, either that she could cook the dinner, or wait at table, and she therefore would be obliged by my informing her how I purposed managing these matters.

Here was a difficulty which I hadn't anticipated, and for a moment I was taken aback. However, having gained my point thus far, I was not disposed to push my victory beyond prudent limits, and so I answered that, if Mrs. Squeezer would have the extreme goodness to give me her own ideas on the matter, I should be obliged to her, and would willingly adopt them. Would she take a seat, and allow me to mix her half a glass of cognac? Why, yes, she would take a seat, and not feeling very well, she would take just half a glass of cognac, but very, very weak, if I pleased. I knew what "very weak" meant well enough, and when Mrs. Squeezer had imbibed, with sundry groans and turning up of her eyes, the reeking tumbler I placed in her hand, she condescended to unfold her ideas on the momentous matter of the dinner.

"Soup from Jude's five minutes before four. Certainly nothing could be better. Then the confectionery. Did I prefer Polson's or Maguire's? Leave it to herself. Well, perhaps it might be better if I did so.—In happier days, before she had lost her dear departed, she had been accustomed to arrange matters of this kind. At their last great dinner, the day when poor Mr. Toady made such an exhibition of himself, and had to be put to sleep on the sofa in the back drawing-room, it would have done my heart good to see the magnificent display they had—Oh dear! Oh dear! Little did she think then of what was so soon to happen! Would I pardon her for a moment, if her feelings were too much for her? Well, as I so kindly mentioned it, she would take just one teaspoonful more of cognac, for it had a soothing effect upon her poor shattered nerves. She detested it. Oh, I didn't know how much she detested it; but as it was of such service to her, she felt it a duty to overcome her natural repugnance to the beverage. But to return to the arrangements—Yes, she begged my pardon for having allowed herself to be overcome, but we are very weak; O dear, yes; the very best of us are very weak. She would endeavour to compose herself and proceed—The wine! Of course I would look to the wine myself. It was a matter on which she did not presume to give an opinion. Well then, we would say that the soup and the confectionery were arranged. With her plate, linen, and glass, all that would be necessary would be a person to cook the mutton, grouse, and vegetables, and a young woman to wait at table. Did she know of any good trustworthy cook? Certainly. When they were in Rutland Square, before the death of her dear departed, they were in the habit of employing a very decent person, Mrs. Grigg by name, honest, sober, and trustworthy, and no doubt she would be glad to lend her assistance on reasonable terms. Would I consider 5s. too much? Very well—she would see Mrs. Grigg herself, and make all necessary arrangements. Was she sure that Mrs. Grigg was sober? She had once heard that Mrs. Grigg fell down in a faint before the kitchen fire in Judge Bagwig's house, rather than take a drop of anything in violation of her solemn pledge, although Mrs. Bagwig herself came down from the drawing-room, and besought her, with tears, to drink a glass of wine—Oh, dear no! I needn't be afraid of Mrs. Grigg, not I. I might trust that creature with untold gold. What about the young woman to wait at table? Yes, she begged my pardon—Well, Mrs. Grigg, indeed, had a daughter, a neat, handy girl, and perhaps she might do as well as any one else. Leave it all to her. Well, I might rely upon it that she would do her duty. Thursday next at four p. m. Yes, she understood it, and although it was painful to her feelings, and did bring back melancholy recollections of her dear departed, and of the days when she sat at the head of her own table, still, as I wished it, she would stifle her feelings, and take care that everything should pass off in a satisfactory manner," etc. etc. etc.

Thus soliloquized Mrs. Squeezer, and, indeed, at one time, I was very much afraid that she would never stop; but, fortunately, her glass of cognac having become exhausted, and finding that I did not invite her to take any more—for between you and me, dear reader, I was very much afraid that she was about to follow the example of the depraved Mr. Toady just alluded to, she rose to say "good evening."

She seemed in such a good humour, and so reconciled to the idea of the dinner, that my spirits rose at once proportionately, and I began to indulge in the hope, that, with the assistance of Mrs. Grigg, and the handy young woman, my little dinner would turn out a decided success. How far these hopes were realized, I must make known to you in my next paper.

NATIONAL TINTINGS.

III.—JOHN BANIM.

THE subject of our present tinting was born in the city of Kilkenny, on the third day of April, 1798. His father was a trader in all the necessaries required for the outfits of sportsmen and anglers, in addition to being a farmer.

Banim's only characteristic as a child is described as having been a kind, loving disposition, which endeared him to all the household. In his fourth year he was sent to a school kept by a Mrs. Alice Moore, where, however, he did not long continue a scholar, for, after an hour's tuition, he rushed home, and told his mother that he could not continue at a school where "there wasn't a bit of paper on the walls, or a step of stairs in the house." Mrs. Banim, who appears to have much petted her son, regarded this outburst as "but the childish indication of an aspiring mind," and did not enforce his return. After this Banim was sent to a seminary kept by a Miss Lamb, where he remained until he could, as she was accustomed afterwards to boast, "turn the primer." In his fifth year he was removed to a school at that period well known in Kilkenny and its vicinity as the "English Academy," the master of which, a Mr. George Charles Buchanan, appears to have been somewhat of an oddity. He professed to teach all subjects, commencing with what he termed "oratorical reading," and ending with the modern languages. He is thus graphically sketched by "The O'Hara Family," in the novel entitled "Father Connell":—"His countenance was long, and of a soiled, sallow colour; and the puckering of his brows and eyelids awful; and the unblinking steadiness of his bluish-grey eyes insufferable; and the cold-blooded resoluteness of his marble lips unrelaxable. . . . He was tall, and had remarkably well-turned limbs; and he had the gift to know it; for, in order not to hide a point of the beauty of those limbs from the world, he always arrayed them in very tight-fitting pantaloon, which reached down to his ancles. His coat and waistcoat were invariably black. A very small white muslin cravat, and a frill sticking out quite straight from his breast, occupied the space from his chin to his waist. And James Charles Buchmahon's hat was of cream-colour beaver, high-crowned and broad-brimmed; and he ever carried either a formidable walking-stick of stout oak, or else a substitute for it, made of five or six peeled switches, cunningly twisted together, and at one end loaded with lead." From this establishment, after an attendance of five years, Banim was removed to a seminary kept by the Rev. Mr. McGrath, a Catholic clergyman, where he continued for about twelve months, and was then transferred to the care of a well-known teacher named Terence Doyle. "Although not a very idle boy," writes his biographer, Mr. Patrick Joseph Murray, to whose work we are indebted for many of the facts introduced in our sketch, "Banim loved to study in his own way, and at his own time, and his chiefest pleasure was to steal away from school, and, lying under a hedge, or beneath the shelter of a hay-cock, to pore over some prized volume of romance or fairy fable. Hans Andersen, in all his dreamy youth, never longed to hear the lore of fairy-land more earnestly than did little John Banim, and his ready memory enabled him to retain the subject of each narrative of wonder." Moore is said to have

"Lisped in numbers as the numbers came,"

and John Banim appears to have been an equally precocious genius in another way. In his sixth year, after the earnest perusal of a fairy fiction of more than ordinary interest, he determined to compose an original story. He was not sufficiently tall to write conveniently at a table, even when seated, so he was accustomed to place the paper upon his bed-room floor, and lie down beside it! During three months he devoted nearly all his hours of play to the prosecution of his task, the writing of which, when he had completed it, was so execrable, that he only was able to decipher it. By the assistance of his elder brother, Michael, and of a school-fellow, however, he got it transcribed, and it is really amusing to read of the many futile attempts he made to have it published. No printer in Kilkenny would undertake its issue, but his disappointment at this result by no means damped his literary efforts. He wrote a romance which extended over two thick manuscript volumes, in his tenth year, and about the same period composed several poems, one of which, entitled 'Hibernia,' exceeded a thousand lines in length. The private theatre at Kilkenny was open at this time, one of the chief performers being Thomas Moore, then in the first glory of success. On one occasion Banim was admitted to witness the performances, and was so much impressed with Moore's recitation of his 'Melologue on National Music,' that on the following morning he could repeat the entire with almost perfect accuracy. He went so far as to introduce himself to Moore as a brother poet, to the great amusement of the latter, who received his odd little visitor kindly, and inquired whether there was anything he could do to oblige "his brother-poet?" Banim replied that there was nothing in the world he should like so much as a season ticket to the theatre, a desire which was immediately complied with by the good-natured poet. "And how the boy's soul would have swelled," says his biographer, "could he then have known that but twenty-two years later his own fame would be so fully acknowledged, that this same great poet, whom he was now so anxious to please, would, when in Kilkenny, call upon old Michael Banim, and, finding that he was from home, write, on a card, and leave for the old man, these words—'Mr. Thomas Moore called to pay his respects to the father of the author of 'The O'Hara Family!'"

Banim frequently devoted his hours of recreation to mechanical inventions. Amongst others he formed a complicated machine which he designed to realise the idea of perpetual motion. He also endeavoured, but of course unavailingly, to fabricate a pair of wings, by means of which he could enter upon aerial voyages of discovery, as well as constructing sky-rockets which were intended to mount to an extraordinary altitude. They only blazed along the ground, however, burning the pyrotechnist, and almost destroying the house. After a stay of about twelve months at Terence Doyle's academy, he was removed, in his thirteenth year, to Kilkenny College, which, as he himself remarks in "The Fetches," was the most famous as well as the most ancient preparatory school in Ireland. The master, at the time of his entrance, was the Rev. Andrew O'Callaghan, a man of great learning and ability. Whilst here Banim evinced a very remarkable talent for drawing and painting, and having selected the profession of an artist as that which he would desire to follow, he was removed from the college, in the year 1813, and sent to Dublin, where he became a pupil in the drawing academy of the Royal Dublin Society. He continued here during the two succeeding years, and is described as having been a regular and industrious student. Nothing, however, could overcome his love of literature, and whilst residing in Dublin, he first saw himself in print. The piece was a metrical criticism on an exhibition of Irish artists, and was entitled, "A Dialogue in the Exhibition Room."

At the expiration of the two years he returned, at the age of eighteen, to Kilkenny, where he intended to commence life as an artist and a teacher of drawing. He is described as being at this time of very prepossessing appearance. He was the admirer of every pretty girl in Kilkenny, and between rhyming, painting, flirting, and book-lending, his entire time was fully occupied. At one of the schools which he attended, as a teacher of drawing, was a young girl of seventeen, named Anne D—, a boarder in the establishment. A mutual passion sprang up in their breasts, but they carefully concealed it from all. He used to tell his brother Michael that his mornings were devoted to sketching excursions, but these early morning hours were the trysting times when he and Anne D— strolled along the quiet banks of the Nore, or rambled through the fields, accompanied by an under governess, who aided the lovers, and devised means by which their meetings might escape detection. Banim's brother at length discovered the secret of his constitutional walks, and was made his confidant in the confession: "I love Anne D— as boy never loved girl before." The following little piece, written at this period, is not to be accepted as a proof of his poetical abilities, but as an evidence of the sincerity of his affection:

"My Anna is tall, and my Anna is fair,
Dark brown is her eye, and jet black is her hair;
She is straight as the poplar that springs in the dale,
Her eye-beam is such as the glories that sail
Over the bosom of midsummer heaven,
When angels disport in the sunbeam of even.
The bright rose of summer, indeed, does not streak
With full ruddy blush the warm snow of her cheek;
For Love thought it pity to scatter or spread
With ill-judging craft all his treasures of red,
But gave it to glow in a spot so divine
That the essence of all in a kiss might be mine!"

Banim's nature was exceedingly impetuous, and at the end of a year since he had first seen and loved Anne D—, he resolved to wait upon her father—who resided in a neighbouring county—and demand her hand. His request was replied to with sneers and insulting expressions, which Banim retorted, the scene being terminated by the old man ordering him to instantly quit the house. He returned home dispirited and heart-sick; the doors of the school in which Anne resided were closed against him, and all communication was banned between them. But who or what can oppose the power of love? "Those," says Mr. Murray, "who watched Anne and her fellow-pupils as, on Sunday evenings, they left church, might have observed a figure, clothed as a countrywoman, in a long grey cloak and full deep hood, stealing close to Anne's side; this was Banim disguised; and it was on these occasions that he contrived to press his mistress's hand, while he placed within it a poem, or a letter, telling her to love and hope." At length, when Anne's father discovered the depth and reality of her love for the young artist, he arranged that she should be secretly removed from the school, and placed in the house of one of her mother's family. Banim by some means discovered the day and hour of her departure, and as the chaise bearing her away passed his father's door, he rushed, bare-headed, before the vehicle, from the window of which Anne leaned, pale, terrified, and sobbing bitterly. The lovers' eyes met but for a moment, the carriage rolled rapidly away, and John Banim never more—in life—saw Anne D—. The sequel of the story is very affecting. When he re-entered the house a small parcel was placed in his hand, which he found to contain a miniature of himself that he had painted for Anne, and which she had long worn concealed in her bosom. In addition to this were the verses and letters which he had addressed to her, but not a line of explanation as to whether their return was of her own accord, or upon compulsion. "He paused," writes his biographer, "a moment, looking upon the miniature, and then, dashing it to the ground, crushed it to atoms beneath his feet; tore the letters and verses into fragments; and, as he scattered them away, as the memory of all his hopes and joys came back upon him when he thought of their vows and promises, he cried—bitterly and fiercely—"Curse her! curse her! to abandon me and break my heart!" But Banim, in his bitterness of spirit, erred. Anne never proved faithless; the communications which he endeavoured to forward her were intercepted. Consumption—that silent but insidious fiend—seized her, and in two months after her removal from the school in Kilkenny, Anne D— was dead. We will pass over Banim's wet, dreary pilgrimage on foot (for his circumstances were too indigent to permit of his engaging a conveyance,) to gaze upon her remains ere they were consigned to their mother earth; how one of Anne's half-sisters recognised him by the coffin, broke out into violent invectives against him, designating him as the murderer of her sister, and demanded his expulsion from the room; how he followed the remains to the churchyard, and when the sad ceremonial was over, and all had departed, madly flung himself upon the damp green mound that marked the grave of his first love; and, how during the twelve months succeeding that day, his system was so shaken that the stamina of life may be truly said to have broken down, leaving him, at twenty years of age, a victim to spinal disease, which but a few years later reduced him to a crippled body.

With a partial return of health, Banim recovered his courage and love of literature. He painted a few portraits, and became the editor of a local newspaper, the Leinster Gazette. Debts and difficulties, however, gathered around him, and formed an insuperable obstacle to the peaceful pursuit of any profession. He at length resolved to leave Kilkenny, and try his fortune in Dublin. Accordingly, early in the year 1820, he left his father's house for the metropolis, and from this period may be dated his literary career. But his life in Dublin was a hard and disheartening struggle with disappointments. He published a couple of volumes of poetry, which are now all but unknown, and it was not until the production of his tragedy of "Damon and Pythias," at Covent Garden Theatre, on the 28th of May, 1821, that his prospects began to brighten. This play—the principal characters in which were supported by Macready and Charles Kemble—was a great success, in fact, as he remarked in a letter to his father, "a trump had turned up to him;" it is now entirely neglected on the London boards, but is occasionally performed in Dublin. In February, 1822, being then in his twenty-fourth year, Banim married a daughter of John Ruth, of Cappagh, an old friend of his father, and in less than one month after that event, the young couple set out for London, to seek their fortune. His first residence there was at No. 7, Amelie-place, Brompton, the house in which Philpot Curran died in 1817. He says that he "took the rooms at once, that he might dream of Ireland, with the glory and halo of Curran's memory around him." The difficulties which he encountered here in his struggles for wealth and fame are graphically related in his letters home. In 1823, poor Gerald Griffin arrived in London, and was received by Banim with great kindness. "What would I have done," wrote Griffin, "if I had not found Banim? I should never be tired of talking about and thinking of Banim. Mark me! he is a man—the only one I have met since I have left Ireland, almost." Meanwhile Banim was pushing his own way in the world; he contributed many operatic pieces to the English Opera House, and became the chief adviser of its proprietor, Mr. Thomas Arnold, to whose liberality and steady friendship he bears honourable testimony. Towards the close of the year 1823, he submitted the first portion of the manuscript of that powerful story, "Crohoore of the Bill Hook," to his brother Michael, for his opinion, the latter in return forwarding portions of his works to him. Each brother thus acted as critic to the other, and hence arose the nom-de-plume, "Tales by the O'Hara Family," John taking the name of Abel O'Hara, Michael assuming that of Barnes O'Hara. In 1824, Banim published a volume of essays under the quaint title of "Revelations of the Dead Alive" the revelations being clever hits at the English follies, fashions, and manners of the year 1823. In 1825, the first series of the "Tales by the O'Hara Family" were completed, and published in the April of that year, at once acquiring popularity. They were followed, early in 1826, by "The Boyne Water," which got rather a rough reception from the critics; their censures, however, were directed rather against its politics than its literary merit. Colburn, who had published the "Tales by the O'Hara Family," offered a very large sum for a new story, and John Banim immediately commenced writing his novel, "The Nowlans." This work, together with "Peter of the Castle," forms the second series of the "O'Hara Tales," and was published in November, 1826. The success of "The Nowlans" was most satisfactory. Although the author's health was now in a very dangerous condition, from a recurrence of the old malady from which he had suffered after the death of Anne D—, he still wrote on. In 1827, he completed his tragedy of "Sylla," which, however, was not offered for representation until the spring of 1837, when it was performed at the Theatre Royal, Hawkins-street, Dublin. To his own sufferings at this period was added the weak and uncertain health of his wife, Ellen. In the autumn of 1828, Banim commenced writing a new series of "The Tales by the O'Hara Family," the title adopted by him for the work being "The Denounced." It was written amid great pain, and the dread of still greater suffering. In change of air and scene lay his only hope of restoration, and he removed to France. While sojourning at Boulogne, in June, 1830, his mother died, and the announcement of her decease came with a crushing effect upon the already-weakened energies of our poor author. "The Ghost Hunter and his Family" was published in 1833, in the "Library of Romance," edited by Leitch Ritchie. Banim's malady soon proved beyond the skill of any physician, and his affairs became so embarrassed that public meetings took place, and subscriptions were entered into in England and France, as well as in his own country, to relieve his necessities.

In 1835 he returned to London, but quitted it—for ever—in the July of that year, for Dublin. His brother Michael hastened up to see him, and has given us a most affecting description of the condition in which he found him; laid listlessly on a sofa, his useless limbs at full length, his sunken cheek resting on his pillow—a meagre, attenuated, almost white-headed old man. As a graceful means of increasing his resources, a performance was given for his benefit at the Theatre Royal, under the immediate patronage of the Earl of Mulgrave, then Lord Lieutenant. The performance took place on July 21st, and the house was densely crowded. In the following September he returned home to Kilkenny, and was warmly and kindly received by his fellow-townsmen, who presented him, through the late Dr. Cane, with a handsome silver snuff-box, and a purse of £85. Before he had been a year residing at home, the welcome news arrived that the Queen had conferred a pension on him of £150 per annum, for the bestowal of which he acknowledged he was principally indebted to the Earl of Carlisle, the present Viceroy of Ireland, then Lord Morpeth, who visited him at his residence more than once. His little daughter attracted his lordship's attention, and on her behalf a further pension of £40 was granted. This girl died of consumption in 1844, in her eighteenth year. When the "Irish Penny Journal" was commenced in 1840 by Messrs. Gunn and Cameron, an offer was made to Banim to become a contributor to its pages, but no final arrangement was ever made respecting the proposal, resulting from an unpleasant correspondence, to which we need not here more particularly allude. "Father Connell" was the last joint work by the "O'Hara Family," from the period of the publication of which our author's health began more perceptibly than ever to fade away.

We will not linger over the painful closing scenes of John Banim's career. It is sufficient to say that life passed from him almost unperceived, in July, 1842, in the forty-fourth year of his age. Frequently during the last six years of his life he had engaged his brother's promise that he would stand by while his grave was digging, and that he would see the side of his mother's coffin laid bare, and that when his body was lowered to its last resting-place, he should be certain the side of his coffin was in close contact with that of his beloved parent. His wishes, we need scarcely say, were religiously observed. His bust, in marble, executed by Hogan, was placed in the Tholoe of Kilkenny in the year 1854.

After his decease an application was made to government to regrant to his widow the pension which Lord Morpeth had given to his daughter. Through the active and kindly interposition of Sir Robert Peel, she at once received £50 from the Royal bounty, and a guarantee—which was strictly fulfilled—of £40 on the first vacancy. Of the committee who took up Mrs. Banim's case, and carried it to this fortunate issue, may be mentioned the names of Daniel O'Connell, Dr. (now Sir Robert) Kane, Thomas Davis, William Carleton, John Austin, Charles Lever, Torrens McCullagh, Samuel Ferguson, and Thomas McNevin. Banim's brother Michael still survives, and fills the office of Postmaster of Kilkenny. Exertions are, we believe, being made to obtain for him the pension of which his sister-in-law (who died within the past two years) had been the recipient. The bestowal of it would be a graceful and well-merited recognition of his own services to literature—to say nothing of his brother's—and we heartily wish the movement success.

LITTLE THINGS.—Life is made up of little things. He who travels over a continent must go step by step. He who writes a book must do it sentence by sentence; he who learns a science must master it fact by fact, and principle after principle. What is the happiness of our life made up of? Little courtesies; little kindnesses; pleasant words; genial smiles; a friendly letter; good wishes, and good deeds. One in a million, once in a life-time, may do a heroic action. But the little things that make up our life come every day and every hour. If we make the little events of life beautiful and good, then is the whole life full of beauty and goodness.

A SPA-SIDE SKETCH.

URING the summer of the year 18—, I was commissioned by a well-known legal firm in Dublin to make some surveys in the neighbourhood of Cloyne, a pretty little country town twenty miles to the north-east of Cork, snugly nestled in among splendid sheep-walks, and luxuriating in well-swept streets and nicely-painted houses. Firstly, having got my surrounded away in my portmanteau, secondly, having care-fully packed the pocket-book that contained, and satisfactory calculations of powers of endurance, my comfortable little command a view of sea that bounded on set those magnificent have alluded to, and better advisers, took into my confidence my old travelling friend the portmanteau, and the indispensable pocket-book, that we might hold a little friendly council as how best we might spend the few days that yet remained before my services were again required in Dublin. Now, as palpable as that morning sun that came laughing on my little window from that restless, blustering ocean in the distance, was the advice of those twin sisters; there was combination unmistakable in that open portmanteau that held up before me the nicely-packed shirts and the tourist's suit of shepherd's plaid, and peeping under them was my bright brass telescope actually shaking hands with my brandy flask, and smiling ridiculously as you please at a pair of vulgar hobnailed boots that some fairy must have included in my wardrobe on my leaving Dublin, for indeed of their presence I was entirely innocent till that moment; was not this a combination? And now something just gives my left hand a little modest twitch, I look for my pocket-book; that was certainly no accomplice, but it had taken the hint too; and there was my finger actually caught in the act of abstracting from one of its green linings the identical five-pound note that I had been hoarding up for a trip across the channel. Perhaps my portmanteau knew me better than I knew myself; perhaps it hated to be again thrown into the hotel like a common porter-cask; perhaps it hated sea-sickness, for this portmanteau of mine had been an old traveller, had suffered many slights from numberless porters, and had been often rudely sacked and overhauled by custom-house officers in legion; perhaps it was national and country-loving. I can't tell; but this I can say, that both it and my pocket-book mutually undertook to enjoy themselves at my expense, and said very authoritatively to me: "Take a run, like a dear good fellow as you are, to that old place you are thinking of so often; we want to see the old round tower; we should like so much a breath of the ocean air; we want to hear something of that Edmund S—— you dream of so often, when we lie so still in the dreary darkness and listen to all the stories you tell us in your sleep;" and I knew that those monitors meant Ardmore. And now we three are off there for a day, my pocket-book, my portmanteau, and myself. There are two roads from Youghal to Ardmore, and I shall not tell you which of them you ought to take; and were I to tell you the shorter, perhaps I should not get thanked for my pains. Now, the road that I know is the shortest, were I on a pinch, as I was when I wrote this long, long ago, perhaps would not have been the one you would have chosen who had lots of time to loiter abroad; but I will make a compromise on the question with you, and this is how we will shake hands over it. Now, suppose you have strong grounds for thinking that your excellent chop is done to a turn, and that a delicious-looking crab is really in tears before the fire at your absence, and that the honest, happy-looking potatoes are waxing cold, and that your watch tells you they have been on the look-out for you an hour at Hearn's excellent lodging-house, and you a still debating the question at the Youghal side of the river, then, by all means, get across the ferry, jump on a car, and in one half-hour you are seated to the delights I have imagined for you. This route gives you an idea of the Blackwater, just a little foretaste of some of its beauties, but on your return, when time hangs heavily on you, after bidding adieu to town, and hill, and ocean, come back then to the long wooden bridge that separates Cork from Waterford, and just as you hear the clatter of your vehicle ring on the timber flooring, look down the river for a view that will enchant you, so varied is it, so full of nature, so beautified by art.

The principal objects that engage the interest of the tourist at Ardmore are, its Round Tower, the remains of two churches, and St. Deelan's Stone and Well. There is no other Round Tower in Ireland in such preservation as the magnificent relic of pagan times that stands before us here. It rests on an elevated plateau above the village, is about 95 feet high, and is divided on the outside by five zones of grained stones that project a few inches from the surrounding masonry. It has a strikingly solid appearance, not a stone misplaced, not a bend or crack in the entire structure; it is capped by an exact representation of the sacred head ornament worn by the pagan priests. A capital staircase has been placed in it, and a magnificent view of land and sea is obtained from the four window-like apertures that are built a few feet from the open air, and most naturally face the cardinal points. A cross which was probably erected on its point by Deelan or one of his immediate successors, was shot off a few years ago by some barbarian firing at rocks, and has not since been restored. Within a few feet of the tower are the remains of the old church; they instantly rivet the attention of the tourist. At present merely the aisle exists, flanked on the east side by two enormous buttresses, which are of much earlier date apparently than the remaining parts of the ruin. Within lie some strangely ornamented tombs, some of which are carved with different ecclesiastical symbols, probably to mark the clerical precedence of some of the companions of St. Deelan, who succeeded him in the bishopric, and who raised the see to a distinguished place in the history of the Irish church during the five centuries after Deelan's death. This to my mind is the surpassing interest of Ardmore. From its rude masonry it is pretty evident that next to the Round Tower it is the oldest structure in Ardmore, some say in Ireland; a few broken walls alone remain. It must have been originally singularly small, or a landslip must have brought down some of its walls over the deep cliff. It is said by competent authorities to have been built by St. Colman, and St. Colman was the evangeliser of Deelan. Its position is a strikingly picturesque one.

A number of small groups in basse reliefs, rudely carved, and all scripture subjects, are collected on the western end of the ruined aisle, but the weather is gradually destroying them, and in a few years no trace of them will remain. Deelan preached in the middle of the fourth century, so that this ruin will attract the attention of the antiquary, while its mystic silence, and utter seclusion from the noise and turmoil of the neighbouring little village, will make it at least a pleasant ramble for the most listless and unpoetical visitor. Just near is Deelan's tomb, covered over some years ago; it looks a simple shed covering a deep hollow. As you move rather nearer the sea, the remains of the once splendid Castle of Ardmore present themselves; during the wars of the Geraldines it played some important parts in the tragic game that disgraced the history of that period. Some years ago, the melancholy debris of its last struggle showed themselves, while some workmen were making excavations.

Under two apertures of one of its old walls is the well, and its ivy-covered ruin, so clear and placid looking, a fit accessory in the sacred rite of baptism, the probable use that directed the spring down the high upland to its holy resting-place. Near is the rude remains of an altar, over which are very rudely-carved images which bear a strange interest. This is their story. After the termination of the unhappy rebellion of '98, a strong, soldier-like looking man appeared one morning at the well; no one had ever seen him before, and few cared to look too closely at him; but his kindness and charity soon endeared him to the poor villagers, and engaged their sympathies and regard; he built a hut over against the wall, carved the rude symbols I have alluded to, carefully guarded the place from all that he thought might offer it profanation, and finally, left this life with the character of a christian fully impressed on the mind of the universal peasantry. Who was he? A disbanded soldier of a northern militia regiment, expiating some dark crime, hid away in his breast, by a life long of penance. What poetry the rude soldier had in him! what lovelier spot could he have chosen from which he could look out on the Great Judge in His loving gentleness and in His mighty wrath? And now one word of a remarkable stone, and then I shall tell you why my pocket-book and my portmanteau whispered me to see Ardmore. This large block of granite, weighing many cwt., lies so evenly balanced over two projecting rocks, that it has resisted every storm, and will probably do so till the end of time. It has evidently a similar origin with the Round Tower, for a circle, to represent the sun can be clearly traced on it, and was probably used by the pagan priests as an altar to propitiate the Deity on any proposed voyage, or fishing or predatory excursion. Edmund S— and I had been schoolfellows; we had both entered old Trinity at the same time; during four years of close study we had worked, and striven, and succeeded together; a sympathy of tastes had done all to firm my first impressions of him which were certainly created by the ingenuousness and unselfishness of his nature. Talents that required but a guiding hand to lead to a magnificent culmination; talents that reflected back and harmonized with all the nobler feelings that can dignify the soul of man—such were his. Happy to find in me, when experience had left him too many proofs of friendship unrequited, and kindness blackened by calumny sometimes too; happy to find in me, I say, some tiny chord that could vibrate at his touch, that could, inadequately though it was, reciprocate his generous trustingness, our friendship became solidified by its very nature; on one hand, the strong intellect scattering its beauties upon everything that reached it, while it dazzled like some giant lighthouse amid the storm, its fire always cleared the surrounding gloom, and we steered to a haven. Time grew on. Ruin came and blighted hopes, and the high-souled young lawyer embarked for Australia. My early friend was gone. He rose rapidly in the colonies, preferment succeeded as a matter of course, but the night dews of the gullies had induced a disease that years before had threatened him; and now in Melbourne, he lies in the silent little church-yard, with a view of the broad sea that separated him from all he loved.

Ever since we parted, an indefinable strong, impulsive anxiety had taken possession of me to see Ardmore; that strange longing to see its old traditions speak of themselves in its tower, and its well, and its noble headland.

And now, on this fine breezy June morning let us look out on the stirring scene that is passing before us—ay, even under us—for the deep water lashes the huge rocks under where we sit, and in that little bay the jolly crews of ten or fifteen crafts are hauling their nets, the boats are hurrying to and fro, a great take of fish is expected; plans and counter-plans are given and rejected; the shouting of the crews and the music of the oars made it as exciting as it is strange to me. A thundering discord of voices and hauling cables run in an immense volume of sound along the head-land, and meeting nothing to break its force till it strikes against some deep ledge in the outer bay, it comes back again to shore, with a hundred startling echoes, and right under us is a great moving mass. One unaccustomed to such scenes would imagine that the furies had taken a holiday. A hundred times have I strained my eyes to catch the blows that I imagined would follow this chaos of confusion; but no—all was harmony, all peace, in that little village. And what can be more beautiful than a large take of fish? Just watch the little victims, as they are drawn from their native element. What enchanting variety of colour—some darkly silvered, with a shade of the brightest blue—those are just expiring; but those gilt with all the glows of the rainbow, they are panting hard for dear life. What a combination of colour, ever varying as the fish fights to free himself, but never losing for many moments its gorgeous shroud of tinting, as varied as the leaves in the early autumn, but leaving nature far behind in the variety of the colouring and the glorious harmony of effect; and then only to hear the pattering of the little fellows, as they are pulled on deck, it feels like a miniature battle. The fish, in all their dying beauty, now gasping for breath, now turning over on their companions, now torturing themselves in ceaseless efforts to leap the bulwarks of the little crafts, reminded me much of what I had seen poor humanity strive to do in far-off lands.

To the invalid Ardmore presents, I think, more attractions than does any other village in the south of Ireland. Picturesque villas cover the head on its extreme point near the village, and one must be fastidious indeed not to be pleased with the accommodation afforded in some eight or ten lodging-houses. Cars continually run to and from Youghal, and every necessary and luxury too can be had from it at every hour. I am astonished that this lovely little nook has not become better known to bathers. No one who has not strolled among its beauties can conceive the grandeur of its sea-views; and, taking into account the marked contrast that Ardmore presents to other watering-places, I don't believe that many will dispute its superiority over Tramore or Kilkee, or the many other favourite resorts in the south and west of Ireland. And this is why I think so. Sloping down to the water's edge, that runs in and washes the little village, about two miles from the huge headlands that, like sentinels of the deep, seem to guard the little community, are the richest meadows and pasture lands, giving an indescribable lightness and elegance to the panorama, that otherwise would look so wierd; and as you look down from the headland that bears the name of the village, inside, between the two heads, a placid lake of monster proportions lies entombed in almost fatiguing calmness, while out beyond the headlands the Atlantic tosses itself in a thousand convulsions that delights the mind while it awes it with the echo of God's presence. Look from that wild head, the mighty ocean careering around, ever putting on a new appearance of sublimity, heaving and boiling like a mighty furnace, rising like an angry flood to beat down the huge rocks, and in its wild attempt leaping back in mad fury—held down by the hand of the great Creator—as obedient to His law as the little fairy streamlet on the mountain side. How true to this weary world is that swelling tide! And now a gentler wave runs off to gambol with the tiny shells that carpet the whole shore; its little joy has not well begun when a huge wave, tearing along with the fury of a demon, surprises it, and with one great swell crushes the wavelet; 'tis world-like—the weak and nerveless ever collapsing in the unequal life-struggle. My visit too soon drew to a close. I had lived two days in the memory of my young friend—his spirit had conversed with me across the ocean. Sea, and sun, and star-light was painted before me with a vividness that borrowed its force from that poetic legacy he had somehow left on my mind.

THE EMIGRANT'S FAREWELL.

FARE thee well my own old home!
 From thee I now must sever;
 But still this heart, where'er I roam,
 For thee shall beat for ever.
 Oh! here my brightest days were past,
 And now their joys are ended,
 Since I must leave those scenes at last,
 With which they have been blended.
 Oh! I must leave the fairy dell
 Where little streams meander,
 And I have heard the vespèr bell,
 When lonely I would wander.
 Oh! I must leave the hazel shade,
 So dear to me in childhood,
 But not more dear than the old glade
 In yon romantic wildwood.
 Our bark moves slowly from the strand,
 While burning tears doth blind me,
 To think I leave the dear old land
 And friends I love behind me.
 My last faint glimpse of Erin's o'er—
 From my old home I'm parted;
 I see those faithful friends no more,
 And I am broken-hearted.

J. T. F.

O'DALY'S BRIDE.

It was towards the close of a beautiful summer day in the year 15—, as two horsemen passed at a brisk pace along the forest track which, in those times, did duty for the high road which now leads from the metropolis to the town of Naas. The sun had been for some time gone down beneath the horizon, and the shadows of the night seemed already to have invaded the recesses of the wood through which the travellers journeyed, and were advancing steadily towards the path which alone was uncovered by the over-arching canopy of the spreading boughs of the gloomy and gnarled oaks around. As the horses tramped along the dust arose at each footfall from the dry and rugged path by which they passed, covered as it was, by scant and starved herbage, which seemed to have grown under difficulties. The animals exhibited the appearance of having undergone a long journey under the broiling sun of the day, which was now fast fading from the sky; their coats were travel-stained, and they needed an occasional shake of the bridle to stimulate their movements. The horsemen evidently were not equals in rank. The one who seemed to be the superior rode slightly in advance, and wore a conical cap of blue velvet, across which trailed a white feather, fastened in front by a gold clasp, set with Irish crystals. A doublet, plaited in thick folds, covered his graceful though muscular figure. This garment was fastened at the waist by a belt, from which depended a sword of that shape which Spanish cavaliers borrowed from the Moors—and descended midway to the thigh—from whence his limbs, round and well-shaped, were covered with trews; his feet were encased in buskins, which reached to the calf of the leg, and then lapped outward with a deep fall, completing the costume of the principal personage of the wayfarers. For his personnel he was about the middle height, and formed with a conformation fitted for agility and strength. His hair, as it escaped from beneath his cap, was of a glossy brown, and clustered in curls around his temples. His face, with a skin clear as a girl's, was bronzed by the ardour of the sun, but still presented features which might afford a model for Praxiteles in their manly beauty. A broad forehead, which was marked by eyebrows delicately pencilled in their rounded sweep; his nose, of the purest Grecian type, terminated in that nostril peculiar to Ireland, which a critic might object to as being too full. A moustache covered his mouth, his chin gracefully curved, evinced the determined disposition of its owner in the firmness of cast which it imparted to a countenance which otherwise was expressive of joyousness and good-nature alone.

He might be between twenty-five and thirty years old, and altogether presented a figure which reached as near to perfection as mere human nature can be ever approximated. Slung at his saddle-bow was the favourite weapon of his nation, the battle-axe. His horse wore frontlet and breast-plate, and our cavalier, as becometh him in those troublous times, was equally ready for peace or war. His companion was a perfect antithesis to him. Hanging at his saddle-bow, in addition to the battle-axe, was his master's morrion; above it rose his own figure. Broad-chested, long-armed, he was clad after the manner of the native Irish of the time. The fileadh or cloak enveloped his brawny figure. His hair was of the ruddiest hue, and growing in matted profusion upon his head, half-hid a face which was seamed by an ugly scar which reached from the outer canthus of the left eye down to the centre of the upper lip, and showed the handiwork of some vengeful steel. Fierce-looking, without a regular feature in his mutilated face, there still was a glance of wildest drollery gleaming for ever in the restless eye. No words were spoken by the travellers as they went along. The younger and superior was clearly indulging in some of the day-dreams, which are natural to those persons of his age, and the gallowglass was just as clearly indulging in surmises as to the thoughts of his lord. They travelled onward in this fashion until they approached the bank of a rivulet, which crossed the path they were pursuing. At the sight of the clear streamlet the wearied horses pricked up their ears, and stretched their necks, whilst they enlivened the slow and shambling pace at which they had been proceeding into a quick, sharp trot, incited by the stimulus of the grateful liquid gleaming before them ready to quench their thirst.

"Soh, brute!" exclaimed the foremost of the travellers in Irish, as he steadied his horse with the rein—"soh! you are as ardent as lover might be at the sight of his mistress, and as reckless too. Would you break your neck for the sake of dying in the stream, merely because you might swill a draught from it. We must look for easier access to the spring than this."

The eyes of his uncivilised-looking henchman laughed at the apostrophe of the cavalier, but not a muscle of the scared face moved. A short ride up the bank brought them to a broken spot in its side, by which they descended to the little river. The steeds rushed into its centre, and plunged their muzzles deep into the water. As their horses drank the riders sat watching the eddies of the current as it foamed past in tiny whirlpools.

"My soul!" shouted the gallowglass, "O'Daly, look—what is that?" He pointed to a dark object floating slowly down in the shadow of the further bank.

The young chieftain turned his eyes in the direction indicated by the finger of his companion, and then drawing his sabre, rode towards it. Stooping from his saddle, he raised it on the point of the sword, as he said:

"It is a scarf, don't you see—a silken gew-gaw too—flung away by some one when it has served his turn; let it go whither it was committed." He lowered his sword and dropped it again into the stream.

"O'Daly! O'Daly!" muttered the gallowglass, "silken gear is not to be found floating on streams every day in summer, and what would the Vanthee say to Art Mac Caura if she were to be told he allowed tissue fit for the wear of a princess to go to the fishes for pride to take it from them?"

The thrifty gallowglass loosened his spear-topped axe as he moved his horse down the stream to get within reach of the scarf. Riding on until he had gone below the floating stripe of silk, he raised it on his axe, and held it at arms' length from him, so that the water which poured from its folds might drop into the stream.

"A pretty piece of wear," said he, as he rode towards his master, "and one that belies the saying—the early bird shall get the worm." Now, the bravest cock that ever crew at midnight will not find that piece of prey even if he gets off his roost in the dark to go look for it, when the belated scald-crow has it in his nest. Come, Bully, climb up until I wear my prize in more peaceful fashion than this."

He caught a firmer hold of his rein as he turned his horse to ascend the bank and rejoin his master, who was waiting at some short distance, and had, in the meantime, dismounted to girth his saddle. When his servitor reached him he sprang lightly to the ground and held his horse whilst the chieftain mounted.

"Now," said he, as he took the scarf in his hand, "our journey has not been without profit. Eh—eh? what is this?" as he let it fall, and peered in the twilight at his hand; "gore, as I'm a sinner!—blood, O'Daly—and the brave scarf that bears it with a broad hole in it. Wheugh! the vultures are abroad, and I'll take my oath that is a spear thrust from no child's arm. Chreestha, what's that?"

The latter exclamation had been caused by a sound which might be the alarm note of a bird shrieking at some disturbance of its nest. Both listened, and again the sound was repeated seemingly at a long distance in the heart of the wood.

"It is a distressful voice," said he who was addressed as O'Daly. "In the name of Heaven let us go to find out its cause."

"Easy now, O'Daly, easy now," said his companion; "have a care; maybe it's the good people, and maybe it's not; but what have we to do with it?"

"Pooh! come on, Mac Caura," answered his companion, as he touched his horse with the spur sharply, and dashed in amongst the trees, taking the direction whence the voice appeared to proceed.

"That's like him," said Mac Caura, as he grasped his axe, "always flighty; but it is as well to meet the good people in company as to wait for them alone. Get on, Bully!" he exclaimed, as his horse sprang forward on the same path taken by O'Daly.

After a brisk canter through the wood for about ten minutes, he overtook the chieftain, when the same sound which first attracted their notice, arose again at no great distance from them on the right of the course they were pursuing.

"Halt!" said O'Daly. "Let us proceed cautiously now in the direction of the sound. It seems to me to arise from beyond the clump yonder; best hold my horse, and I will explore the place of mystery on foot."

So saying the young cavalier dismounted, taking his pole-axe from the saddle-bow, and walking lightly forward, he entered into the copse from whence the sound proceeded, and found it thickly overgrown with brush-wood. He strode along through the obstacles in his path with light and agile step, peering, as he proceeded, the dusky wood around. He had gone on for about a hundred paces when he found his steps arrested by a precipitous declivity overgrown with stunted white thorn. With cautious movement he swung from tree to tree down the deep descent, until he found himself in a dell with a river running through its centre, the same which lately crossed his path. Some few yards from its bank lay an object difficult to distinguish in the uncertain light, and again arose an ear-piercing shriek, similar to those he had just heard in the forest. O'Daly was a brave man, but tinged with the superstitions of his time. He hesitated to go forward, and was about to retrace his steps in order to obtain the company of his henchman. When he turned again and felt assured that he saw the outline of a human head lifted above the dim and shapeless figure. Grasping his battle-axe he crossed himself, and advanced cautiously nearer to the mysterious object.

"Bah!" said he, "it is a woman entangled with some brute."

He walked forward, and as he approached he was hailed by a prayer imploring blessings on his head, and beseeching his aid for the suppliant.

"What has happened, my good woman?" said he, as he stooped over the curious mass, and beheld a female lying upon a mule, which was surrounded by a pool of blood.

"Enough has happened, achora," said she, replying to him in the soft accents of the Gael, "enough has happened. I have been plundered and tied fast to this dead mule by the plunderers, while the man who ought to protect me fled before the ruffians, and left me a lone woman to be slaughtered. But loosen me, sir knight, for I fear their return every moment."

With some difficulty O'Daly undid the fastenings, and listened to the story of the woman. She had been to Dublin, she said, to purchase linens, and silks, and miniver furs too, for her young mistress, who was about to be married, in a few days, to young Sir Reginald Talbot, of the great Talbots, and she was despatched by her master, with an apprentice of the citizen from whom the goods were purchased, to enquire her home. She had intended to be at Naas before sundown, when two Sassenach robbers darted out upon the path they were pursuing, shouting to them to stop. The apprentice urged the mule along, while she sat in a pillion behind him, and they were crossing the ford in the stream, when a cross-bow bolt struck the mule, which started up the river stung by pain, and became utterly uncontrollable. By the bed of the stream they had got into this lone dell, but their pursuers had seen the course taken by the wounded mule, and from the height above had shot again when they came within range of the fugitives; the mule struggled up the bank and fell dead where he lay, and the worthy cit, freeing himself from the dead animal, had run away as fast as his legs could carry him. The robbers had then rushed down upon her as she also fled, and having seized her, they bound her to the dead animal, which they disencumbered of all his burden. Some of the costly silks which he carried having been covered with the animal's blood, and otherwise injured, the marauders had flung into the stream, and let them glide down with it. Then, having hidden the rest in the hollow of a tree which she indicated, they had gone off in search of the fugitive, believing he might have some money with him, of which they could make a booty. An hour had passed over since, and they had not returned, whilst the pain of her limbs had become intolerable, and she could not repress those shrieks which had called attention to her situation.

"Come now," said O'Daly; "I have a horse near, and my gallo-glass, Art Mac Caura, has another; you shall ride behind him to Naas, which cannot be far off."

"Art Mac Caura!" exclaimed the woman; "you don't tell me that Art Mac Caura has left the service of that black-hearted villain, Carroll Moore O'Daly, the brother of the Connaught chief."

"No!" exclaimed O'Daly, "I tell you nothing of the kind? But why call you Carroll Moore O'Daly, blackhearted and a villain. I tell you what, good dame, few would say that, and I to be within hearing of them."

"Then here is one who would tell it to the traitor's teeth, and proclaim him a dishonoured and false-hearted dog," she said, excitedly. "The fairest maiden in all the land—Eileen O'Kavanagh, goes to the altar in two days hence to plight her marriage vows to a man whom she detests because of that same Carroll Moore O'Daly, who won her young love, and then scorned it to wed another."

"Tush!" answered O'Daly, "you rave; I am Carroll Moore O'Daly. I have not been false to Eileen Kavanagh, and not all the angels in Heaven could convince me that she has been so untrue to me as to wed another. Well for you, babbling woman, that your sex is your shield!"

It was the evening of the second day after the scene we have detailed, as horsemen, with girls and matrons mounted on pillions behind them, crossed the lowered drawbridge which led into the castled-keep of Clonmullen. The great hall of the fortalice was thronged with guests, who were seated according to their rank along the table, which extended from end to end of the apartment. Rude but rich cheer smoked in varied profusion on the hospitable board. At its head sat the lord of the castle, the chief of the O'Kavanaghs; on his left were two vacant chairs for the bride and bridegroom-elect; on his right was placed the pastor of the district and some of the neighbouring clergy. As the guests came in he assigned them their places, and saluted them familiarly. When all were seated, the chief called a servitor to him and gave him some command, upon which he went out through a door at the upper end of the hall. Immediately after the door opened and the bride-elect appeared leaning upon the arm of her brother, and accompanied by Sir Reginald Talbot. She approached and took her seat as appointed; Sir Reginald assumed that next her. Nowhere could there be a fairer face; yellow hair, which fell in rich golden ringlets on each side of her head, covered her shoulders with its glossy wealth. But although the beauteous features were calm, there was that in their pensive cast which told of a deep sorrow in the heart of her who bore them. The large lustrous eyes were suffused with a light which told of tears more than joy; and the pained and anxious gaze was looking through the smiles around as if seeking some face not to be found there. In reply to the greetings of those around her a joyless smile dwelt for an instant on her pale lips, and then passed away, leaving the face it had lit for a moment with a darker shade of sadness visible for the momentary brightness which faded from it so soon.

"A strange bridal this," said one of the guests to his neighbour. "Eileen O'Kavanagh does not look as if it liked her. See how she turns from that dark Talbot when he speaks to her."

"Aye! aye!" replied the man addressed, "my wife, who knows more about the matter than I do, tells me that the colleen's heart is bursting for the brother of Donogh Moore O'Daly, who went off to the wars some two years since, and has married a Spanish princess, they say."

"Blood of the stranger! bad blood it is, neighbour, and bodes ill to our land wherever its dark stream runs. But this Carroll O'Daly, I am told, is not married at all in Spain. A friend of mine, who was with Prince Hugh Rhua O'Donnell, and has come home from that country, told me that Carroll O'Daly is free to wed where he lists."

"A likely fellow he is, wherever he be," said the other. "I rode a raid with him across to Maynooth of the Fitzgeralds once, and no man that ever I saw would I rather follow on such an errand. I had rather see him here than the tall sassenach we have; for sure I am, we would never want a herd of cattle or a flock of sheep when he tired of his lady's bower, and could find herd or flock in the cincture of the Pale. But I fear me he will never go hosting with the O'Kavanagh's again when his lady-love spends the mi na meala in Malahide. By my troth the girl loves him, for she has delayed her bridal hour unseasonably when she will not have the ceremony performed until the third hour before midnight. Hush, though! listen—what is that?"

The sound which attracted the notice of the gossips had had an equal effect upon all at the table. The conversation was hushed as the full, rich tones of a manly voice arose upon the evening air under one of the windows of the hall, singing an exquisite melody, perfectly strange to every listener. Every note was modulated in such a manner that showed the singer to be no ordinary one, and the accompaniment of a harp filled with minstrel grace the pauses between the stanzas. At last the notes died away, and the first who spoke was Sir Reginald Talbot.

"Bravely done, by my faith," said he. "Wly, O'Kavanagh, this is a pleasant surprise; I never knew your harper boasted of such skill. Music like that is rare to hear."

"Sir Reginald," said Fitzpatrick, the old harper, who sat some distance behind the knight in a recess close to the huge chimney of the hall, "Sir Reginald, I never knew but one voice could make such music as that, and that voice is far away to-night. My poor tones could never match those of Carroll Moore O'Daly."

"Bring in the minstrel if he be mortal," said the chief to his cup-bearer; "bring him in and he shall have his guerdon."

The command of the chief was soon obeyed. The guests turned around as the strange minstrel entered and strode proudly towards the chief. It was O'Daly himself, but completely altered in appearance from the cavalier of the forest. His face and hands had been stained of an olive hue by some pigment. His hair and eyebrows were black as the raven's wing, and no discernment would have detected him as the same young knight who travelled with Art Mac Caura. As he stood before O'Kavanagh he bowed as if awaiting his command, whilst the chief surveyed him.

"Take a seat at our board, good bard," he said, "and be welcome to Clonmullin. Drink a health to the bride, and take of our best, that we may hear that dulcet song again."

"The bride's weal I will drink," answered the minstrel, "but I may not eat of your cheer for a vow I have made. If it pleases you to hear my performance for the sake of the occasion, you are welcome."

Eileen Kavanagh looked full in the face of the stranger as he spoke, and her colour came and went. O'Daly held his gaze averted from her; through his disguise her glance alone had penetrated. O'Daly had concerted a plot with her nurse by which he intended to fly with Eileen; he had instructed the old woman to make only a portion of it known to her foster-child, fearing that her agitation, as the crisis approached, might mar his plans. For this purpose the woman had only informed Eileen that her lover was true to her still, and would send a trusty friend who would prevent her marriage until Carroll O'Daly should claim her in person. For one reason or other, by her advice, Eileen had insisted that the ceremony, which would make her the wife of Reginald Talbot, should be delayed until late in the evening, and we have seen that she succeeded. O'Daly had adopted the disguise of a minstrel or gleeman, and thus had entered the hall of the bridal gathering. His remarkable skill in melody had been his passport.

"What is the name of that song, minstrel," said Talbot, "and by whom is it composed? Methinks I heard it before."

"Melody nor words you have never heard, sir knight," answered O'Daly; "both were born of my brain to-day, as I thought of a girl I loved very dearly, and whose friends by falsehood estranged her from me and wedded to another. My song will live when I am gone, and the tale will be told by cottage-fires in Irish land many an age to come, when the minstrel and Eileen a Ruin, the girl he sung, both sleep quietly in the dust. Such is the power of the bard, and such to his pride. Now," he continued, waking a prelude on his harp, "let the bride hear the utterance of a heart in which there never was untruth."

The minstrel ceased to speak, and from his touch swelled upon the air the plaintive and thrilling notes of his melody—soon his voice joined in concert with his instrument, and the song of Eileen a Ruin charmed his auditory. During the performance the Chieftain's daughter bent her gaze upon the singer, and the hot blood rushed in flushing waves across her cheeks. As the bard told his truth and constancy in the cadences of the song, her eyes flashed with pride, and one glance which he cast towards her was returned by another which told him he was understood. He ceased and the plaudits of the company and approached Eileen—

"Deign lady," said he, "to accept this scroll wherein the notes and language of my poor melody are transcribed. It may remind you, from the story it conveys, never to believe without good proof in the perfidy of any whom you once found to be true. A happy bridal be yours! Gentles, adieu!" So saying, suddenly as he appeared, and before he could be prevented, the bard had issued from the hall of feasting.

An hour had passed away, and before the altar in the chapel of the Castle of Clonmullen stood the bridal party. The irrevocable words had just been spoken which bound Sir Reginald Talbot to the lady who stood there. A thick, white veil covered her from head to foot, and the bridegroom was just about concluding the ceremony by placing the ring upon the finger of the bride, who seemed struggling with some nervous influence, for she shook strangely, when, with a thundering oath, Sir Reginald shouted—

"This is not the hand of Eileen O'Kavanagh!"

"No!" exclaimed the lately wedded. "It is a heavier hand—taste it, Talbot!"

With the word Sir Reginald received a blow which prostrated him before the altar, tearing, as he fell, the veil from the face of the figure, and revealing the ghastly face of Art Mac Caura, his wild features convulsed with laughter.

"The henchman of Carroll Moore O'Daly!" cried several voices. "Seize Art Mac Caura!" But the nimble gallowglass had dashed the torches from the grasp of the bearers, and plunged in the darkness through the crowd, his bridal costume torn to tatters, as a hundred hands had grasped at it to stay his flight. Through the open door he fled out upon the ramparts.

"Farrak! for the O'Daly," he shouted, as he stood above the moat. "The bard foiled the Sassenach." For a moment there might be seen the shadowy outline of his form through dusky air, as a burst of hoarse laughter rung from him in the ears of his pursuers, and then downward he sprang into the waters with a wild whoop, and swam with sturdy strokes to the other side, up which he clambered, and was soon lost in the shadows of the night."

There was rushing to the postern, but no getting out; the warder was in a state of helpless intoxication—he had locked and double locked every issue in the most careful manner, and the keys could not be found. Sir Reginald shook him into answering some of his angry questions.

"The bard—hiccup—a goo-good fell-w. Wouldn't disturb me to let the strolling women out, and gave me—hic—all the usquebagh. He has the keys—hic-hic—just as safe as if I had them myself."

A blow on the ear from the knight prostrated him in the corner of the apartment on the straw from whence he had arisen, or been shaken up rather; and by the time anything could be done in the way of pursuit, Connor Moore O'Daly was beyond all probability of capture. At daylight Sir Reginald Talbot rode from Clonmullen never to enter its walls again. The daring of O'Daly made him popular in the country, and his spirit caused him to be regarded as a hero even in the eyes of the O'Kavanaghs, who had done their best to poison the heart of his lady-love by their falsehoods against him. Many months had not passed over ere the gallant young chieftain was welcomed back with his fair bride to Clonmullen, and the wine-cup flowed over as the sept of the O'Kavanaghs toasted the singer and the song of Eileen a Ruin in the hall where it had its first expression, and to which it owed its existence.

LEIXLIP AND ITS CASTLE.

IXTY years ago there were few localities in the neighbourhood of the Irish metropolis more frequented by its pleasure-seeking inhabitants than the village of Leixlip, although it is now comparatively neglected. Doctor Campbell says: "All the outlets of Dublin are pleasant, but this superlatively so which leads through Leixlip, a neat little village about seven miles from Dublin, up the Liffey, whose banks are beautiful beyond description." O'Keeffe in his opera of "The Tired Soldier," thus chants its charms:

"Though Leixlip is proud of its close shady bowers,
Its clear falling waters, and murmuring cascades,
Its groves of fine myrtle, its beds of sweet flowers,
Its lads so well dressed, and its neat pretty maids."

The town is memorable in an historic point of view as the place where, in the war of 1641, General Preston halted when on his way to form a junction with the Marquis of Ormond to oppose the Parliamentarians. It is bounded on one extremity by the river Liffey, which is crossed by a bridge of ancient construction, and on the other by the Rye-water, over which there is a bridge of modern date. The Castle of Leixlip is magnificently situated on a steep and richly-wooded bank over the Liffey. Although of great antiquity, its external character exhibits but little of the appearance of an ancient fortress, having been modernised by successive occupants. It is supposed to have been erected in the reign of Henry II., by Adam de Hereford, one of the chief followers of Earl Strongbow.

THE BLACK DOCTOR.

CHAPTER VII.

WHEN the Jew and Tony had left the room where the Black Doctor was sitting, the latter carefully opened Isaac's pocket-book, and stooping down to the light of the fire, he began closely to examine the contents of his prize. In one of the larger compartments was a parchment document carefully folded. Within it was a roll of bills bearing the signature of Frederick Foster. That which surrounded them was a deed of conveyance, from Foster to the Jew, of all he possessed in the world. Bramble cautiously replaced the documents in the place in which he had found them, and while his hands trembled with excitement, he sought for the forged bill of Stammers. After an anxious search he found it wrapped up in a piece of blotting paper tied with a string. He opened it and closed it twenty times, till at length, not able to restrain his emotion, he rose hurriedly from his chair and walked up and down the room like a person who had lost his reason. He rubbed his hands together in the wildness of his glee. Hearing footsteps on the stairs, he rushed to the table, and seizing the pocket-book, thrust it inside his coat. He had scarcely done so when Abraham Isaacs re-entered the room, looking pale, and exhibiting a strange wildness in his manner.

"I remember," said the Jew, "that I left the pocket-book containing the forged bill of Stammers at home in a safe. Give me the thousand pounds which the forger gave you for me, and I will let you have the bill in the morning. If you do not what I require, I will take no further trouble in the matter, but leave your swindling friend to his fate."

"What security," replied Bramble, with affected seriousness, "will I have if I pay you the money now, that the forged bill will not pass into the hands of strangers?"

"I will give you a receipt for the money the moment you give it to me, and you know that will be security sufficient for you," replied Isaacs.

"I will pay you no money confided to me," continued Bramble, "unless you give me up the bill."

"Don't tamper with me," said the Jew. "I will make this compromise with you: let me have seven hundred and fifty, and you can have your friend's bill."

"Now?" asked Bramble.

"No," continued Isaacs, "not before to-morrow morning."

"I have given my answer before," said Bramble coolly. "I think that you would form a strange notion of my business habits if I paid you before you produced that for which the money is demanded. Have you the bill at all? If you have it, why not give it to me? You said that you would bring it with you to night, and why have you not done so? I tell you, once for all, that I will give you no money till I get the bill."

The Jew instinctively thrust his hand into the pocket into which he remembered to have placed the pocket-book, and, as if suddenly recollecting himself, he said: "I have left it at home; and when you see your friend, tell him that the vengeance of Abraham Isaacs will be prompt and terrible."

When the Jew was passing through the shop, he was asked by Tony Johnson how he was, and, if he was not in a great hurry, taking some of the mud off the back of his coat would be an improvement.

Isaacs made no reply, but passed out to the street. He retraced his steps through the streets and lanes by which he had come from his own house to the "Three Jolly Travellers." He kept his eyes bent on the ground as he proceeded, and when he came to the place in the dark lane where he had fallen, he stopped and commenced groping in the mud for his lost treasure. "I brought it with me, I swear," said the Jew, "and I must have dropped it. I am ruined—ruined," he exclaimed bitterly, as he wiped the mud off his hands. In all Dublin that night there was not a sadder man than the Jew, as he opened the door of his house and entered.

Bramble was seated by the fire in deep contemplation when Jacob Barman entered the old drawing-room of the "Three Jolly Travellers."

"I am glad you are here, Doctor," said the new comer, addressing Bramble. "We have a good job on for to-night, in which you can give us all the assistance that is required. Foster's wife has a few thousands in the English equity courts. This money cannot be disposed of until the time of her death, and, to evade the law, we have made her make a will, which we will prove by your means. You must be one of the witnesses to the will, and be ready to state that you attended her in her last illness. We are to have a mock funeral at which you will be present. Quill was telling me that he had been speaking to you on the subject, and that you had no objection to act with us."

"All that I can do I will do; but, wont there be great risk in the matter?" observed Bramble.

"None whatever," replied Barman. "The plan is simple and plain. On this night Foster will bring the will here signed by his wife, and in this very room it shall be executed."

"How will you manage the funeral?" inquired Bramble.

"A coffin half-filled with clay will do, and you may rest assured that we will manage the wake as well as the funeral," said Barman.

Barman was one of those men who, by some mysterious amalgamation, unite in themselves strange contradictions, such as the extremes of good nature and self-sacrifice with the most malignant hostilities to those who do them wrong, and a kind of perversion of moral rectitude, seeking shelter under the externals of seeming benevolence—in fact, men who are good by the impulses of vanity. Impulse, not principle, is their motive power, and the observer of life is always prepared to expect a sinister object is sought to be achieved even at the time when they are performing an act of seemingly genuine and disinterested kindness. Barman was apparently about fifty years of age, and one who had mingled at one time in what is called, "good society." Although his clothes were shabby, they were scrupulously clean and carefully brushed. His white cravat was always exceedingly well put out of hands, and he made the very most of the "art of dressing," by the ease and suavity of his manner, which transferred the observation of those with whom he came in contact from his garments to himself. He had the art of being above the art of fashioners, and could pass muster in attire which would make other men seek shelter from criticism in secluded places, or turn from a thoroughfare to avoid the gaze of those who were on better terms with their tailors. Barman was "one of many"—one who had invested much capacity and a great deal of natural goodness in the game of life, which, if turned into honourable and legitimate channels, would have resulted in honour, respect, and independence; and instead of being the law adviser of the wanton, the spendthrift, and the profligate, he might have been an honest man and an honour to his profession. His face was more remarkable in its expression for sharpness, or rather cunning, than for intellect; and his blue eyes, and thin, sandy whiskers threw the sallow whiteness of his face into disagreeable contrast.

Bramble knew his acquaintance well, and as the attorney stamped his foot on the floor, he observed him closely from beneath his big eyes.

The approach of Tony was heralded by a series of whistles performed with great ability through his fingers. When he entered the room, he observed—

"Who was knocking for something? here I am."

"You are a slow machine," said the Black Doctor; "surely you must have heard that gentleman knocking."

"To pay me the five shillings he owes me," said Tony.

"Not at all, Tony," said Bramble; "he only wants to make what he owes you worth your while."

"All right," replied Tony—"suppose you never pay me, what matter, as John Brunt can stop all you owe me out of my wages—because he never gives me any."

While Bramble and Barman were laughing at the observations and antics of Tony, the gruff voice of Brunt demanded the presence of his accomplished assistant.

"Wait till your betters are served, old Brunt," cried out Tony, at the top of his voice. "Come, gentlemen, say what do you want, as there is a nice lot below."

"Who are they?" asked Barman.

"There is Mr. Quill, your clerk; Mr. Wisp, and five or six other respectable people," replied Tony, and was leaving the room when Bramble told him to remain where he was.

The Black Doctor rose and left the room, signalling to Tony to follow, without allowing the motion to be observed by Barman. Tony took the hint, and ran after Bramble, who was waiting for him on the stairs.

"Do not be far out of the way," he said, "as I will want you to-night—go back to that gentleman inside, and I will return soon."

There was no person in the shop but John Brunt when the Black Doctor went down stairs; but the noise of many voices announced that a number of persons were in the tap.

"You were loudly calling, Brunt; what did you want?" asked Bramble, who looked cautiously into the places where the dim light of four greasy candles in tin sconces could not reach.

How altered had become the proprietor of the "Three Jolly Travellers" within the space of a few short hours. He appeared to have lost all his old characteristics, and whatever he did he appeared to do mechanically. He called Tony as usual; he counted his money, ranged pints and glasses; but even in his dull, heavy face there was still sufficient expressiveness to tell that he felt overshadowed with some terrible evil, and that he was ill at ease. Whenever he lifted his hands to his head they moved as if loads had been attached to them, and his eyes were bloodshot and dry, as if he had never slept.

In reply to the question put to him by Bramble, John Brunt said:

"I was calling Tony to prevent people coming inside that bar and helping themselves; but I do not care now; it matters little to John Brunt."

"Who are those inside?" asked Bramble; "they seem to be enjoying themselves."

"I know but one of them," replied the landlord. "Tony told me that he was—his nephew." If he does not know it all, what brings him here?"

"He is not Hawksworth's nephew," said the Black Doctor, "no more than I am."

"Where did you hear that name?" asked Brunt; "I never told it to you. I am now lost," added the wretched man, as he staggered to his seat behind the counter.

Bramble gently opened the door of the tap, and therein was assembled a motley group, who seemed to be making the best of the spoils captured from the bar of John Brunt. Amongst the motley throng none enjoyed the joke, as it was called, more than Quill and Wisp, who were laughing heartily over their potatoes. When the hilarity had somewhat abated on the part of the two distinguished servants of the law, Jonas Quill said:

"If I had not a great constitution, the doings of last night would have killed me. But my family were remarkable for strong constitutions. My father (although you may not believe it, Wisp) recovered from a heavy fit of sickness, although three doctors were attending him."

In one corner of that tap-room sat Frederick Foster alone. His head was bowed down and his arms were folded over a breast within which beat as heavy and as weary a heart as ever moved in a human breast. As he gazed upon the fire he looked as if he was sadly reviewing the past, and he appeared not in the slightest degree to heed the noise and clamour of those around him. He was a photograph of abject misery, and one who seemed destined to be ever acquainted with misfortune. But no one heeded him, though he had been once courted and flattered, and was now penniless, ill clad, and half-starving.

The entrance of the Black Doctor appeared to exercise a most potent influence on Quill and Wisp. Bramble immediately recognised Foster, and on going over to him shook him warmly by the hand.

"We have been waiting for you some time, Mr. Foster," said Bramble. "Barman is up stairs, so you had better come up. Follow us," he continued, turning to Quill and Wisp.

Tony was at once despatched for hot punch.

"You know," said Barman, addressing Wisp, "a great deal about me, but I know more about you. For reasons which I have I want you to sign this will, but you must keep your tongue quiet. You will be well paid during the next two days for assisting at the funeral of the lady who made this will. She is the wife of Mr. Foster here."

"I would die before I would deceive you, and if you like I will swear that I will not tell anything," observed Wisp.

"I would sooner not pay you a compliment, but I must; I would much sooner have your word than your oath. It is a habit of yours to break your oath, but it will be a kind of novelty to you to be believed on your word." The sarcasm of Barman excited a general laugh, in which none joined more heartily than Wisp.

The Black Doctor, Barman, and Frederick Foster entered into close conversation; and after some time all appeared to be perfectly satisfied with the arrangements concerning the "will," the "waku," and the "mock burial."

Bramble rose from his seat and said that he had important business to transact, and however anxious he may be to stay, that he should leave, as time pressed him heavily. "I have much to do, and all must be done as far as possible this night." He beckoned to Tony, who followed him to the street. "Come with me," continued Bramble, addressing the boy; "keep behind me, but don't lose sight of me."

"Never fear," replied Tony. "What's up now? I walked more for the past two days than I did in all my life before."

"Come on quickly," said Bramble, in a harsh tone of voice, and the two pedestrians moved on at a brisk pace through a number of bye-streets. It was near midnight when Bramble and Tony entered Elm Place. Everything appeared to be still within the stately houses that seemed to have put out their lights, and to have gone to sleep for the night.

"Do you stop here till I return," said Bramble, addressing Tony, who seated himself on one of the stone steps.

Bramble knocked gently at the hall-door, and in a short time after the reflection of a light in one of the upper windows of the house of Colonel Stammers, showed that the knock had been heard. In a few minutes the hall-door was partially opened, and a female voice, scarcely raised above a whisper, asked "Who is there?"

"It is I, Mrs. Stammers," said Bramble; "let me in at once."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

A CHAPTER ON OLD BACHELORS.

E cannot define with certainty the nature of the feelings with which the antediluvians looked upon old bachelors. Probably they regarded them with contempt and scorn. This, however, is on the supposition that there were old bachelors in those days of war, revelry, and giving in marriage. "There were giants in those days," and, from all we have read and heard of those stepple-like specimens of humanity, we are led to think that they were far more given to matrimony than to single blessedness. Before the Flood, then, an old bachelor must have been a regular rara avis, but we are not to imagine that on account of his scarcity, if we may so express ourselves, he was looked upon with any degree of leniency by his contemporaries. Let us suppose, for a moment, although it is very unlikely that such an individual did exist, and, furthermore, that he was, for instance, a neighbour of Tubal Cain's, the old artificer in steel and brass, to whom, in the common course of events, he would have been likely to give some employment. Well, let us say that, at the age of five hundred years, which, according to the philosophers, corresponds to fifty in these degenerate days, he bethought himself one fine morning of getting his horse, or his behemoth, or whatever beast of burthen people then used, abod, and for that purpose paid a visit to old Tubal's forge. Is it likely that the gigantic blacksmith and his witty apprentices could refrain from passing many a joke and jibe upon the enormity of his remaining single up to such an age? All we can say upon the matter is, that, notwithstanding their stature, they were men, and that, participating in the feelings common to all humanity, their noses, which, if we are to believe some ancient writers, were considerably over a fathom in length, were often cocked up at their neighbour, and their huge and begrimed physiognomies contorted into many a sarcastic laugh at his expense, as he sat "like patience on a monument" upon the hob, listening to the bellows that roared beside him like a volcano, and to the "ding dong" of the mighty hammers upon an anvil which, after a minute analogical course of reasoning, we conclude must have been the size of a respectable mountain.

The foregoing being all mere conjecture, we will now glide up to a time after which the feelings of society with respect to old bachelors assume a more certain and definite aspect—we mean that "old dusky time" when, as the prince of idlers, Thomson, says, in his poem of "the Seasons"—

— "The deep cleft-disparting orb that arched
The central waters round, impetuous rushed
With universal burst into the gulf,
And o'er the high-piled hills of fractured earth
Wild dashed the waves in undulation vast,
'Till from the centre to the streamy clouds
A shoreless ocean tumbled round the globe!"—

Then as the waters of the deluge subsided, and when Noah portioned out the green and smiling earth between his three sons, from that ancient period people seem to have looked upon old bachelors with no small amount of contempt, blended with a hot seasoning of animosity. Now, in all this we can see but little justice and less of charity. Nero is said to have wished the whole human race to have but one neck that he might sever it with a single blow of his sword. Doubtless, although he never obtained his wish, the nefarious pagan often feasted himself by doing the deed in his imagination. For a far different purpose we have bundled up the whole mass of society, living and dead, before our mind's eye. We have held the scales of justice in our hands and weighed their opinions, and though we have found many of them fair and good, we triumphantly pronounce the aforesaid one regarding old bachelorism wanting—wanting in truth, kindness, and charity. Why should a man be blamed for what he cannot avoid; for what he has heroically striven against with might and main during many a long and weary year? People will answer that a man becomes an old bachelor from mere choice, and will point the finger of scorn at many an unfortunate example of their assertions; but they who do so have studied the secret workings of the human heart but lightly.

A man who begins life with the avowed intention of never marrying, and apparently to the world "kicks against the goad" with his whole heart, is always sure in the end to become entangled in the flower-garland mesh of Hymen. Our friend Jack Browne, of Ballyskellig, is a good example of this. Jack is now a flourishing attorney, and a contented and benign paterfamilias. When he commenced to practise in his native town, he let "all and every" of his acquaintances know that he was determined to die a single man. This resolution of his did not proceed from lack of funds to support a family, and keep up the credit of a matrimonial establishment, for Jack had a handsome property and a splendid house adjoining the town. His relatives, of course, although in secret they heartily despised him, entertained him with the utmost blandness and cordiality whenever he condescended to visit their domiciles, for, casting their piercing eyes into the future, they were in the daily habit of contemplating his last sickness, death, burial, and will, from the items of which delightful document they had no small expectations. But Jack Browne still went on "the even tenor of his way," adjusting the differences of his litigious neighbours with wonderful judgment and impartiality, and seemingly never dreaming that such a thing as a marriage-ring was ever beaten into shape by a goldsmith. The marriageable girls of Ballyskellig set their caps at him in vain, and even their plotting and matchmaking mammas, whose sagacious eyes might have been supposed capable of detecting a flaw in his resolution, at last gave him up in despair. And thus years rolled on, Jack all the while adding to his wealth, and ostensibly looking upon matrimony with the most rampant ill-will and hatred. At last Mrs. Tomkins, the banker's wife, gave a ball, and amongst the guests at this brilliant festival was Mary Somers, a black-haired, dark-eyed, rosy-cheeked, laughing beauty, without as much of a fortune as would "jingle upon a milestone." This quaint method of expressing the amount of Mary Somers's worldly gear was used by Miss Angelina Primrose, as that sweet-tempered old maid and I stood in a corner of the ball-room, looking at the dancers.

"But you may be sure, Mr. Hazlewood, she will not be long without a husband for all that," added Angelina; "for if she hasn't the gold, she has an unlimited supply of brass. See how amiably she looks upon Mr. Browne, as he stands her vis-a-vis in the quadrille," and Angelina nodded her head towards the far end of the room.

I looked, not at the beautiful Mary Somers, but, as it happened, at my friend Jack Browne, and, to my infinite amazement, saw him regarding the former with an unmistakable glance of admiration, as she moved through the mazes of the dance before him, with an airy and inimitable grace that seemed peculiar to herself.

"However," rejoined the rather antiquated specimen of womanhood by my side, with a long-drawn sentimental sigh, which seemed to intimate that she herself had tried the powers of her beauty upon Jack, and failed—when she failed, how could others succeed? "However, if she had ten times the tact and impudence that she has, she can have but small chance of catching Mr. Browne!"

The quadrille soon came to an end, and a universal polka began, during which my amazement was not a little increased to see Jack and Mary Somers, as partners, twirling round and round upon the well-waxed floor. Five mortal times that night they danced together, greatly to the consternation of the girls of Ballyskellig, to whom Mary Somers was a comparative stranger. Speculating mammas fanned their perspiring cheeks, pursed up their lips, looked sadly upon their bereaved daughters, and shook their heads at the expected result of those five Terpsichorean figures. The result was known soon enough, and far too soon for many. It fell, in fact, like a thunderbolt on Ballyskellig, for next day Jack Browne popped the question to Mary Somers, and was accepted. They were married within a month, and we may here state, as a remarkable proof of our theory, that since the memorable night of Mrs. Tomkins's ball, the ladies of Ballyskellig, blooming spinsters, old maids, and sagacious mammas, have all looked upon the protestations of the young men to become old bachelors, as "airy nothings," and thereby have become far more cheerful and endearing towards us all, by which latter I mean those of us who are what is called eligible, in a matrimonial point of view.

Of your indifferent man who set out by saying that he does not care a straw whether he gets married or not, we have but little to say. An individual of that description is always sure at sometime or other to be ogled into matrimony. Of him we have nothing further to remark. We pass him over in silent contempt, and come to a specimen of a far different class—we mean the hot-headed, warm-hearted, sanguine youth, who steps out upon life's devious way, to him at first all bright and glorious, and looks around him upon ever-green woods and shining valleys as he travels onward, with the delightful aspiration of becoming a Benedict ever burning in his joyous bosom. It is from such that the ranks of old bachelors are mostly recruited. They love, and live in paradise for a time, but by and by the world, the frosty and cruel code of pounds, shillings, and pence comes between them and the objects of their young affections, withers up their hearts, and makes them miserable. A blight seems to fall upon them for a year or so. They live in darkness, despair, and sorrow, till once more the dawn appears, and they pluck up heart of grace, as the old romancists express it, and recommence their journey with renewed hopes. Another love, another walk through an enchanted and delightful land, lit by the golden sunlight of the heart. Then, mayhap, the ladies whom they worship play them false. The clouds again gather on life's horizon, and spread over the laughing summer sky. The lightnings flash, the thunder growls and bellows, and the storm pours down upon the poor wayfarers, who still journey on, their trust in woman's faith shaken to its foundation, their hearts seared and hardened, and their eyes opened to the guile and treachery that so often lie like an artful ambuscade before them. Once more they trust and are trusted, and now they are surely happy after their many sorrows. The bridal day comes on, a happy day for those who see it, but there are many who never see it, for death steps between and smites down their idols with his unrelenting sword. Then, like a man who, when his last tie on earth is severed, throws himself into the tumult of war, careless of the future, those poor hearts whom death has thus bereaved step forward and join the little army of bachelors, whose fate it is to do battle ever against the ill-deserved contumely of the world.

As an illustration of the above, we take the liberty of giving here the history of our friend Frank Eamonde. Frank is a gentleman of independent property, who, having grown weary of the country, now lives exclusively in town. The whole aim of his life at present seems to be to attend his club regularly and read the newspapers, to saunter on the sunny side of the street when the day is fine, to eat a good dinner, and afterwards, as he holds in his hand the single tumbler of punch he invariably indulges in, to drink happiness to the whole world—a happiness, alas, in which he is destined never wholly to participate. Frank, when I first knew him, was about eighteen years of age, and an only son. Never on the face of the earth existed a kinder, truer, or more honorable heart than his. Many a ramble he and I had together over his father's mountains, and many a pleasant story he told me of his youthful loves, as we sat by the verge of some green summer wood, or walked over the hill, side by side, to start the brown grouse from its purple covert of heather.

One bright October morning Frank and I went out shooting. The two previous months I had spent in town, and as a matter of course, on that identical morning I made the most minute inquiries regarding the heart adventures he had undergone during my absence, for it seemed a settled principle with him to have a new sweetheart every month. To my surprise he answered my inquiries in a very absent manner, and at length became quite uncommunicative. After several ineffectual attempts to get a story from him, I at last rattled away at my own adventures, at the end of which he appeared to relent somewhat, and seemed more inclined to take me into his confidence.

"As for me, Tom," said he, as we sat to rest ourselves on the grass on the verge of a glen, "I have nothing pleasant to tell you this time,—at least what you would call pleasant."

"You don't seem much pulled down by sorrow, nevertheless," remarked I, looking into his fine eye and sunbrowned face.

"Well," said he, "I suppose it is the case, for in my heart one feeling counteracts the other; I may say that I am happy and unhappy in the same breath."

"In other words," resumed I, "you are in love, Frank. With whom?"

"I am in love, Tom," answered he, "but this time it is a real feeling. I love her with my whole heart and soul, and shall never marry if I cannot marry her."

"Who is she?" said I eagerly, for I saw by his face that he was in earnest.

"Kate Neville!" answered he, with a sharp scrutiny of my face in return.

"Yes, Kate Neville," he resumed somewhat bitterly, noticing my surprise, "why should I not love her? Is she not good enough for me—for the best man in the kind?"

Kate Neville was the daughter of one of his father's tenants. It will not be wondered at, therefore, that I started on hearing her name pronounced by poor Frank, knowing, as I did, that his father was one of the proudest and sternest men in the county. James Neville, Kate's father, was a poor man, but his heart and head must have been in advance of his means, for he had contrived to give his daughter an education far beyond that usually given to young girls of her class. Kate was, in point of beauty, a most remarkable girl; and when we add to this her mental accomplishments, which were considerable, it will not appear strange that, however they happened to meet, she captivated the heart of Frank Esmonde, young, impetuous, warm, and romantic as he was at that most critical period of his life.

"Now, Frank," said I to him, "you had better pause before you go further in this matter. I see no hope from your father, and thus you can easily understand what a mad course you are pursuing. It is only destroying your own happiness and hers both together, for no matter how long you wait, your father will never consent."

"I suppose so," said he sadly, "but as for drawing back, that I cannot do. We are pledged to one another, Tom. She loves me, if possible, far better than I love her, and think you that I could break her heart by basely forsaking her? It would break my own heart to do so. Therefore, I will wait—and wait—"

"And wait for what?" I interrupted, "Depend upon it, Frank, that when you leave home as you are about to do, and enter the army, your sentiments will soon change."

"We will see," said he determinedly, as he stood up. "There," continued he, as if wishing to change the conversation, "see, there goes a pack of grouse whirling over the hill. Let us follow them," and with that he strode off at a surprising pace up the side of the rugged glen by which we had been sitting.

"Poor fellow!" said I commiseratingly, as I followed on the path at his heels, "he is mad, but the world will soon cure him."

"The world will never do so, Tom," said he, turning suddenly and laying his hand on my shoulder, "for I have sworn in my inmost heart to love Kate Neville and none other, for evermore!"

When we returned that evening, we were rather surprised to see James Neville, Kate's father, coming down the avenue. He seemed in a troubled state of mind as he passed us. I immediately suspected what had taken place. The sturdy old farmer, however he had come to the knowledge of it, had informed Frank's father of the whole affair. The latter, however, made no allusion to it, but I noticed that his look was sterner, and his manner more reserved than ever that evening. Next day he left home and did not return for a fortnight. In about a week after his coming home, Frank was gazetted to an ensigncy in the —th regiment of foot.

After a few days' preparation, Frank Esmonde bade farewell to his home, and proceeded to join his regiment. How he parted from poor Kate Neville no third person ever knew, but it must have been a sad leave-taking. Six years afterwards old Mr. Esmonde died, leaving Frank his sole heir. The latter, who had risen to the rank of captain, sold his commission and returned to his native home. On his arrival at the neighbouring town, he bade his servant drive off to Esmonde Hall to notify his coming, and said, as the evening was fine, that he would walk home. In doing so he took the path that led through the ancient and beautiful churchyard of Temple-Darren. As he passed through this solitary abode of the dead, a new and handsome tombstone caught his eye, and feeling a natural curiosity to ascertain who it was that had been stricken down during his absence, he turned aside to read the inscription. To his grief and horror he found it was "to the memory of Catherine Neville, who departed this life at the early age of eighteen years," just one twelvemonth after he had left home. It is scarcely necessary to say what followed. Finally, poor Frank left Esmonde Hall, came to reside in town, and has since lived, as I have said, the lonely life of a confirmed bachelor.

THE GRIEVANCE PAPERS.

CHAPTER VI.

TREATS OF DINING IN GENERAL, AND OF MY FIRST DINNER PARTY IN PARTICULAR, TOGETHER WITH MRS. SQUEEZER'S ATROCIOUS CONDUCT TOWARDS ME ON THAT OCCASION.

IN my last paper I told you, courteous reader, as perchance you may remember, something of my preparations for my first dinner party. Having, as I fondly hoped, propitiated Mrs. Squeezer, and the services of Mrs. Grigg and her handy young girl having been secured for the important event, I began to feel somewhat more at ease, and to look forward with considerable satisfaction to the day when I should receive my friends at my own table. A good dinner, I take it, is one of the greatest enjoyments of life. Of course, I don't mean the "mere muzzling and the guzzling" part of it, as an eminent authority has described it. An intellectual and educated man may, indeed, enjoy his dinner, that is, the mere animal part of it, to a certain extent, but he can never be wholly taken up with it, or look upon it as a "something" which he can anxiously desiderate for its own sake alone. It is all very well for old Brown, for example, to place his "sumum bonum" in a piece of green, greasy turtle, and no one is astonished to find the old animal "living to dine," as one may say, that is, living in the anticipation of the dinner to come, in enjoyment of the dinner which has come, and in delicious contemplation of the dinner which has just passed away. But I trust that none of the readers of this paper will so far misunderstand me as for a moment to suppose that I mean any such mere animal enjoyment as this, when I lay down the proposition, that a good dinner is one of the greatest enjoyments of life. On the other hand, I don't mean to pretend that the mere eating and drinking part of it, the animal part if you will, for we won't quarrel about words, is to be altogether despised; for, no matter how pleasant the party may be, or how entertaining the guests whom you meet, I say and maintain that you cannot properly appreciate their merits, as you are certainly in no frame of mind to listen with a complacent ear to their conversation, if the mutton be raw, the potatoes like cannon balls, and the wine sour. When, therefore, I speak of a good dinner being a real enjoyment, I take it for granted that the viands provided for one's consumption are selected with good taste, and are well cooked, and this being the case, if the guests invited to meet you are fellows of your own humour and inclination, fellows whom you know, and knowing, love, and in whose company you find that real enjoyment which is certain to follow when kindred spirits meet, then, I hold that a good dinner, a dinner in this acceptation of the term, is one of the greatest enjoyments of this state of things in which we find ourselves placed. Society is our native element. We are made for society, and being made for society, we are bound to do our best to render society what it really ought to be.

"Man is society is like a flower
Blown in its native bed. 'Tis there alone
His faculties, expanded in full bloom,
Shine out—there only reach their proper use."

The mutton and the game, etc., are, of course, in my estimation merely the conditions for this expansion and full bloom of the faculties referred to by the poet whose lines I have just quoted, and, therefore, must always hold the second place; but, as I have already said, they are not to be overlooked, inasmuch as they are conditions for ensuring that expansion of soul which is the essence of true enjoyment, and which constitutes the charm of society. I won't condescend to dignify old Brown's performances with the name of "dining." "Feeding" is the only word which properly expresses his manner of sacrificing at the shrine of gastronomy. Then, again, there are many dinners which I should be very sorry to consider as among the greatest enjoyments of a rational being. I am afraid there is but too much truth in the following lines:—

"Society is now one polish'd hord, Form'd of two mighty tribes—the bores and bor'd."

I am sure I should be very sorry to consider the dinner which I sometimes eat at Mr. Straitlace's as an enjoyment, in any sense of the word. Every body seems to hate every body else, and to wonder what can have induced Mr. Straitlace to invite them to meet such very low people. I have been stared at through quizzing glasses by fat old dowagers, and sniggered at by scraggy old spinsters of the last generation, until I have sworn that I will never enter Straitlace's house again. What matter does it make to me, if a fat old lady, who stares at me through her glass till I am covered with blushes like a full-blown peony, have a handle to her name, and be called the dowager Lady Standoff or not? Or, what consolation is it to me, that the lean old creature who is sniggering at me, is the honourable somebody or other, who despises me from the very bottom of her honourable old soul? I assert most emphatically that there is no enjoyment in sitting down to dinner with such creatures as these, no matter how dainty the viands on which you dine may be, or how well cooked. But what I simply want is, a good plain joint well cooked, and put me down to this, with half a dozen fellows whom I know and love, fellows whom I can understand and appreciate, as they in their turn understand and appreciate me, and I say that I am in for a real pleasant evening, an evening to which I can look back and say,

"Though few the days, the happy evenings few,
So warm with heart, so rich with mind they flew,
That my full soul forgot its wish to roam,
And rested there, as in a dream at home!"

And a dinner of this kind is, I fearlessly affirm, among the greatest social enjoyments of our existence. It was to an evening of this kind that I fondly looked forward, when I invited Jones, Jenkins, and Scroggins to dine with me, at 4 P.M., and I invited them purposely for 4 P.M., in order that we might have a real long evening of it. Oh! could I have foreseen how my hopes were doomed to be blasted, I should have paused ere I issued my invitations; but I will not anticipate.

As the day for my party gradually approached, I need scarcely say, I suppose, that my anxiety for its success increased proportionately. I did all that prudence suggested. I purchased the tenderest leg of mutton and the plumpest grouse on which I could lay my hand. I laid in my stock of wines, small perhaps, but still choice and select. I endeavoured still further to propitiate Mrs. Squeezer by the present of sundry little dainties of which I knew that she was fond. I questioned her more than once in regard to Mrs. Grigg's sobriety and capabilities, and still I could not help feeling very anxious. Mrs. Squeezer seemed all complacency, but I had a dread of some hidden treachery or other, which, do what I would, I could not shake off.

The night before the eventful day on which my dinner was to come off, was, so far as I was concerned, I may safely say, a sleepless one. I arose nervous and unrefreshed. As I was making my way down stairs to breakfast, I met Mrs. Squeezer. She bade me "Good morning," and smiled benignantly as she did so. Under ordinary circumstances, such a smile should have been a good omen, but at the very moment, some inopportune quotation to the effect, "that a man may smile, and smile, and be a villain," rushed into my mind, and again my equanimity was overthrown. I enquired whether Mrs. Grigg and the handy young woman had made their appearance, and, receiving an answer in the negative, requested that when they did so, they might be shown up to my room.

I was a great deal too anxious to eat my breakfast. Anxiety is a great destroyer of one's appetite, and on this eventful morning mine was completely gone. I swallowed a cup of tea, and trifled with an egg or two, and had just peevishly pushed the tea apparatus away, when there came a loud single knock at the hall-door. I heard Mrs. Squeezer proceed to open it, and this operation had no sooner been performed than, from the noise of tongues which immediately made its way up to my room, I concluded that Mrs. Grigg and the handy young woman had arrived. I was right, for in a few minutes there came a knock at my door, and the parties in question were ushered into my apartment by Mrs. Squeezer.

Perhaps I am peculiarly subject to first impressions, but be that as it may, I no sooner saw Mrs. Grigg than I conceived a violent antipathy towards her. For a person who had taken a solemn pledge, and who, rather than violate that pledge, had fallen down in a faint before Judge Bagwig's kitchen fire, I must say that Mrs.

Grigg's countenance presented a highly inflamed and cutaneous appearance. Having Mrs. Squeezer's solemn word as to the temperate habits of the lady before me, I was, of course, bound to ascribe these peculiar appearances to dyspeptic causes; but, nevertheless, my heart sunk within me, and I began to feel very uneasy, and much less confident about the success of my dinner. Moreover, there was a glassy, or "fishy" look in Mrs. Grigg's eye, which I didn't at all like, and when she entered my room, she was accompanied by an odour, which in another I should have ascribed to whiskey, but which in Mrs. Grigg's case I was bound to set down to peppermint. I have nothing to say about the handy young woman, except that she was a copy of her mother, done a little younger, and a little less red in the face. Her clothes, which were evidently her best, presented that appearance which is familiarly described as having been thrown on with a pitchfork. Such were my first impressions of the two interesting females in whose hands the fate of my dinner rested; and, dear reader, you will not be surprised when I say that I shuddered for the result. I am, as I have already had occasion to mention, of a highly nervous temperament, and I was so overcome by the sight of Mrs. Grigg and her handy daughter, that for a moment or so I was perfectly unable to speak.

"The cook, your honour," ejaculated Mrs. Grigg, in a remarkably husky voice, at the same time going through some extraordinary performance, which, I have little doubt, that in her own mind she designated as "dropping a curtsy."

"Oh! indeed," I stammered out. "Yes, to be sure. You are the person, I suppose, whom Mrs. Squeezer has recommended to me. My dinner," I went on, driven almost to desperation, "is a very plain and simple one, and I suppose you feel yourself perfectly competent to undertake to cook it? But I wish you to understand that I am very particular about it, and if you feel any doubt about it, I should wish you to say so at once, as your wages for the day are a much smaller consideration with me than the spoiling of my dinner."

Mrs. Grigg eyed me reproachfully for a second or two out of her fishy eye, before she answered; but when she did begin to speak, I was perfectly overwhelmed by the torrent which she poured upon me. Not cook my little dinner indeed! Why, she had been head cook to Judge Bagwig for so many years, and Mrs. Bagwig had never doubted her power, or found fault with the result of her cookery, and not cook a leg of mutton and a brace of grouse indeed! And Mrs. Grigg fairly laughed at the idea.

What could I do? I resigned myself to fate, that is, to the fact that was personified by Mrs. Grigg, and desired Mrs. Squeezer to conduct her to the kitchen, and put her in possession of the eatables, which were to be served up steaming hot at four P.M. The handy young woman was to assist her amiable parent in the kitchen until two o'clock, at which hour she was to come and lay the cloth in my sitting-room, Mrs. Squeezer sending up in the mean time her plate, linen, and glass, as per agreement.

These preliminaries having been thus far arranged, I endeavoured (but I didn't succeed) to feel at ease, and went out into the city to purchase a few matters which I required for the evening.

I returned about half-past one, and found Mrs. Squeezer's plate, linen, and glass all ready in my room. Mrs. Squeezer had made so much talk about her plate-basket, that, considering also that I was to give a consideration for its use, I must say that I did expect that it would have contained something more than two horrible-looking, battered, old monstrosities which she dignified with the name of "gravys," and three or four still more battered-looking forks. I rang my bell in a fury, and up came Mrs. Squeezer, as cool as ever. What could I expect, she demanded, from a poor widow, or what use had she in her lonely way of life for a large supply of plate? When they were in Rutland-square, indeed—I didn't wait to hear the conclusion of the sentence, but rushing out at once, purchased half a dozen spoons, and the same number of forks, of some article which is called nickel plate, I believe, and which is warranted to look as well as real silver.

When I returned I considered it quite time to have the cloth laid, and for this purpose I rang for the handy young woman. As she ascended the stairs from the lower regions of the house, I heard her making a horrible snorting kind of a noise, from which I concluded that she was either very short of breath, or that her education had been very considerably neglected, which latter supposition I am inclined to believe was the more correct. She made her appearance, looking a great deal dirtier and more untidy than she had even done in the morning, and I confess that I felt considerable shyness in bringing her out before my guests, especially before Jones, who has a foolish and absurd habit of turning every thing into ridicule. However, there was no help for it now, and so I civilly requested her to lay the cloth. It is my firm belief that this handy young woman had never before laid a cloth in her life, for anything more utterly imbecile and impotent than her efforts to do so, I never witnessed. Her notions of laying a cloth seemed to be very simple. Spread the cloth on the table, any way, no matter how, and then pitch on the knives, forks, spoons, etc., all in a heap, and leave every body to take what he may require; but as to arranging the various articles in that beautiful order which constitutes a well-laid table, I am certain that I do this young woman no injury when I say that she had no more idea of any such proceeding than I have of taking a journey to the moon in an air balloon. I looked on for a few moments, in speechless horror, at her futile efforts, and then, when I could find my speech, I told her that she might leave the room, and that I would settle everything myself; an intimation which, probably on account of her mental perceptions being somewhat dull and feeble, seemed to give her great satisfaction, but no pain, as it might have done to a better-regulated mind than the one possessed by this poor creature, whom Mrs. Squeezer had described to me as a handy young woman. (I hadn't dived into Mrs. Squeezer's motives then, but I know them now.) She hadn't been gone ten minutes before she returned with an intimation that mother wanted the whiskey for the pudding sauce. Now, I reasonably considered that this was coming to me rather strong, as the pudding was to be sent from the confectioner's, and Mrs. Grigg fortunately had nothing to do with it. I objected as much to the young person, who immediately put in an "instabiz," (and I must admit that she was much readier with the use of her tongue than her hands,) to the effect that, although the pudding was certainly to come from the confectioner's, still the sauce wasn't, as that must be manufactured on the premises. I felt that I was being "done," but I was helpless. I felt that I was utterly helpless, and I at once gave five large glasses of whiskey to this young woman, who unblushingly affirmed that that quantity was absolutely necessary for the preparation of the sauce. I then laid the cloth myself, as well as I was able, and I flatter myself that I really did it with considerable neatness and skill; and I then spent at least half an hour in walking round the table, making various little changes as my taste suggested, and surveying the general appearance of the arrangements; and I must say that my new plate made the table look very nice and pretty, and my spirits, which had been considerably depressed during the morning, began to regain their wonted elasticity.

About half past three, and just when I was beginning to expect the arrival of my guests, I heard a rap at my door, and Mrs. Squeezer made her appearance. I knew at once, from the cool malice of her features (and I must say that her features do seem peculiarly adapted for malicious expression), that something was wrong. There was no outburst of vindictive triumph, no loud words or victorious gestures, but there was a quiet malice, a consciousness of superiority, an assumption of victory, which made my blood run cold. She spoke in a cold and measured tone, eyeing me sternly and reproachfully the while, and the words she uttered were as follows:—

"Mr. Incog," said she, "I think it might be as well if you went down to the kitchen and looked after your cook," laying a vicious emphasis on the word your, "the abandoned and disgusting creature," she actually went on to say, "whom you have introduced under this hitherto pure and unpolluted roof."

Oh, the hypocrite! my cook indeed, whom I had introduced under her roof, as if I had had a word to say in the matter. If Mrs. Squeezer had been a gentleman I should have done my best to knock her down; as it was, I cast upon her one look of unutterable contempt, and rushed madly down to the kitchen.

My worst fears were realized. The handy young woman was nowhere to be seen. The leg of mutton was all in a blaze, for the spit having no one to turn it, had naturally enough come to a stand still, and in an old arm chair in front of the fire, sat Mrs. Grigg in a state of beastly intoxication. When I entered the room she stared at me vacantly out of her fishy eyes, and her head wobbled helplessly from side to side. At her feet lay the vessel which had contained the five glasses of whiskey for the sauce, empty, of course I need not say empty, still less need I say what had become of the liquor. Will you be scandalised, sympathising reader, if I confess that I did lose my temper and break out into angry exclamations?

"Get out, you nasty, drunken beast," I roared in my passion. Mrs. Grigg made a feeble effort to answer, but although her lips moved, I could only hear some inarticulate sounds, which seemed to be, "Get out yourself," and "you're another;" but I was in too great a rage to pay any attention to her. I don't know what I might have done if the handy young woman had not happened to enter the kitchen at this juncture. When she saw the state in which her unfortunate parent was, she burst into tears, I must say, and began to stammer out some apology, and in deference to her feelings I tried to restrain my indignation as well as I was able. Fortunately the dinner was nearly cooked, and as the young woman assured me that she could serve it up, if I would only allow her, I determined to make the best of a bad job. We managed to hustle the unfortunate Mrs. Grigg into the back scullery, in order that she might be out of the way, Mrs. Squeezer, who had followed me down to the kitchen, looking on with her severest expression of face, and groaning fearfully all the time. I closed the door of the scullery upon Mrs. Grigg, and left her to sleep off the effects of her potations, the last I heard from her being an ineffectual attempt to retaliate upon me with "you're another, you're another," pronounced in every variety of drunken incapability.

Mrs. Squeezer, after indulging in some of her severest reflections upon the inevitable end of all junkettings and carousals, to which, under the circumstances, I listened without making any reply, undertook to look to the serving up of the dinner, and I ascended to my own room, to await the arrival of my guests, whom I expected every minute.

I couldn't quite make up my mind whether to tell them or not that my cook was hopelessly drunk in the scullery, and so throw myself upon their mercy; or trust to good fortune, and say nothing about it, hoping for the best. I determined to take the latter course, for as I have already said, Jones has such an unfortunate propensity for turning everything into ridicule, that I should never have heard the last of it. I need scarcely say that by this time I began to have very serious misgivings about my dinner, and to wish more than ever, that I had left the whole business alone; but you know, dear reader, when things arrive at a certain crisis, we become more or less desperate; and this I believe was now the case with me.

A loud double knock at the door, and Jones, Jenkins, and Scroggins, make their appearance. They all appeared in the highest spirits, Jones especially, but they at once remarked my disturbed manner, for I have no doubt that I had received them in a way very far from showing any very high exuberance of spirits.

Jones began to rally me immediately. "Look very glum, Incog, old boy; nothing wrong in the kitchen, I hope—rough and ready, you know. Bachelors' party, and no dainties expected, so don't be uneasy. Your table does look very neat to be sure; what did you give for the spoons? How's the amiable Mrs. Squeezer?" and a great deal more to the same effect? "I say," put in Scroggins, "are we going to dine to-day, or to-morrow? And thus reminded, I look at my watch, and find that it is already half-past four, and no sign of the dinner making its appearance. I give a ghastly smile—I didn't see it, but I felt that it was a ghastly smile, and muttering something about my people not being accustomed to parties, and in consequence rather unpunctual, I walked over to the bell, and pulled violently, as a signal for dinner.

I listened anxiously, and after the lapse of a few minutes, I heard the snorting noise, to which I have already alluded, that the young person was addicted, only this time it seemed to proceed from the region of the kitchen stairs; and as it was very much intensified, so to speak, I concluded from these signs that the handy young woman was painfully making her way up stairs with the dinner. The snorts came nearer and nearer, more and more distinct. Jones, who will have his joke, had just asked me whether I kept a tame rhinoceros on the premises, adding that he had a particular dislike to wild beasts, and I was just walking over to open the door, concluding, from the distinctness of the snorts, that the young person had achieved the journey, when I heard a scream which made my blood run cold, and then there came a crash as if the whole stock in trade of a china shop had been devoted to destruction in one fell swoop. I rushed to the door, and the first object that greeted my sight was the handy young woman, flat on her face, buried, literally buried, I may say, in one universal ruin of plates, dishes, tureens, glasses, game and vegetables. I don't include the leg of mutton

~~s.c. that~~ was trundling, flop, flop, flop, down the stairs towards the back kitchen as hard as it could go, accompanied by several dozens of potatoes, and the soup tureen. My first impulse (which I didn't follow) was to raise the handy young woman, who had made a mess of it this time, and no mistake, from amid the ruins by which she was surrounded. My second impulse, which I didn't follow either, was to hurl the carving-knife, or some other deadly missile at Mrs. Squeezer, who was screaming fearfully on the first landing. The impulse which I did follow, was to seize a fork, and rush after the leg of mutton, if, perchance, I might arrest its progress before it finally reached the back kitchen. I succeeded just as it had arrived at the last step, and sticking my fork into it, raised my eyes in time to see Mrs. Squeezer's cat making off with the grouse, on which I have no doubt he made a hearty meal.

When I got back to my room, with the leg of mutton in my hand, I found the handy young woman sitting on my sofa, surrounded by Jones, Jenkins, and Scroggins. I confess that my first impulse on beholding her was to assault her with the leg of mutton, which I still held on the fork. However, this, I am happy to inform you, courteous reader, was but a momentary feeling, which was immediately followed by better and more generous sentiments. I saw at once that she was in pain, and found that she had sprained her ankle badly; but amid her moans, she every now and then indulged in fierce and vindictive denunciations of the author of all the mischief, which, to my unspeakable indignation I found to be no other than Mrs. Squeezer's filthy, odious, and abominable cat!!! That beast was born to be the bane of my life and the curse of my existence; but if I am not even with him yet, I will know the reason of it. The young woman affirmed, with many moans of pain, on account of her sprained ankle, and with many piteous looks at me, that she had made her way up stairs with the dinner, when, just as she was entering my little ante-room, that diabolical cat made his appearance, and after glaring at her till she was all of a tremble—so she expressed it—suddenly charged ferociously at her like a tiger, threw her down, and then made off. My own impression is, that the handy young woman, not wishing to make more journeys than were absolutely necessary, had loaded the tray to the utmost limits of repletion, and her centre of gravity being thus somewhat disturbed, a very little matter would necessarily be sufficient to destroy her equilibrium altogether. Making her way up stairs in this critical position, I have no doubt that she suddenly came upon Mrs. Squeezer's cat, who, according to his wont, was prowling about in search of prey, directed, doubtless, by his instincts to the vicinity of my room. Coming thus suddenly upon the ferocious brute, no wonder if the young person's nerves were somewhat startled. He too, in his turn, was probably taken by surprise, and making a vigorous rush to escape, no doubt he came into violent collision with the young person, and with quite sufficient force to destroy her equilibrium, already so much disturbed by the great weight of the dinner tray, and hence the cause of the catastrophe. Such is my own view of the accident; but it is a matter of no moment; the mischief was done, and was irreparable; and I must beg to be allowed to drop a veil over the painful scene. I will say nothing of the jokes and witticisms of Jones on the occasion; I will say nothing of the sum which I paid for dinner at the hotel to which I was obliged to conduct my guests; I will say nothing of the sum which I had to pay for broken glass, china, and crockery ware; I will say nothing of a bill of thirty-five shillings, for attending to the handy young woman's sprained ankle, which the Doctor sent to me, with a polite note that as the young person had received the injury in my service, and as she was totally unable to discharge the debt, he trusted I was too much of a gentleman to see him lose it. I will say nothing of my altercations with Mrs. Squeezer, on the subject of one of her battered old "gravys," which she affirmed was nowhere to be found, and for which she held me responsible, as well as for the damage done to her stairs from the soup, and gravy which had been spilled; I will restrain myself, and say nothing of these matters; but there is one thing which I must say, and which I will say, and it is this, viz: that I am certain that Mrs. Squeezer was the real author and concoctor of the whole mischief. Finding that I was determined to have my dinner party in spite of her opposition, she appeared to give in, and craftily managed to place me and my dinner in the hands of Mrs. Grigg and the handy young woman, rightly enough judging, that the result would be such as effectually to restrain me from ever attempting to repeat the experiment. The whole truth flashed across my mind like lightning, (but unfortunately it was after the damage was done,) and once again I was obliged to sit down and confess that, in very truth, I had been taken in and done for. And yet, to see and hear Mrs. Squeezer on the morning after this lamentable affair! Her house had been polluted, and her good name seriously endangered, by the remarks made by the crowd, who had assembled to witness the removal of Mrs. Grigg, still hopelessly drunk, and her daughter, to their own abode. Never since the death of the dear departed had she so felt her own sad, lonely, and helpless position. When I, naturally enough, begged to remind her that Mrs. Grigg and the young person, had been engaged on her own strong recommendation, she ignored the whole proceeding, and somehow,—I can't possibly tell how she did it, but she did it,—laid the whole blame upon my shoulders, and made me feel as if I really had been the culprit in the business.

But for the present I must pause. If Mrs. Squeezer's mode of acting towards me does not constitute "a real grievance," I shall be very much obliged if the intelligent readers of the "Illustrated Dublin Journal" will inform me of anything which can, in truth, be considered such.

INCOG.

THE SONG OF LIFE.

My fairest child, I have no song to give you,
No lark could pipe to skies so dull and grey;
Yet ere we part, one lesson I can leave you
For every day.

Be good, sweet maid, and let who will be clever;
Do noble things, not dream them all day long;
And so make life, death, and that vast for ever
One grand, sweet song. C. K.

FAVERSHAM ON HIS WAY TO FAME.

BY BLANCHARD JERROLD.

CHAPTER I.

QUIETLY enough the tide of life appears to ebb and flow. Seen from afar, judged by its surface, it scarce shows a ripple. To few of us, indeed, does life present itself as exhibited in story-books, even in the story-books of great and notable parentage. It shows not often the terrible plots we read of. The deserving do not always get the fortune to the utter discomfiture of the wicked. The sugar-plums fall often into the dirtiest of hands. Carelessly looked at, the scheme of the world has all the features of a game of hazard, a game in which knowledge is of little use, and where fortune follows the turn of the dice—of dice, too, not seldom loaded. Yet in little circles nearly seen, every man who makes notes as he passes on his way, traces curious intricacies; wonderful turns of luck; disappointed men; girls crossed in love, (who seldom remain old maids, I have noticed)—thriftless, idle boys, who are the plague of the “governor” for many years; occasional runaway marriages; happily, rare tragedies. All these materials exist abundantly; yet they generally refuse to adapt themselves easily to the span of story-books.

Unhappily, the lover does not always return from abroad—

(laden with gold)—at the exact moment, to prevent the forced marriage of his mistress with another, and to rescue her father from impending bankruptcy; the rake does not always reform; the rigid old father does not always soften at the right moment. The troubled lovers, who have fought hard through all difficulties to the altar, do not in every instance live afterwards, to end in domestic harmony. I am certain that even in the very quiet suburbs of London, these happy issues do not prevail.

Here disasters have been known to afflict permanently the eminently pious; and wretchedly dissipated young fellows have dashed down the quiet groves, and past the serene places and terraces of these placid neighbourhoods, in dog-carts, with pockets full of money, and little or no care at the heart. And, to the end of their days, these wild men have ridden in dog-carts, and halloosed to gentlemen (who went three times to church on Sundays) to get from under their wheels.

But the life-tide—placid as its bosom looks, seen from afar—has its ripples. If these ripples do not flow always within the circle of three volumes, it may be that they are subject to higher rules than those to which the novelist sometimes seeks to confine them. Perhaps, therefore, if the scenes about to be opened be not parted into a first volume of introduction; a second volume of mystery; and a third volume of explanations, ending with a general jingling of marriage-bells, the reader may be pleased to believe that the painter thereof has endeavoured to see life without attempting to pencil out its incidents and its passions into a given number of pages and volumes.

Quiet neighbourhoods have already been touched upon.

Now, it was a quiet neighbourhood where the Ashbys lived. During the day a man was seldom seen thereabouts. All the male inhabitants were in that mysterious city—transacting that mysterious business. The groves and terraces were, during this time, in the undisturbed possession of ladies, chiefly of a serious turn of mind. Decidedly the neighbourhood was serious—quiet. I am certain that young Faversham—as he walked with his friend Jack Ashby, to see the parent Ashbys, turned many contrasts of the tide of life over in his mind.

Faversham was a very lively fellow in chambers, when he had eight or nine young fellow-students with him; when his pipe was in his mouth, and there was a good supply of whiskey upon the table; because then, life was surging about him. His friends were telling lively anecdotes—saying clever things possibly—and there was elegance in the tone of the general conversation; an elegance to which it is just to add he was an important contributor. But Faversham was usually grave and listless when alone; or when, as he expressed it, “nothing was going on.” He loved the world—all human associations; every thing bearing upon human life. For the country he had little relish. He never longed for a sight of green trees—never pined for the salt breeze; never thought of the glories of the mountain, or the quiet, melting, sweetness of the valley. He was a London bird essentially, and loved every haunt where he had met a friend, or spent a merry evening. He knew hundreds of the gay young fellows about town—because he habitually courted society; and was never willingly alone. He contracted new friendships every week of his life; and made few, if any, enemies. Yet alone—or alone with an intimate friend, whose opinions on every conceivable subject he knew thoroughly; whose jokes he had laughed at, and who had laughed at all his—alone with this friend, he was usually serious, even melancholy. Some sentiment—some stirring point of human life was necessary to rouse him, and he would then draw his sympathies to its brighter or kinder side, with a touching love.

The two friends were very wide apart in feeling and opinion; yet they liked one another extremely, and were always together, sharing the same rooms in the Temple.

We have come up with them on their way to Jamaica Lodge, to enjoy a quiet evening. Young Mr. Ashby was accustomed to describe this suburban retreat as “the private crib of the governor.” The old gentleman was a merchant, of Wood-street, Cheapside.

The two young men had been out very late for three or four consecutive nights; had talked, over whiskey and tobacco, for seven hours, on the relative merits of the two great contemporary novelists; and had arrived at the conclusion, if the whole truth must out, that neither of the celebrities in question had written any fiction approaching in pathos, in wit, or in abundance of imagery, the work upon which their friend Lumberly was engaged. A discussion of this nature had naturally exhausted them; and they were both “seedy”—that is, in a re-actionary state. Hence, young Ashby's consent to visit Jamaica Lodge. Here there would be no tobacco, no staying up till three in the morning; here they would be chained down by the strict laws of suburban respectability, and would be continually reminded that they were in a serious neighbourhood. Faversham, although not fond of quiet evenings, liked the Ashbys: he admired their hospitality and respected their scruples—although these bored him a little. He was, in return, always welcomed at the Lodge, and exhibited to Jack Ashby as a serious gentleman whose friendship he should cultivate, and whose excellent example he should follow. Jack Ashby did both, for he borrowed Faversham's money, and sat up with him till the day dawned.

The Ashbys were really a serious family. Their principles and practices were not Faversham's, yet he discovered many points of sympathy with the Ashbys; but he could not long support a conversation with old Ashby, who gossiped only about the rise or fall in consols, the value of certain foreign securities, the probabilities for and against a dividend out of the bankrupt firm of Tuppence and Co.; and his reasons for believing that the South Carolina shares would hold at their premium. Some very sarcastic young gentlemen summed the old gentleman up, by declaring that the only things that could reconcile any man of taste to Ashby's conversation, were his wines and his cigars. In fact, Jack Ashby was the first man to allow that his father was “a bore;” but he generally added, good naturedly, that he was a good fellow, and he hoped his friends would be civil to him. This civility was readily promised; and when Jack took his friends to Jamaica Lodge, they paid great attention to the old gentleman's claret, and some attention to the old gentleman. Faversham, however, while wishing to distinguish himself for politeness, was the worst-behaved of the set. Half an hour after the ladies had left the dinner-table he was invariably asleep; and old Ashby was left in the middle of a long story about that frightful fall in Barbadoes Stock, in the year 'forty-nine, Jack Ashby kindly pelted his friend with walnut-shells to avert the catastrophe, but in vain. The old gentleman always left the room stiffly, to join the ladies, bidding his son, in a stern voice, wake that young man! To call a man a “young man,” was, in Mr. Ashby's estimation, to wither him with a severe reproof.

The ladies of the Ashby establishment included Mrs. Ashby, Miss Ashby, and Miss Victoria Ashby. To this circle it is necessary to add a local nuisance called Master Walter Ashby.

Mrs. Ashby was a tall, prim lady, obviously fond of dress, not a determined enemy to the pleasures of the table, yet prim in many things. It was difficult to know what you might do and what you might not do in Mrs. Ashby's house. You were not certain in the matter of whistling; you wondered whether they danced; you had seen Master Walter with a dirty heap of dominoes, but you decidedly would not be the first to mention cards as a rational or even possible amusement. With the tall hostess you might occasionally be very sociable and cheerful for half an hour, but, suddenly, she would freeze you, trotting you off into the valley of death at a brisk pace. But then, she had a daughter who was exemplary in every respect; who seldom smiled, and never laughed; who had a confirmed antipathy for young men. She was really the pattern of a young lady, like those patterns of young ladies we cut in paper for our children. Her mamma found her a blessing daily. She was always doing good. Every body in the house, except Miss Ashby, called her brother Jack; Miss Ashby called him emphatically, John. This perfect young lady always kept her clear, blue eyes on her mother whenever any of John's friends were in the house. It is possible that the sudden changes in Mrs. Ashby's manner were traceable to this eye-guardianship—for Miss Ashby often wondered how her mamma could “go on so.” And Mrs. Ashby really appeared to wonder herself, and to be astonished at her wickedness—that she did “go on so.”

Faversham, with his sly habit of adapting himself, managed to be a favourite even with Miss Ashby. She disliked all John's friends, except Faversham. He thoroughly humoured her. He chimed in with her pretty little songs. He even honoured her seriousness, and liked her principles “in the abstract,” perhaps, because she had a pretty face of her own, in fact. Faversham used to say she was a pretty girl, iced. She wanted, he said, warmth—stronger human sympathies—some kind of human toleration.

He would have liked to see a tear, just once, suffuse those cold, blue eyes. Those lips, in his opinion, should have been puckered occasionally to kiss children. But no tear ever started; the lips were never puckered for a kiss. Miss Ashby had more important objects in view than the pleasure of kissing children. Indeed, so important were these objects, that every movement in Jamaica Lodge was subservient to hers.

On the occasion to which reference has already been made, the two Temple students found the Ashby family in a state of most respectable dullness. Not the most fastidious old lady could have found fault with their proceedings. Mrs. Ashby was trimming something; Mr. Ashby was reading the “Pilgrim's Progress” to her; Miss Ashby was balancing the accounts of a school-room Building Fund to which she was secretary and treasurer; Master Walter (the genius of the family) was painting a battle-piece from the “Illustrated London News;” and Miss Victoria was laughing in a corner, with her back turned to her sister, over a volume of “Cruikshank's Omnibus”—the wicked creature! When the two young men entered, a general stir took place; a stir that reminded Faversham, he said afterwards, of the flutter occasioned by peeping into a bird's nest in spring time. Jack Ashby launched jauntily into the circle, joked his perfect sister about her accounts, begged that the governor would shut up the “Pilgrim's Progress,” admired the scarlet tints his brother had handsomely thrown about the horses, in his picture, and told his mother to put away her work. It was remarked by the general circle that Jack looked pale. “Pale!” said Jack. “Tut! that's odd. I'm brisk enough; we have walked all the way from town.”

Faversham was very quiet: hoped that he had not disturbed Miss Ashby at her excellent employment: wished he knew somebody who wanted something done for him, that he might do that something, and so imitate Miss Ashby's example in an humble way. Jack laughed in his sleeve at Faversham's serious conversation; and never forgot to joke him about it when they were mixing in bachelor life together. But Faversham always vehemently asserted his sincerity—for he hated a hypocrite; and protested that he really admired, although he was not strong enough to imitate, the life at Jamaica Lodge.

Mr. Ashby entirely agreed with his young friend, and hoped Jack would profit by sentiments so excellent.

"I!" said Jack, jumping up from the corner of the sofa, where he had been sitting with Victoria, "I didn't hear; I was telling Victoria, Faversham, all about Namby's Burlesque. That was a capital notion, where he made Ariel a running patterer. Do you remember any of the jokes?"

Faversham said gravely "Not at the moment."

"But wasn't the girl who sang that splendid parody on 'Drops of Brandy,' wonderfully like Araminta?"

Faversham reddened—but had nothing to say, poor fellow.

Miss Ashby said, with a look cold, even for her:—"We didn't understand you, John—you are not in the Temple now."

"Come, come," Mr. Ashby interposed, "drop your burlesques and actresses here, Jack. You must have enough talk on those subjects, unfortunately, in town. You know we never go to theatres, and that we are very unhappy—very unhappy to hear that you habitually visit those resorts. Hem! Mr. Faversham, do you take port or sherry?"

"Port, thank you."

"Your very good health, sir. Very unhappy—Jack. I think you will find that this is not a bad glass of wine."

"But pray, Miss Ashby, don't let us disturb you at your work. Can I assist you? You were ruling these account books with red ink. I think I'm a very good hand at the sort of work. Allow me." And in a few minutes Faversham was hard at work.

Old Ashby looked on at the excellent young man; Mrs. Ashby was sure that it was too bad to trouble Mr. Faversham, and so was Miss Ashby; but Mr. Faversham was so obliging as to insist upon troubling himself.

"Capital!" said Jack, looking over his friend's shoulder, "you were born for the work, Araminta!"

Araminta's eyes never rose from the mass of figures she was twisting into the desired result.

Jack sauntered back, naturally, to his seat near Victoria. Old Ashby threw a glowing bandanna over his white head; intertwined his hands over his rotund torso, and twirling his two thumbs rapidly round one another, began, in his capacity of bear, to dream of happy disasters in the future. Mr. Ashby played with Master Walter, while Jack, in a corner, examined Victoria on the probabilities of collecting a good supper from the late repasts of the family. In this quiet way time crept on to the supper hour. Master Walter, when this happy period had arrived, sprang from his place under the table, to summon the maid, striking himself violently against an edge of Mrs. Ashby's arm-chair, by the way.

"Oh!" screamed the Ashby pet, "I have hurt my 'ead!"

"So I hear," murmured Faversham, glancing from his work, "you seem to have knocked the 'h' off it."

And amid the noisy merriment of Jack and his sister Victoria, "the tray" was brought in.

As the two young men walked home (having rubbed their fuses vigorously against the railings of Jamaica Lodge, to light their first cigar), Jack offered his apologies to his friend for the slowness of the evening. Faversham was bent upon seeking an early bed, with the hope of accomplishing a hard day's work on the morrow, (no man had better intentions than Faversham): but unfortunately, as they walked down one of the narrow Temple courts, Jack saw a bright light at a window high above them.

"There's something up at Namby's;—let us go up—just for half an hour."

"Not to-night," Faversham replied, doggedly, "I must be at work to-morrow."

"And so must I," shouted a young fellow who, at the moment, darted from an opposite court, with a bundle of pipes and a packet of tobacco in his hand. "Come along! young Clifton is up stairs, he wants to be introduced to you. I drew him a caricature of you just now; and he said, if it were anything like you, you must be a damned good-looking fellow: but he objects to fair men. I told him he would be horribly disappointed when he saw you."

Thus Faversham's good intentions were frustrated; and in a few minutes he was in Namby's chambers. He found three or four young fellows smoking. A heap of law books having been thrown out of an old arm-chair upon the floor, to accommodate Faversham; the men settled down for a night's entertainment. Namby had a talent for caricature; and had been amusing his guests with ludicrous portraits of mutual friends. The new comers found that they had not escaped, and the caricature of Faversham was, perhaps, the cleverest specimen of the artist's skill upon the table. The breadth of Faversham's forehead had been exaggerated; his curious nose—a nose that baffles all description, being at once contrary to the law of beauty in nasology—yet, manly in its solidity, and pleasing in its combination with the rest of the features, this nose had been badly treated, its defects having been exposed, while its resemblance to life had been ingeniously maintained; the caricatured mouth was true to its owner's haughty expression, curling down at the corners. The eyes, lively, without being restless. Faversham, of course, wore a moustache, and ladies may wish to know that it was light—two or three shades lighter than the warm brown hair that hung in rich glistening clumps over his forehead. He was not tall; he was a dandy. There was no man in the Temple, not even the Honourable John Stackington, (and he was a great "swell") who wore boots better made than those which covered the feet of Mr. Faversham. Stackington openly gave up the greater part of his time to dress; but Faversham, without obtruding his weakness for a good tailor and bootmaker, contrived to be a dandy without being a coxcomb. And in this dandyism he presented a strange contrast to the four or five young fellows into whose company he was thrust. He knew them all with the exception of Clifton; and he told this gentleman politely that he had long known him by reputation. Mr. Clifton said that he should have recognised Mr. Faversham anywhere after having seen Namby's caricature of him, though it was a shameful libel.

"But you have never seen me in boots like these," said Faversham, a little petulantly to Namby, pointing to the drawing.

"Perhaps not, but this is like Jack." The caricature was handed round.

It was like Jack. That absurd grin of his, those thick dry lips, that fat, chubby cheek; those glistening good-natured eyes, and that well-pomatumed hair, packed closely over the forehead, and bending into a curl upon each cheek. This head was the capital to a bright blue cravat, ornamented with an oxidised silver death's head. The adjoining anatomy of the gentleman was covered by a very brilliant waistcoat, relieved by a chain, upon which the wearer sported silver and gold monkeys, greyhounds, horse-shoes, opera-glasses—all made on a scale to ensure their uselessness and perishableness. All present agreed that Namby had been successful in libelling the future owner of Jamaica Lodge.

"These are capital rooms of yours, Namby," said Faversham, looking round.

"Yes, sir," said Clifton, with great gravity. "Namby, in this very room, composed that remarkable parody of his. You know, Jack, that which goes to the air of 'Drops of Brandy.'"

"Yes," piped Namby. "And to this very lodging my first literary effort was addressed, when it was returned to me with the editor's compliments."

Namby gave out his points in a shrill voice, and with a serious expression which made them tell, even when they did not exhibit that "unparalleled humour," which was attributed to him by the "Evening Paper."

The rooms thus eulogised and honoured, were small and low; and to the eye of the most cheerful visiter, must have been dingy. Apparently, many years had elapsed since the windows had been cleaned: the furniture was old without being antique. The mantelpiece was ornamented with heaps of unanswered letters, interspersed with cards and washing bills. The central ornament was a stand used for the display of blackened dhudeens. Let the reader's imagination add to this list an empty lucifer box, and a substantial old-fashioned corkscrew, and he may realise to himself the fireside of Mr. Namby. Stay, upon one corner lay the first volume of Blackstone's Commentaries, with a play-bill inserted between the fifteenth and sixteenth pages, to guide Mr. Namby to the exact point of legal study, at which, after nine months' application, he had left off. Against the wall opposite the fireplace, Mr. Namby's artistic eye had led him to suspend the portrait of Mrs. Keeley in the character of "Topsy."

This lady was supported on the left by one of Gavarni's "Enfants Terribles," and on the right by a favourite actor representing him; as he appeared in Mr. Namby's most successful burlesque.

Mr. Namby's room boasted the luxury of a bell-rope; and the distinguished tenant paid five shillings weekly for the pleasure of pulling at it. Considering the lady whom this instrument summoned to the lodger's presence, Mr. Namby must have been a very strong-minded man.

Students-at-law (who seldom are at law), and other occupants of those dingy rooms let at heavy rents by the Honourable Societies of the Middle and Inner Temple, painfully enough must you recall in after life, the figures of those extraordinary females who appeared daily in your chambers, to make your bed and lay your breakfast; who woke you up early on so many mornings after you had been "making a night of it," greeting you with unfriendly grunts, and informing you that if the eggs were cold it was not their fault, that was all; who were always sure that your father and mother did not know how you were going on; who bored you with stories of their early experiences; how they had been either dressers to Queen Charlotte, or had nursed the princess at least; and who begged that you would pay your washerwoman's bill, for she had a large family with limited capital. It is only necessary to add that a very fair specimen of this extraordinary class answered Mr. Namby's bell; and on the occasion which has introduced the reader to this gentleman, brought up to his friends a dish of sandwiches and a can of beer. As she entered the room, she expressed her wonder how a set of young men could sit up to such hours and smoke so; and as she deposited the sandwiches upon the sofa, and placed the can of beer near the fire-place, she intimated to the host that she would stay up no longer. Namby replied that this was a question which he left to her discretion. She muttered "there was the beer and sandwiches for him when he liked to offer them;" and then she shuffled out of the room.

Left to themselves for the night, the young men set fairly to work. The sandwiches they ate, the beer, which they greatly enjoyed, they drank from the can; the pipes they smoked; and the whiskey they imbibed, are points of this history into which it becomes us not to inquire too narrowly. Nor need there remain a written record of the opinions these hot-headed fellows expressed upon men and things. How they boldly questioned the genius of the men holding high places, for instance; how, with the temerity natural to their age (and making, perhaps, the glory of it) they lifted one another to seats of honour; and foresaw the time when the heroes of the hour would be forgotten.

Some of these men were of illustrious parentage. Clifton's father was a distinguished critic and biographer; while the father of Mr. Namby was a leading chancery barrister and Q.C. Namby, who was happy at a jovial speech, proposed the health of his distinguished friend Clifton, as a man who would be heard of by the world very shortly; and he said it with every kind of respect for the conspicuous talents of his governor, would far surpass that gentleman in that profession which had been chosen for him. He proposed Mr. Clifton and the Bar.

Mr. Clifton, of course, disclaimed the praise of his friend Namby, as undeserved; and even thought he detected that gentleman's vein of sly sarcasm, under the handsome things he had been pleased to utter concerning himself. Indeed, the weight of praise had embarrassed him. There was one toast, however,—since toasts appeared to be popular that evening, which, with their host's permission ("go ahead, my boy!" from Namby) he would propose. They were honoured on that occasion by the company of a gentleman, who, young as he was, enjoyed a reputation amongst a large circle of friends—a reputation that must shortly be extended, and earn for him that conspicuous place to which his brilliant talents and his happy social qualities fully entitled him. It was obvious to all of them that he alluded to Mr. Faversham. (A loud "hear! hear!" from Mr. Namby; Mr. Faversham examines his boots and looks a little red.) He had met the gentleman for the first time that evening; but he had heard of him frequently before, from their mutual friend Namby, from Ashby and others; in fact, he had heard so much about this gentleman on all sides, that he had said: this Mr. Faversham must be a wonderful fellow, and must have some very good stuff in him. Meet Ashby; drop in upon Namby; take a pipe with Stackington; enter my chambers between White-friars and Essex-Street, in short, and you are certain to hear of that capital fellow, Faversham. He now proposed that gentleman's health.

Faversham was not happy at any speech, but he was a picture of distress at a speech expressing thanks. For the least expression of good will touched him keenly, and made him shy and nervous. All that he could say to his friends,—in reply to Clifton—was, that he was very much obliged to them for their goodnature; and that he could not believe he deserved one tithe of the praise which Mr. Clifton had showered upon his humble head.

A summer sunrise disturbed this party: how it crept into the room: made the candle flame look red and shabby; showed the tobacco-ash lying about the floor; took all the remaining colour out of the faded furniture; and sent a chill through every guest, will be readily understood by those wild gentlemen who have been at revels like this, when the first wink of sunlight flies overhead.

THE OLD FLAG.

(From the French of Beranger.)

COMRADES, the cup we drink to-night
My old heart fills with joy—
With you around me, now again
I feel as when a boy!
When o'er your head and over mine
Our banner waved on high:
With Heaven's aid we'll furl it yet
In glory to the sky!

Here, 'neath my humble pallet laid,
I've guarded it full well;
How dear each tattered string to me
My heart can never tell!
Oh! how it waved for twenty years,
Mid laurels and mid flowers;
Comrades, we'll furl it once again
O'er France's hills and towers!

Well has our flag paid back to France
The blood we freely gave;
The freedom that it gave her sons
Has taught them to be brave.
And yet again oppression dire
Shall pale beneath its sheen;
The torn flag of victory
We'll furl once more I ween!

The glory that our Eagle crowned,
For which we'd gladly die,
It grew too vast, and by its weight
Our flag fell from the sky!
But France, forgetting all her grief,
Will gladly bless the hand
That raises from the dust and furls
Our banner o'er the land!

And as of old our peasants found
Their freedom on the Loire,
A happy race shall ever bless
Our flag—the pride of war!
'Twill throw a veil o'er all our woe,
Grim tyranny shall fly;
Then, comrades, fling in Heaven's name
Our banner to the sky!

And there thou art, my banner brave!
Comrades, I have it here;
Come forth my flag! my only hope!
With thee I'll dry my tear!
Ah! when a soldier cries to Heaven,
Will Heaven not hear his cry?
It will: then, comrades, let us furl
Our banner to the sky!

ENNISCORTHY.

THE principal part of the town of Enniscorthy, including the Castle, with its grey towers, is situated on the side of a steep hill, rising above the river Slaney, county of Wexford. The town itself is built in great irregularity and variety of outline.

It has of late years been extended considerably. The Slaney, which, from Enniscorthy downwards, is a large tidal river, is navigable for barks of considerable tonnage. To facilitate the trade by the river, two quays have been erected at a considerable expense. The town witnessed many sanguinary scenes during the unhappy events which characterised the year 1798.

The Castle of Enniscorthy, seen to the right of our sketch, was originally erected by Raymond le Gros, and is one of the earliest military structures of the Anglo-Norman settlers. It is a very remarkable building, as well from its commanding situation as from its architectural peculiarities.—The body of the edifice is of a square form, flanked at each corner by a round tower.

It appears that the castle and manor were formerly possessed by the O'Kavanagh's, and subsequently granted by Queen Elizabeth to the poet Spenser. It was taken and destroyed by Cromwell, and afterwards repaired by Sir Henry Wallop.

A fragment of the Franciscan Convent is all that remains of the ancient churches which were erected here.

There is no scene in the county Wexford more beautiful than the rich valley above and below Enniscorthy, through which the Slaney flows. As the river occupies the greater portion of the valley, the principal part of the town reaches along the abrupt banks on either side, the streets being consequently in several places inconveniently steep. A magnificent view of the town, river, and country around is obtained from Vinegar Hill, which adjoins the town, and rises to a height of 389 feet above the sea level.

HOW OUR ANCESTORS FARED.

Y people talk of wisdom of our sages, and the reason has almost tired the force of currency of an age; but although I J. Manners, he silly lines in which he expresses opinion that commerce should be allowed to flourish, provided "our nobility" be left to flourish, have had the currency of a few days as feeble as one regards the elusive colouring of fancy, what is socially? Could we be able only to remain, compensate article of decent raiment with three shillings and the litter of with the comfort or an Alfred only learn to spell at the mature age of thirty-eight? and what would be now thought of the principles of trade that prevented a man who bought corn in one market from selling it at any other for a profit, or from wearing clothes of a peculiar texture or colour, unless he belonged to a privileged class? But it may be said that physical discomforts have no necessary antagonism to wisdom, and that Diogenes in his tub knew more than the king with whom he refused to change places. But Diogenes, if he had washed himself, and rented a decent lodging, even up a two-pair stairs, would have proved a much more useful member of society, and the experience of any man will assure how that "cleanliness is next to godliness," and that soap and decency of apparel add to self-respect, and enforce the courtesy of others. But to come a little more minutely into an examination of the wisdom of our more remote ancestors, where it is to be found. Strip off the picturesque ivy that encircles the moral ruin, and what do we find? The monopoly of a few to the prejudices of the millions. The peasant bound to the soil as much as if he were a slave in the Southern States of America, and his distinctive name, "villein," becomes a synonym for all that is base. Great lords, with power of life and limb over their feudatories—minors made the subjects of traffic, and forced to marry according to the will of their superiors, or to forfeit their property during those years when most helpless and most requiring advice and counsel. Gratuitous labour enforced under various pretexts—juries fined and imprisoned if they did not give verdicts according to the wish of the crown, as in the case of Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, in 1554—alleged confessions of dead men read against the accused, and his witness not allowed to give evidence under the solemn sanction of an oath—and poor women, because they were old and ugly, burned as witches, to gratify the malice of some neighbour.

As a historian forcibly remarks, when speaking of the delusion existing upon this latter subject even so late as 1712—"The literary intellect never shone more brightly than in that year. Dryden had set, but Pope had risen. Addison was painting his genial portraits of Sir Roger de Coverley; Pope's genius rising from the previous obscurity; Arbuthnot, Steele, and Swift, in their meridian of celebrity; and Jane Wenham, in this period of enlightenment, was tried at the assizes of Hertford, before Justice Powell, for witchcraft, and found guilty, while in July, 1716, a substantial farmer of the name of Hickes accused his wife and child (the latter a girl nine years of age) of the same crime, and on the evidences of the husband and father, the wife and child were hanged on the 28th July."

Victoria felt, not to speak of the aristocratic Brussels, or the more lordly Turkey carpets? Would a Charlemagne of the nineteenth century be unable even to write,

The well-known saying of Fletcher of Saltoun, that the framers of the ballads of a people exercise more influence than their legislators, may be true, but a review of the acts of parliament passed at a remote day, will show very clearly the tone and temper, the condition and position of the governors and the governed, and especially in Ireland, where to the existing distinctions of rank were added those of race and conquest. We proceed, therefore, to briefly illustrate the state of affairs by black-letter records, that cannot err, and that are the photographs of our ancestors' wisdom, personal appearance, and habits.

An act of the third of Edward II. recites, that "inasmuch as merchants and the common people of this land are much impoverished and oppressed by the prizes (from prendre, to take) of great lords of the land, which take what they will throughout the country without paying anything, or agreeing with the owners for the same: And forasmuch as they will also sojourn and lodge at their pleasure with the good people of the country against their wills, to destroy and impoverish them, it is agreed and assented that no such prizes be henceforth made without ready payment and agreement, and that none shall harbour or sojourn at the house of any other by such malice. And if any shall do the same, such prizes and such destructions shall be holden for open robbery, and the king shall have the suit thereof, if others dare not sue."

The last line is very significant, and explains what was the extent of the evil to be remedied. How delightful to find one of those "noble lords" locking up his castle on a fine summer's day, and accompanied by horses, dogs, and armed men, stepping into farmer Terence O'Byrne's lawn, and wishing him the time of day, and without leave or license, taking possession of the best apartments in the house, making fierce love to Mrs. O'Byrne, and emptying the larder and dairy with greater rapidity than the transformation is effected in a pantomime. "Like master like man," and the latter having no wages, but only what they might pick up, the haggard is rapidly cleared—the poultry disappear, and a widowed gaudier is the sole representative of the feathered tribe. Swift tells an anecdote of some soldiers quartered in a man's premises during a disturbed period, denuding him of almost everything, and when expostulated with, exclaiming, with an air of indignant innocence: "Why, hang you, you ungrateful scoundrel, are we not here for your protection!" and as even Queen Elizabeth used to swear tremendously, it is not doing injustice to assume that the great lord of the land, when he saw O'Byrne looking cross, also ejaculated: "Why, hang you, am I not here on a visit!"

What would Lord Carlisle or Sir Robert Peel think of not going to the Lakes of Killarney—of not enjoying the hospitality of Lord Downshire at Hillsborough, or of declining a great cattle-show at Cork, least Lord Chancellor Brady and the privy-council might entertain doubts whether they had not abdicated the offices of Lord Lieutenant and Chief Secretary of Ireland? But what says a statute of Henry the Sixth?

"Where it was in doubt and in diversity of opinion that if any ministers or officers of the king, did pass by the coasts of the sea from the ports of Dublin, Drogheda, 'Molagh-hide,' or Dalkey, or elsewhere in those parts, to Wexford, Waterford, Cork, and to other places by the whole sea-coast within the said land of Ireland, that their offices were void, as if they had passed into England, or into other lands," the parliament then goes on to provide against such a mode of transit invalidating their appointments. In the same session comes one of those sumptuary regulations so much at variance with all the doctrines of free trade, and based not merely upon invidious social distinctions, but upon an absurd monetary error. The making of "gilt bridles and poyntells," is forbidden, as "wasting the gold of the land," and none are to use them "except knights and prelates of Holy Church." Of course, there are always private fashions which regulate admission to certain circles, such as a court costume to the castle, and cloth cut in a certain shape to a ball; and when, after the fall of Robespierre, to the rage for carnage in Paris succeeded that for pleasure, there were assemblies to which no one would be admitted, unless not only he had lost some one of his family upon the scaffold, but had his hair cut like those going to be decapitated; according to the expression of the day, "les cheveux à la victime." But who would ask the royal assent to a bill to prevent a wealthy citizen from transferring some of his gold from the shop to the stable in his stable, unless, indeed, he should happen to have attained the dignity of a knight? Koster, in his "Travels in Brazil," tells an amusing story of how invidious class privileges were evaded in order to punish a party who would otherwise have escaped for a wrong done to one of the natives. Thus was a mulatto who had been ordered to be flogged, but he pleaded that he was protected as being "half a hidalgo," i.e., noble. Amaro the governor, imitating the practical sagacity of Sancho Panza in the decrees pronounced in his island, allowed the plea and privilege to a qualified extent, and directed that the culprit should only be flogged on the plebeian or non-hidalgo side.

With the Arab a shaven face is regarded as the brand of a slave; but the parliament that, under the Earl of Shrewsbury, sat at the very appropriate town of Trim, in the reign of the same Henry the Sixth, was pleased to take a very opposite view of matters, as appears by what follows.

"For that now there is no diversity in array betwixt the English 'marchours' and the Irish enemies, and so by colour of the English marchours the Irish enemies do come from day to day to other into the English counties as English marchours, and do rob and 'pill' by the highways, and destroy the common people by lodging upon them in the nights, and also do kill the husbands in the nights, and do take their goods to the Irishmen: Wherefore it is ordained and agreed that no manner of man that will be taken for an Englishman shall have a beard above his mouth, that is to say, that he have no hairs upon his upper lip, so that the said lip be once, at least, shaven every fortnight, or of equal growth with the nether lip. And if any man be found among the English contrary thereto, that then it shall be lawful for every man to take them and their goods as Irish enemies, and to ransom them as Irish enemies."

What a sensation would be produced in Grafton-street or Merrion-square on a band day, if such an order should now emanate from the Castle! The Samsons of fashion would rise in rebellion rather than lose the chief source of their power and influence, and in their Thermopylae, the dressing-room, like the Spartan of old, calmly regulate their moustaches while awaiting the approach of the enemy—in this instance the barber, and not the Persian. H. W. L.

THE NIGHT ATTACK.

IN the winter of the year, 13—, Sir Ralph Ufford, at the head of a chosen band of knights and men-at-arms, left Dublin, and proceeded to the south, in order to bring the earl of Desmond and his turbulent followers under the rule of King Edward, the third of that name. The weather favoured his march. From the day of his departure from the city, the sun continued to shine down upon the landscape; scarcely a cloud was arising and floating across the pure blue heavens to obscure its rays. As he marched southwards, a slight, but unvarying wind continued to blow from the north-east, gradually becoming colder, till at length, notwithstanding the daily return of the slanting sunbeams, the whole face of nature seemed to lie dead beneath its chilly influences. The remaining leaves dropped from the trees, and lay in damp and decaying heaps upon the gnarled roots beneath. The birds that had carolled forth their gladness at the coming of the bright weather, now sat drowsily upon the naked branches, as if tired of the wintry glitter, cold and cheerless, till at length the scarred faces of the ancient crags began to gleam with innumerable icicles, and the small rills that ran downward into the forlorn woods to lose their voices, for the frost had begun its silent work, binding up all nature in its potent chain, till the earthen clods beneath the hoofs of Sir Ralph Ufford's charger felt as hard and obdurate as the stern hearts of those who were at the time engaged in deadly strife.

from end to end of the cold and inhospitable region through which he passed.

On the day preceding Christmas, the sun rose with undiminished splendour into a cold steel-blue sky, but ere he had run half his diurnal course, a dark cloud arose like a giant spectre, between the east and north, and spread slowly, till at the passing away of noon not a rent was left in the broad canopy overhead through which the conquered beams might shine down upon the silent earth. Still the Lord Justice and his little band shaped their course southward, heedless of the sky's threatening and desolate aspect. As the evening wore on, the mighty cloud that had arisen began to descend and lie like an oppressive weight upon hill, and valley, and plain, and in the spectral twilight that succeeded, an occasional white flake came down in a perpendicular fall, lying pale and cold wherever it chanced to alight upon plume or shoulder-plate in the cavalcade, and each moment becoming more frequent, till at last, as the darkness set in, the whole atmosphere seemed one universal mass of descending snow. The next sun arose over a gleaming expanse of spotless purity and whiteness, for the snow-fall of the night lay deep and cold over the land; and thus began a Christmas-day that brought desolation and sorrow to many a bold heart in the stout fortress of Castle-island, far away amid the fastnesses of Kerry.

In the bosom of a wild gorge, at the verge of one of those primeval forests that then clothed the land, Sir Ralph Ufford and his band had taken shelter from the snow storm, intending to remain there till the weather became milder, and then to commence their operations against some of the refractory chieftains, who owed allegiance to the powerful and cautious Earl of Desmond. The giant trees spread their snow-laden arms over a number of huts constructed of branches beneath, in which the men-at-arms sat around their fires in small groups, regaling themselves on the flesh of a horse—in that terrible winter they could obtain no better food—talking over their affairs, and drinking the wine they had brought in their flasks—in honour of Christmas-night. Into the centre of their encampment ran forward a projection of rock, split at its extremity into two long abutments, which rose up perpendicularly at either side, leaving a flat space of green sward between them, four or five yards in breadth, and of considerable length. This long channel Sir Ralph Ufford had caused to be roofed over with the trunks of young trees, over which was laid a thick bed of brambles, heather and fern, that defended those beneath from the severity of the elements. At its upper angle steps were formed, leading out through a hole in the roof, in order to facilitate escape in case of an attack, and the whole structure looked, lit up as it was by two large fires, like one of those rude caverns described in German romances, with its horde of wild, free companions, assembled over their nightly orgies. The red glare of the fires fell upon many a stern and noble face within it, and glimmered and shone upon many a sword, and spear, and various pieces of armour that lay scattered upon the floor, or hung against the rocky walls.

Within this strange habitation Sir Ralph Ufford, Lord Justice of Ireland, was now sitting at his Christmas-dinner, with his knights and leaders. The repast consisted of the carcasses of two deer, which some of the light-armed followers had brought in during the snow storm of the preceding night, and which these same nimble-footed gillies were now serving out to their masters with no sparing hands. The looks of care that had sat in each eye, during the time the building of the huge hut was in progress, were now fast disappearing under the genial influence of the repast, and the measures of wine the leaders were quaffing occasionally, as they sat around the cheerful fires.

"By my knightly word," said Sir Ralph Ufford, as he cut away a huge slice of venison with his dagger, "but this, bad as it is, is more palatable than sitting at the best revel in Dublin Castle, and hearing of the Desmond riding rough shod over the necks of King Edward's liege subjects. Up and doing is the word, however fortune or the weather may treat us."

"It is true, my lord," returned a huge and fierce-looking knight, from the other side of the fire; "whilst thou didst sit in Dublin, the Desmond laughed at thee and thy menaces; now, however, he may change his tune when he finds thee thus, with harness-back, in the very midst of his territory."

"He will never change his tune, Sir Pierce Creagh," remarked another, "never till my Lord Justice takes him prisoner, and thus gets him under his thumb-nail. At present I wot he is still laughing at us, as he leads the revel in the halls of Tralee. Would to heaven we were near enough to assault the castle in the middle of their carouse."

"Cheer thee up, man," resumed the Lord Justice, "there are other refractory fortalices hereabouts, that we may have for the taking ere the morning light, and we be willing to tempt the weather. Should those I expect be here at the appointed time, our swords may soon be unsabbarded and crossed in combat."

"I' faith," said the second knight who had spoken, "I would freely venture my blood to get into some store-house or fortress, where we might have one good meal. An' we remain much longer in the woods, our bones will shame a skeleton, we are getting so thin from starvation. Oh! what a rousing bout over the groaning board, was that we had on coming southward, when the fat citizens of Limerick entertained us."

"I have reason to remember Limerick well, but not from our late carouse," remarked Sir Pierce Creagh. "I got this there, many years ago," and he pointed to the mark of an old wound upon his forehead. "It was when I was squire to the Knight of the Valley. One day I rode on an errand for my master, from the Hold of the Valley into Limerick. The President of Munster was holding sessions there at the same time, whilst the gallants who attended in his train were ruffling it with a high hand through the town. I left my horse at the hostelry of the 'Gleeful Can,' and took a walk down street after doing my errand, to hear the news, and see the gay sights attendant on the session. As I came suddenly round a corner, I saw poor Eman Ban, the fool of Glynn, flying out on his face into the street, from a blow he had received from one of the President's squires."

"Ha! ha!" exclaimed Eman, as he picked himself up, and shook his fist at the brutal squire, "there's one behind you that'll pay you off from basinet to boot-toe, for what you have done to the poor fool."

"The squire turned and beheld me behind him. He was formed like a hogshead, he was so broad and fat, with a small bullet head, and little rat-like eyes, that glinted furiously upon me as he turned."

"Wilt thou take up his quarrel?" he asked, drawing his sword.

"I will," answered I, for my blood was up at seeing the poor fool, whom we all knew, so savagely treated.

"A ring! a ring!" shouted the crowd, and a ring was soon formed within which we pointed and parried for some time, till he gave me the wound, the mark of which you see upon my forehead."

"My sword also touched him several times, but at last, with one good plunge, I sent my weapon through his rib. That ended our duel. Half blinded with the blood that streamed from my wound, I rushed through the crowd and reached my horse, and ere the forces of the President had time for pursuit, I was far on the road to the 'Hold of the Valley.' I promise you all, my lords and gentlemen, that it was a long time again till I visited Limerick."

"Wert ever tried for the deed?" asked the Lord Justice, after emptying a small silver goblet that was attached by a chain to his richly chased belt.

"Never," answered Sir Pierce Creagh.

"Then, by my knightly vow!" returned the Lord Justice, with a grim smile, "had I been President at the time, thou wouldst assuredly have hung for it."

"It is not too late yet," exclaimed several of the audience, laughing. "A trial! a trial! my Lord. Sir Pierce Creagh is guilty of slaying a liege subject, by his own confession, and therefore deserveth to die the death!"

"No comrades," said another, a low-sized but extremely stout knight, who now stood up and seized Sir Pierce Creagh's hand, "the squire was not killed, for I am he! Sir Pierce," he continued, laughing, and shaking the brawny hand he held, though I was two good months on my bed, in consequence of thy brave thrust o' sword, I think that scar thou showest makes us quits. What sayest thou?"

"I say, Sir Roger Lombard," answered the grizzly old soldier, standing up and shaking the hand of the other warmly, in return, "that never in my life did I feel so glad as on this Christmas night!"

As he spoke a heavy tramping was heard outside in the snow, and the next instant a gigantic archer—a cross-bow man—with his two attendants, stalked into the apartment, and up to where the Lord Justice sat. The knights put their hands to their swords, expecting an attack; but Sir Ralph Ufford waved his hand for silence, and then turned his fierce and eager gaze upon the intruder.

"What tidings hast thou brought, sir archer?" he said, as the cross-bow man drew himself up respectfully before him.

"I have brought more than tidings, my lord," answered the archer. "Look on this key. It belongs to the postern gate of the castle of the island, where Sir Eustace Poer and his comrades and followers are even now indulging in their drunken revelry. Ere I stole the key, I saw, through a loop-hole, Sir Eustace and other knights, thine enemies, draining the wine goblet to thy downfall, over their chess-table. Art for a bold deed, my lord? If thou art, follow me, and I will lead thee upon them in the midst of their revelry!"

"What reward dost thou expect for this signal service?" asked the Lord Justice, with a grim look.

"I am a free archer, belonging to the Desmond," answered the cross-bow man; "but the Desmond will not take up my quarrel. I must, therefore, put it in other hands. Last Hallowe'en Sir Eustace Poer hanged my brother and my only son at his castle gate, and ever since I have haunted his stronghold like a spectre, without getting an opportunity for vengeance till to-night, when I found the warder drunken at the postern. This is the key, and, when all is over, I ask but the head of my mortal foe!"

"Thou shalt have it, by my fay!" answered the Lord Justice. "And now," continued he, turning to the cross-bow man's two attendants, "what do these wild kerns want with thee?"

"They will speak for themselves, my lord," answered the archer.

"I want to share in the attack," said the first gillie. "The knight of Castle-island burned my home by the banks of Feale, and lopped off my father's head with one sweep of his sword at the Ford of Bierna, and therefore I want vengeance—head for head!"

"I had my skene at the throat of his nephew at the battle of Tiernan's Bridge," said the other gillie, with a wild light in his grey eye, "and I remembered the wrongs of my race, and would have the knife steeped to the hilt in his blood, were it not for the charge of the Knight of Castle-island, who bore down like a torrent with his men-at-arms upon us, and gave me this with a back slash of his sword," continued he, suddenly baring his broad chest, and exhibiting the mark of a wound, "but to-night we can pay back all!" and with that he plucked forth his dagger and shook it in the direction of the doomed castle.

"Yes, and pay yourselves!" exclaimed the Lord Justice, starting to his feet; "for I have heard that Sir Eustace Poer, after robbing the whole country, hath more gold in his fortalice than the mad Knight of York had, who shod his horses with it. Arm yourselves, gentlemen, and follow me, and we will show yonder traitor and his drunken companions, be they belted knights twenty times over, that they cannot safely beard the Lord Justice, armed with the authority of our master the king!"

The horses were brought from where they were picqueted beneath the shelter of the trees, and in about half-an-hour afterwards the whole band, led by the Lord Justice and the vengeful archer, was winding its way through the snowy forest towards the Castle of the Island. After arriving at a spot within the distance of an arrow-shot from the castle, Sir Ralph Ufford gave orders to his men to dismount and tie their horses in the wood hard by. He then led them down cautiously towards the postern indicated by the archer. But caution seemed now unnecessary, for the warders had forsaken their posts, and stolen into the hall to join their comrades in the revel. The archer opened the postern door, and the band filed after him into the deserted court-yard; where they stood, the sounds of reckless and drunken revelry breaking upon their ears from the distant hall.

"Go," whispered Sir Ralph Ufford to the archer, "and climb yonder buttress—from it thou canst see how they are engaged within."

The archer did as he was directed, and looked in through a loop-hole—the same through which he had peered some hours before. There they were, warders and all, singing, shouting, and drinking away in their mad revel, while Death, a veritable thief in the night, was hovering over their heads, and that of their master. At the upper end of the hall sat Sir Eustace Poer, and a few of his comrades knights, engaged in a game of chess, and laughing loudly at the various fortunes of the play. The archer sprang down and reported what he had seen to the stern Lord Justice, who, beckoning to his followers, strode round to the main door of the fortalice, and rushed in, sword in hand. Up started the revellers in wild affright, some of them drawing their swords or seizing the battle-axes from the wall to resist the sudden attack, whilst others vainly endeavoured to make their escape by the door through which their mail-clad enemies were still rushing inward. A knight who sat by Sir Eustace Poer immediately attacked Sir Ralph Ufford, who was in advance with the archer, but a blow from the heavy sword of the Lord Justice stretched him mortally wounded on the floor beside a table, which had been overturned in the struggle. Sir Eustace Poer sprang to his feet, and drew his sword, but a heavy blow on the head from the stock of the archer's cross-bow flung him senseless beside his fallen companion. A general butchery commenced, for the revellers, unarmed as they were, were unable to cope with the fierce and iron-clad band of knights and men-at-arms, who rushed so suddenly upon them.

"Slay him not!" exclaimed Sir Ralph Ufford, as the archer was about to plunge his dagger through the breast of the hapless master of the castle, who still lay upon the floor—"if the catiff still lives after thy brave blow, we will hang him before his own gate, even as he hanged thy brother and son. In the name of our liege-lord the king," continued he, turning to those who still endeavoured to defend themselves, "I, Ralph Ufford, Lord Justice of Ireland, command you all to lay down your arms, in which case you will get mercy—all, except Sir Eustace Poer, who lieth wounded here, and Sir William Grant, whom I am sorry to see in such company, but who can expect no quarter!"

His command was instantly obeyed, the castle rendered up, and in the dead of that icy Christmas night, the cross-bow man and his two attendants, as they stood before the gate of Castle Island, looked with a smile of grim and vengeful pleasure upon the bodies of Sir Eustace Poer and Sir William Grant depending from the ominous cross-beam over the archway. Without more ado the Lord Justice and his stern band sat themselves down in the hall of the fortalice they had thus taken, and there finished their Christmas cheer.

ACQUAINTANCE AND FRIEND.—Man's life is a chain, and every acquaintance he forms in its course is a link, completing the whole. Affection is the clasp securing it, which only snaps when Death severs it.

NEW BRIDGE.

THE town of New Bridge, county Kildare, is pleasantly situated on the river Liffey, the banks of which, above the town, are very beautiful and fertile, a great extent of rich pasture land extending from the river on either side. About a mile above the town are the ruins of Great Connell Abbey, founded by Meyler Fitzhenry, A.D. 1202; a mile below is the large bog of Mounds. The cavalry barracks in the town are very extensive.

It is rather anomalous to call the oldest bridge now remaining on the river Liffey, New Bridge, for, with the exception of the ancient Bridge of Dublin, which was taken down and rebuilt some years since, it is asserted to be the first stone bridge which spanned it. We learn from Pembroke's "Annals," that this bridge was erected in the year 1308, by John le Deceur, the Lord Mayor of Dublin in that year, at his own expense. The bridge is situated about a mile south-west of the town of Leixlip, illustrated in our last number. It consists of four arches, some of which are semicircular and others pointed. Like the majority of most ancient bridges, it is high and extremely narrow. "Mantled with luxuriant ivy," says Dr. Petrie, "and enriched with the varied and mellow tints of so many centuries, it is in itself an object of great picturesque beauty; but these attractions are greatly enhanced by the quiet, yet romantic, features of the scenery immediately about it—particularly the woods, and the ruins of the venerable Abbey of St. Woolstan."

THE BLACK DOCTOR

CHAPTER VIII.

RS. STAMMERS opened the door with feverish haste, and Bramble stood before one who was the very personification of physical suffering and mental distress.

"Oh, Doctor, have you any news for me. I have lived a life of torture since I last saw you—tell me all—tell me the worst; this suspense is worse than a hundred deaths. His sister has cried herself to sleep, but there has been no sleep for me for nights, nor I fear is there any more peace for me in this world."

"I have good news for you," said Bramble, "aye, the very best news; I have the forged bill."

The lady stared with intense wonderment at the Black Doctor as she caught him by the hand, and her face was at once expressive of incredulity and amazement.

"This way, madam," said Stammers, as he led the lady to an adjoining room, where he placed the candle which he held on a table, and drew forth from his breast pocket the fatal pocket-book, within which was contained the cause of so much heart-burning affliction, within which was the product of fraud and avarice, and the sad results of prodigality and crime—the records of many a human folly, and that which gave power and wealth to Abraham Isaacs.

Mrs. Stammers almost fainted, as she saw Bramble unclose the strings which secured the pocket-book.

"Here it is," said Bramble, as he produced the forged bill and held it up to the light. "On that slip of dirty paper the life of your husband and my friend depended. It is now yours," and the Black Doctor placed the bill in her hand.

She grasped it convulsively, and big tears rolled down her face, but they were tears of deep and soul-felt gratitude.

"How can my life and every energy of my soul thank you for the great good you have done us, and if my life can repay you it is at your service," said the lady, as she held the hand of Bramble in hers. But as she did so a cloud seemed to pass across her features, and she added: "I hope no wrong has been done to obtain this bill."

"None whatever," replied Bramble; "and you should not be conferring all your gratitude on me; the person who obtained the pocket-book is outside; would you wish to see him?"

"I would be most anxious to do so," said Mrs. Stammers, "that I may thank him."

Bramble cautiously opened the hall-door, and called Tony.

"All right," said Tony, as he ascended the steps and entered the hall, "this is a lonesome place, and it is very cold."

"This is the young person who found the pocket-book," said Bramble, introducing Tony, "and he gave it to me. He knew what it contained, and was aware how much you would wish to have it."

Mrs. Stammers ran over to Tony, and not only embraced him, but absolutely kissed him, much to his own surprise, as he did not think it necessary to remove his white hat.

"Yes, ma'am," said Tony, when he had recovered from his surprise, "the doctor is right; I found it, and I gave it to him."

"What is your name?" asked the lady, as she placed her hands on Tony's shoulders, and looked at him with eyes beaming with joy and thankfulness.

"Tony Johnson, ma'am," replied the boy; "I know your governor very well, and I would go a long way to serve him."

"This poor boy," said Mrs. Stammers, "reminds me of my duty. Where is my dear husband, and how is he? but how can he be if you have not informed him of the good news which you have told me?"

"We must be very cautious for some time in this matter," said Bramble. "You must not breathe a word even to Miss Stammers of the finding of the bill; tell her that her brother is safe, and will be here in the course of to-morrow. Above all things, keep that bill safe."

"I will," said Mrs. Stammers, "put it where its horrid presence shall never remind me of my husband's shame," and she held the bill towards the flame of the candle.

"Are you mad?" said Bramble, as he had just time to prevent the lady putting her threat into execution; "are you aware the Jew could get others to forge a bill to imitate that which you were going to burn, and swear, and get others to swear, that the one which was but an imitation was the original forgery?"

"I feel the importance of what you say," said Mrs. Stammers, "and you may rest assured that I will keep it safe."

"I am now compelled to leave you," said Bramble, "as Tony and I are going in the direction of home. He is to be my cicerone, and you may be expecting to see Mr. Stammers here in the evening, as in all probability I will meet him early."

Mrs. Stammers caught the doctor by the hand and said: "Accept the warmest gratitude of a mother and her children; as for Tony, the welfare of his future life shall be my anxious care; I owe him much, and I will repay him as well as I can. I will now bid you good-night," said the lady, almost overcome by emotion, when Bramble and Tony left and gently closed the hall-door after them.

As they were leaving Elm Place, Tony inquired: "Where are you going, doctor?"

"To Mud Island," replied Bramble, "where we will remain till daylight."

When they reached this classic locality, Bramble entered the room where Stammers lay, and, addressing him, said: "Stammers, I am happy in being able to inform you that your wife has now the bill in her possession, and you are safe from all danger."

"Don't mock me in my misery," said Stammers, as he rose from his wretched pallet, but immediately fell backwards, exhausted. "I have," continued the sick man, fifty thousand pounds—I will pay all my debts this night."

"I am afraid," said Bramble, addressing the Mud Island king in a low tone of voice, "that our poor friend has lost his reason. Have you observed anything like delirium about him?"

"He has been raving all day," said the king, "and I fear that he is stark mad this moment. Poor gentleman, the shock he has received, together with his recent accident, has been too much for him."

"This," said Bramble, "is the most unfortunate item in the case, now that the danger which he and his friends most apprehended is all past. What is to become of his poor wife and helpless children?"

Meanwhile the patient continued to writhe as if convulsed on his pallet. The Doctor strove so far as possible to soothe the frenzied excitement of his unhappy friend, and had at length the satisfaction of seeing him fall into a profound slumber just about daybreak, when the entrance of Tony drew the Doctor's attention, who made a sign to that wide-awake young gentleman to tread softly, to speak low, and not disturb the maimed and heart-worn sleeper.

"The detective is going to get his reward," said Tony, chuckling in high glee. "They are going to tar and feather him."

The Doctor repeating by gesture his intimation of silence to Tony, both left the room of the sufferer, and proceeded to the window of an out building, or rather round hovel, from whence they could enjoy a full view of the operation of tarring and feathering, a process by no means new to the executive of Mud Island.

The luckless detective (Horseman) had been led from an underground cellar, wherein he had been confined, together with Squint for his companion, during the previous night. His appearance at the place of execution was hailed with shouts and roars of ribald mirth by the vast mob assembled. The process of denuding the hapless victim of his garments was accomplished with marvellous celerity by "Red Dan," who evinced a dexterity in the disrobing process which proved him to be an accomplished and tried hand at that sort of work. The tar brush was most vigorously and unsparingly applied by a half dozen willing operators, who speedily covered the body corporate of poor Horseman with a dense bituminous coat, his entreaties for mercy and forbearance being interrupted by the casual introduction of the loaded tar brush into his gaping mouth. The tarring having been completed, a sack full of feathers was then showered, of course with unsparing liberality, over his tar-covered body. The aspect of the feathered biped was so truly comical, that the grave features of the saturnine Black Doctor relaxed into a smile, whilst Tony crowed and capered with ecstasy. The process of the execution of the Mud Island sentence terminated by Horseman, tarred and feathered as he was, being drummed out of the King's territories beyond the Spring Garden frontier, with all the ignominy considered to be due to a spy and an informer. The fife and drum of the Mud Island militia played "The Rogue's March" in front, and thus amidst the yells of the mob, the shrill laugh of the women and girls, and the shouts of the young population, Horseman made his exit from the Mud Island territory, and having had his water-soaked clothes thrown to him, retreated to hide his shame and discomfort in some private hostelry or lodging.

So soon as the crowd had dispersed, the Black Doctor, addressing Tony, said, "Tony, here is money, go and hire a chaise at once, and let it be brought to the door of the king's house immediately. It is necessary that my friend Mr. Stammers shall be removed from this without delay."

"All right, doctor," answered Tony; and, whistling a few bars of "The Rogue's March," interrupted by occasional roars of merriment, off went the young scamp on his message in search of a discreet jarvey.

It required a considerable amount of time and trouble to make Stammers ready for his journey from Mud Island to Elm-place, but by persuasion and gentle violence, the Black Doctor succeeded in prevailing on him. When the chaise drove up to the door, with Tony sitting on one of the back rails, in all the full excitement of juvenile delight, Bramble had to laugh at the antics of his young friend, whose white hat had undergone anything but a process of renovation during the past twenty-four hours.

"That is a precious young fellow," said the King of Mud Island, "I would like to have him as a subject."

"Tony," replied Bramble, "is one of the greatest artists of his time. I would not part with him for any consideration. He saved my friend from his worst enemies, and was the means of defeating Abraham Isaacs, the terrible Jew money-lender. This won't do," continued the Black Doctor, "as Mr. Stammers must be at home before the day is much older. You must help me to put the injured man into the chaise."

"No sooner said than done," replied the king; and in a short time Stammers and Bramble were seated in the vehicle, driving at a brisk pace for Elm-place.

On arriving opposite the residence of Colonel Stammers, the Black Doctor alighted, and knocked gently at the hall-door, which was opened by Mrs. Stammers.

"Your husband is in the chaise," said Bramble, as the lady shook him warmly by the hand.

"A thousand thanks," said she, "are yours from me. How can I thank you or show my gratitude as I should do?"

The maimed man was borne from the chaise with as little delay as possible. He appeared to be suffering much pain, when he was placed in a bed fitted for his reception.

The meeting between Stammers and his wife was most affecting. "I owe that which is worth twenty lives to Bramble," said Stammers; "and to that little boy in the street. You have that accursed bill, I am informed. Keep it safe, at present I could not look at it."

"I have it," observed the lady, "in safe keeping, where no one can obtain it." As she spoke, Colonel Stammers, accompanied by his niece Charlotte, entered the room where Stammers was lying. When his sister saw him she was transported with joy, and the old man went towards him and addressed him in the most affectionate terms.

Colonel Stammers was about sixty-five years of age. He was still erect, and time seemed to have dealt leniently with him. He dressed with the greatest care, and wore the full blue body coat of the time, adorned with gilt buttons. He had on a buff vest, and cravat scrupulously white, secured by a large diamond brooch. Trowsers very tight at the ankles, pumps with jewelled clasps, and white silk stockings, completed the costume of the old colonel.

"You have got a bad hurt, I am sorry to hear, Bob," said he. "I have also learned that this gentleman,"—pointing to Bramble—"has done you good service. Accept my best thanks," continued the colonel, as he extended his hand to the Black Doctor.

"I have done my best," replied Bramble, "but the greatest quiet for many days will be required for your patient. I have to go now on important business, and I will call to see him to-morrow, when I trust he will be much better."

STANZAS BY MOONLIGHT.

The last spring moon was shining
Above Knockfierna's hill;
As late I lay reclining
By Woodstock's murmuring rill;
Which flows a scene of beauty round,
All silent and all still,
Save where the water's pleasant sound
Comes floating by the mill.
And sweetest fancies filled my mind
While gazing on the scene—
The village loomings far behind,
The vernal lawns between;
I thought how calm my days might glide
In some retreat like this,
Afar from haunts of pomp and pride,
'Mid Nature's sylvan bliss.
There read the muses' mystic lore
In valley, grove, or stream;
Or high on Fancy's pinions soar,
Above the solar beam;
Or, sweeter still, with fond delight
To sing some lowly song
In such a scene—on such a night—
To maiden fair and young.
But well I know the rainbow's hue
Is fleeting as 'tis bright;
And still my days of rest are few,
Nor cheered by love's fond light;
And I have neither wealth nor fame
To gain the valued boon;
Yet I can pleasing fancies frame
Beneath the silver moon.

THE PAST AND PRESENT OF TYPOGRAPHY.

HE many sciences necessary to be practised in the production of a book or periodical are so various and interesting, that we have little doubt a brief insight into the history and progress of the art of printing, will be acceptable to the readers of this journal.

We need scarcely remark that the science of typography is of comparatively modern origin; for although the principles upon which the art was ultimately developed are of the most remote antiquity, it is not more than four centuries since the first book issued from the press. Anterior to the invention of printing, raised words were cut on a block of wood, the impressions from which were taken by means of a simple pressure. To this day the Chinese pursue this rude method of printing, being the only people who do so. The work which they intend to be printed, is first written upon sheets of thin transparent paper, impressions of each of which, by the aid of glue, are transferred to tablets of hard wood. The engraver removes every portion of the blank surface of the block, and the transcribed characters are thus left in relief. The Chinese do not use any press, but when the ink is laid on, and the paper carefully placed above it, a brush is passed over with the necessary degree of pressure.

According to Davis, before the discovery of wooden blocks, the Chinese were accustomed to use stone blocks, on which the writing had been engraved, by means of which process the ground of the paper was made black, and the letters left white. The first moveable types that were constructed were of very rude and imperfect manufacture. The exact year of their introduction has not been ascertained, but it is certain to have taken place in the course of the fifteenth century, probably between the years 1437 and 1438. Although the credit of the discovery has been variously awarded, there is little doubt that it must justly be accorded to John Gutenberg (or Guttenbergh), a German. Even the briefest history of the art of printing would be incomplete without a sketch of his career. He is supposed to have been born at Mayence, or Mentz, early in the fifteenth century, and to have settled at Strasburg, about the year 1424. Eleven years afterwards he entered into partnership with three citizens of that town, binding himself to disclose certain important secrets connected with the science of typography, by means of which they would attain opulence. Shortly after their proceedings were initiated one of the partners died, upon which Gutenberg sent his servant to the brother of the deceased with the request that no stranger might be admitted into the workshop, lest their secret might be discovered. However, he was too late, for all the "plant" of the office had disappeared, a circumstance which produced a lawsuit amongst the surviving partners, the result being a dissolution amongst them.

In 1445-46 Gutenberg returned to his native city of Mentz, where he succeeded in obtaining the necessary capital for the prosecution of his typographic experiments, from a wealthy goldsmith and worker in precious metals, named John Fust, or Faust. This was the origin of the first regular printing establishment. Between the years 1450 and 1455 Gutenberg succeeded in printing complete an edition (in the Latin language) of the Bible. This was executed with cut metal types, on six hundred and thirty-seven leaves, and from copies still in existence in the Royal Libraries of Berlin and Paris, some impressions appear to have been printed on vellum. But the expenses incident upon the publication of this work subsequently proved the cause of Gutenberg's ruin. Successful legal proceedings were instituted against him by Faust, into whose possession the entire of his "plant" fell—the suit being followed by a dissolution of partnership. The story in which the latter is introduced under the name of "Dr. Faustus," and represented as having been in collusion with his Satanic majesty, originated in the superstitions of the vulgar with regard to the books first issued from the German press. In addition to this Bible, many other specimens of the typographic work of Gutenberg have been discovered. Amongst them is an almanac for the year 1457, which was found some years ago in the archives of Mayence. "This," remarks Hansard, "would most likely be printed towards the close of 1456, and may consequently be deemed the most ancient specimen of typographic printing extant, with a certain date. That Gutenberg was a person of refined tastes in the execution of his works, is sufficiently obvious. Adopting a very ancient custom, common in the written copies of the Scriptures and the missals of the Church, he used a large ornamental letter at the commencement of books and chapters, finely embellished, and surrounded with a variety of figures as in a frame. The initial letter of the first psalm thus forms a beautiful specimen of the art of printing in its early progress. It is richly ornamented with foliage, flowers, a bird, and a greyhound; and it is still more beautiful from being printed in a pale blue colour, while the embellishments are red, and of a transparent appearance. What became of Gutenberg immediately after the unsuccessful termination of his lawsuit with Faust is not well known. Like the illustrious discoverer of the great western continent, he seems to have retired almost broken-hearted from the world, and to have spent most of the remainder of his days in obscurity. It is ascertained, however, that in the year 1465 he received an annual pension from the Elector Adolphus, but that he only enjoyed this small compensation for his extraordinary invention during three years, and died towards the end of the month of February, 1468." We may add that, not long since, a monument was erected to his memory in his native city.

All Gutenberg's types were individually cut by the hand, the mode of casting types in moulds being assigned to Schoeffer, an apprentice with Faust, and Gutenberg's successor. The first joint production of Faust and Schoeffer was an edition of the Psalms, the most perfect copy known of which is that in the Imperial Library of Vienna. It is the first publication to which the date, printer's name, and place of publication were affixed, and was discovered, according to Timperley, "in the year 1665, near Innspruck, in the castle of Ambras, where the Archduke Francis Sigmund had collected a prodigious quantity of manuscripts and printed books, taken for the most part from the library of Matthias Corvinus, King of Hungary, from whence it was transported to Vienna. The book is printed in folio, on vellum, and of such extreme rarity, that though not more than six or seven copies are known to be in existence, all of them differ from each other in some respect. . . . The capital letters are cut in wood, with a degree of delicacy and boldness which are truly surprising; the largest of them—the initial letters of the Psalms—which are black, red, and blue, must have passed three times through the press." Faust and Schoeffer succeeded in concealing the improvements which they had introduced into the typographical art till the year 1462, when, at the sacking of Mentz, their employes were dispersed into different countries, and the invention of printing was thus dispersed throughout Europe. From Mentz, its birth-place, the art travelled to Haerlem, in Holland, and Strasburg, each of these cities having its respective advocates for its first introduction.

It is a popular error to suppose that the credit of introducing the art into England is due to William Caxton, since we find record of a small quarto of forty-one leaves—copies of which are extant—as having been published at Oxford, in the year 1468, being three years antecedent to the commencement of his labours. From a work entitled "Original and Growth of Printing in England," published in London, in 1664, it would appear that the first introduction of the art occurred during the reign of Henry VI., which monarch, at the expense of fifteen hundred marks, sent R. Tournour, Master of the Robes, and William Caxton, merchant, on an express embassy to Haerlem, to secure the services of a printer named Corsellis, to come to England, and set up a press at Oxford, which city has, therefore, the honour of being the original seat of the art in England. The king subsequently established another press at St. Albans, and a third at Westminster, the last being placed under the charge of Caxton, in the year 1471. It is affirmed by many that the very old practice prevailing amongst printers of calling their office a "Chapel"—the title being also applied to a species of lodge in which they meet to settle any dispute which may occur amongst themselves—originated in Caxton's exercising the profession of a printer in one of the chapels in Westminster Abbey. In a poem entitled "The Press," there occurs the following allusion to the epithet:

"O, Albion! still thy gratitude confess
To Caxton, founder of the British Press:
Since first thy mountains rose, and rivers flowed,
Who on thine isles so rich a boon bestowed?
Yet stands the chapel in yon Gothic shrine
Where wrought the father of our English line.

Our art was hailed from kingdoms far abroad,
And cherished in the hallowed house of God;
From which we learn the homage it received,
And how our sires its heavenly birth believed.
Each printer hence, howe'er unbless his walls,
Even to this day his house a CHAPEL calls."

William Caxton was born in Kent, in the year 1412, and was apprenticed to one Robert Large, a mercer of the city of London, who died in 1441, leaving him a legacy of twenty-four marks, with which fortune he went abroad, and acted, it is supposed, in the capacity of agent for the Company of Mercers, in Holland and Flanders, where he resided nearly thirty years. In such esteem was he held both at home and abroad for his probity and moral character, that Edward IV. appointed him one of the commissioners to complete a treaty of commerce with the Duke of Burgundy. On his arrival in England he obtained apartments in the Almonry, at Westminster, when was produced, in 1474, the "Game and Playe of Chesse." This was followed by the "Recollections of the Siege of Troy," from the preface to which we learn that Caxton had "practised and learned, at great charge and dispende, to ordain that said book in print." This remarkable man was the first who introduced the printing with moulded metal types, a great improvement on the wooden letters of his predecessor Gutenberg; but for many years afterwards the art of type-casting remained in a very rude and imperfect state. Caxton died in 1490, at the age of seventy-eight, one of his biographers telling us that he worked both at "press and case" to the very last day of his life. In a paper like this it is impossible to give anything like a minute account of his life and labours, but we may obtain some idea of his industry when we find that, in addition to he being his own compositor and corrector, he also made his own type and ink, and left behind him no fewer than five thousand autograph manuscripts. His pupil and successor, Wynken de Worde, a foreigner, improved the art considerably, being the first printer in England who introduced the Roman letter, all previous printing having been in the black or German letter.

Printing was introduced into Scotland, and begun in Edinburgh, about thirty years after Caxton had brought it into England. Very few works, however, appear to have issued from the Scottish press until the year 1541, when James V. granted licences to print. The art was not known in Ireland till about the year 1551, when a book in black letter was issued from a press in Dublin. We regret, however, to be compelled to acknowledge that Ireland has never kept pace with the sister kingdoms in this department of the arts. Why this is the case it is not difficult to determine, and we shall perhaps take another opportunity of referring at length to the causes which have hitherto led to the total neglect of national foreign literature. We may add here that the first printing-press established in America was one set up at Cambridge, Massachusetts, in the year 1638.

In the sixteenth century the number of type foundries in England was limited to four; but in 1684, we learn from Joseph Moxon, himself a letter cutter, that "the number of foundries and printers are grown very many, insomuch, that for the more easy management of typography, the operatives have found it necessary to divide it into the several trades of master-printer, letter-cutter, letter-caster, letter-dresser, the compositor, press-man, the ink-maker, besides several other trades which they take in their assistance, as the smith, joiner, &c." For much of the present excellence of the form and elegance of types we are indebted to the late Mr. William Caslon, letter-founder in Chiswell-street, Finsbury, London, where his descendants still carry on the trade. Caslon was originally an engraver of ornamental devices on the barrels of firearms; but having, about the year 1720, been employed to cut a fount of Arabic letters for an edition of the New Testament, he was so successful that he abandoned his original profession, and started as a letter-founder, the superiority of his types speedily putting a stop to the importation of foreign letters. Mr. Alexander Wilson, of Glasgow, was another very eminent type-founder; nor must we omit to award a word of praise to the durability and elegance which, for a half a century past, have characterised the letters cast in the foundry of Messrs. Miller and Richard, of Edinburgh.

The first step in the process of type-founding is the cutting of a punch or die, of hardened steel, with the figure of the letter cut the reverse way upon its point. When finished, this figure is struck into a piece of copper, which being thus impressed with the represensation of the letter, is termed the matrix. This matrix is then fixed in a frame, called a mould, the external surface of which is of wood, the internal of steel. There is an orifice at the top, through which the metal (an amalgam of lead and regulus of antimony, the smaller letters requiring the greater quantity of the latter metal) is poured. The mould, with the matrix at the bottom, is held in the hand of the founder, who pours the necessary quantity of hot metal into the cavity; swings the mould dexterously round his head, and thus forces the metal into the interstices of the matrix; the metal instantly cooling, the mould is opened by the pressure of a spring, and the type is cast out, the operation taking the eighth of a minute. From the caster the letters go to the breaking-off boy and rubber, who remove any adhering metal and smooths their sides. They are then set up in long lines upon a frame, and carefully dressed or finished. There are about one hundred and thirty separate pieces to a perfect fount of type, consisting of capitals, or "upper case" (A B C D); small capitals (a b c d); small letters, or "lower case" (a b c d); accents (á é í ó); signs, fractions ($+$ = $\frac{1}{2}$ $\frac{3}{4}$ $\frac{5}{8}$) etc. From the scale adopted by every type-founder to show the proportional quantity of each letter required for a fount, it would appear that the letter e is employed more frequently than any other letter.

For book work there are about sixteen sizes of letter, each letter having a separate name. The smallest is "Brilliant," the next "Diamond," and then in succession upwards, "Pearl," "Ruby," "Nonpareil," "Minion," "Brevier," "Bourgeois," (the letter with which this journal is printed,) "Long Primer," &c. Every description of type is sold by weight, and the price varies in amount according to the size of the letter; "Brilliant," the smallest size, costs about fifteen shillings per pound. The types used in printing offices are sorted in shallow boxes, with divisions, called "cases," and distinguished as the "upper" and "lower case," the former containing all the capitals, small capitals, accented letters, and characters used as references to notes, and the latter all the small letters, placed without any alphabetical arrangement, the only guide to their particular position being the size of the division devoted to them, the letters most in use being placed in the larger boxes. When the printer has composed or "set" the manuscript allotted to him, the matter is formed into pages, or "forms," as they are technically called, "imposed" upon an iron slab, and finally secured in an iron frame or "chess," to make it ready for the pressman, who "works it off." Of course, proof-sheets of the matter have been previously taken, and subjected to the careful scrutiny of the "reader," who marks all the words and phrases to be altered or corrected. We have already, in a paper upon "Errors of the Press," shown the care and attention with which it is necessary this functionary should discharge his duties. A recent writer has truly observed: "Many who condescend to illuminate the dark world with the fire of their genius, little think of the lot of the printer, who sits up till midnight to correct their false grammar, bad orthography, and worse punctuation. I have seen the arguments of lawyers in high repute as scholars, sent to the printer in their own handwriting—many words, especially technical and foreign terms, abbreviated, words misspelled, and few or no points, and these few, if there were any, certainly out of place. I have seen the sermons of eminent divines sent to press without points or capitals to designate the division of the sentences; also the letters of the political and scientific correspondent. Suppose all these had been so printed, the printer would have been treated with scorn and contempt. No body would have believed that such gross and palpable faults were owing to the ignorance or carelessness of the author; and no one but the practical printer knows how many hours a compositor, and after him a proof-reader, is compelled to spend in reducing to readable condition manuscript that often the writers themselves would be puzzled to read."

Stereotyping literally signifies the manufacture of solid pages of types, and the invention is ascribed to a Mr. William Ged, of Edinburgh, about the year 1725. The utility of the process will be at once obvious. Let us take this journal, for example. It frequently occurs that many more copies are sold of one number than another, and if the types were kept "standing" to complete sets, so much letter would be "blocked up," that is, remain unemployed, and a serious loss to the printer, as well as delay in the publication, be the result. There are two modes of stereotyping. In the one the pages are encrusted with a level cake of liquid stucco, which hardens almost immediately, and is then separated from the type. By this means an exact representation of the letters and illustrations is obtained. The stucco moulds are next placed in an oven and baked to a certain degree of hardness, after which they are laid, with their faces downwards, in a square iron pan, having a lid of the same metal, with holes at the corners. This pan being immersed in a pot of molten type-metal, which enters by means of the holes and fills the moulds, a fictitious plate or page of types is thus produced. The other mode is the papier-mâché process, by means of which the "Illustrated Dublin Journal" is stereotyped, and which is thus described in Chambers's "Information for the People." "The substance used in making the mould consists of several layers of paper—one of brown paper, another of blotting-paper, and two of thin white paper—glued together with a paste made for the purpose. It is kept always in a damp state; and when about to be applied to the types, the surface is lightly and very carefully rubbed with French chalk, to prevent the plate from adhering to the mould. The paper is then laid on the types and beaten into them with a hard brush, a piece of cotton cloth being laid over it to prevent its being destroyed. When it is sufficiently beaten in, an additional layer of paper is applied on the top to strengthen the mould, and the whole is placed for some time under a press, and then on an iron table heated for the purpose of drying it. The mould being dry, is removed from the types, and the edges being pared, is now ready for casting. The casting-box consists of two pieces joined by a hinge; the mould is placed in the one half, and the other being fastened down, leaves a space equal to the desired thickness of the plate. The metal is then poured in at the open end of the box, and sets almost immediately. Care must be taken that the metal be not too hot, otherwise it adheres to the mould. When French chalk is too freely used, the quality of the plate is injured. If a piece of white paper dipped into the metal is made dark-brown, it is a sign the metal is too hot."

In future papers we shall notice the mechanical progression of literature, from the days of the rude old screw-printing press to those when machines are manufactured capable of throwing off twenty thousand impressions per hour, as well as the history of the substance upon which we write, from the time when the first paper was made from the papyrus of the Nile, to that when an English Chancellor of the Exchequer abolished the duty upon it, and thereby added additional weight (if any were necessary) to the aphorism: "Educate that you may be free."

HOW THE CHINESE MAKE DWARF TREES.—We have all known from childhood how the Chinese cramp their women's feet, and so manage to make them "keepers at home," but how they contrived to grow miniature pines and oaks in flower pots for half a century, has always been much of a secret. With the breaking down of their famous wall and of their exclusiveness, this, among other curious nonsense, has been partly discovered and understood. It is the product chiefly of skilful, long-continued root pruning. They aim, first, and last, at the seat of vigorous growth, endeavouring to weaken it as far as may consist with the preservation of life. They begin at the beginning. Taking a young plant (say a seedling or cutting of a cedar), when only two or three inches high, they cut off its tap-root as soon as it has other rootlets enough to live upon, and replant it in a shallow earthen pot or pan. The end of the tap-root is generally made to rest on the bottom of the pan, or on a flat stone within it. Alluvial clay is then put into the pot, much of it in bits the size of beans, and just enough in kind and quantity to furnish a scanty nourishment to the plant. Water enough is given to keep it in growth, but not enough to excite a vigorous habit. So, likewise, in the application of light and heat. As the Chinese pride themselves also on the shape of their miniature trees, they use strings, wires, and pegs, and various other mechanical contrivances to promote symmetry of habit, or to fashion their pets into odd, fancy figures. Thus, by the use of very shallow pots, the growth of tap-roots is out of the question; by the use of the soil, and little of it, and little water, strong growth is prevented. Then, too, the top and side-roots being within easy reach of the gardener, are shortened by his pruning-knife, or seared with his hot iron. So the little tree, finding itself headed off on every side, gives up the idea of strong growth, asking only for life, and just growth enough to live and look well. Accordingly, each new set of leaves becomes more and more stunted, and the buds and rootlets are diminished in proportion.

A VOICE FROM AN OWL.

my portrait to the Editor, accompanied by a few notes, for which he may find a corner.

The general character of my family is, I may premise, as follows: Our eyes are large, and are surrounded with a radiated circle of feathers, of which the eye itself is the centre; our beaks and talons are strong and crooked; our bodies very short, but thick, and well covered with a coat of the softest and most delicate plumage; the external edges of our outer quill feathers, in general, are finely fringed, which adds greatly to the smoothness and silence of our flight.

There are numerous branches of my family. Chief amongst these I must notice the "Great-Eared Owl," who in size is not much inferior to an eagle, but is rarely found in the United Kingdom. Then there is the "Long-Eared, or Horned Owl," remarkable on account of its horns, or ears, which consist of six feathers, closely laid together, of a dark brown colour, tipped and edged with yellow. The upper part of the body is beautifully pencilled with fine streaks of white, rusty, and brown. In addition there are the "Short-Eared Owl," the "White Owl," the "Barn Owl," the "Screech Owl," the "Gillhowt," and others, who, like the company at a public meeting, are "too numerous to mention." With a fresh protest against any member of my family being deemed a type of dulness, I will conclude by asking, with the poet—

"Can grave and formal pass for wise,
When we the solemn owl despise?"

THE GRIEVANCE PAPERS.

CHAPTER VII.

CONTAINS WHAT THE WRITER CONSIDERS SOME VERY SOUND ADVICE, TOGETHER WITH THE TRAGIC HISTORY OF THE MELANCHOLY END OF A CERTAIN CAT OF THE "SQUEEZER" SPECIES—A SOLEMN WARNING TO MRS. SQUEEZER.

IN the last chapter of these papers I gave a true and unvarnished account of my attempted dinner party at my "apartments," as Mrs. Squeezer designates my suite of rooms. I related with perfect candour the manner in which I was over-reached by that astute female, and my hospitable intentions frustrated. I kept nothing back, neither did "I aught extenuate, or aught set down in malice," as my intention was to give the readers of this journal a plain, unvarnished tale, leaving it, then, to them to determine whether Mrs. Squeezer may not, in very truth, be considered "a real grievance" in my regard.

You may easily believe, courteous reader, that, after the failure of my dinner, and the ignominious defeat which I suffered, I did not attempt to repeat the experiment. It was at once too costly and too unsatisfactory; and Mrs. Squeezer had the satisfaction, and I have no doubt that she enjoyed it prodigiously, of having beaten me, beaten me hollow, I may say, on every point on which we had engaged in combat. Armed at all points, up to every dodge of offensive or defensive warfare, and with her immense experience in doing for young men, (I have very little doubt that she did for the late lamented Mr. S., too, if the truth were only known,) I was but a mere babe in her hands, and had no resource but to sit meekly down, cross my hands upon my breast, humbly bow my poor crest-fallen head, and acknowledge myself conquered. It was a lamentable state of things, but there appeared no help for it, and it has always been a fundamental part of my philosophy to "make the best of a bad job," as they say in that part of the country whence I sprung. Hence, I did not add to my real grievances, by allowing myself to be too much overcome by my misfortunes, but with that elasticity of mind which, I am gratified to say, distinguishes me, endeavoured to look at the brightest side of these untoward occurrences. When, for example, the tails of my coat were so unluckily set on fire by the box of matches which I carried in my pocket, for the purpose of lighting my lamp, I didn't fret and fume about my coat, which, indeed, was irretrievably ruined, and which I didn't take the trouble of picking up out of the street into, which I threw it, (I recognised it the other day on the back of an urchin of some eight years of age, in Liffey-street, the two tails trailing behind him in the dirt, like a presentation train,) but I at once said to myself, "Incog, my boy, you have lost your coat, no doubt, but just consider that before you could have succeeded in pulling it off, you might have been all in a blaze; and instead of merely feeling uncomfortably warm about the region where the matches were creating so much mischief, you might have been very uncomfortably singed, and so be thankful after all." Again, when Mrs. Squeezer's cat capsize the handy young woman, of whom frequent mention was made in the last chapter, and (I say nothing about the dinner) caused her to sprain her ankle, the way I put it was this, viz.: that, instead of throwing down the handy young woman, and spraining her ankle, he might have thrown me down, and not merely have caused me to sprain my ankle, but even to break my neck; and, when I looked at it in this light, I confess that I soon recovered my equanimity, and considered that it was a much lesser evil to have had my dinner wasted, and to have had to pay a larger sum for breakage, doctor's bill, etc., (I am sure that £10 didn't cover all,) than to have had my own ankle sprained, or, perhaps, even to have suffered the dislocation of my neck, an injury which, I have been informed, is beyond the skill of even the most clever and scientific doctor to repair.

This is my way of treating the "ups" and the "downs" of this life. I have had a fair share of them, yet still, more of the "downs" than the "ups," I am quite sure; but, somehow, I have managed to pull through them all, and have arrived at my present period of life, whatever that may be, without having suffered so much from the wear and tear of life as most of my friends; and this happy result I attribute solely to the sound philosophy upon which I have always endeavoured to act, and which I am striving to impress upon the favourable notice, of my readers. Farmer Ashfield, of "Speed the Plough" notoriety, has always been a great favourite of mine. His philosophy is my philosophy, and hence the reason of my favourable sentiments towards him. "Never despair, Farmer," says a certain Mr. Morrington to the sturdy old man, when he is about to be turned out of house and home.

Listen to the philosophy of the old man's answer, which, divested of its Somersetshire dialect, and translated into English, more or less comprehensible, runs thus:—

"I never do, sir," he answers. "It's not my way. When the sun do shine, I never think of foul weather—not I; and when it do begin to rain, I always think that it's a sure sign that it will give over." Now, what could be sounder or more practical than this answer of the old farmer's? and, as it contains a very apt illustration of my code of philosophy, I here present it to you, courteous reader; and, if I may presume to give you a piece of advice, it is this—viz., always to try and look at the bright side of things. Try and meet your troubles half-way, and you are half-through them. We cannot expect always to have good fortune; and when bad fortune does come upon us, there is nothing to be gained by sitting down in a corner, covering our ambrosial locks with dust and ashes, and giving vent to nothing but sighs and groans. No; let us look it boldly in the face. "We should manage our fortune," says La Rochefoucauld, "as we do our health—enjoy it when good; be patient when it is bad, and never apply violent remedies except in an extreme necessity." When things come to the worst, they are sure to take a turn; or, at all events, we must endeavour to persuade ourselves that it will be so.

"There is a tide in the affairs of men,
Which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune;
Omitted, all the voyage of their life
Is bound in shallows and in miseries.
On such a full sea are we now afloat;
And we must take the current when it serves,
Or lose our ventures."

Such are the words which the great man who wrote of these things as scarce another ever wrote, puts into the mouth of the noble Roman, and who is there who may not learn a lesson from them? Yes, kind and intelligent readers of the "Illustrated Dublin Journal," this is my advice to you; and, we now know one another so well—and I have reasons enough for believing, that the bond of sympathy which inevitably springs up between a man who writes with a strong and earnest desire to benefit as well as amuse his fellow men and his readers, has already been born between you and me—that I am sure I may presume to repeat my piece of advice—by always to try and meet your troubles half way. When adverse winds are blowing, and a thousand contrary currents are carrying you hither and thither, sometimes threatening even to dash you upon the rocks and overwhelm you with destruction, always try to keep your look-out eye sharp upon this tide, of which the poet speaks. Catch it. Steer your bark into it like a man at the proper moment. Hold the rudder with a firm and unflinching hand, and never doubt, but the favouring flood will eventually lead you on to fortune, and to happier things; and even if, after all, you should go down—and you won't be the first honest, single-hearted man who has been swamped by the flood of life—you will at least have the consolation of feeling that you struggled like a man, and that you only gave up when you were utterly impotent for further efforts, and what need you care for the world and its opinion then? The great Cardinal was never half so great as in his fall, nor, can anything be more sublime than the words put into his mouth—

"Love thyself last: cherish those hearts that hate thee;
Corruption wins not more than honesty;
Still in thy right hand carry gentle peace,
To silence envious tongues. Be just, and fear not:
Let all the ends thou aimest at be thy country's,
Thy God's, and truth's; then, if thou fall'st,
Thou fall'st a blessed martyr."

Such, dear reader, is my advice to you, as I know that you will take it in the same spirit in which it is given; and be sure that you will be the happier at all events, if not the better for it. It is the same habit of "taking things easy," which has supported me in all my troubles, and more particularly in the annoyances which I have suffered at the hands and appetites of Mrs. Squeezer and her cat; and this remark brings me back to my subject. I confess that since I began to write these papers I have got into a sad habit of rambling away, and treating, as a certain learned old gentleman put on the title page of a book he published, "De omnibus rebus et quibusdam aliis," which means, as far as I can put it into English—but it loses its force by being translated—"Concerning everything, with several other interesting matters." However, courteous reader, allow me to say in this place, that although I may appear to ramble, still I never do so without an aim. Of that aim I fondly hope I need not here pause to speak. - Moreover, as soon as ever I have reason to believe that my rambles are either growing uninteresting, or that you are becoming disinclined to follow, I shall at once bring my disquisition to a speedy close, and "Finis" will be appended to these papers with as little delay as possible. But, on the other hand, so long as I have reason to hope that the readers of this "Journal" turn with pleasure and expectancy to that part of it where the "Grievance Papers" are generally to be found, so long shall I continue my humble efforts to amuse and instruct you, at least, until the subject shall be exhausted, and with due submission to the all-powerful sway of the Editor, who, of course may, any day, should he be so viciously inclined, turn off my steam, and bring me to a sudden stop. And now, courteous reader, hoping that you are only a hundredth part as happy to meet me in print as I am proud to have the privilege of appearing before you, and of finding just one little atom of room, and I will say, of kindly feeling in your hearts, and hoping still more fondly, that the longer we know one another the better we may like one another, I will now return from these roadside wanderings to the beaten track, along which my course is laid.

I think I have made the remark more than once, and I now solemnly repeat it, viz., that I believe that I have been driven as near to desperation by the machinations against my peace, of Mrs. Squeezer and her cat, as it is well possible for a man to go. Whether I may ever pass the limit, is more than I can say. My temper, I am happy to believe, is good, but still I am but human, and being but human, I must confess with the poet (the quotation I admit is rather stale,) or, in other words, there is nothing which an aggravated specimen of the human species may perpetrate, to which I may not be eventually driven in revenge, or self-defence.

"Nil humanum a me alienum puto:"—

I wish no harm to Mrs. Squeezer or her cat. I have no desire to be brought under the notice of the "Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals," the agents of which, I am given to understand, go about our streets in the guise of benevolent-looking old gentlemen, that they may thus more easily pounce upon cabmen, coalporters, and other individuals whose feelings towards animals are not generally supposed to be of the most tender character. I should shrink into my very shoes with shame were I brought before a presiding magistrate, and charged with having, in a spirit of refined cruelty, converted, or caused to be converted, so the indictment would run, Mrs. Squeezer's cat into a rabbit pie, and still further—so the indictment would go on—by malicious perversion and mis-statement caused said pie to be consumed by the aged lady to whom said cat pertained, to the grievous bodily injury and detriment of aged lady aforesaid, etc., etc; and yet, Mrs. Squeezer, such things have happened. It is in a spirit of peace and friendliness towards you that I raise my voice and solemnly proclaim to you, through the medium of this "Journal," which I know that you read, that such things have happened, and that matters have been so arranged, that "rampagious" old ladies have actually, thinking that they were devouring the lodger's pie, feasted on their own cats—baked, and served as "rabbit."

Listen, Mrs. Squeezer, if you please. Some friends of mine had apartments in Glasgow. They suffered grievous injuries at the hands (I suppose the critics will object that cats haven't got hands,) of the landlady's cat, and not being gifted with my amiable and forgiving spirit, they retaliated. I have reason to believe that the Glasgow cat was of the same species as your brute, Mrs. Squeezer; for his depredations, too, extended to the matters of spirits, tea, and, in a word, of whatever was going. Well, this unfortunate animal was caught, killed, (oh! what a case for the benevolent Society already alluded to,) skinned, and sent to a pastry cook's, where he was made into a pie, highly seasoned, and covered over with a delicious-looking crust. When properly baked he was sent home to the lodgings of my friends. The landlady had already missed her precious favourite, but, as he was accustomed every now and then to leave home for a few days, (on a party of pleasure, most probably,) without permission, his absence had not caused any very particular surprise. Well, my friends, on receiving their delicious pie—and they told me that you really could not distinguish it from “rabbit”—carefully removed a portion of the crust and also of the inside—the meat, I suppose, we ought to call it—as if they had eaten it. I promise you that they didn't eat it; but they took good care to keep what they had removed out of sight, and the pie had all the appearance of having afforded a hearty lunch to two healthy young men. There was more than half of it left; and upon leaving the house, these wicked young men gave particular orders that the remains of the pie should be most carefully preserved, as it was of extraordinary excellence. They collected several friends, who were all wild with excitement to witness the denouement of this horrible affair, and in due time, about seven in the evening, they returned in a body to my friends' apartments. It was quite evident from the confusion of tongues that issued from the back parlour that the landlady was entertaining a select party of acquaintances. My friends ascended to their own apartments, and rang the bell for tumblers, and the remains of the cold pie which they had ordered to be put away. After a time the servant brought up the tumblers, and, “Mistress was very sorry, but really the pie had disappeared, and could not be found anywhere. That nasty, mischievous cat had made away with it, and eaten every morsel of it.” As soon as the servant had left the room, the wicked young fellows almost danced again with mad excitement. Again they rang the bell, and sent down an angry message, demanding the relics of their precious pie, and again the same answer was returned—“the cat, the mischievous cat.” At length, pretending to have lost all patience, and boiling over with irrepressible indignation, they all rushed down to the landlady's room. Tartan, who headed the party, tore like a madman into the room, taking very good care to leave the door wide open, so that the others who were outside in the passage might witness all that passed.

There were some six or seven old ladies seated round the table, in the centre of which stood the dish which had contained the pie, quite empty, whilst the mouths of the old ladies were still greasy, as if from delicious picking of bones, and consuming of savoury tit-bits.

“My pie!” roared Tartan, in a pretended fury. “I want to know, ma'am,” addressing the landlady, “what has become of the pie which I desired to be so carefully kept? It is atrocious, and I will never sleep under this roof another night!”

The landlady had dexterously and unperceived, as she fondly imagined, by Tartan, thrown the corner of the table cloth over the empty pie-dish, and, deluding herself with this false idea, she stood upon her dignity.

“Really, Mr. Tartan,” began the Glasgow Mrs. Squeezer, “I don't know what you mean by thus rudely forcing yourself into my room, when I am entertaining a few of my friends. As to your worthless pie,” she went on with unblushing effrontery, “all I have got to say is, that it was carefully put away, and if the cat got at it and devoured it, I can't help it; and have only to beg that you will at once retire from my apartments.”

She delivered herself of this brazen speech, (I suppose it is a habit which elderly females who take in and do for young men gradually acquire,) with a great deal of confidence and self-possession, considering the circumstances and the nature of the case, and her gesture, as she pointed with her finger to the door, was really quite impressive.

Tartan, however, didn't budge an inch. He walked coolly over to the table, and taking the corner of the table-cloth between his finger and thumb, deliberately turned it back, thus displaying in all the beauty of its cleanly-polished sides, the empty pie-dish.

“I always believed that your cat, madam, was an extraordinary animal,” he said, looking fixedly at the landlady the while; “but, really, if it be true that he has devoured my pie, he must have not only surpassed even himself, but every cat of which I have ever heard. The Kilkenny cats, indeed, ate one another, but your cat has beaten them hollow, inasmuch as he has eaten himself.”

“What do you mean?” gasped the landlady, beginning to grow very yellow in the face.

“Why, what I mean is this,” returned Tartan, more deliberately than ever, “that pie,” pointing with his finger to the empty dish, “contained the body of your cat—properly cleaned, seasoned, and prepared,” he added, “but, still, I repeat, the body of your precious cat. I don't say who has eaten him or who has not, but all I say is, that I hope whoever did eat him enjoyed him, and that he may agree with them. If it will be any consolation to you, madam, in your bereavement to possess his skin, which can be stuffed as naturally as life, I shall be most happy to make you a present of it, and will send it down to you;” but before Tartan had concluded the sentence, the horror-stricken landlady had fallen down in a faint, in which state she was conveyed to her bed, from which I understand that she did not rise for several weeks.

I need scarcely say that Tartan made his escape as quickly as possible from the infuriated old ladies, who seemed prepared to fall upon him and tear him to pieces. He rushed up stairs, screaming with laughter, and waited further proceedings. In the course of half an hour all the doctors in the neighbourhood had entered the house; while from every part of it issued those peculiar sounds, which, as a general rule, you only hear in the cabin of a steamer during a heavy gale of wind.

It is in no malevolent spirit that I tell you this veritable story, Mrs. Squeezer. As I have already said, I wish no harm either to you or your cat; but I repeat, that there are limits beyond which human endurance cannot go; and I trust, for your own sake, that you will not drive me to take desperate measures. If you do, the consequences rest upon your own head. Once again, I raise my voice, and solemnly exclaim, Mrs. Squeezer, beware! INCOG.

P.S.—“Inco” takes this his first, and, indeed, the only opportunity in his power, of returning his sincere thanks to his anonymous friend in Scotland for his sympathetic communication; and also for the valuable facts contained in that note, of which he has not failed to make due use. It is a great encouragement to him in his investigations of this interesting subject of “grievances,” to find his efforts meeting with such kindly appreciation, whilst his own sufferings evoke such warm expressions of sympathy and condolence as those uttered by his correspondent.

FAVERSHAM ON HIS WAY TO FAME.

BY BLANCHARD JERROLD.

CHAPTER II.

YOUNG man's way in the world is seldom won easily. Every father starts his boy with a notion that he is to enter the lists with peculiar advantages over ordinary combatants. He has a longer spear than his adversaries; his helmet is more easily carried than theirs; his armour is proof against the most deadly weapon. Therefore, he must be a conspicuous fellow, and must win a heavy bunch of laurels in a very short time. Other young men, the pet boy is told, have a hard time of it, and would give thousands for his long spear, and his strong armour. He ventures out into the field with this notion. Poor lad! His spear breaks with his first thrust; his heavy armour bears him to the earth. Then the father advances in anger to speak of advantages thrown away, of money squandered, of morals stained and tattered, of time misused. And the son hangs his head, or, stung with some vague sense of the parent's unjust verdict, talks loudly. He may forget his natural filial respect, and turn alone into the world, to seek friends who will bear with him in his wayward disposition, who will kindly pass his errors by, for the traits of goodness which redeem them; who will pardon his wild passions for the noble character that, in the end, shall master and subdue them. These friends, he finds, unhappily, far away from home, as a rule; and so, as he advances, he becomes estranged from the hearth at which he passed his infancy; or cherishes the remembrance of it chiefly for the mother who was so good to him, and who is now the only familiar friend he has there.

Young Newcome was not quite at his ease even with the good colonel his father. And how many Colonel Newcomes can any of us count in our circle? I may remember one or two among a hundred fathers, but then not one of these has all the boyish good humour, the mercy for faults, the gentleness in reproving them, which are the charming characteristics of the colonel's character. I am certain that among all the young men whom Faversham knew, he could not point to three on good terms with their fathers. Perhaps the fault lay usually with the young men; yet none of them were rascals, and most of them were good-hearted, and on excellent terms with their associates. They were generous in their views, happy to look to the bright side of any man's character; esteemed by old gentlemen whom they met on equal footing; yet with their fathers they never cared to spend a single week. If the governor sent the money required by return of post, he was a trump; if, instead of the desired pecuniary remittance, he favoured his son with a moral lecture, he was an old bore; if he paid a visit to his son's chambers, he was on a prying expedition. If the son got into a scrape, he did not care how far it was noised about so that it did not reach the governor's ears. Thus the governor was being to be drawn upon; from whom everything was to be hidden; who was never welcome in his boy's rooms; whose advice was a bore, and whose anger could not be afforded. Jack Ashby talked about "the old boy" having tipped him like a brick, or about my old governor who keeps me shamefully tight. Stackington looked upon his noble parent as the born liquidator of his tailor's bill. Clifton's father was a stern man, whom Clifton respected and avoided, but of whom he was independent, being a contributor to various journals. As for Namby, he delighted in telling the most ludicrous stories, reflecting either upon the parental sense or the parental probity; but I think he preferred the stories which damaged both at a blow. Faversham, who was a sensitive fellow, and hated to see people on bad terms, always expressed his distaste for stories of family quarrels.

"I and my father quarrel, occasionally," he would admit, "but I keep the row to myself—I am really sorry to be on bad terms with the old gentleman."

Not that Faversham felt at his ease when alone with Faversham senior, or sought, as a remarkably pleasant relaxation, a week in the old gentleman's company. But he was naturally tender-hearted, and sought to explain discords away. He talked about May and November; he endeavoured to explain to his companions that men of fifty, and men of twenty-five, had necessarily different tastes, and that, possibly, an old gentleman would find an evening at his own place, or at Namby's, a most stupid affair. Clifton, however, who delighted in having an argument out, and prided himself upon downright expression of opinion, would at once boldly go in to show that the fault was all on the side of the fathers. The father moulded the son—it was surely not the son who moulded the governor! Therefore, if the two fell out, it was only logical to lay the blame at the father's door, since he had obviously failed to bring up his son, as a loving, a clever, and an accomplished son.

"The fact is," Clifton went on to assert, with an emphasis intended to clinch the argument—"the son grows so much like the father, that the father says: 'What, ho! here's a fellow creeping up to my side, who will pretend to stand upon equal ground with me presently; who will put a wig and gown on like mine; who will cease to look up to me as his supreme earthly ruler; but who will absolutely think for himself. He will surely become a rebel in my little kingdom at home, for I shall no longer be able to lock him up, or cuff him when he contradicts me; or he will move an opposite way to that which I have pointed out. Let me assert my dignity at once. Let me brow-beat him, and show him how poor a thing a young man is. I intended him for the bar, and he has actually the impertinence to possess an eye for colour. If he will not bend to my will, he shall, under the heavy penalties of my displeasure. Surely I know better than he can know, whether or not he should become a painter.' That is the sort of thing, my boys. For instance, my governor, for whom I have great respect, thought I should make a good lawyer. Well, you all know by this time, that I am not likely to disturb any gentleman present who may happen to occupy the wool-sack twenty years hence. I told him I had a love of art. He replied that I ought to be keeping myself. I retorted hastily, that I would keep myself; and I have done so from that moment. I and my father are friends still, while we are apart, and I dare say he is a very lovable sort of person to people who are admitted on intimate terms with him; but he never allowed me this intimacy, so I cannot speak from experience. Now this is the sort of thing with us all. We are all to be great men, but we seem to be slow in getting our crine on. This laziness and money rows are the points upon which young men and their governors split. These have too much dignity to make companions of the fellows whose ears they have pulled through happy infancy; and we seem to have too much spirit to be slaves. So each goes his own way, in the belief that each is ill-used. I know we are rioters, that we smoke shamefully, that we are up later than the family doctor would advise us to be out and about; it is quite true that Jack bought a Don Cesar de Bezan costume with the tin which his governor gave him to pay his rent; but surely our governors did all this before us, and if we were to believe them, they became decent fellows enough after a few years' wildness, and made, I believe, at least, some sort of reputation in the world. In the same way we shall turn up on our feet at last. And as for masquerading, why I saw Mr. Sergeant Blaring the other night dancing at Vauxhall with Lady Macbeth!"

In this way Faversham's friends discussed parental duties. And looking at the question from Clifton's point of view, many of us may perceive little bright bits of truth—of truth that should guide us all, if we would make good fathers, and being good fathers, rear sons that will make intimate friends of us when they grow up.

Among Faversham's friends, however, Namby was the man who had always a brisk parental quarrel in hand. There appeared to be seldom an interval of civility between father and son. Weddings and funerals, and Christmas dinners, were the special occasions on which the young gentleman to whose rooms the reader has been already introduced, was distinctly summoned to spend a few hours under his father's roof. And then the father and son invariably launched into an argument which ended in a quarrel. On no subject of human interest did the father and son think alike. But poor Mrs. Namby could not understand this quarrelling; she would beg of her "dear boy, George," to listen quietly to his father, who was a very great man, and ought not to be contradicted.

George Namby, Esq., Q.C., was a great man at home. When he spoke at the dinner table, Mrs. Namby glanced at the guests to catch their looks of admiration. Mr. Namby had grown to his "proud position" out of the corduroys of a country charity boy. He professed to glory in this, and when he waved the muffin cap of his youth in the presence of his democratic constituents, deafening cheers greeted him. I think he would have taken it as a personal favour, if any genealogist could have proved to him that he was born in a work-house. To young Namby the parental glories were most distasteful, and he declared that in this boasted humility there was a very low kind of pride. "To pull down your parents into the mud, that you may look all the taller raised upon their backs, is not a very creditable action," said young Namby, often.

The quarrels between father and son became at last so frequent, that it was necessary to come to an arrangement which should effectually separate the radical father from the conservative son. It was agreed that the son should draw his quarterly allowance from the parental bank, and send the receipt for it to his father's head clerk. In this way there would be no occasion for a letter to pass between Mr. Namby, senior, and Mr. Namby, junior. This happy expedient having been arranged, the young gentleman announced to his friends, that he and the governor had at last come to terms; and that they had mutually agreed not to write to, or visit each other, except on some very pressing emergency.

Namby stated the cause of quarrel in his shrill voice, (with that quiet face never moving the while,) as an inveterate objection his father had to comic writing.

"He persists in ignoring my humorous powers; and I tell him I might as well deny his legal knowledge. He says, that I am a paid buffoon; I reply, that equal talent is wanted to write a burlesque as to state a case. He has a pet currency theory, which I smashed; he said, all the country wanted was an enormous supply of paper money; he insisted that bank-notes created wealth; I replied, that he mistook the ticket for the soup. And so we parted."

And in this way, strong in himself, young George Namby stalked into the field to carve his own fortune, and determined at least to back his sword with the strength of a brave heart. When Faversham was first introduced to him, he had already been his own master some six or seven months; during that period he had worked hard at times, and at times had been wild with his money. He had, however, contracted friendships that kept his heart warm. Perhaps—of these friends—Clifton was the man who appreciated him with the most discrimination. He saw something sound and good, though rugged and unpleasant, under that saucy humour which characterized Namby's general conversation. He believed thoroughly, that the time would come, when Namby would cast aside his contemptuous verdicts on men and things; when he would become tolerant, and gentle, and even tender. And looking forward to this time, he cherished his friendship for the brave young jester, for the pleasure that it promised. Clifton, himself, hated the sentiments entertained, as he believed, for the moment, by Namby; for the young press-writer was a liberal—with all the ardour for his party which a young man, once interested in politics, usually exhibits. Namby wrote sparkling paragraphs to damage the radicals; attacked a political principle with a pun; and threw a mot at every bill before the House of Commons. It was Clifton's business, on the contrary, to take up all questions serious. He read political thinkers attentively; he had heaps of blue books in his chambers; he was an occasional student of "McCulloch's Dictionary;" he knew all that had been said on both sides about "Free Trade" and "Protection." The benefits of competition were at his fingers' ends; the evils of every kind of "Protection" he could demonstrate at any moment; and he turned the attention of his friends constantly towards America—where, he said, men drew the breath of freedom—and, added Namby, were subject to the mild regime of the bowie-knife. The difference of opinion existing between the two young men was not more decided than that of their persons and habits. Clifton was a spare, muscular man, with a pale, thoughtful face, and an expression habitually serious. His manners were reserved, and he cared little for society. If he ever danced, it was after great persuasion; if he ever prepared himself for the opera, it was to oblige a friend. He would sit up smoking and talking till the sun shamed him; but he was never attracted to Vauxhall three times throughout his period of residence in the Temple. Namby was a capital dancer; had appeared at Vauxhall in many costumes, was well known at various late London houses; showed his placid face, and shrilly piped his jokes wherever he was invited. The primrose gloves he wore in six months would have lasted Clifton his lifetime. And then his fat figure, and his round head, upon which some sculptor seemed to have begun the model of a face, but to have left off his duty half-performed, are to be considered. The nose was an unfinished protuberance; the mouth was a curved slit; the eyes appeared to have been just pushed into the clay, and left there, without the ceremony of moulding the delicate rise and fall which should throw light and shade about them. Then the round head was fastened to the body by a thick, shapeless neck. The shrill voice that almost whistled from this extraordinary head was ludicrous in itself; and people who heard Namby make an observation for the first time, turned round, wondering to hear that little voice issue from that substantial bust.

Faversham had no great admiration for Namby. He disliked the ill-nature apparent in his jokes; he did not share in his independent views of men and things. He said that young men should hold themselves back; bear themselves modestly towards their elders; and issue verdicts but sparingly.

The hall dinners frequently brought these men together. They met in the little kind of passage in which they put their gowns on, and sat upon a table against the screen, waiting to make up a mess. They were known, too, and liked by all the panniers, and were on particular terms with the smart old gentleman in velvet robes, who kept the list of attendances, and presented their bills to them with jocular remarks. Their jokes about the gastronomic indulgences of the benchers—their endeavours to obtain sauces or dishes from the cross-tables—their propensities for treating their favourite panniers to wine—their utter disregard of all law questions—their easy way of forming acquaintances, made them a very popular Temple set. As they left the hall after dinner, running across the tables to make an early exit, and as they threw their gowns into the open arms of the attendant at the hall-door, invitations to various chambers were pressed upon them, cigar cases were opened for their convenience, and a pannier issued from the room beyond, where the butler was counting the heavy baskets of plate, with a lighted paper. They left with a "good-night" for every body, and generally with the promise of having "just one glass of grog" in one of the adjacent courts. Stackington was at once the swell and the butt of the party. Namby liked him because he had Plantagenet blood in his veins, but joked him, because the opportunities he offered were irresistible. Clifton, however, intensely disliked him, partly because he was an aristocrat, and partly because he was a very shallow fellow. Faversham admired his coats, and was inclined to cultivate him for his gentle birth; but Ashby was undisguised in his satisfaction when he made the acquaintance of a peer's son.

Stackington liked Faversham. There was in this young gentleman a certain bearing that suggested to strangers a descent from a long line of earls; and, to be just to Faversham, this bearing was without pretension of any kind. He was not proud, he was not haughty, he was not cold. He had a natural refinement which blended itself with every act of his life—which he carried with him upon the wildest scenes of his youth, and which gave him tastes difficult to satisfy with £200 a year. His set cared very little for private society—avoided taking tea in any metropolitan suburb; but Faversham might be found rubbing his patent leather boots with a white handkerchief, in his little Temple chambers, on many a winter's night. Namby dropped in, perhaps, and remonstrated with him; or Ashby tried to lure him away to a whist table in Pump Court. But Faversham was always resolute in his determination to exhibit the patent leathers at the evening party to which he had been invited. Namby said he was a most lady-like man, and that his sisters were most gentlemanly women. Ashby insisted that Faversham had once kept him waiting for three-quarters of an hour while he dressed in full evening costume, to witness a sparring match in the neighbourhood of Leicester-square.

To close a long digression, and to return to that point at which we left the natural current of our story. On the morrow of the party at Namby's chambers, while Namby was yet in bed, and the cigar ash still lay about his sitting-room, Clifton knocked at Faversham's door. A second knock produced a muffled grunt from within—a third knock was followed by a bump upon the floor and a shuffling noise. In a minute afterwards the door was opened by Faversham to Mr. Clifton. Faversham was too polite to exhibit the annoyance he felt at being seen with tumbled hair and an uncombed moustache. He begged his visitor to enter his sitting-room, telling him that he would find plenty of pipes in the cupboard, and as much bottled ale as he liked to drink under the sofa. And then the host disappeared to "add perfume to the violet," which was Mr. Namby's expression for the cares of the toilette.

Meanwhile, Clifton, in no way inconvenienced by the evening he had spent, threw open the cupboard, selected his pipe, and took up a volume of Shelley. Clifton thought that was just the sort of book Faversham would read—a book without an atom of sound thought in it; a book whence no single fact of avail to the progress of the world could be evoked. He rubbed his closely-cropped head nervously as he read; and seemed, as he turned over leaf after leaf, to grow more and more irritated. He was disgusted with its constant reference to flowers, honey, and bees; and, at last, he pitched it aside, with the declaration that there was no good of any kind in it. Science was to him the end and aim of all intellectual exertion. Whether to discover new combinations of human labour, new natural laws, new properties in matter, all efforts should tend to the solution of some problem. Thus, all fiction which, instead of elucidating social laws for the information of the world, generally distorted them, according to Clifton, was to be avoided and discountenanced. Following out this logic to its utmost limits, our philosopher had discovered, at the early age of twenty-two, that poetry had done infinite harm to the civilised world. He described it as intellectual dram-drinking. His visit to Faversham was due to an anxiety he felt to know the exact state of this gentleman's opinions. Some delicately-tinted note-paper and envelopes, together with a heap of dirty white gloves lying in a corner of the sofa, gave him ugly suspicions. He had fears that he had recently made the acquaintance of a very idle dandelion.

Faversham presently entered the room magnificently prepared for breakfast. He wore berlin-wool slippers, upon which some tender hand had worked a group of pansies and violets; he had a perfectly-adjusted black cravat about his neck; broad stripes meandered from his pockets down his trousers, and his waistcoat presented a plaid of the quietest design. This kind of tailoring gave Clifton a very unfavourable impression; but it was natural that the fellow who had daubed pencil-marks upon every page of his Shelley, should wear pansies upon his slippers! The soda-water and tea duly discussed, the honey put aside (for in the summer Faversham ate bread and honey), the two young men having thoroughly aromatised Ashby, settled down to a quiet conversation, and to bitter ale and pipes.

Faversham had intended to write the opening pages of his romance, but he could not turn Clifton out, nor did he feel inclined to get rid of him. All he wanted was an excuse for not devoting his morning to work, and in his early visitor he welcomed that excuse; besides there was always something to be got out of a conversation with an ordinarily intelligent man. Thus, perfectly contented with himself, he filled his pipe, and relieved the pansies upon his slippers against the fender.

"So, Mr. Clifton, you are surprised that I eat honey for breakfast?"

"I think a mutton chop and a pint of beer would do you more good," Clifton replied, as he filled his glass with the liquor he recommended.

"It doesn't agree with me; it makes me heavy; it takes all romance, all love of the beautiful out of a man. Now, there is something sweet in the associations which flit about a bee-hive! A man actually in Pump Court is whisked away to Mount Hybla upon a slice of bread and honey!"

While Faversham talked in this way, in a half-humorous, half-serious tone, his guest kept his eye fixed upon the end of his pipe, puffing strongly, the while, the smoke into rich grey clumps, which rose boldly as his own thoughts, as rapidly and with an end, I am afraid we shall find, as faint and useless.

"I see we are not likely to understand one another, Mr. Faversham," Clifton said, as he cleared the last volume of smoke from his mouth with a bound. "I am disappointed, for I hoped you were a man with a strong, practical tendency."

"I catch your meaning," Faversham answered, rather nervously, and with an expression which a friend would have recognised as one of sarcastic disdain. "The difference between us may be explained in a few words: you derive your logic from a study of McCulloch; I get any I may have from Shelley. We need not be the less friends for this difference—take some more beer."

"A dexterous definition, I grant," Clifton pursued, without either accepting the beer, or the civil wish of his host, "but to me, unsatisfactory. I estimate a thing by the value—material or immaterial—you are able to get out of it."

"So do I, my boys," said Ashby, as he entered the room, in a pea-jacket, without a cravat—"so hand me over the bottle. If there be nothing in it I will throw it under the sofa, because there's nothing to be got out of it; but if there be something in it, I will cherish it accordingly till it is empty. Hang it! no more philosophy. I am going down to Hastings, to-night, to the governor; so I shall get a dose of it there. Faversham knows, to his cost, what a hand my sister is at it."

"Now, then, Jack, no nonsense. He has a sister, Mr. Clifton, any fellow might be proud of." Faversham was glad to turn the conversation to general topics.

Other men dropped in rapidly. Stackington, the magnificent, strolled in last. Clifton coldly bowed to him, and disappeared very soon after the aristocrat arrived, slipping a little book into Faversham's hand, and begging him to read it, if it were not too heavy for him, as he passed out of the room.

Ashby was most energetic in his attentions to his honourable guest. Stackington would have conferred a personal favour upon that gentleman if he had consumed all the beer in the chambers, and had kindly emptied the tobacco-jar into his pocket. Stackington was shrewd enough to perceive Ashby's veneration; and although he was not altogether regardless of the attentions it produced, he had a slight contempt for the fellow who offered them. He felt that Ashby must be a very obscure person to think him a "swell;" but he did not discourage this verdict, nevertheless.

There is no democracy more complete—no republic more thorough—than that which governs the society of young men. In the free atmosphere of London chambers, my Lord de Lys may shake out pictures of all his quarters without obtaining a better footing than Barlow, the great biscuit-baker's son; the young baronet may have his cab waiting for him, and his balls to talk about, yet if he be a fool, or a snob at heart, he will come in for his full share of unpopularity.

The representatives of the great families learn at Eton lessons of liberal meaning, which, let us hope, will be of use to them all when worldly heads abase themselves before them. In the same way, these Temple courts—dingy places though they be—are so many colleges, where young men first come in contact with the world. All the light that struggles into these low, old rooms, comes from the young hearts they harbour; none penetrates through their smoked windows from the sky. Here all worldly considerations are set aside; the peer's son and the tradesman's son meet on equal ground to smoke and drink, and think together. Many grey heads are shaken at these windows; but, believe me, there is more good than harm comes from even the smoking parties peculiar to these regions. The beer may give occasional headaches; the tobacco may benumb the brain, still there is a heartiness among the men—a true liberality of soul, which sweetens the early days of life. Few of us grow better as we grow older. The ambitious become misanthropes; the liberal hand closes up; the free mind grows diplomatic; the warm blood recedes from the heart as the colour fades from the hair. Well may Lord de Lys cherish the remembrance of the time when to the baker's son he was simple Jack de Lys. That intimacy was worth all the respect which has familiarised him with the crown of men's heads ever since.

Did any man, save Ashby, ever move from his seat when Stackington entered the room? No; Lord Stackington's son, shuffled upon the corner of the table—when all the chairs were occupied—and, in no way condescending, smoked the dhudeen the baker's heir had lately had between his lips. The Stackingtons occasionally meet young fellows in whom the snobbish element of life displays a precocious development; but the Stackingtons then despise it, although in after life it becomes a pleasure to them. Thus Stackington, although the son of a peer, was a gentleman upon whom practical jokes—always stupid jokes—were played; whose dress was a constant source of amusement to the set; and who had fewer invitations "to make a night of it" than most of his associates. He certainly was a very mediocre person. He was remarkable for nothing so much as for a composure which no contre-temps could disturb. If he said a stupid thing, and the company became merry at his expense, he quietly asked the noisiest of the laughers to hand him a pipe-light, and calmly blew his Turkish tobacco cloud. At home he was a very great person, but, he could not possibly account for it, directly he came in contact with Temple men he was little more than a tailor's dummy. Here his quarterings were of no account. Faversham alone of all the Temple set known to Mr. Stackington, enjoyed this gentleman's perfect good will.

Ashby marked down that day in his calendar when Stackington dipped his long fingers into his tobacco-jar, as a bright one. Faversham saw this with regret. It jarred upon him; he felt that Stackington must think his hum a very vulgar kind of person. To make up for Ashby's assiduity Faversham was undoubtedly off-hand.

"I am afraid you'll have to sit upon that pile of books, Stackington," said Mr. Faversham to his exquisite visitor, pointing to a confused heap of the "Annual Register," with his pipe.

"All right," answered the Hon. Mr. Stackington, as he proceeded to dust his seat with his handkerchief. "Deuced dirty, though."

Mr. Stackington was relieved from his embarrassment by Ashby, who persisted in giving up his arm-chair, although he had studiously kept that seat when Namby and others had entered the room.

Stackington had called on this occasion to ask Faversham—for the first time—to pay Lord Stackington a visit. It must not be disguised that this invitation was most welcome to the young gentleman. He would have been shocked if a friend had accused him of love for a lord in the abstract; but he did like that kind of society known as "good society." The invitation was to Hastings, where the baron had a marine residence.

Ashby was going, as he had already intimated, to this watering-place to meet his father. Faversham had already arranged to go with Ashby, so that it was agreed, to the latter gentleman's great joy, that the three should depart together. Having finished all the ale that Mr. Faversham's wine and beer merchant had deposited under his sofa, the young men were unceremoniously informed by Ashby that they must go, as he and Faversham had barely time to pack their portmanteaus. This proposition was met by Namby (who had come with the shameful intention of reading his last parody to Faversham) with a determination to replenish his pipe. It was in vain that the hosts tried to turn their unceremonious visitors out; so they packed up in their presence, and under the fire of their criticism, and only left them at the railway station, the roysterers returning to dine at the "Dolphin," in Fleet-street.

PROLONGING THE BEAUTY OF CUT FLOWERS.—For keeping flowers in water, finely powdered charcoal, in which the stalks can be stuck at the bottom of the vase, preserves them surprisingly, and renders the water free from any obnoxious qualities. When cut flowers have faded, either by being worn a whole evening in one's dress, or as a bouquet, by cutting half an inch from the end of the stem in the morning, and putting the freshly-trimmed end instantly into quite boiling water, the petals may be seen to become smooth and to resume their beauty, often in a few minutes. Coloured flowers—carnations, azaleas, roses, and geraniums, may be treated in this way. White flowers turn yellow. The thickest textured flowers amend the most, although azaleas revive wonderfully. We have seen flowers that have lain the whole night on a table, after having been worn for hours, which at breakfast next morning were perfectly renovated by means of a cupful of hot water.

WEDDINGS AND THEIR ASSOCIATIONS.

OR so far, in this world, there is no cessation to the occasions of marrying and giving in marriage, and, no doubt, our fair readers look upon such opportunities with a spirit of interest which would do honour to more primitive ages. We never knew any lady who has not gone a shopping with the most earnest zest whenever she was destined to appear at a wedding déjeuner, and we must add also, that we never knew one who was free from a flutter of excitement as to how such a transaction would go off. Until the bride has stepped into her travelling carriage with the happy man, whirled off from a railway station, or steamed away in a packet-boat, the mental organisation of the most staid of the female members of the bridal friendly circle has been ever a victim to visions of tulle d'illusion, orange blossoms, and white lace, kid gloves and blanc mange, nice young men and splendid settlements, to an extent positively alarming to contemplate. We must admit in our own person to have attempted—vainly attempted—upon a few occasions to combat the flutter to which we refer, and awe it down by the dignity of our mortal manhood, and we must confess our utter discomfiture in every such attempt. White lace and female excitement have been at all such times triumphant, and we have paid the penalty at M'Swiney, Delany, and Company's palace mart, when we have paid for a bonnet, an opera cloak, a sash ribbon, and a pair of bracelets, as a peace offering specially designed for the adornment of our decidedly better half at the ceremony. At such times we have privately sought consolation from the contemplation of the reduction in our funds, by contemplating the systems of conducting marriage formula over the world, and now place the result before our readers.

In the Jewish tribes the candidates for matrimony were betrothed before the elders or the governors of the place, at the house of the bride's father. It is asserted by Jewish writers that after the espousals the bride remained during ten months at least in her parents' house, in order to make suitable preparations for her marriage ceremony. This period past, the wedding was celebrated by a feast of seven days. The bride was adorned on the occasion with as much care and elegance as could be afforded by her station in life, and a nuptial crown was placed upon her head. A curious difference existed between the Israelite mode of holding the festival and the modern. At the ancient marriage feast of the Jews, the bridegroom and his party feasted in one apartment, whilst the bride and her companions enjoyed themselves in another. On the last day of the seven the bride was conducted to the house of the bridegroom's father. The procession usually set off in the evening with great ceremony. The bridegroom was clothed with a marriage robe and crown, and the bride was covered from head to foot with a veil. Each of them was accompanied by his or her companions marshalled in a distinct body, playing on musical instruments, and singing songs composed for the occasion. The maidens who accompanied the bride wore veils which completely concealed their features. As they passed along the way which led to the bridegroom's house, their path was illuminated by the light of torches placed at intervals to shine upon their path. At the bridegroom's house his female relatives and friends, invited for the occasion, came forth to meet them. They also waved torches or bore lamps as they moved forward. Having met the bridal party, they joined their ranks and accompanied them to the residence. Upon their entrance the doors were shut, and no other guests admitted to the marriage supper and its accompanying festivity.

The modern Jews considerably differ, in their ceremonial of marriage, from their forefathers. The bride is accompanied to the place of celebration by her female friends, and the bridegroom by his male friends. The company is always large, as unless ten men are present the ceremony is null and void. When the marriage is about to be solemnised, a canopy of velvet is brought into the room, and extended on four posts. The bride is led beneath this canopy by two females, the bridegroom by two men. Those are generally the female and male parents of each, if such are living; if not, the nearest kindred perform this duty. The celebrant then takes a glass of wine; and having recited a formulary prayer, offers the glass to the bride and bridegroom, who both drink of the wine, after which the bridegroom places the ring on the finger of the bride. Then the marriage contract is read, and when its reading is concluded, the person officiating takes another glass of wine and gives it to the bridegroom and the bride, who both drink. The empty glass is then laid upon the floor, and the bridegroom stamping upon it breaks it to pieces. This is intended to symbolise the frailty of life. All the company then cry out, "Good luck to you!" The ceremony is followed by alms for the poor. After this ensues the nuptial feast for seven days. The nuptial ceremonial of Christianity is, we have no doubt, a subject with which our readers are well acquainted; but the merely social forms were somewhat different in the early ages to those with which we are familiarised. Unmarried females in those times wore a purple fillet, which was unbowed before the rites began; a veil was then thrown over the bride. The ordinary formula was then gone through, after which the parties were adorned with garlands of flowers, and went in procession to their home. The evening was closed with a marriage feast, at which the friends of the bride and bridegroom were present.

Amongst the ancient Greeks marriage was looked upon as a solemn transaction. On the day before its celebration sacrifices were offered. The bride and bridegroom cut off a portion of their hair and dedicated it to the gods. Towards the evening of the day of marriage the bride was conducted from the residence of her father to that of the bridegroom, accompanied by the bridegroom and a companion, whom he selected for the occasion. Crowds of attendants marched in procession, carrying lighted torches, and vocal and instrumental music hailed the bridal party as it moved along. The bride was veiled, and she as well as the bridegroom wore a chaplet on her head. As the parties entered the house which was to be their residence, confectious were showered over their heads, to indicate that abundance of all good things might ever await them. The marriage was not celebrated by a civil or religious rite. A nuptial feast was held in the house of the bridegroom, at which both men and women were present, seated at different tables. The epithalamium or nuptial hymn was then sung, and the ceremonies were over. On the following day it was customary for the friends of the parties to send presents to the wedded pair.

The custom of a Roman marriage differed in many respects from the Grecian mode. The wedding day was never fixed without consulting the auspices. Certain days were always avoided as being unlucky. When those difficulties were arranged, on the occasion of the marriage the bride wore a long white robe adorned with a purple fringe, or with ribbons, a girdle was worn around the waist, whilst a veil of a bright yellow colour was thrown over the head, and shoes of the same colour were worn upon the feet. When dressing, the hair of the bride was divided with the point of a spear. No religious ceremony was used upon the occasion. In the evening the bride was conducted to the house of her husband, carrying in her hand a distaff and a spindle with wool. Three boys accompanied her dressed in the prætexta, one bearing a torch before her, and the other two walking by her side. The procession was also attended by a large company of the friends both of bride and bridegroom. On reaching the house, the entrance of which was ornamented with flowers, the utmost care was taken that the bride should not strike against the threshold, which would be an unlucky omen. To prevent this she was carried into the house. Before entering, however, she wound a portion of the wool around the door-posts and anointed them with lard, after which the bridegroom met her with fire and water, which she was required to touch. She then advanced and took her seat upon a sheep skin spread for the purpose, after which the keys of the house were formally handed to her. A marriage feast terminated the proceedings.

Amongst the ancient Scandinavians the marriage ceremony consisted in feasting chiefly. The bridegroom having obtained the consent of the maiden, and also that of her parents, appointed the day, and having assembled his relatives and friends, sent some of them to receive the bride from her father. On those occasions the dowry was also given. The father of the bride then accompanied her and the bridegroom's party to his house, and there formally gave her into his hands. After this the bride and bridegroom sat down to table with their guests, who drank their healths, and tossed the gods and heroes in Valhalla, in full draughts of the beer of the heroes Vikings. The bride's friends then took her up on their shoulders and bore her around the apartment—a mark of esteem amongst the Goths. The husband then presented the wife with a pair of oxen for the plough, a harnessed horse, a shield, a lance, and a sword. "This," says Tacitus, "was to signify that she should not lead an idle and luxurious life, but was to become a partner with him in his labours and a companion in danger, and equally sharing with him the lot of peace or war." He states also that the women on their parts gave some arms; this was the sacred bond of their union, these their mystic rites, and these the duties who presided over their marriage." The yoked oxen, the caparisoned horse, and the arms, all served to instruct the women how they were to lead their lives, and how, perhaps, life might be terminated. The arms were to be carefully preserved, and, being conveyed by the son the husband made of them, were to be consigned as portions for the daughters, and to be handed down to posterity.

Those modern nations which are still darkened by barbarism have some very peculiar and interesting ceremonies upon the nuptial occasion. In Japan, after the preliminary choice has been made by the bride, and the wedding day fixed, an intelligent female servant, of the second class, is sent to the house of the bride to attend her; and the father of the bride, having invited all his kinsfolk, entertains them previous to the bride's departure; the bridal party sets out in litters, called in that country marimasa. A mediator or "go-between," being always the originator of a marriage in Japan, precedes them to the house of the bridegroom. His wife occupies the first of the numerous litters, then the bride, then the bride's mother, and finally her father, constitute the train. The bride is dressed in white, the Japanese mourning colour, to signify that she is about to be taken from her parents. At the right hand of the mediator in the bridegroom's residence is stationed an old woman, having a mortar containing some rice cakes, and on the left is an old man furnished out in the same manner. When the bride's litter makes the appointment they begin to pound their mortars vigorously, the man shouting, at each blow, "a thousand years!" the woman exclaiming, just as often, "ten thousand!"—thus alluding to the supposed length of life of the tortoise and the crane, and invoking them for the bride. As the litter passes between those personages, the man pounds the cakes into the mortar of his female companion, and both pound vigorously together. What is thus pounded is made up into two cakes, which are given a conspicuous position in the apartment where the marriage is to be celebrated. Within the passage of the house the litter is met by the bridegroom, who stands in the door of ceremony ready to receive it. There is seated in the same room a woman with a lantern, and several others behind her. It was by the light of this lantern that the bridegroom first saw his bride, and if he felt dissatisfied with her appearance now, he can at the sight of preventing the ceremony from being performed.

As the light of the lantern reaches to him a small bag, placed in the trunk window of her litter, containing a small image of the gods, is handed to the female servant, who places it in the wedding apartment and hangs it up. The bride is then conducted to the apartment, the lantern-bearer preceding her. The ceremony is very simple. The mediator, his wife, the bridegroom, and bride, are assembled together in the same apartment, and the ceremony is commenced. Two young girls, one of whom is the bride's sister, and the other the female butterfly, from the time when they first carry, pour out wine into one another's cups, and then each upon the other. The bride then takes a little of the wine, and sips a little of it, and then hands it to the bridegroom, who, in like manner, puts the bowl under the third, takes up the second bowl, it to be filled, and, drinking out of it three times, presents it to the bride, who performs the same ceremony, and puts the second bowl under the third, takes it up, and, after holding it to be filled, begins the same formula as before, and giving it to the bridegroom, he drinks and places the bowl under the first; this concludes the ceremony. The relatives are informed that the marriage is celebrated, and join the bride and bridegroom for the wedding feast.

In Madagascar, when the choice is made, and the preliminaries arranged, a lucky day is fixed by a soothsayer, and the relatives of the bride and bridegroom meet at the houses of the respective parties. All are attired in their best apparel, and decorated with their gayest ornaments. At the appointed hour the relatives or friends of the bridegroom accompany him to the house of the bride. There receive the dowry, which being settled, he is received by the bride as her future husband. They eat together, and are recognized by the senior members of the family as husband and wife; a benediction is pronounced upon them, and a prayer offered to God that they may have a numerous offspring, abundance of cattle, many slaves, great wealth, and increase the honours of their respective families. They then repair to the house of the parents or friends of the bridegroom, and again eat together, when similar benedictions are pronounced by the senior members of the family, or the head man of the village, who is usually invited to attend the ceremony. The nuptial bond is in some instances now regarded as complete; general feasting ensues, after which the parties return to their respective homes, and the newly-married couple to the residence prepared for them.

In the South Sea Islands the marriage ceremony is a curious proceeding, as described by Mr. Williams in his "Researches." He gives a very life-like account of an instance at which he was present. A group of women seated under the shade of a noble tree, which stood at a short distance from the house, chaunted, in a pleasing and lively air, the heroic deeds of the chieftain and his ancestors; and opposite to them, beneath the spreading branches of a bread-fruit tree, sat the newly-purchased bride, a tall and beautiful young woman, about eighteen years of age. Her dress was a fine mat, fastened around the waist, reaching nearly to her ankles, with a wreath of leaves and flowers, ingeniously and tastefully contrived, decorated her brow. The upper part of her person was anointed with sweet-scented cocoa-nut oil, and tinged partially with a rouge prepared from the turmeric root, and round her neck were two rows of large blue beads. Her whole deportment was pleasingly modest. While listening to the chaunters, and looking upon the novel scene before us, our attention was attracted by another company of women who were following each other in single file, and chaunting, as they came, the praises of their chief. Sitting down with the company which preceded them, they united in one general chorus, which appeared to be in praise of the bridegroom and his progenitors. This ended, a dance, in honour of the marriage, was commenced, which was considered one of their grandest exhibitions, and held in high esteem by the people. The performers were four young women, all daughters of chiefs of the highest rank, who took their stations at right angles on the fine mats with which the dancing-house was spread, and then interchanged positions with slow and graceful movements both of the hands and feet, while the bride recited some of the mighty doings of her forefathers. Such is the marriage ceremonial down by the lone Pacific. The bride is bought and paid for there, so that a numerous family of girls is a valuable stock-in-trade to the avaricious savage who possesses them. There is a touch of slave traffic about it which divests it of interest.

Marriage amongst the Hindoos, is conducted with great pomp and enormous outlay. It is stated that a parent will often expend his whole fortune on a marriage entertainment, and pass the rest of his days in the most pitiable destitution. The nuptial ceremonies continue during many days. The wedding dinner is given to an immense number of guests, and if the entertainers be rich, is extremely magnificent. Upon this occasion only, the bride sits down to partake with her husband, of the luxuries provided; indeed both eat out of the same plates. This, however, is the only time in her life that the wife is allowed such a privilege; henceforward she never sits down to a meal with her husband. Even at the nuptial feast, she eats what he leaves unless she be too much of an infant—for females are married in Hindostan at ten or twelve years old—to be sensible of the honour done her. Some sacrifices being made on the last day of the festival, a procession is made through the streets of the town or village. It commonly takes place at night, the streets being brilliantly illuminated with innumerable torches. The newly-married pair are seated in the same palanquin facing each other. They are magnificently arrayed in brocaded stuffs, adorned with jewels presented them by their parents, and if their parents are unable to make such presents, the gems are borrowed for the occasion. Before the palanquin marches a band of musicians, who drown every other sound in the braying of horns, the clamour of drums, pipes, and cymbals. As the procession moves onward, the friends and relatives of the bride and bridegroom come out of their houses to express their congratulations as they pass, offering them various presents, for which, however, they expect a more than adequate return.

Like the Hindoos, the Chinese incur large expense in celebrating marriages. The bride, locked up in a red quilt sedan, borne by four men, usually followed by a train of friends gaily dressed, accompanied by music, and bearing banners, is carried by night to the house of the bridegroom. Here the parties pledge each other in a cup of wine, and together worship the ancestral tablets, together with prostrating themselves before the parents of the bridegroom. This done, the Celestials are held to be formally united.

In those details, our readers have the description of most of the strange ceremonies by which marriage has been, or is at present, instituted. From Sackville-street to the South-Sea territories, it seems to be an interesting occasion to the fair sex, of which they take the utmost advantage in crinoline and tarlatane, with wine and cake in the one region, and in newly-done up mats, cocoa-nut milk, and dancing in the other. We confess, after all, to a leaning to the crinoline and tarlatane, and the additional ecstasies; and conclude our jottings by professing our preference, even at the cost of being amerced for the same on the next possible opportunity, in the which event we will lay down our money generously; deriving courage from a vision of banian trees, mat millinery, and the wife trade, gathered in gloomier days of meditation.

THE LADY OF DARREN.

IT was a bright day, early in October. The two preceding days had been wet and stormy, but now not a breeze shook the brown leaves in the woods, the clouds had cleared away from the blue heavens, and the cheerful sun shone down upon the landscape with a calm, warm smile, as if the golden summer were once more about to return. The jays and starlings, and hosts of other birds, sat upon the sunny sides of the trees, pecking at their glossy plumage, and singing and chattering away merrily; the shy hare rustled the fallen leaves in its joyous gambols beneath upon the sere grass, and the wily fox and ruffian wolf emerged from their caverned homes, and basked themselves in the genial light, as if the spirit of peace had descended into their savage hearts, and they were never more to commit havoc amongst the weaker denizens of the forest. The solitary crags upon the steep mountains looked silently down with the stern smile they had worn in the moonlight of many a faded century, upon the winding river and the wide labyrinth of forest beneath, whose aged trees crowded low-lying shores and valley with their naked trunks, like battalions of giants arrayed in serried ranks awaiting their foes; and the streams that had roared savagely, during the preceding day, adown their rocky channels, now began to subside, and sent their murmuring voices in low and quiet cadences from the surrounding hills.

Amid the above-mentioned forest by the Liffey shore, stood a strong mansion, which, some centuries ago, was occupied by a widowed lady, by name Margaret Preston, who dwelt there with her only child, Mary, a young girl just verging into her eighteenth year. On the noon of the above day, a page was leading the way, accompanied by Mary Preston, into a solitary path that wound northwards along the shore of the river, from the gate of the house of Darren, the home of his fair companion. Mary Preston, as she looked forward, suddenly beheld a powerful black horse, standing beneath a tree, an armed knight leaning beside him. The heart of the young lady of Darren beat and fluttered hurriedly at the sight, for she well knew that martial form, but, overcoming her maiden shyness, she hastened onward, and in a few moments was beneath the tree, and clasped fondly to the breast of Sir Brian Courtenay, one of the bravest knights belonging to the gallant city of Dublin. The page, after fastening the bridle of his master's horse to a branch of the tree, with a laugh of delight at bringing the two lovers together, scrambled nimbly up the jagged face of the crag, and perched himself upon its summit, a wary sentinel over the trysting-place beneath. Courtenay and Mary Preston sat themselves side by side upon a fragment of rock, with hearts so full of love and joy at their meeting, that for some moments they scarcely knew how to speak.

"Dearest," said the young knight, when at length he found words for his thoughts, "I owe thee much for what thou hast undergone for my sake."

"Ah, me!" answered Mary, "how I suffered when I heard of the battle, and the sad doom they laid upon thee!" and she sighed at the remembrance.

"Methought," resumed her lover, "that a worse doom even than death awaited me, for, the first night after I was taken prisoner at the battle of the Red Rath, I doubted thee, and thought thee false!"

"How couldst thou think so, Brian?" said she, casting upon him a look of mingled fondness and reproach. "Did I not plight heart and hand to thee at Darren Ford, and couldst thou lose thy faith in me so soon?"

"I heard the guards that surrounded me, after the battle, saying, that thou wert going to be married to Sir Maurice Plunket's son, my mortal foe, within a month," answered he, "and in my madness at being his father's prisoner I knew not what to think!"

"It was so settled between Sir Maurice and my mother," returned Mary Preston, "but they little knew what a weak maiden could suffer for him she loved. I would have died ere I saw that day!"

"Yes," said Courtenay, passionately, "and I, faint heart that I was, still doubted thee even whilst thou wert under the same roof with me in Plunket's Castle, pleading for my life. Ah! I little knew thy fond and loyal heart, Mary, but I shall never doubt thee again!"

"It would kill me an thou shouldst," answered she. "But that woeful morning in Plunket's Castle I shall never forget. Little was the wisdom I had, not to take the advice of my cousin Alice, when she said that asking the father to spare the life of his son's rival would only make matters worse. But when I heard next day that thou wert to die ere the setting of the sun, I was mad; I seemed to think but one thought, that of saving thee, Brian. Thou knowest the rest."

"I do," said Courtenay, taking off his steel gloves, and clasping her small white hand fondly in his. "I do, and I know thee better, dearest."

"I fear me," resumed the lady, "that I shall come to some woeful harm between them. My mother even treats me coldly since morning. My kinsfolk pass me coldly as if I were the enemy of all, and Roger Plunket, he that advised me to beg thy life of his father, knowing that it would only hurry thee to the death, he even looks insolently upon me!"

"Name him not," said Courtenay, while a wrathful light kindled in his dark eyes. "His dagger is even now whetted for my breast, Mary, but he and his father—my father's murderer—shall get what they deserve ere long!"

"And his father," resumed Mary, not heeding the prohibition. "It is fearful father. The looks he used to give me, whenever we happened to meet, after that fearful morning. Day and night afterwards in the misery of suspense about thy fate, when I had no comfort but thinking and dreaming about thee all alone, his black eyes seemed to glare before me ever, till my heart would shudder and my soul sicken at the thought that, though respited for a time, thou wert in his power. Ah!" continued she, with that guileless truthfulness and candour that disdains concealment of the slightest thought, "my poor heart was torn with sorrow for thee, Brian, during all that time of misery, till I thought at length it were good if I could lie down and die!"

"And to me also it was one long night of woe," said Courtenay. "But I beseech thee, Mary, not to give way to such gloomy thoughts again. My heart tells me that these troubles cannot last. Dost thou not see that when Maurice Plunket and his son thought their power over me securest, God delivered me out of their hands—giving me means to escape even at the gallows foot!"

"It was a gallant escape," answered she, looking proudly on her lover. "Oh! how my heart beat when I saw thee, after thou hadst broken from them and seized yonder fortunate steed, sweeping past the house of Darren with the speed of the wind, with those woeful foes upon thy track!"

"And I, too!" exclaimed he, "I saw thee as I passed, and the sight of thee gave me ten-fold courage!"

"I fell upon my knees and prayed for thee," rejoined she, "and never rose till I heard the thunder of their horses coming back, and saw them returning without thee. I knew that God had heard me, and I sought my own room and wept, and prayed in gladness at thy escape!"

"Darling one!" said Courtenay, in a low, tender voice, pressing her to his leal and gallant heart as ever beat beneath a corselet. "See," continued he, "what a brave charger I have got by that wild chase."

"He is a noble steed," said Mary. "But now that I think of it," she continued, with a mournful and frightened look, "why art thou armed, Brian? Surely this panoply is unnecessary for such a day as this, and for such a meeting!"

"Alas!" answered her lover, sadly, "it is for a sterner meeting I have donned these arms."

"For what? Tell me—I beseech thee, tell me, Brian!" she exclaimed, eagerly looking into his face, and at the same time taking her hand from his and laying it upon his steel-clad arm. "Surely, surely, thou art not going to expose thyself to new dangers, and leave me—yes, leave me to suffer over again those dreadful days I have spent in fear and sorrow on thy account!"

"It is my duty," answered Courtenay, taking her hand fondly again—"my duty to get back the lands belonging to my house and name, that Sir Maurice Plunket now holds—yes, and my duty to avenge my father's murder. This evantide Plunket, and his stewards, whom I have bribed, are to visit the 'Dane's Knoll,' to mark out a site for the building of a tower. There I will confront him, and pay back in blood the red debt I owe him for my father's death!"

"Ah, me!" said Mary, while her eyes filled with tears—"thou lovest me not, Brian, else thou wouldst not leave me thus."

"If I loved thee less," resumed Courtenay, "I would abandon the cause of my house and kindred, and stay within the gates of Dublin like a coward—stay and brand my name with dishonour; for even now, my comrades begin to look lightly upon me, seeing that I have not yet fulfilled my vow to avenge my father. No, Mary, for thy sake I would go. For thy name that will yet be joined with mine, I will go; and if I do not win back my ancestral lands, I will at least make Maurice Plunket pay dearly for them. Trust me, that the danger is not so great as thou thinkest, and that I will soon return to fold thee in my arms as I do now!"

"Alas! alas!" exclaimed poor Mary, as she wept bitterly—"ah, me! that I have ever loved, for it brings but sorrow!"

"Say not so, dearest," resumed Courtenay. "A happy day will yet dawn upon us. But now the hour is come when I must begone. Farewell, darling one," continued he, as he kissed her sorrowfully—"farewell, and may God watch over thee till my return to the woods of Darren!" and with that he loosened his horse, and rode across the river, and into the wood at the opposite side.

"So soon!—so soon!" exclaimed Mary, as, rigid as a statue, she stood looking after him—"may Heaven have pity upon me!" and as the last gleam of his armour shone upon her from amongst the trees, she dropped again upon the seat, and wept long and bitterly. Recovering herself somewhat, at length, she stooped up and took the path homeward, along which the page, by his master's orders accompanied her.

There was a stream amid the forest that then clothed the whole district, which, after flowing down through a magnificent valley, made a sudden semicircular bend, and then wound away to join the Liffey, about five miles from the House of Darren. Into this bend ran a picturesque tongue of land, which, becoming gradually more elevated as it approached the stream, at last ended in a perpendicular rock upon the shore. Upon its highest point stood one of those ancient Danonian forts with its encircling fosses, between the outer of which and the abrupt edge of the precipice lay a smooth, level piece of green sward, shaded by a few huge oak trees. And here Courtenay, after tying his horse in the wood, stood awaiting the coming of his foe. Scarcely had he waited half an hour, when, peering through the trees, he beheld Sir Maurice Plunket and his treacherous steward riding towards the spot, the former wearing no defensive armour, and having no weapon save his sword, dagger, and pistol.

"He shall never say that I attacked him unfairly," muttered Courtenay to himself, as he speedily divested himself of his armour, and placed it in a heap near his horse. He had scarcely done so when there was a hurried rustling through the brushwood, and the next instant Sir Maurice Plunket, followed by his steward, sprang out upon the level space, and, with a fierce frown of mingled hatred and surprise, stood confronting his young foe.

"By the blood of my body!" he exclaimed, "but we are well met!" as he plucked his huge sword from its scabbard, and, without pause or explanation, attacked Courtenay, who stood gallantly on his defence, the tall steward at the same time putting his back against a tree, quietly to survey the contest. After narrowly escaping, by a spring to one side, one of the terrible thrusts aimed at him by his antagonist, Courtenay sprang forward, and plunged his weapon obliquely into Sir Maurice Plunket's back, as the latter followed his harmless stroke.

"Ha! ha!" exclaimed he, bitterly, as he plucked his sword out of the wound, and stood on his defence again. "Thou art turning thy back too soon, Sir Maurice. Put thy breast to the front, like a man," continued he, springing within his antagonist's guard, and striking him across the hand. "There, thou base murderer—there! Hast thou not time to pick up those two fingers of thine now lying upon the grass?"

"Yes!" exclaimed Plunket, who was a stout old warrior, "and thy heart's blood shall reddens the grass where they lie!" and with the words he threw away his sword, and, springing in, grappled with his antagonist. Courtenay's sword was now useless. He cast it also away, and a fierce struggle commenced, in which both came to the earth, rolling over and over till they came within a few feet of the sharp edge of the precipice. Here Courtenay almost felt his foe's dagger in his flesh, but, after another fearful struggle, he at length brought him under. Three times he plunged his keen into Sir Maurice Plunket's neck, and then sprang triumphantly to his feet.

"Now," continued he, as he looked upon his prostrate foe, "think on all the blood thou hast spilt," and with his foot he spurned Plunket nearer to the edge of the cliff—"think of my father's blood that thou didst shed—think of it, for he is now well avenged!" he added, as he dashed his dying foe over the edge of the rock!

One calm morning, when the winter had passed away, the sun shone down merrily on the green woods of Darren, the bright Liffey tumbled joyously down by bank and brake, and level flowery shore, and a joyous peal of bells rang out to welcome the happy bridal of the Lady of Darren and her handsome lover, Sir Brian Courtenay.

ANTRIM CASTLE.

THE original Castle of Antrim is generally supposed, according to Dr. Petrie, to have been erected in or about the year 1662, by Sir John Clotworthy, Lord Massarene, who died in 1665, and whose only daughter and heiress, Mary, by her marriage with Sir John Skeffington, the fifth baronet of that name, carried the estate and title into the latter family. From the architectural style of the edifice, however, it is more than probable that although the Castle may have been re-edified in the seventeenth century, it was founded long before, as some of the walls of the earlier structure are still visible. The present Castle appears to have been originally erected in the early part of the reign of the First James, by Sir Hugh Clotworthy, who by that monarch's patent had the charge of certain vessels on Lough Neagh. His son, Sir John, was one of the most distinguished leaders of the Parliamentary forces during the Civil War, and notwithstanding this fact, was, oddly enough, raised to the peerage by patent of Charles II., under the title of "Baron of Lough Neagh and Viscount of Massarene." The Castle is beautifully situated on the banks of the Six-mile-water river, immediately contiguous to Lough Neagh, and is a good example of the style of domestic architecture introduced into Ireland after the Restoration. The gardens of the Castle, the greatest length of which runs parallel with the river, are probably coeval with the erection of the edifice, and are laid out in a very attractive and uncommon style.

THE BLACK DOCTOR.

CHAPTER IX.

RETIRING from the apartment, after a renewed expression of the colonel's thanks, Bramble said to Tony:

"Show the coachman the way to Abraham Isaacs," and in a quarter of an hour the chaise was in front of the residence of the Jew.

Abraham Isaacs could not sleep the night before, and he arose early. He looked care-worn and disturbed when Bramble entered the toy-shop.

"Good morrow, Mr. Isaacs; of course you have found the bill which you mislaid last night," observed Bramble. "I am directed to let you have a thousand pounds for it."

"I have it not by me," said Isaacs, "but I will give you a receipt for the money."

"I will not pay you a farthing till I get the bill," said Bramble, "and if you don't produce it now you may do your worst. It is true then what I have heard, that you have lost the bill, and that you want to frighten me out of a thousand pounds. The sheriff has not the bill, and you know that. Let me tell you Jew," said Bramble vehemently, "you cannot cajole me."

"Am I to understand that you defy me," asked Isaacs, becoming pale with rage. "I will make your friend feel the vengeance of 'old Isaacs the money-lender,' as you call him.—I will!" continued the man of Israel, "I will," as he clenched his hands.

"Good morning Mr. Isaacs," said Bramble, as he rose and bowed with ironical obsequiousness to the Jew.

When the Black Doctor re-entered the chaise he said to Tony—"The Jew will try and forge another bill for the one he has lost. He will go to Barman's for that purpose, and we must be there before him."

The chaise was driven without delay to Equity-row, and when Bramble had paid the coachman, he dismissed him.

Quill was sitting on his high stool, whistling, as the Black Doctor and Tony entered Barman's office.

"Welcome, Doctor," said Quill. "Tony and you are out early this morning—there must be something up."

"I expect the Jew will call here soon," said the Black Doctor. "He will want you to commit a forgery, to make good a bill which he has lost. Tony and I will remain behind that old screen till he comes."

"All right," replied Quill, and he had scarcely done speaking when Abraham Isaacs arrived.

"There is nobody here," asked the Jew, as he cautiously looked around him.

"Not a soul," replied Quill, as he rose and locked the door.

"You can put money into your pocket and in mine," said Isaacs. "I want you badly. I lost a pocket-book containing a forged bill and other valuable documents. I have a stamp with me, and we can draw up a bill like that of Stammers' in no time, and I will give you fifty pounds for your trouble."

Bramble and Tony held their breath as Quill observed that the sooner the thing was done the better.

The Jew readily assented, and proceeded to fill the body of the bill. When this process was completed, the Jew handed Quill two names on a piece of paper. "Copy them as closely as you can, and give me the bill."

"Admirable," said Isaacs, as he looked at the two signatures.

Bramble cautiously stole from his hiding-place, and snatched the bill from the fingers of the Jew, and crumpling it in his hands said, "Ha, ha, Mr. Abraham Isaacs, is this the game you are at? Who is compromising a felony now, will you tell me?"

The Jew looked aghast with amazement.

"You are in my power now. You played for a heavy game, and you have lost."

"Give me that document," said Isaacs, "and there shall be no more about it. I will destroy it here in your presence."

"No," said Bramble, "I will keep it for your comfort." Come Tony," continued the Black Doctor, addressing the boy, and as both took their leave, Bramble said to Quill that he would require him in the evening.

"All right," said Quill, as the Jew fixed his eyes on the confidant who had betrayed him.

At a subsequent period of the day Frederick Foster, Jacob Barman, and the Black Doctor, met in the two-pair back room of a tumble-down old house.

"This place will do admirably for holding the wake," said Barman; "and we won't have much trouble in getting the coffin in."

"I think it will do," replied Foster; "but we must be looking after the coffin at once."

"Come along, then," observed the Black Doctor, "as there is not much time to be lost."

A fat little man, with a round jolly face, was sawing timber in a place where piles of unfinished coffins were placed. The undertaker tried to look sorry, as Bramble, Barman, and Foster entered.

"We want a plain, cheap coffin," said Barman, "and we require to have it sent where we direct with as little delay as possible."

The little, fat, round-faced man nodded assent, and in a short time the coffin was placed on a bier outside the door.

"Will you require any body to put the corpse in the coffin?" asked the jolly little man, who tried again to look sorry.

"No," replied Barman; "the deceased was the wife of this gentleman," pointing to Foster. "We will manage the matter ourselves."

Nelly, the person who had been so kind to the Fosters in their poverty, provided a quantity of stones and rubbish, which she put into the coffin on its arrival at the hearse where the wake was to be held.

During the progress of these events, poor Mrs. Foster was sitting before a scant fire in her wretched lodgings. The lady had made a will, bequeathing all that she was entitled to receive out of the English equity courts to her husband, never knowing of the mock wake or burial.

The coffin was placed on two chairs, and a solitary candle stood on the mantel-piece of the room in which the wake was held. The Black Doctor, Barman, Foster, Nelly, and about half a dozen other persons were present. Tea and refreshments were supplied, and a number of observations were made regarding the merits of the deceased, who, while the mock wake was going on, was thinking sadly of the past.

"We must be very cautious regarding the funeral in the morning," said Barman, addressing Foster. "It must leave early."

"It must," replied Foster. "I believe Bramble has obtained a promise that a hearse will be here in time."

It was a dark raw morning in December, when a mean-looking hearse stood at the door of the house. Day and night were just parting when the humble funeral took its departure for an obscure cemetery, where a grave had been prepared to receive the coffin. Some shovels full of damp earth having been thrown into the grave, the seeming mourners left the churchyard.

"I must have that certificate of Mrs. Foster's death from you this day," said Barman, addressing Bramble, "as we will want to apply for probate to the will at once. I must get Mrs. Foster out of town with as little delay as possible."

"I am ready at any time with what you require," replied Bramble, "after I return from seeing John Bruat, at the 'Three Jolly Travellers.'"

The several actors in the mock funeral separated in the morning before nine o'clock. Barman to make the necessary arrangements for the proving of the will, assisted by Quill, who looked as if he would give the world for a sleep; Wimp to take up one of his old positions, to wait until he would be called on to act officially; and poor Foster to return to his cheerless and miserable home. As he went along the streets he thought, in all the time of his want and misery, he never felt so miserable in his life, as he knew that he had been guilty of a fraud and an act of dishonour, to which his nature had been a stranger. He looked as if he had been crushed to the earth by the weight of his afflictions, and as the thin sharp morning air made him shiver from head to foot, he pursued his way to where his wretched wife was anxiously awaiting his arrival.

Mrs. Foster had risen from her bed when her husband entered his lodgings. Within all was squalid misery and want. There was no sign of fire in the grate, although the cold was intense.

"Where have you been all night, Fred?" asked Mrs. Foster. "You are in a deplorable state, and must need rest. Misfortune and want have been old guests of ours, and they appear inclined to prolong their visit," continued the lady, as a melancholy smile passed over her pale and worn features.

"They leave us this day, Laura," replied Foster. "I was kept out arranging about that will, upon which we can raise sufficient means to relieve all our wants. We will leave this miserable place this night. For the present," continued Foster, handing his wife some money, "try and make this place more habitable by getting fire and food."

Mrs. Foster soon availed herself of the services of Nelly, who, in a short time, lighted a fire and prepared breakfast.

"It will be necessary for us to leave town," said Foster. "You must precede me, as the entire success of our efforts will depend on our enemies not seeing you."

"I am willing to do whatever you require," replied Mrs. Foster, "particularly as no position in which I could be placed could be worse than my present one."

"You shall have ease and comfort, and shall be removed from the miseries and the degradations of poverty."

It was about noon when Barman entered the shop of Abraham Isaacs. The Jew was in his old seat, dictating a letter to a young man of genteel appearance, though shabbily dressed. This young man was the son of one of Abraham's victims. The Jew gave, out of what he called charity, the young fellow something to do at scrivenery, to keep him from starving.

Isaacs observed Barman as he entered the shop, and addressing the young man, the Jew said: "Harrington, wait outside till I call you, and tell that gentleman in the shop to come in."

The poor scrivener rose and obeyed, and in a few minutes the needy attorney and the Jew were closeted in deep and earnest conversation.

"I am destroyed, Mr. Barman," said the Jew, "if you do not come to my assistance. I made a terrible mistake yesterday in your office."

"In my office?" asked Barman, with surprise.

"Hear me out," said the Jew, sternly. "Yes, in your office I mislaid a bill worth to me a thousand pounds, and, as it should be taken up yesterday, I thought of drawing up a bill to imitate the one I had lost—mislaid, I should have said," observed the Jew, correcting himself. "As I said before, I went to your office, and with the assistance of your clerk, Quill, we drew up the duplicate bill. When it was completed, and while I was giving the ink time to dry, that demon, whom you call the Black Doctor, came from behind the old screen, and snatched it from me."

"Did you recover the forged document from him?"

"Don't call it a forgery," said the Jew, stamping his right foot on the floor, "it was only the duplicate of a forgery."

Barman perceiving his advantage, replied coolly, "If it is not a forgery, I would like to know what a forgery is? So Mr. Isaac, you were not content with putting your own neck into a halter, but you should put that of my unfortunate clerk into another. Was there any one present but Bramble, Quill, and yourself?"

"That is the worst of it," replied the Jew. "Bramble was accompanied by a boy, whom he called Tony, and both overheard my conversation with Quill."

"This is a desperate affair," observed Barman. "You must get up that forgery, even if it cost you half what you possess in the world."

"Could we not do it cheaper," said the Jew, as he lowered his voice to a whisper, and fixed his heavy ravenous eyes on the attorney.

It was now a contest between the wolf and the fox—between savage avarice and intense cunning.

Although Barman guessed the meaning of the Jew, he affected not to understand him.

"What do you mean by 'cheaper'?" asked Barman. "Do you know anybody with sufficient influence over Bramble, who could induce him to give you up the bill?"

The face of the Jew assumed a fiendish expression, as he drew his chair closer to where Barman was sitting, and said: "I did not mean that; I meant," and Isaac looked wildly around him, "I meant that you should pick a quarrel with the Black Doctor, and this will decide the encounter," and he drew a small dagger from beneath his coat.

In a second Barman sprang on him like a tiger, and before the Jew could utter an exclamation, his throat was in the vice-like grips of the attorney.

The Jew was nearly strangled when Barman threw him heavily on the floor.

He slowly recovered his breath, and contrived to crawl back to the chair on which he had been sitting.

"So Mr. Abraham Isaac, you want me to commit murder, to save you from the gallows. Only that I would not like to deprive the law of its due, I would have choked you myself. I will," continued Barman, "be a witness against you, and serve our case by recording the agreeable conversation we have had."

"And hang your confidential clerk," murmured the Jew.

"Fool! can't you perceive, even on your own statement, that Quill was a party to your committing yourself. Was he not aware that Bramble and Tony were behind the screen, when you were committing the forgery?"

"True," said the Jew, "I should have thought of that. Perhaps, Mr. Barman, you will be kind enough to forget the foolish proposal which I made to you about Dr. Bramble. I did not mean it, I assure you, it was a mere joke."

"You dog!" observed Barman, as he foamed with passion, "what reason did I ever give that you could believe me capable of becoming an assassin? I will make it a dear joke for you, a thing that you will not have much time in this world to remember."

"I admit I am in your power and that of Bramble," said the Jew, mournfully. "I am in a position to reward you for silence, and if you can obtain that 'duplicate,' and give it me, Abraham Isaac will be practically grateful."

OUT ON AND ABOUT HOWTH.

UBLIN is generally admitted to be excelled by few, if any, European capitals in the varied and magnificent scenic features by which it is surrounded. Amongst these the peninsular Hill of Howth, which rises to an elevation of nearly six hundred feet above the sea level, at the northern entrance to a bay rivalled by none other in the world for picturesque effect, if we except that of Naples, is perhaps the most attractive, as well for the gifts which nature has so lavishly bestowed upon its historic recollections which add to its very name. Rich, in old hill in memories of gallant chieftains, as we have elsewhere seen thence their forays and wars, and wide, even to the very Rhetian Alps, and here, girt by their chivalry, held courtly joys the triumphs which their arms won. The standard of the hill flung its folds on its breeze, rattling hosts, when least looked for, like storm-billows swept its coasts, and the surge of slaughter and spoliation rolled over rampart, and shrine, and hamlet. To the lingering wayfarer here,

"Where Beauty is and Power hath been,"

when not a murmur disturbs the tranquil grandeur of the picture, save the soft ripple of the waves upon the solitary strand, sobbingly, as it were, chanting requiems for the victims they had made in the wild winter of their wrath, and above and around the carolled rivalry of nature's music-choir, memory, unbidden, will conjure up visions of the unquiet actors and the scenes of the long-ago, and the ring of the revel, the song of the bard, and the clash of battle seem to haunt the echoes still.

In a previous paper, descriptive of some incidents in the career of Grace O'Malley, we gave an illustration of one of its most striking features—the Lighthouse of the Bailey, and now proceed to notice a few of the legendary and historical events connected with Howth, which, we have no doubt, will be acceptable to our readers. The ancient name of the hill, as we have already remarked, was "Beann Etar," or more correctly "Beann o-tir," the hill from (or off) the land, in allusion to its almost insulated position. It is curious, however, to see to how many conjectures, more or less fanciful, the etymology of the title has given rise. According to the "Dinneenchus," it was called "Etar" from Eada, a queen of the Tuatha-de-Danaan, who was interred here, and to whose memory a cairn was raised. In Grose's "Antiquities of Ireland" it is given as "Binnea-dair," the "Hill on the Water," from the word "dair," said to be synonymous with the British "dur," water. Baxter, in his "Etymological Glossary," writes it "Ben-na-dair," the "Hill of Oaks," from a belief that its sides were formerly luxuriantly clothed with that tree. Others attribute the name to the hero Edar, brother to Breagh, from whom the headland of Bray is thought to be named, while many contend for "Bin Eider," or the "Cliff of the Eagle." The present name of the hill is thought to be traceable to the Anglo-Norman "Hofda" and "Houde," from the Scandinavian "Hoved," or "Hofud," a promontory, the Norse synonym for its Irish radix.

The early history of Howth, as recorded in the bardic annals, is of a very mythical character. Legend poems recount that here the first bark and first knight-errant that ever visited Ireland arrived; here the Fenians erected a beacon-station, from which they could discern and herald the approach of a hostile fleet; thence, with trembling senses, they beheld the mystic sable cloud that from the orient mantled the island in Cimmerian gloom, as a corpse with a shroud; and here the famous Fionn-mac-Cumhail, foretaught the dark future of Inisfail, embodied his previsions. Of Irish faery traditions, the wildest and most wondrous are those relating to a baleful race of mammoth Piasts, or serpents,

"Unknown to Pliny and the laws of nature,"

that was supposed to infest rivers, lakes, and wells, whose breathings, as they trailed their scaly spires through the slime, were as pestilential blasts. Numbers of these fell reptiles, happily completely unexampled in the extant fauna of the world, were slain by Fionn, who was a veritable Apollo amid Pythons, and flayed them as that luminous deity did Marsyas, when he dared to emulate the melody of his lute. Amongst his conquests was one hitherto invincible Titan, who had haunted Howth for ages, an achievement thus alluded to in the "Lay of the Chase of Sliabh Truim," published for the Ossianic Society:

"He killed the Piast of Loch Cuillin,
It fell by Mac Cumhail with success;
And the great Piast of Binn-Eadair,
That was never overcome in battle."

There were giants, also, in those days, and one of them, named Roc, being fiercely pursued by Fionn and the Fenians, after making a circuit of nearly the entire of Ireland in his headlong retreat, in the course of which he sprang across the cataract of Eas Ruaidha—now Assaroe, on the river Erne, near Ballyshannon—"without wetting his foot," followed by Fionn, directed his course towards "the estuary of Binn-Eadair," which he cleared "in a leap similar to a flight over the sea," still attended by the chivalrous Fionn, whose endurance was at length rewarded by his capture. "This Fin Mac Coffe," writes the veracious Dr. Meredith Hanmer, "also fought with a gyant that landed at Howth and came to challenge combats for tribute, and by policie, not by strength, overcame him. His policie was: he caused him in the night (for the space of three nights) to be kept waking, and in the day-time to be fought withal, and thereby weakened his strength, and foiled the gyant." In the first century of the Christian era Howth was the residence of a famous bardic soothsayer, called "Athairne of Beann Etar;" it was from a ford constructed by his dependents across the Liffey, that Dublin derived its ancient appellation, "Baile-atha-Cliath Dubh-lin," the "Town of the Ford of Hurdles on the Black Pool."

One of the earliest notable events in the history of Howth, is the assertion that it was the principal scene of the devastations of the pestilence—the first recorded in the Irish annals—which swept away the entire of the Partholanian colony, after having held possession of the island for nearly three hundred years. Be this as it may, certain it is that Howth was the first place where a very destructive pestilence, which is said to have originated in the East, broke out in the year 1348, devastating the entire country, and almost depopulating Dublin and Drogheda. Passing over the reign of Crifin Nianair, in the ninth century, who had a fortalice on Howth—having alluded to it in the paper entitled "An Irish Sea Queen"—we may here remark, with reference to the popular error which has long supposed one of the many cairns that, more or less injured, may be still discovered on Howth, to be his sepulchral monument, that there can be little doubt these artificial elevations are tombs of the Tuatha-de-Danann, a race which, in the far, far past, formed one of the most important dynasties of ancient Ireland, and some of whose monarchs and greatest heroes here flourished and were interred. For example: In "Cath Mhuirghe Leana; or the Battle of Magh Leana," edited for the Celtic Society by Eugene Curry, Esq., M.R.I.A., a historical tale of the time when Conn Cedchatach, or "Conn of the Hundred Battles," reigned at Tara; when the Red Branch Knights were pavilioned at Craobh Ruadh, and when Erin was partitioned into two kingdoms by the esker, or steep ridge of hill that stretched—

"From the point of Leim Con of the Bays;
From the pleasant Ath Cliath Mearaidhe Unto the sea at bleak Eadair [Howth]"— that is to say, in the words of one of Florence M'Carthy's exquisite lyrics—

"From the waves of the West to the cliffs of Ben Edar"— there is allusion to a powerful chief of this mystic people, named

"Aedh of Eadair," who resided on the summit of Howth. His daughter Eadoin was celebrated for her charms, and dying of grief at seeing her husband—Oscar, son of Oisín—as she thought mortally wounded after an engagement, was buried on the north side of the hill, where the cairn erected to perpetuate her memory is still visible. A poem ascribed to the warrior-bard Oisín, affirms that Howth was the muster-place of the Fenian forces and their Norse auxiliaries, previous to their departure for the disastrous battle of Gabhra-Aichle, in the third century—an engagement so fatal in its effects to the destinies of Ireland, that it is regarded as the source of the ultimate decadence of the national monarchy. About the middle of the seventh century Howth was the scene of a sanguinary conflict between the forces of two rival aspirants for regal honours, in which two of the candidates were slain. During the ninth, tenth, and eleventh centuries its history is nothing but a series of relations of its being harried and plundered by the Danes—acts which, from their frequent repetition, evidence that it must have presented temptations substantial enough to encourage and reward their love of "loot" and slaughter. As if their visits, however, were not sufficiently inimical, and direful in their results, its soil was frequently drenched with the best blood of those who should have shed it in its defence, and not conquest; for we read many a sad record in which it figures as a scene of carnage where the weapons of our ancestors were levelled with deadly intent, not against the ruthless enemies of their country, but against one another.

When the Anglo-Normans invaded Ireland, Sir John de Courcy and Sir Amoricus Tristram, with their followers, were amongst the foremost who enlisted in the enterprise.

"Adventurers they from far, who roved
To live by battle which they loved.
All brave in arms, well trained to wield
The heavy halbert, brand, and shield."

They had previously served together in the Norman campaigns, their achievements in which have been so marvellously related by the chroniclers of the age, that in reading of them we can almost fancy ourselves listening to some scald chaunting the deeds of the heroes of Scandinavian romance. De Courcy had received letters-patent from Henry II., entitling "him and his heires or assigns after him to enjoy in that land [Ireland] all that he could conquer with the sword, reserving to the king homage and fealty." Associating with himself in the enterprise Sir Amoricus Tristram, he disembarked their troops at Howth, but being compelled to remain on board ship through illness, the command devolved upon Sir Amoricus, who, in the engagement which ensued with the forces sent to prevent their landing, and which occurred at the "Bridge of Evora"—a mountain stream that falls into the sea on the north side of the peninsula, nearly opposite the rocky islet of Ireland's Ey—displayed such brilliant gallantry and generalship, that the victory remained with him, and he received from the king for his conduct, amongst other rewards and distinctions, the "land of Houede," in the tenure of which he was subsequently confirmed by King John, in a letter-patent which is still extant, a fac-simile of it being engraved in the official reports of the Royal Commissioners appointed by George III. to adopt means for the preservation and classification of the Public Records of Ireland. The original surname of Tristram is said to have been changed by Sir Amoricus for that of St. Lawrence, in consequence of a victory which he obtained at Clontarf over a division of the Irish forces that had invaded his territory, on the anniversary of that saint. Tradition relates that, while in Normandy, Sir Amoricus and De Courcy had entered into a solemn compact in the Church of Notre Dame, at Rouen, to assist each other in acquiring territorial aggrandisement in foreign lands, and to equally divide between them whatever wealth they should acquire by conquest, or receive in reward of their services. This chivalrous league eventuated in the death of Sir Amoricus, in the year 1189. As the gifted author of "The Monks of Kilcrea" writes—

"Close hemm'd by foes, in Ulster hills, within his castle pent,
For aid unto the west countrie Sir John de Courcy sent;
And, for the sake of knightly vow, and friendship old and tried,
He prayed Sir Armor Tristram would to his rescue ride.

Then grieved full sore that noble knight, when he those tidings heard,
And deep a vow he made, with full many a holy word—
That, aid him Heaven and good St. Lawrence, full vengeance should await
The knaves who did De Courcy wrong, and brought him to this strait."

Sir Amoricus organised a strong expedition to effect a diversion in favour of his brother-in-arms, but on his march into Connaught was encountered at Knoc-tuadh (Anglice, Knocdoe), the "Hill of Axes," which is situated within a few miles of Galway, by a far superior division of the Irish, under Cathal O'Connor, King of Connaught, surnamed the "Red Handed"—the "Cáhal Mór of the Wine-red Hand," of Clarence Mangan's exquisitely beautiful ballad, "A Vision of Conact." Finding it impossible to advance with success, and disdaining to submit or retreat, the grim old Norman dismounted, and, drawing his sword, "ranne his horse through, saying, 'Thou shalt never serve against mee that so worthily has served with mee.'"

"Then every horseman in his band, dismounting, did the same,
And in that company no steed alive was left but twain;
On one there rode De Courcy's squire, who came from Ulster wild,
Upon the other young Oswald sate, Sir Tristram's only child."

Of the entire band these were the only two who survived the slaughter of that disastrous day. One by one Sir Tristram and his gallant followers fell, not, however, until

"As move the mowers o'er the sward upon a summer day," they had cleft many a broad gap in the ranks of their foes. And thus, sword in hand, as he had lived, perished the first Baron of Howth; as for the victors—

"Good cause had they to rue,
For a bloody fight and stern was the battle of Knoc-tuadh."

Sir Amoricus, who, in addition to being De Courcy's brother-in-arms was likewise his brother-in-law, having espoused his sister, had issue three sons, of whom the eldest succeeded him in the lordship of Howth. In the subsequent struggles which ensued to establish English dominion in Ireland, the St. Lawrence family distinguished themselves through many generations for their devotion to the English cause, both in the field and in the council. Sir Robert St. Lawrence, the fifteenth baron, who was Lord Chancellor of Ireland in 1483, married a daughter of the Duke of Somerset, his descendants thus claiming descent from Edward III. In the year 1767, Thomas, the twenty-seventh baron, first adopted the title of earl, he having been created "Viscount St. Lawrence and Earl of Howth," furthermore receiving, in consideration of his own and his ancestors' loyal services, a pension from the crown.

The venerable ruins of the Abbey of Howth crown the hill rising immediately above the harbour. This edifice, which is frequently designated Balcadden Abbey, from the little bay of that name, is said to have been originally founded by the Ostmen, in the course of the eleventh century, about which period Sitric, the Danish King of Dublin, after his profession of Christianity, conferred a considerable portion of the lands of Howth upon his ecclesiastical foundations. In the early part of the thirteenth century (1235), when the original prebendal church of Howth was transferred from Ireland's Ey to the mainland, the Abbey of Howth was dedicated to St. Mary, and constituted a member of the chapter of St. Patrick's Cathedral, being shortly afterwards endowed by Almericus, the ninth baron, with a grant of thirty acres of ground. There is a very excellent notice of this edifice given by Mr. Bell, in his admirable prize "Essay on the Ecclesiastical and Gothic Architecture of Ireland." We may here observe that this gentleman, who was an eminent heraldry painter in Dublin, and "in all the relations of life a most worthy and kind man," died in Simpson's Hospital, in that city, on the 15th of last September, in the 86th year of his age.

A flat, embattled belfry with pointed apertures for the suspension of three bells, springs from the gable at the western extremity, opposite the principal window of the Abbey, and harmonized well with the sedateness and solidarity which characterised the rest of the structure. When the Abbey was finally dismantled, the bells, which were probably of German or Lombardic manufacture, and not of an earlier date than the fifteenth century, were deposited in the vaults of the Castle, in the great hall of which they are still preserved, where they remained for upwards of two centuries. When they were discovered they were found to have sustained such injuries as to be altogether unserviceable. No longer, as of old, with emulous chimes to peal alarms to castled steep and tented hill, or speak, with solemn, sweet vibrations of—

"Birth, wedded love, God's service, and the tomb."

They are each about two feet and half in height, and one foot and a half in diameter at the base, and are furnished with legends in relief, occupying a single line. Those around two are in the Latin language and Gothic characters, and are easily deciphered. The inscription on the third differs in the formation of the characters, and its explication has hitherto been an antiquarian questio vexata. Many assume that it is verbally abbreviated, while others will not consent to receive the spaces and points which would thus, of necessity, be introduced between the words, and for which, they contend, there was no authority in the original. Bell, in his "Essay," has adopted this reading:—

NICHOLAS : MUN : CIR : OF : MELCIPER :

From a "rubbing," however, the text would appear to more correctly run as follows:—

NICHOLAS : MUN : CER : OFMEBLALNER :

The writer was of opinion, assuming the legend to be in the Irish dialect, that by the restoration of a few mutilated lines or strokes a vraisemblable if not vrai interpretation of at least a portion of it might be:—

NICHOLAS : MUNTIR : OR : ——— :

"A prayer for Nicholas of the family of ———:" that is, a prayer for the donor of the bells, who, from the Christian name, was apparently a member of the St. Lawrence family. Dr. Petrie, however, in a letter addressed to him, while characterising this hypothesis as ingenious, does not consider it tenable, the correct orthography of the word muntir being muintir, or muintiar, while, moreover, if used to express a tribe or family, it should have the word do, corresponding to the Latin de, prefixed to it. However, as the circumstance of this peal of bells having been cast abroad scarcely admits of a doubt, the perhaps too violent contraction of a sentence in Irish is not only possible but excusable at the hands of foreign artists or craftsmen.

In the south aisle a massive monument,

"Carved o'er in ancient Gothic wise
With many a scutcheon and device," serves as an altar-tomb for Christopher, twentieth Baron of Howth, who sat in two Elizabethan parliaments, respectively held in 1559–89, in which latter year he died, and his wife, both represented by recumbent effigies in high relief, the baron in the armour of the period, with a hound, an emblem of faith, reclining at his feet, and the baroness in the quaint costume of the same date. The sides of the monument are divided into Gothic panels, with handsome foliage ornamentation and scroll work, most of them charged with the armorial bearings of the St. Lawrences, and those families with whom they intermarried. In the immediate vicinity of the Abbey cemetery are the remains of a monastic edifice, usually known as the College of Howth, exhibiting characteristics of a different style of architecture to the Abbey, and being probably referable to the sixteenth century. The entrance porch, which leads from the south side into a quadrangular court-yard of small dimensions, and the principal window, placed to the left of the doorway, even in their present desolate and ruined condition—Man having, as usual, proved a worse foe than Time—, are objects of deep interest, and cannot fail to attract attention.

Whatever may have been the dimensions and architectural trait of the original edifice, the Castle of Howth appears to have been completely restored about the year 1564 by Christopher, the twentieth baron, few traces remaining of the earlier edifice, with the exception of a small square castellated tower opposite the left wing, called Corr Castle. The modern mansion is an irregular embattled structure, flanked by square towers at each extremity, and from its eccentric but picturesque architectural combinations clearly indicates that its present proportions are the result of additions made from time to time, less with regard to uniformity of style than convenience. Entering the principal porch from a terrace approached by a massive flight of steps, the visitor finds himself in a hall of spacious dimensions, running parallel with the front of the building. Around it are suspended reliques of ancient armour and weapons, which serve to illustrate the military life of a former age. Amongst the latter the chief attraction is the two-handed sword employed by the first baron at the battle of Eborac, a sufficiently formidable weapon, no doubt, in skilful hands, but withal rather unwieldy. It is rusted towards the point of the blade, which is still three feet nine inches in length; the hilt alone is twenty-two inches long. In the picture gallery of the Castle is an impressive full-length likeness of Dean Swift, by Francis Bindon—one of the four of Swift from the pencil of that artist—executed in 1735, which represents him in clerical robes, holding a scroll inscribed "The Drapier's Fourth Letter to the Whole People of Ireland." This was the famous pamphlet published on the 23rd of October, 1724, in which Swift first openly affirmed the independence of Ireland. Prostrate at his feet is the nude figure of William Wood, writhing in mortal agony, and clenching the patent granted him in July, 1722, which empowered him exclusively to coin half-pence and farthings to the extent of £100,000, to be alone current in Ireland. The "Drapier's Fourth Letter" was denounced by the authorities as "a wicked and malicious pamphlet, containing several seditious and scandalous passages," and three hundred pounds were offered for the discovery of the writer. Robert Blakely, the Dean's butler and amanuensis, was alone in the secret, which he preserved inviolate, and, for his fidelity, was afterwards appointed by the author verger of St. Patrick's Cathedral. Swift was a frequent visitor to Howth Castle. The demesne, which comprises about six hundred acres, is richly wooded, and affords at every fresh turn of the walks some new and picturesque glimpses of the sweeping swells of greenward that stretch away through the vista of foliage. In the pleasure grounds the parterres are all of free, tasteful patterns, the flowering shrubs, which are massed about with great skill, being relieved by magnificent hedges of beech, remarkable for their dimensions and form, and having a very pretty effect. In a dip of the ground adjoining the east side of the demesne are the remains of a crom-leac, one of the finest rock monuments in the county Dublin. The table is a huge quartz mass of irregular form, measuring in length eighteen, in breadth twelve, and in extreme depth eight feet. The weight of this boulder is probably about ninety tons, and it is evident has been too ponderous for the upright stones upon which it rested—although some of them are seven feet in height—as the pressure has completely destroyed their original perpendicular position, while one side of the table is supported altogether on the ground. It is locally termed "Flonn's Quoit," from a tradition that it was employed as a war missile, and left in its present situation by Flonn-mac-Cumhail, who in the attitude of launching it through the air would have made a fine study for another Discobolus, or quoit-thrower, had ancient Ireland possessed a sculptor as gifted as Myron of ancient Greece.

The first stone of Howth Harbour was laid in 1807, after which the works were steadily on under the superintendence of the eminent engineer, Mr. John Rennie. The entire amount expended in the construction of this harbour, which has been characterised as "a beautiful product of English thought and Irish taxation," from the 2nd of July, 1807, until the 5th of January, 1832, was nearly £420,500. The deposition of sand and mud, from the banks on the west side, has accumulated to such an extent within the harbour that it is now entirely worthless for the purpose for which it was designed. On the 12th of August, 1821, immediately after his coronation, George IV. landed here, after a lengthened passage, the tedium of which was alleviated by a notable carouse on goose-pie and whiskey.

The Hill of Howth is easily accessible from the metropolis by the swift agency of the Dublin and Drogheda Railway, a branch line from which was opened in July, 1845. The town of Howth consists of a single street leading towards the summit of the hill, and extending irregularly along the north-east angle of the peninsula, with a congregation of huts branching sea-ward down the declivity. The population, which is chiefly devoted to a sea-faring life, exclusive of visitors, is about nine hundred; that of the entire parish about seventeen hundred. The circuit of the peninsula is nearly six miles. From the Kilrock Quarries, situated on the steep ground impending above Balcadden Bay, a little beyond the eastern pier of the harbour, and which from its smooth sand and clear water is very attractive to those who regard the sea as a natural panacea, the 'New Path,' formed a few years since, commences. It extends in an undulating course and with a gradual inclination along the exact verge of the cliffs, the toil of the ascent being more than recompensed by the glorious panorama within ken when the summit of the path is gained—an attitude of nearly three hundred feet above the level of the sea. At the extreme north-east of the hill, and a short distance from the quaint cliff locally known as Puck's Rock, is the precipitous headland called the Nose of Howth, a term identical with the Norse næs. From this point the path, which in many places is so narrow as to render a passage past any fair votary of the prevailing fashions a feat completely incompatible with safety, diverges southward, passing the Castlen Rock, in the vicinity of which the ill-fated Victoria steamer first struck, and numerous rocks and headlands distinguished by names having reference to their fantastic forms or associations, until it terminates below the Bailey headland, near the site of the ancient lighthouse, from which roads ramify inland, and towards the Sutton or south side of the hill, the scenic features of which blend the most tranquil beauty with the sternest sublimity. From the little hamlet of Censure, south-west of the Bailey, immediately above which are the remarkable rocks called "The Needles," and the once fortified headland of Drumleck Point, of the dun that crested which the tradition is now alone preserved, a wild road conducts with a gradual descent in the direction of Sutton, before reaching which it separates, one branch leading to the left towards the cultivated slopes that stretch away to the southern shores of the bay, while the other, and more modern, sweeps to the right, past the ruins of the ancient little oratory called Cill-Fintan, or St. Fintan's Church.

THE GRIEVANCE PAPERS.

CHAPTER VIII.

ENTERS UPON THE QUESTION OF THE DINNER GRIEVANCE.

HAVE now, courteous reader, made you acquainted with the principal points upon which I rest my case for concluding that I am suffering from "a real grievance" in the person of Mrs. Squeezer, and, I shall add, her cat—although I am afraid that the grammar of my sentence will be somewhat deteriorated by the addition of that animal, inasmuch as it may be objected with considerable reason, that Mrs. Squeezer's cat is not a person, and, therefore, cannot with propriety be included in the sentence as it stands. However, I pass over all such minor considerations, as they shrink into comparative insignificance before the real merits of the case, and the far more weighty interests which are at stake. I rest my case, then, against Mrs. Squeezer principally on the "latch-key" and the "dinner," and, indeed, what more can be required to constitute a grievance of the very weightiest character than the manner in which I was treated on these two points. I did allude to shirt buttons, but I am content to let that point pass. Considering the large sum, too, which I pay for my "apartments," I have no doubt that some, were they in my position, might object to the lumps which render my bed anything but one of roses: others, again, might raise an objection to the generally dilapidated state of the furniture, which, indeed, I must confess, is on a par with the plate basket of which Mrs. Squeezer had so much to say, and which turned out such a sham when it was produced. I should imagine that the furniture of my room is that which was provided by the late lamented Mr. S. when about to bring home his blushing bride, and that must have been a very long time ago, indeed; and little wonder if the appearance which it now presents is of the dingiest, and of a fashion of days long since passed away. As an example, although I believe that it is not very logical to conclude from a particular case to a general proposition, I will merely take the mirror which is suspended over the fire-place. It certainly is not ornamental. I imagine that at some remote period—say in the beginning of the seventeenth century—the frame may have been gilt, but it certainly does not look as if it had seen the hand of the decorator at any later period; and yet this dingy old thing is kept carefully covered by Mrs. Squeezer with a piece of gold-coloured gauze, (I only say gold-coloured gauze, because I know that is the colour usually employed for this purpose,) which has gradually become as black as the frame which it covers, and which, by a delicate fiction, which only a highly-imaginative mind could ever realise, it is supposed to protect. As it certainly is not ornamental, neither is this mirror of any earthly use, so far as I can conceive. I sometimes glance at myself in it, but I invariably turn shudderingly away from the sight of the ghastly, double-nosed, yellow, and dimly-reflected monstrosity which is presented to my gaze. I am, unfortunately, of a highly bilious temperament, and am under no necessity of resorting to any artificial means for bringing on an attack of this unpleasant disease; but, if, for any reason which a lively imagination can conceive, I did wish to do so, I really don't know anything which would be so efficacious as, after I had dressed with peculiar care, and had flattered myself that I was looking more than usually well, (I was going to say fascinating, but I won't,) to seat myself before Mrs. Squeezer's mirror, and survey myself steadily in its wonderful surface for a short space of time, say, half an hour. If I didn't rise from the contemplation bilious and jaundiced to the very last degree of which human nature is capable, I don't believe that there is anything in creation which would produce the effect, if Mrs. Squeezer's mirror failed to do so.

However, as I have just said, I don't rest my case upon these minor matters. Others might do so; and might, even with reason, I admit, consider Mrs. Squeezer's neglect of shirt-buttons, Mrs. Squeezer's furniture, Mrs. Squeezer's distorting mirror, and Mrs. Squeezer's lumpy and uncomfortable bed, as quite sufficient to constitute a "real grievance." I rest my case on higher grounds, and with a magnanimity of mind which, I am quite certain, is uncommon enough to be remarkable, despising these smaller matters, I fall back upon the latch-key and the dinner party, and with these facts—figuratively, of course—in my hand, I fearlessly appeal to the enlightened readers of this journal, amongst whom I have very strong reasons for concluding that, my melancholy case has excited a large amount of sympathy, and call upon them to decide whether, in my position as "a single gentleman," I am not suffering from such a pressure of untoward circumstances as may be considered amply sufficient to constitute a "real grievance." By the diabolical manoeuvres of Mrs. Squeezer, my latch-key was rendered practically useless, and not worth its own weight in steel; and the result of it was, that I was prevented from seeing my friends on any evening at their own dwellings, and of mixing in that society for which I feel that I was formed, and in which I could find so much enjoyment. If I must be home by ten p.m., of course evening parties were out of the question; and the most I could aspire to would be a dull dinner party, with a lot of old fogies, with whom I could not be expected to have any sympathy or congenial feeling. I confess, and I am not the least ashamed of the fact, that I do enjoy a lively evening party, but dinner parties, properly so called, are my horror, and I hold them in utter detestation. After Mrs. Squeezer had brought things to such a pass, that I could neither remain out after ten p.m., with due regard to the safety of my shins, and other tender parts of my body, nor see my friends at home without being committed to the tender mercies of Mrs. Grigg and the handy young woman, I did try to relieve my overcharged feelings, and find vent for the natural vivacity of my nature, by attending some of those dreary dinner parties, to which I have just alluded, but I was obliged to give it up. I couldn't stand it. It wasn't in nature; at all events, not in that portion of nature which has its development in my person, to bear such an infliction as some of the dinner parties which it was my miserable lot to attend, and I was compelled from motives of the most obvious nature to relinquish all participation in these melancholy performances.

I don't see any particular reason in the nature of things why a dinner party should be such a stupid business, as in nine cases out of ten it turns out to be, but as the philosophers say, there is no arguing against a fact, "Contra factum non licet argumentari," and of the fact, I at least, so far as my experience goes, have no doubt. First of all, there is that fearful ordeal to be gone through in the drawing-room while we are waiting for dinner. Fat old Lady Standoff, with her flaming turban and its bird of paradise, which, judging from the antiquity of its appearance, may reasonably be presumed to have been coeval with Adam when our first parent inhabited that garden of delights, stands at the top of the room, and turns up her nose (although, indeed, nature has performed that operation for her in a sufficiently marked and most certainly durable manner already) because old Taylor, who is a hundred times as rich as she is, but who has the misfortune to be in the "leather line," has presumed to speak to her ladyship, and make some inoffensive remark about the weather. If my Lady Standoff hasn't got breeding enough to behave herself like a lady, why didn't she stay at home, and send a civil refusal to the polite invitation to dine, which Straitlace forwarded to her? But my lady had no such intention! Her dinner at home would most likely have consisted of a scraggy chop, and a half pint of sour wine, whilst she is sure of the best of good eating and drinking at Straitlace's table, and therefore Straitlace knows well enough that he can reckon upon her company, although he can by no means reckon upon her behaving with even a semblance of civility to the rest of the guests, whom he is, morally at least, bound to invite to his festive board. If I were Straitlace, Lady Standoff might go to Timbuctoo for her dinner, and be taken down by the king of that interesting but little-known kingdom, for anything that I cared; but dinner of mine she should never have the satisfaction of devouring, unless she had good manners enough to behave with civility to my guests. Then, to see that poor old Lucretia—oh, I beg her pardon, the Honourable Lucretia Fadedflower, who must, I think, have "come out" somewhere about the middle of the last century. She has chosen—so she says, others maliciously add, through necessity—a state of single blessedness; and whatever temptations may have crossed her path in former times, I should imagine that there is very little danger now-a-days, at all events, of her being tempted to break her resolution. But, then, to see her airs, and her poor old faded-out gentility, as she stands aloof in Straitlace's drawing-room, and refuses to fraternize with the rest of us, and for no earthly reason, so far as I can judge, except that she has "Hon." tacked on to her name, and happened, by some freak of fortune, to be born tenth daughter to the most noble the Earl of Stoneybatter, who died ages ago, and left his numerous family but very slenderly provided for. And to see the look of utter contempt with which she regards me, as Straitlace leads me up to her, and ask me to take her down to dinner, which I humbly beg to be allowed to have the honour of doing. The supercilious look which she gives me through her quizzing glass, which is of a pattern as antique as herself, would goad me into fury, if I didn't despise the poor old thing from the bottom of my soul. To see the manner in which she puts the tips of her dirty kids,—and I'll swear that they have been cleaned at least half a dozen times, at twopence a time,—upon the sleeve of my coat, you would imagine that she was fearful of contracting some unpleasant and contagious disease or other. Why doesn't she stay at home? Or, better still, why doesn't she fraternize with old Lady Standoff, and why don't they dine tête-à-tête—and oh! what a dinner that would be—instead of bringing her last generation gentility, and her poor threadbare pride where they are not wanted, and where they throw a damper upon every one with whom they are brought into contact? What right has she, I ask, as I have already asked in the case of Lady Standoff, to cause herself to be conveyed in a hired cab to the house of Straitlace, who is a decent fellow enough, but who does make such mistakes in these matters, if she can't prevail upon herself to behave like an ordinary Christian, who lives in the nineteenth century, when she arrives there? Why doesn't she shut herself up like that horrible old woman of whom we have just been reading in "Great Expectations," and hide herself and her worn-out old airs from the face of the daylight which glares so strangely and so sadly on them? It would be an arrangement which would, I am sure, be a great deal more satisfactory to all parties concerned, with perhaps, the exception of herself. For my part, I must say, that I took her down to dinner twice, but I wouldn't have done it a third time for all the dinners which were ever cooked at Straitlace's kitchen-range. I couldn't do it; it is not, I repeat, in nature to stand it. If these old creatures be so utterly lost to all sense of decency as not to perceive the propriety of discontinuing their frantic efforts to keep a place in the society which is so irrevocably slipping from under their feet, and which is no longer the place for them, I consider that government ought to take the matter into its own hands, and provide them with apartments in the British Museum, in that part of it which is named the "antediluvian," at the same time making a strict law, that they should never be allowed to leave it, but should constitute an integral part of the curiosities there collected. For example, the Honourable Lucretia Fadedflower might be provided with a glass-case large enough to permit of pedestrian exercise, combined with every facility for showing off her poor old worn-out airs. It might be labelled—"a relic of the last century—extremely rare, and very valuable, on account of its great antiquity.—Visitors are requested to approach this specimen with great caution, as it becomes very mischievous if touched, or annoyed by questions." And I am confident that the glass-case and its contents would become at once a most interesting and useful exhibition, whilst society would be infinitely relieved by the removal of these poor old creatures to a sphere so much more fitted for them. However, don't for a moment, courteous reader, if you please, think that I am indulging in these philippics against my Lady Standoff, the Honourable Lucretia, "et hoc genus omne," merely because they are old. I should be ashamed of myself were I to attempt to treat old age with any such disrespect or unbecoming levity. No. If there be anything for which I have a sincere and deep respect, nay, even a loving veneration, it is for the beautiful old age which does not attempt to cover its own snowy locks with a ridiculous wig, or try to hide its wrinkles under a coat of rouge. There is no disgrace in the scanty locks over which Time has scattered his snows—it may be, with no sparing hand. There is nothing repulsive in the furrows which the same ruthless hand ploughs upon the faces of us all, as we approach nearer and nearer to the appointed term. I know two or three venerable old ladies, who have passed the appointed "threescore and ten," and I never see them in the midst of the prattling children who play around their knees, and smooth by their guileless love the path—the inevitable path—which every day grows plainer, and still more plain before them, without feeling sentiments of veneration arising in my soul for the beautiful old age which they do so grace and dignify. In my eyes, at least, the silvery hair in its scanty thinness on the old woman's brow, and the plain white cap, of a fashion long since passed away, are a thousand times more beautiful than the most elaborate wig over produced by the perquier's hand, or the showiest turban ever turned out by Parisian milliner. I never meet these old ladies at dinner parties in flaming turbans, and antique satin dresses, endeavouring to pass themselves off for that which they are not, striving in their folly and imbecility to hide that age, which, did they but receive it as the natural consequence of their being, would be their greatest ornament, and which is only rendered more evident, as it surely becomes more hideous and revolting, by their futile efforts to hide its ravages by wigs, feathers, and paint. Oh, let them go home! by all means, let them go home!—Let them throw off their borrowed locks; let them wash their faces, and fling the rouge pot out of the window; let them lay their feathers, their laces, and their gimcrackery aside, once and for ever; let them comb in two plain bands across their brow, the silvery locks which Nature herself has covered with her snows, to remind them of the winter which has already come upon them, and of the returnless bourne whither they are journeying. Let them clothe themselves in the simple garb which alone fits their age and their position. Let them give their feathers and their flowers to their grown-up grandchildren, and let them believe how much more beautiful they themselves will look in their plain white cap, and the simple mittens, which are the only adornments which become them. Let them not be ashamed of the wrinkles on their faces; Nature, herself, has written them there with her own finger, and when the face on which they have been traced is wont to wear a smile; is wont to reflect the placid cheerfulness, which ever follows a life well spent, these wrinkles do but serve to set it off in all the honest comeliness of its venerable beauty. Let them show themselves no more in ball-rooms, or at dinner parties, but let them, instead, make their way, if they are able, to those rooms at the top of the house—the rooms with the bars in front of the windows, whence children's voices are to be heard for ever issuing during the day. Let them strive to render their presence in these rooms one to which the hearts of the children may fondly cling; and when evening has come, instead of decking themselves out in their borrowed plumes, and driving off to entertainments, which, at their age, they by no means grace, let them call the little children to kneel around their knees; let them take the little hands, and fold them between their own, and teach the young lips, which as yet can scarcely form the words, to say "our Father who art in Heaven, hallowed be thy name;" let them teach their grandchildren how to raise their innocent minds to God their maker, and the fresh young love of children's hearts shall scatter on their path to the grave a thousand flowers of never-dying sweetness. Then, in truth, shall their old age be venerable and beautiful; then, in truth, shall they be respected in their lives, and lamented when they shall have passed away; then, when their time shall have come, shall they face "him who rides upon the white horse, and whose name is Death," without fear or trembling; without that horrible shrinking from an inevitable decree, which is so fearful to one whose whole life has been spent in a futile effort to hide it from himself; to make a mystery of that which is plainer than the noon-day light.

But I must pause, and bring these reflections to a close. If I continue them, I am afraid that I may travel out of my proper sphere, and expose myself to that unpleasant operation which is familiarly known as "snubbing," or, as some phrase it, "putting a fellow's nose on the grindstone." During the course of my chequered existence, I have had to undergo the operation referred to more than once, and have found it so decidedly unpleasant, that I am by no means anxious to suffer a repetition of it, more especially at the hands of those whose good opinion I am so anxious to propitiate as the readers of this journal. I am quite convinced that the remarks which I have ventured to make in this paper do not apply to any of the readers of the "Illustrated Dublin Journal," and, therefore, I have given expression to them the more freely; but I have made them, because I have often met the types of those whose folly has called them forth, and I think it is the duty of an honest man to expose folly whenever he has a fitting opportunity, not for the sake of exposing it, but of correcting it; and of all the follies which walk this world, I do believe that there is none so thoroughly ridiculous in itself, nor so disgusting to others, as the foolish old age which tries to hide itself under borrowed plumage, and goes mincing forth in feathers and in paint, keeping up the "sham" till the fatal moment when it is stricken down for ever and ever, and the poor old worn out skeleton is exposed in all its natural hideousness to the unsympathizing looker-on.

So much for the "Dinner Grievance," which, is however, by no means exhausted, and which shall, with your permission, kind reader, form the subject of some future remarks.

FAVERSHAM ON HIS WAY TO FAME.

BY BLANCHARD JERROLD.

CHAPTER III.

HE sale of wooden spades and polished shells was proceeding vigorously, when the train added Messrs. Stackington, Faversham, and Ashby to the population of Hastings. The sunburnt faces that were pressed against those of pale citizens; the rapidity with which clerks' heads disappeared under the uglies of their wives, sisters, or sweethearts; the ardour with which young gentlemen rushed at their papas; and the agility with which the railway officials pitched the luggage from the waggon upon the platform, are points in the arrival of a Saturday afternoon train, which may be remarked at any watering-place within easy reach of London.

Ashby was very proud to find his sister Victoria and his mother waiting at the station. They would see him shake hands with the Hon. Mr. Stackington; they would also learn that Faversham was going to pay a visit to Lord Stackington at St. Leonard's. The young men shook hands, before they scrambled after their luggage, and parted. Ashby was a little sulky, for Mrs. Ashby had asked him, within hearing of Stackington, whether he had brought down the saddle of mutton from Newgate market for the morrow's dinner. Faversham had faithfully promised Ashby to call upon him on the following Monday, and, if possible, to bring Stackington with him. Cheered with this prospect, the young man walked along the winding road from the station, carrying his carpet bag, having first fairly ascertained that the baron's carriage, containing Stackington and Faversham, was out of sight.

Grateful to every body is the first summer sniff of the cool sea; delightful to taste the salt that gathers upon the lips after the first stroll upon the parade of our favourite watering-place. It is pleasant also, to recognise the old familiar faces of last year, still intently gazing at the shingle in the hope of gathering precious agates; to find that the pale boy who was wheeled about in a chair, when we left last autumn, has survived the winter, and can now walk slowly with the help of a friendly arm. It is most mournful, however, to learn that the broad sailor who seemed to have been carved out of a massive block of mahogany, he who pulled us out to catch mackerel last year, lies now buried in the element he loved, with sea weed for a shroud; but it is very exhilarating to know that various weddings, which we had anticipated from observations taken by the setting sun, on many autumn evenings of last year, have actually taken place. Behind one couple who seemed in a very advanced stage of courtship last year, it may be remarked that a servant walks, with something in very flowing robes between her arms, to which something the lady turns now and then to address words which sound like English mutilated by a Red Indian, but which, we are informed, is maternal English. The watering-place itself has changed but little. The bazaar is still holding forth the attractions of a gratuitous concert, to lure its victims to its lotteries; the handsome riding-master still proudly passes the parade, in charge of groups of timid young ladies, who are learning to ride because horsemanship is an accomplishment indispensable to daughters, whose fathers do not keep horses; the same screams rise upon the morning air from the vigorous plunging powers of the same stalwart bathing-woman (who by the way would certainly give any cannibals into whose hands she should fall by chance, the most irremediable attack of scurvy); the same landladies persist in the assertion that houses which front the railway-station, face the sea.

And, unfortunately, there is the same gossip afloat. All newcomers are severely criticised by the people who have occupied the parade during the last fortnight, and various stations in life are freely assigned to them: the fellow who wears the largest whiskers, I have noticed, generally obtaining from parade opinion the greatest consideration and the highest place. Last autumn the post of honour was unanimously accorded to two brothers, who wore fine, fair moustaches, and sported faultless tailoring: but we remember, as very remarkable, that these grandees of the parade were conspicuous at the billiard-table, and were very successful in the public room. The ladies insisted that they must be the youngest sons of earls, at the very least; their name, to the horror of many sentimental minds which had been occupied reading novels, on the shady sides of the boats upon the beach, turned out to be Barlow!

The Ashby circle played a conspicuous part in all this gossip and activity. The family enjoyed a representative in all the varying scenes of the watering-place. No cutter full of people was shoved off the beach, to afford holiday makers the advantage of being ill at the small charge of one shilling, that did not contain an Ashby; no lottery for a glove-box took place wherein an Ashby did not figure as the representative of a number; no raffle-paper was without an autograph of this most interesting and highly respectable family. Even in the matter of costume, the temporary emigrants from Jamaica Lodge were not behind their rivals of the parade. They had invaded the place, amply prepared to put every other ugly in the shade; their boy had a better wooden spade than any of the playmates he found upon the beach; the paternal Ashby had the most wide-awake of all the wide-awakes; and it would have been difficult to find a larger or more useless instrument than that telescope which formed part of the Ashby luggage.

Although the family had arrived only a few hours before the eldest son, already Mrs. Ashby was a subscriber to the reading-rooms, and Miss Ashby to various local charities, when Jack made his appearance in the evening. The old gentleman, in his wide-awake, and light linen coat, looked full of life, as he welcomed his boy's appearance upon the parade, and told him he had ordered a couple of chops for him at the lodgings. Miss Ashby was reclining upon a bench, wondering how her father could become so very excited with so little reason. She asked John after his health, and allowed him to kiss her on the forehead. Jack used to say that his teeth chattered after he had kissed Miss Ashby.

The Ashbys had taken part of a lonely cottage, which was perched upon the precipitous cliffs of the south coast. It was surrounded by trees, and the garden before it sloped away towards the beach. Before the windows lay the broad sea, with ships like white birds floating upon its surface. To the right, the view included a glen, where trees had sprung in the clefts of the sundered rocks, and along the bed of an almost exhausted stream, where rich ferns had softened the jagged outlines of the earth, and from the shady recesses of which the rambler caught, through the mazes of spare trees, welcome glimpses of the blue ocean, to which the murmuring waters at his feet were tending, slowly and almost imperceptibly, but as inevitably as every human pulse bears a creature onward to the Valley of Death.

From the Ashby windows the blue smoke could be seen, which rose from the coast-guard station, sheltered far beneath; from these same windows, people could be observed scrambling down the opposite rocks, and hence flocks of sheep looked like maggots, full of life, against the sloping points of the coast. Here the Ashbys thoroughly enjoyed themselves. They ate all their meals in the open air; they lingered in the garden after the sun had set, and when June flies buzzed about their ears in the dark shadows of the trees; and were loth to enter the house even to sleep. Mr. Ashby was the leader of every excursion; who most loved to scramble over the rocks; who was content to lie behind a huge sand-stone upon the beach, watching his boy and Amy at their daily search for pebbles, little-fish, and sea-weed. He was also content to climb the rocks, at the luncheon hour, with his pockets loaded by the treasures found by his children. It was with a heavy heart that he returned to London every Monday morning, burdened with commissions for the servant at Jamaica Lodge, and with a list of requirements which Mrs. Ashby was sure he ought to be able to get at trade price. It was most consoling to the feelings of Mr. Jack Ashby to learn from his mother that the cottage had been inhabited during many years by the widow of a peer, and that it was in the possession of the aristocratic family at the present time.

Jack took an early opportunity of having an hour alone with his sister, Victoria. Victoria, with her light heart, and active tongue, always amused him. And then the young fellow knew very well that the girl loved him, and turned to him from the sectarian shadows of her home.

"Well, Victoria, what kind of a place is this?" said Jack, as he surprised his young sister on the morrow of his arrival, in the centre of the strawberry bed, her hands glistening with dew.

"Why, the strawberries are ripe, and the people here keep two cows; there are quantities of new-laid eggs, and they bake their own bread," said the girl laughing.

"All weaknesses of mine, as you seem to know, you young puss."

"The man and woman who keep the house have been here fifteen years," pursued Victoria; "they have only one little boy; they have been better off; the man lost all his money in the grocery business; his wife is consumptive; she makes beautiful pies. When she was young she was lady's maid to Lady Agnes Rosemoore, and her husband was footman in the same family; her maiden name was Wallis."

"Does she wear a wig?" Jack asked.

Victoria saw no slyness in the question, but went on again in her own flighty, voluble style. "No, but her husband does; he had a brain fever after he failed in business, and all his hair came off. The coast-guard who lives in the glen—you can just see the chimney from here—is her second cousin. He is under orders to leave for Rye. Poor woman, she is very dull about it."

"Come, never mind the coast-guard, and the rest of it. Are those strawberries for me, chatter-box?" said Jack, advancing energetically towards Victoria's basket, full of fresh fruit.

"Of course they are—but for breakfast," Victoria replied, and snatching up the basket she ran towards the house followed by Jack, both laughing their loudest.

Miss Ashby met her riotous sister at the door.

"I'm ashamed of you," said the serious young lady; "what must the people of the house think of you? Good morning, John; I am not surprised at you."

"I tell you what, Saint Araminta, I'll bet you a brooch against a meerschaum, that the people of the house will have less to say against Victoria than against your saintship, when we leave."

"I don't understand your vulgar nonsense, John; you had better reserve it till you return to your chambers." Miss Ashby passed out into the garden, the picture—the pretty picture, it must be confessed—of disdain.

On the following day Faversham arrived at the cottage, accompanied by Stackington, in the baron's carriage. Faversham, having been asked to stay with Jack till the end of the week, had brought his portmanteau.

Mr. Ashby was very attentive to Mr. Stackington, and was charmed by this gentleman's affable manners. But Stackington could not talk very well; and Mr. Ashby, unfortunately, with the mistaken idea of suiting his conversation to his company, thought proper to start at once into the mysteries of the prevailing diplomacy, of which he knew little, and of which his hearer knew less, except that there was a difference between Berlin and Vienna. Poor Mr. Ashby's little knowledge always turned up a dangerous thing to him. He had read many good books, and had got half notions, indistinct memories of names, distorted views of facts, from them. Some branch of his tree must, at some time or other, have married into the Malaprop family. It was Ashby who was heard by an ill-natured barrister, who spread the joke abroad, at a city dinner, to express his disgust for "Congreve" eels, cooked in any way.

Ashby junior was pleased when Stackington rose to take leave, promising to call in the course of the week. Jack, to exhibit his familiarity with the aristocracy to his dazzled parents, behaved in an unusually off-hand manner to his guest, and asked him, as they shook hands, to come shortly, and have a pipe with him.

That evening Mr. Ashby left the sea-side for his London counting-house. Faversham, left to the godly family, tried to persuade himself that he was very fond of the country; that the glen was very charming; that he could live within the sound of the salt waters all his life. After breakfast he and Jack used to stroll away along the beach; to declare that the day was beautiful; that chambers were murky, disgusting places, compared with this clean cottage. But Faversham's sympathies were with men; as he lay upon the shingle, his thoughts turned to King's Bench walk. He was quiet, subdued all day; he smoked, and talked to Ashby's sisters, but in the cool of the evening, when the ladies were putting on their bonnets for a walk upon the parade, he revived, and hummed his favourite air before the house, as he pulled his yellow gloves on, and repulsed the endeavours of Master Ashby to climb up his legs. The party strolled over the heights towards the town, generally while the yellow tints of the sunset were deepening to a blood-red splendour. As they reached the parade, the red vapours of the west had been already chilled to a fading purple; and the moon had thrown down a silver carpet across the sea, which turned with the walkers, and seemed to invite the adventurous to bend their steps thitherwards. It attracted Faversham's attention, and held it, the first time he walked upon the parade. He had offered his arm to Miss Ashby.

"A splendid night, Miss Ashby!" said Faversham, still gazing away from his companion, across the silvered waters. "A glorious night; one that Shelley would have enjoyed!"

"I have never read a line of him," Miss Ashby replied, with emphasis.

Faversham remembered instantly that his favourite poet was nowhere recognised in the serious neighbourhood to which the partner of his walk belonged. Miss Ashby's serious face looked so pretty, with its solemn expression; the moonlight gave a coldness so proper to its gentle outline, that Faversham, when he turned towards it a little nervously, to note the extent of his blunder, fixed his eyes upon it for some moments, and thought he had never seen a holier image. He longed at once to turn so fair a thinker to his poet. He thought how sweet those lips would look, reciting the tender passages of his melancholy muse.

"I remember," Faversham said presently, "that religious people detest Shelley's name; robbing him of his divinest phase, by denying him religion. Yet there is in every reverence he pays to nature, a good man's reverence for God!"

"Let us change the subject, Mr. Faversham, I beg; we shall never agree," Miss Ashby replied very, very seriously. "I know your opinions are those of all young men, just now. It is a great pity!"

"If I am wrong, undeceive me. You will find me a candid convert."

"It is beyond my power, Mr. Faversham," Miss Ashby answered; "we are a long way behind mamma."

Afterwards Faversham told his friends that he had been walking along the sea-shore with the prettiest little bigot in the world.

Returned from the parade walks, the Ashbys passed an hour about the supper-tray. This hour, in many English households, is the pleasantest of the twenty-four. The talk is light and general. A row of candles stand in inviting prominence upon the sideboard; the servant inquires whether or not anything more is wanted; the fire is made up to last just half an hour longer; the defects of friends have already been amply discussed, and finally dismissed; there is wine, there is also generally some spirit, perhaps there are a few cigars, upon the table; all the party draw unceremoniously about the fire, and impart cheerful confidences.

Faversham was never more lively, during his visit to the Ashbys, than at the hour when the family usually was in bed. After supper Mrs. Ashby allowed one cigar to be smoked in the drawing-room. After supper, when Victoria had gone to bed, Miss Ashby was less serious than at any earlier hour of the twenty-four.

It was at these times that Faversham obtained insights into the mind of Miss Ashby. She fenced with him, it must be admitted, most admirably; she silenced his arguments by pat Scriptural quotations against which he felt it was vain to struggle. He saw that she was literal in everything, that strongly persuaded of the soundness of her own opinions, neither sentiment nor the hardest hits of logic would avail to modify them. Yet she argued with him; and he knew this to be an honour which Miss Ashby conferred upon few of her father's visitors. He talked of an active religion, free from all sectarian bias; she declared that his argument pointed the road to absolute atheism. Shocked often, poor Faversham frequently resolved never again to have an argument with Miss Ashby. But he could never resist the ever-recurring temptation. It annoyed him constantly to see so pretty a girl, so good a girl, opposed to him. He felt a yearning to be in harmony of soul with that sweet little sectarian. He tried to touch her in every way; he appealed to her sense of the beautiful, when they were clambering about the rocks; he drew fanciful conceits before her, when the summer waves came creeping to her feet; the shepherd boys, carving sticks upon the downs, were images to him which he turned to account in vain.

A primrose was a primrose to Miss Ashby; the waves, but the saltiest water. She took her account-books of her districts with her upon the beach; nor did she turn from their ruled pages for one moment to glance at the ribbed silver clouds above, nor the shadows of those clouds upon the ocean below. Here Jack and Faversham often found her, and they lit another pipe, drew their caps over their eyes; threw themselves upon the hot shingle not far off, and played with the pebbles, or pelted Master Jack, and that gossip, Miss Victoria. Faversham, although interested in the conversion of Miss Ashby to his opinions, was glad when Saturday brought back Mr. Ashby to the sea-side.

The old gentleman was welcomed home—as a good father is always welcomed home. That is, Master Ashby hid the flower-pots he had broken during the week—discontinued his cane smoking, obeyed his mother, and went less often to the strawberry-bed. Jack was less jocular, and drank less wine at dinner. Victoria curbed the gossip she loved. Mr. Ashby seldom returned home without some present for the children, or something dexterously obtained at trade price for the elder branches of the family. He always brought a copy of the "Times" with him, and a scarcely dry copy of a weekly paper. He had long stories to tell of the friends he had met in the week; of the little events which had occurred at Jamaica Lodge, and of the political discussions in the houses. He was the idol—the Mentor of his home. His verdicts were final on all questions, to his wife, and to his children—if we except Miss Ashby. It was really pleasant to see his clean face on the morrow of his return, pleased and prepared for some long ramble. He was an intelligent man when he was not intellectual. As he was the oracle of the omnibus in which, six days in every week, he travelled from Jamaica Lodge to the city, so at the sea-side he was the great interpreter to his family of every change of wind, of every phase of the ocean, of the varieties in the shipping that came within sight of that powerful telescope already alluded to. It was his weakness, however, to appear armed with information at all points, and if he did not estimate young men very kindly, it was because he rarely obtained from them that deference for his opinions which he courted, and which, in the city circles open to him, he generally obtained.

Faversham was really interested in old Ashby. He had no great respect for his talents, he detested his business-views, the sordid phases of his character; but he was curious to know how it came about, that this very ordinary member of society, and exemplary city man, made a better father and a better husband than the professional and political men of his acquaintance. There was the Queen's council Namby, for instance. Contrast him with Ashby in his domesticity. The eminent barrister was a liberal, he had one of the clearest intellects at the bar, he had fought his own way to fortune, he loved the poor man (in his speeches), yet he cast his son upon the world, if not with a curse, at least with a scowl that embittered the poor boy's heart against him ever afterwards. Then there was Mr. Clifton, who quarrelled daily with his wife, and told his son he must fight his own way as his father had done before him; nor could he withdraw from his group of contrasts the dignified figure of Lord Stackington, who gave a tip of one of his fingers to Stackington, when he met this young gentleman after an absence of two years. All these gentlemen, thought Faversham, are men of elegant tastes, men of liberal aspirations, authorities on most questions of the day; great upholders of national education, public converts to the doctrine of kindness mostly, patrons of the "Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals," yet they get no welcome home like that which greets Mr. Ashby.

On this account Faversham liked Jack's father. He was easily touched, and he was cheerful in being the witness of the good citizen's domestic harmony. He thought that it would be even worth the sacrifice, could certain men buy some of this quiet happiness, at the price of those thunders of applause which make a platform an elysium, or at the cost of a favourable criticism in the most powerful of the journals.

Faversham was not sorry to be back in his dusky chambers, but he remembered his sea-side walks with Miss Ashby, as bright little passages in his history, which he had not sufficiently appreciated while he was experiencing them. It is a happy truth, that in turning upon the past, the bright passages of our story grow brighter, and the dark clouds under which we have crept, seem less terrible. We wonder that we did not more thankfully enjoy our fortune, and that we made so much of our mishaps.

THE PHANTOM BARK.

A LEGEND OF BRAY.

[THERE is a fanciful legend told among the fishing population of Bray, of a chief of the O'Byrnes who was lured away as the poem relates; but, it is said, even amid the scenes of glory by which he is surrounded he sorrows for the fallen fortunes of his sept; and the fishermen relate tales of a wondrous bark seen at times in the beautiful bay, from which the spell-bound chief gazed on his cherished tho' ruined towers.]

A light skiff lay rocking 'neath Bray-head's bold steep,
Where the waves 'gainst its iron-shore wrathfully leap;
And its master was sleeping, calm, silent, and still,
In the shadow thrown over the wave by the hill.

Till in accents of warning there fell on his ear,
A whisper that mortals but seldom may hear:—
"Ere from the green waters the moonlight shall fly, Thou shalt tread in my bower, or, O! chief, thou shalt die."

As flash the bright rays upon Dargle at morn,
As timid hind bounds at the blast of the horn,
The chieftain sprang upward, wild, startled and wan,
But the form that whispered the warning was gone!

All silent and foamless seemed quickly to glide,
Like a swan on the water, a bark o'er the tide;
And a form seemed to guide it, as pale as the spray,
And fair as a sea-nymph—away, far away!

And soon through the waters, with white sails outspread,
The fay-bark pursuing, the chief onward sped;
Till his bark, as it rapidly swept from the strand,
Was lost to the gazer who looked from the land.

And ever, as onward the spirit-bark fled,
His wild chase unwearied, undaunted he led,
Till visions of glory, that earth's cares dispelled,
His spirit entrancing, the chieftain beheld.

When the dawn of the morning on Ravenswell broke,
And tinted with gold upon Wilfort the oak,
There was wild cavine and wailing—O'Byrne never more
With his skiff from the ocean came back to the shore.

And the chieftain's tall towers begirt by the wave,
With turrets unbannered, looked lone as the grave;
With revel of nobles its halls no more rung,
The harp remained silent, the song-bursts unsung.

When, ruined and roofless in hopeless decay,
His castle unchieftained fell to ruin a prey,
When the morn was decking the mountain's grey side,
The sea-chieftain's bark was flung in by the tide!

Even yet, when the moonlight is wreathing the wave,
And the shade of the mountain falls dark as the grave,
May be seen, where looms upward the sea-witches' cliff,
Far out on the ocean, the chieftain and skiff!

WHAT WE GET FROM GRAPES.

THE variety of beverages is really astonishing that have come into use since the first was invented by mankind, either as a means of allaying thirst, or of stimulating the brain.

Allover the globe there has been placed some means of satisfying what seems to be a universal necessity, and where one source of stimulation, another fills its place, best suited to the climate, or to the constitution.

We turn up our sleeves for the delicacies of some than our own; at China, or the baked Holland; are disreputable at the taste of us, who delight in the eggs of the Siamese, of chicken or rabbit; but a physiologist will tell you that by these disagreeable dainties life is maintained, and muscular strength kept up equally well as by the, to us, more palatable beef or mutton of Europe; and a chemist, his disgust once overcome, would probably sit down to either one or other of them with the comforting knowledge that, after all, they contained quite as much carbon and nitrogen as more familiar food.

So is it with the liquors we ferment. The Switzer, who prepares from the bitter gentian a spirit which affords him solace and warmth on his frozen mountain tops; the Mexican, who brews a liquor with an odour resembling that of tainted meat; and the Tartar, whose constant beverage is fermented mare's milk, all do so from the same motive, and in each case the same result is attained as in the preparation of our wines and malt liquors. All artificial beverages may be considered as the results of a feeble attempt to supply the place of that other which, combining in itself all their good qualities, and possessing none of their faults, has ever been esteemed the type of liquid perfection; has ever, from the earliest ages to the present time, been an object diligently laboured for and universally enjoyed—Wine, the unapproachable, inimitable!

As I write the word Wine my modest sheet of foolscap seems to expand into a very Sahara of paper, claiming to be covered with the ideas which it suggests. The very mention of wine brings visions of sunny hill sides, teeming with golden grapes; of panniered mules, threading along the edge of a precipice, and toiling beneath the weight of their luscious burden; of the heaped fruit, ready for the wine-press; of long files of waggons, laden with turgid skins.

You are taken back to the earliest days of Pagan nations, and see poured from the golden vase the libation which precludes the feast. You think of the wines of Chios and Lesbos; of the Surrentine wine, which was the favourite of Caligula; and of the Pucine, to which the empress, Julia Augusta, said she was indebted for length of days. Then of poor Clarence, and his butt of Malmsey, and pondering upon his strange affection, you remember that of the Rhinelander, as evidenced in the familiar expression: "Lend me your walking-stick to support my vine; the vine will support you when the stick cannot; Lend me your umbrella to prop my vine, it will in turn shelter you far better than the frail silk." And once in Germany you breathe an atmosphere redolent of wine; you are in the land of Markobrunner and Johannisberg, the home of Hock and Liebfraumilch, the country of Gargantuan wine cellars, of the great tun of Heidelberg, of that Bremen cellar, where, for more than two centuries, have reposed five hogsheads of Rhenish, a glass of which is veritable aurum potabile; for supposing the wine to have increased in value in the same ratio as would the sum which it originally cost, if put out to compound interest, it would be worth £113,492, and the price of a single bottle would purchase a German principality!

The knowledge and use of wine dates from a very early stage in the history of man, but we are left in ignorance of the precise period. Noah, we are told, planted a vineyard and drank of the wine, and of the intoxicating nature of the beverage we are not left in the slightest doubt. Indeed, in a warm climate the very fact of the juice of grapes being allowed to remain even for a short time would determine its change into wine. The Jewish Rabbins believed that the fruit—

—“Whose mortal taste Brought death into the world, and all our woe,” was no other than the grape, and to this day the natives of the island of Madagascar have a tradition that the four rivers of Paradise flowed in streams of milk, honey, oil, and wine, and that the punishment which entailed upon our first parents was in consequence of their having partaken of the last of these.

Many oriental nations preserve some memory of the discovery of this universal beverage, and among the ancient Greeks Bacchus and Noah seem to have been considered as one and the same person.

“I know, too, where the Genii hid
The jewell'd cup of their King Jamahid,” sings the Peri, in Moore's “Lalla Rookh.” About this monarch the Persians retain a legend, stating that to him is due the introduction of wine into that country. Jemshedd—the story goes—was so very fond of grapes that, desirous of always having them, he had a large quantity stored in a cellar. When he next visited them he found that the grapes had burst, and that the juice had lost its sweetness; and instead of having it thrown away, which would seem to have been the most natural proceeding, he had it carefully stored in jars, and labelled “Poison.” Now, one of the ladies of Jemshedd's household, perhaps from motives of jealousy, happened to be desirous of putting an end to herself, and taking advantage of the proximity of what she considered a deadly poison, swallowed a considerable draught. Much to her surprise, however, she awoke some hours afterwards without even a headache, mightily refreshed, and not at all in a hurry to attempt suicide again. Many, however, were the visits she paid to the poison jar, and the wine soon becoming exhausted, Jemshedd inquired how it had vanished; and on being told, lost no time in repeating an experiment which had been productive of such salutary effects. More grapes were gathered, and soon fermented, and the court of Jemshedd resounded with the praises of Zeher-e-koosh, or the delightful poison.

Few circumstances argue more in favour of the theory that wine was intended to be the universal beverage of mankind than the etymology of the word itself. From the Hebrew verb in, to press, come the Greek oinos, the Latin vinum, the French vin, the Spanish vino, the Welsh gwin, the Irish fiun, and the English wine.

It will give some idea of the changes and modifications which climate, soil, and cultivation can effect upon the grape to state that no less than fourteen hundred varieties are cultivated in the gardens of Luxembourg. This will also help the reader to understand how it is that one fruit can produce wines of such varied flavour, strength, and richness.

Besides the differences in wines, which are the result of variety in the grapes from which they are made, there are other peculiarities due to the method of cultivation pursued. An example of this exists in the case of the wines of the Cape of Good Hope, the peculiar earthy flavour and want of richness of which are the only particulars in which they are inferior to those of Spain and Portugal. The reason of this is obvious; in the first place the grapes grow very close to the ground, and become covered with particles of earth, and when they are gathered no care is taken to separate the clean from the dirty branches; both, together with unripe and withered fruit, being employed indiscriminately.

The proportion of alcohol in different wines varies quite as much as do their more sensible properties, being on the whole greatest in sherry, which contains a per centage of proof spirit ranging between 30 and 37. In port wine the same, or very nearly the same, alcoholic contents have been estimated; and this also may be said of the wines of Madeira and the Canary islands—Teneriffe; but in French wines the highest per centage ever reached is 16 or 18, and the ordinary wines of the country rarely hold anything like this.

We will now proceed to inquire what are the other constituents of wine, which so modify its alcoholic portion as even in some cases to engender a doubt of its identity with the spirit obtained from it by distillation, i.e., brandy.

The first of these is sugar. This substance serves to modify the flavour of wines very much, by masking the taste of the acids which it contains, and frequently, were this sense alone depended upon, giving a false idea of their strength. As a general rule, it may be said that when the quantity of sugar in a wine, which, like port or sherry, usually contains a moderately large quantity of alcohol, is great, the wine is proportionately weak, and vice versa. In sherry the largest quantity of sugar found is not greater than 18 grains per ounce, while a wine called Paxeare contains as much as 94 grains. Claret and Burgundy are totally devoid of sweetness, as are also many of the German wines. The quantity of sugar in port wine varies between 16 and 28 grains per ounce, and is about, on an average, the same as that in champagne.

The acids contained in wine which deserve notice, are tartaric and acetic, the greater portion of the former being present in the form of cream of tartar.

The substance to which wine owes its astringency or roughness, is tannic acid, one of the constituents of oak bark and nut galls. In the wines of Madeira, Teneriffe, and in most of the Rhine wines, its quantity is so very minute as to be insignificant; but in Port and Claret it is, on the contrary, large, and this fact is often taken advantage of in cases of medical practice, where an astringent is indicated, is, indeed, the great reason why port wine is prescribed more frequently than any other for invalids. The tannin in wine also serves a very important end as regards their preservation, for it unites with other substances liable to decomposition, and prevents them from exerting any injurious effect.

Wine owes its peculiar odour and taste to the presence of small quantities of volatile matter, which are held in solution in the alcohol. The principal of these is æthanolic ether, which seems to be generated from the alcohol during the fermentation. The experiments of Liebig and Pelouze, have shown that from more than one thousand gallons of wine scarcely a pound of ether can be obtained, and from this fact it may be gathered, that in its pure state the ether must be extremely powerful.

The wine used in England is the produce of the vineyards of Spain, Portugal, France, Germany, and Madeira. The Canary Islands also furnish excellent wine, and of late years that of Southern Africa has come more into use than formerly. Taking them in this order those of Spain first demand attention.

Spain is, in very truth, a country of wine; it contains no less than seven thousand vineyards, and the juice of its grapes flows from more than fourteen thousand wine presses.

The variety which chiefly finds its way to England is that near Xeres—pronounced Cheres—a town not far from Seville. The difference in the quality of Xeres wine, known more familiarly as Sherry, are partly natural, and partly artificial. Among the former of these the most important is the fact, that two gatherings of grapes are made; one early, when the fruit is not quite ripe, and the other when it has attained to maturity. Now, as only ripe grapes yield the best wine, that of the earliest vintage is very inferior, and is much mixed with that of a better quality. Among the matter may be classed the mixing of different vintages, and the adulteration with boiled wine and brandy, both of which are practised in order to meet the demand for strong, full bodied wines, in the English market. A Spaniard would reject wine which we esteem as perfection in this country, holding that sweet wines are only fit to be used as liqueurs. Among the most famous wines of Xeres is the Amon-tillado, or Montillado, which is not the production of any particular vineyard, but is stated to be purely accidental; a sort of wine phenomenon. It is pale in colour, almost devoid of sweetness, and has a full, rich, nutty flavour, which is much prized in this country for imparting these qualities to wines in which they are deficient. Thus we learn, that no wine is perhaps less natural than Sherry, which is notoriously a mixture of the products of many vintages, and is moreover “improved,” to suit the tastes of various drinkers.

Sherry is one of the wines which was formerly called “sack.” What the etymology of this word is, is very uncertain, some authorities contending that it owes its origin to a town in Morocco called Xeque; others that it is from sec—dry,—a view which seems to gain some strength from the fact, that lime—if we may take the dictum of Falstaff upon his favourite beverage—was sometimes added with the object, doubtless, of increasing its pungency. On the other hand it may be advanced that so far from sack being necessarily a dry wine, a variety which was very sweet, Malmsey also received this appellation, being distinguished as “Canary sack.”

Morewood inclines to the more probable explanation, that there being a Japanese beverage called sacki, which much resembles wine, the Portuguese traders in Japan—who also traded in Madeira and the Canaries—introduced into Europe the name of a beverage which they had learned to like, together with the wine to which it bore a resemblance.

Portugal gives us only one wine of any importance. This is that of Oporto, or as we call it Port. The importations of this wine form more than three-fourths of the total quantity of red wine consumed in England. In the latter part of the seventeenth century, five hundred pipes of this wine were a superabundant annual supply, while in 1857, no less than twenty-four thousand pipes were shipped to this country; a curious example of the mutability of the tastes and habits of a nation.

It has been often said, “that there is more Port wine drunk in England than ever comes into the country,” a statement not without some foundation, for its deep colour and predominating flavour serve to mask sophistications which cannot so readily be practised upon the more delicate white wines. Even in Portugal itself it is not exempt. The Wine Company of Oporto, some years since, in the endeavour to carry on an honest trade, had all the elderberry bushes exterminated, as the juice of this fruit was largely used to communicate adventitious colour. Even, now, the juice of a species of phytolacca—an adulteration even worse than that by elderberries—is employed.

Port wine, like sherry, receives additions of brandy. This is carried even to a greater extent than with the wines of Spain; it is in fact, invariably practised, no wine ever escaping with less than five per cent of the spirit; while some of a poorer class, said technically to be “sick,” are doctored in much greater proportion.

In pleasing contrast to the brandied heavy wines of Spain and Portugal, come those of France, which are for the most part genuine and unadulterated. Indeed the extreme delicacy of flavour and bouquet, upon which most of the reputation of French wines is founded would be totally injured by even a very small admixture of distilled spirit.

Burgundy, which is one of the most famous, owes the favour in which it is held to the patronage of the Dukes of that name, who were known as “Princes des bons vins.” The most celebrated wines of Burgundy are those produced in the vineyards of Chambertin, Clos Vougeot, and Romanée Conti.

The provinces of Languedoc, Roussillon, and Provence, also produce excellent wines, some varieties of which being sweet and strong, are profitably distilled, or serve to mix with those of a poorer quality. Besides these, the wines of Gascony and Guienne are in much esteem, those with which we are most familiar being the produce of the vineyards of Lafitte, Graves, Sauterne, Barsac, Chateau Margaux and Haut Brion. The wine which we know in England by the generic name of Claret, is a mixture of wines of uncertain names, united in such proportion as to produce a beverage which is known by experience to please.

Champagne, which has not inaptly been said to bear the same relation to wine proper as confectionery does to more solid food, is produced in the department of the Marne, and from the fact that it requires a mode of preparation peculiar to itself, a brief sketch of its manufacture may not be unacceptable to the reader.

As soon as the juice of the grapes, (from which the skins are rigorously excluded,) is expressed, it is put into casks which are kept perfectly full, lest the air should tinge the wine yellow, and allow it to ferment. In the first month of the following year, the newly-made wine is drawn off the lees, and clarified by means of isinglass, a process which it is sometimes necessary to repeat several times. In May it is bottled, and at this time, about three per cent of a syrup, made with the wine and pure sugar, is added. If the champagne is intended to be pink, the syrup is made with red wine. The bottles being secured by wiring down the corks, they are placed in a horizontal position, and thus remain until September. All this time a slow fermentation is going on; alcohol is being formed, and carbonic acid being dissolved in the wine. The latter exerts such considerable pressure upon the fragile glass, that the bursting of the bottles is rather a regular occurrence than an accident; sometimes amounting to as much as fifteen per cent. It is this loss, and the great care and dexterity required in the succeeding process, that accounts for the high price of genuine champagne.

In September, then, the bottles are placed in a refining position, with their necks downwards, so that the deposit which has been formed in them during their fermentation may fall towards the cork. The wire fastening is now removed, and by a series of rapid evolutions, only to be acquired by extended practice, the cork is withdrawn, the sediment tilted out, the cork again returned to its place, and the bottle again placed neck downwards. This jugglery has to be repeated until no more deposit is formed, and the wine remains clear and brilliant.

The wines of Germany are well known to possess excellent flavour and delicious bouquet. The summary of Longfellow's “Friar,” may serve to indicate those in most esteem, quite as well as a less interesting prose description.

“At Bacharach on the Rhine,
At Hochheim on the Main,
And at Würzburg on the Stein,
Grow the three best kinds of wine!
They are all good wines, and better far,
Than those of the Neckar or those of the Ahr.”

Chemically speaking, the characteristics of German wines are acidity, and small alcoholic contents.

The island of Madeira, which boasts the best sugar and wheat, and the most salubrious climate in the world, produces also excellent wines. Besides a Finta or red wine, which does not appear to be exported, there are, according to Morewood, wines made from the Malmsey and Sercial grapes, that from the former being sweet, and the latter a “dry” wine. The wine, however, which is known in England as Madeira, is made from all the grapes of the island indiscriminately, with the exception of the just-mentioned varieties. As in its pure state it will not bear the sea-voyage, it is brandied before shipment, or sometimes the brandy is added when it arrives in England. In the latter case it is distinguished as “London Particular.” When strengthened by the addition of spirit, Madeira, however, vastly improves by transmission to a warm climate, and when so treated, is in much demand. “I have had,” writes Mulder in his ‘Chemistry of Wine,’ “Madeira which had been seven times (in cask) to the East Indies and back, and truly such nectar was unknown to the gods of the ancients.”

Madeira is from its stimulating properties much prescribed by physicians for debilitated patients, in cases where its slight acidity is not objectionable.

Statistics are always rather dry reading, and while we do not think that our readers would care for any lengthened details of wine imports and consumption, we cannot conclude without some reference to these particulars. When we go back and look up the private accounts of some of the royal and noble households of England, we find evidences of the extent to which the drinking of wine was carried, which are scarcely credible when viewed in the light of our modern notions of temperance and moderation.

At the enthronisation of the Archbishop of York, in the sixth year of Edward IV., one hundred tuns of wine were drunk. His predecessor is said to have used eighty tuns of claret yearly in his house; and the consumption of wine in the establishment of the Earl of Shrewsbury exceeded two tuns in the month. In the Earl of Northumberland's household, however, which was regulated with the utmost economy, the yearly allowance of wine did not exceed forty-two hogsheads.

Such, in its origin, in its chemical history, and in some of its varied phases, is wine. We to whose lot falls not to partake of it with our daily bread, should not lament; in this respect its want is well supplied, and it serves with us a no less useful end. To enliven the feast, to cheer in despondency, to strengthen in sickness, is its mission; let us therefore prize it for its excellence, and drink it with thankfulness.

D.

THE BRAVO'S SURPRISE.

N a bright summer morning, about half a century after the death of the renowned Chevalier Bayard, that good knight who lived and died "without fear and without reproach," a young man, in the garb of a soldier, was pursuing his way towards a range of mountains that towered over a certain part of the coast of southern Italy. It was evidently a period of truce in that land, else why should this young soldier be on a ramble of pleasure, as he happened to be at the time? He was dressed in the Spanish military costume of the day, but the lofty brow, slightly aquiline nose, and other eminently handsome features, together with his well-moulded stalwart frame, and proud port, as he trode leisurely onward, were better evidences that he belonged to that gallant nation. His age was about twenty-three, but there was a thoughtful expression in his face, and a look of much experience in his dark grey eyes, that made him appear a few years older.

The range of mountains, towards which he directed his steps, lay between him and the coast, and it was not till the morning was very considerably advanced that he came to the opening of a pass, that seemed to lead in past through them to the sea. Through this pass a stream descended into the plain, and along the edge of the glen, down which the bright cool waters danced merrily, a path led up into the heart of the mountains, and, shaded by many a spreading and graceful tree, formed a pleasant if toilsome way, along which the young soldier pursued his journey, till the beams of the meridian sun smote hot and brilliantly on the fantastic boulders of rock that occasionally strewed the sides of the steep and solitary ravine.

"By my faith, Miguel," said he, half audibly addressing himself, as he went on. "By my good word, but thou art a veritable pilgrim to-day. But we will rest soon."

The turning of the path was at last gained, but when the young soldier here looked on the prospect that opened before him, the idea of his projected halt was abandoned for the time, and he only stood for a few moments in delighted contemplation of the scene. He was on the verge of an immense oval valley, in the midst of which a huge pyramidal-shaped block of hill shot up its pointed summit into the blue air, with a waterfall at its foot.

Upon the very verge of the fall, the young soldier sat down, opened his wallet, and began regaling himself upon its contents, which consisted of a loaf of brown bread, a quantity of dried figs and some raisins, together with a flask, which contained a small modicum of choice wine. After finishing a few morsels of the bread, his eye fell on a huge vine, which hung from the bough of a tree beneath him on the side of the chasm, and which appeared through all its length one immense cluster of ripe and tempting grapes. Casting a glance around the chasm, in order to discover a few bunches of grapes more easy of access, his longing eye again returned to the huge trailing vine, for another was not to be seen.

"Well," he said, at length, "I will have a bunch or two, even though 'twere at the price of my neck. But, no—at Calaro I can regale myself upon them, without incurring such danger," and he recommenced his attack upon the brown loaf. "However," resumed he again, as he gazed upon the heavy clusters of alluring fruit, "a sparrow in the hand is worth a vulture on the wing," and with that sage proverb he put his wallet on the sward beside him, stood up, and began examining the steep side of the chasm, in order to find some mode of access to the object of his desires. Beneath his feet and down to the root of the trees from which the vine depended, hung an aged creeping plant, like a ladder of rope.

It was now an easy task to ascend the trunk, and he was soon plucking eagerly at the ripe bunches of grapes above. After enriching himself with a choice collection, he was about to descend, when the branch of the tree on which he leant principally for his support, incontinently broke beneath his weight, and he would have been precipitated into the deep, dark pool beneath, were it not that at the same instant he caught a firm hold of the depending wreath of vine. This also gave way, and, as it were, peeled down the trunk of the tree, so that when at last it stopped, with a shock, he found himself in the air, swinging to and fro over the pool, and, luckily for himself, entangled in the rosy branches and flexible clingers of the vine. To and fro he swung for some considerable time, till at last the vine wreath ceased its undulations, and he found himself only a few yards above the treacherous water, ensconced in a far more ingenious hammock than ever he had the fortune to be placed in on board ship, when he sailed from the blue Cordova Bay across the Mediterranean wave, to the gay shores of the Italian land.

He had full leisure to regret his hasty act and look around him, but there were no means of escape save by the water, the threatening roar of which, as it escaped from the pool some yards to his right, made that mode of exit appear both dreadful and dangerous. After taking a full survey of his situation, he endeavoured to swing himself into the almost perpendicular side of the chasm next him, but with each effort, the vine wreath, after various provoking oscillations, returned to its original position, and left him to re-contemplate his dilemma in no very enviable frame of mind. His only plan was to wait for the aid of some traveller who might chance to take the path he had taken in the morning.

He was now in despair, and about to let go his hold of the vine, and commit himself to the dubious mercy of the water beneath, when he heard, high above the noise of the waterfall, the jovial notes of a guitar, sounding apparently from the very spot he had some time before chosen, whereon to eat his noonday meal in peace. After making himself hoarse with calling to the unknown musician, the sounds of the guitar at length ceased, and on looking up, the young soldier beheld a stalwart and very handsome youth, about his own age, gazing upon him from the edge of the precipice overhead. Over a blue velvet doublet he wore a light Spanish cloak, and his curling ebony locks fell down almost upon his well-turned shoulders from beneath a plain broad-brimmed hat without a plume, but with a diamond clasp to the ribbon that encircled it. The stranger leant against the trunk of a young tree, in order to have a better view, and at last seemed to comprehend in its fullest extent the danger of him beneath, who so eloquently and eagerly sought his help.

"Who and what art thou?" said he, as he still, however, leant against the tree looking down.

"By my word, sir stranger," answered the unfortunate object of his inquiry, "if you wait for genealogies, there will soon be only a slight account of me, for I feel this bacchanal twig about to give way again and plump me into the pool. My name," continued he, as the other now began to descend with wonderful nimbleness to his aid, "is Miguel de Cervantes, a soldier of King Philip the Second of Spain."

"Ha!" said the stranger, still descending towards the ledge on which the tree grew. "I, too, am a soldier of the king. Dost know me, Miguel? Dost know thy merry comrade of years ago when we lived together in the Calle de los Moros of Salamanca, and studied to make sonnets and redondillas under the tutorship of the worthy Juan Lopez?"

"Don Juan de Burgo!" exclaimed Cervantes, in immense astonishment. "I' faith but it is he for a verity! Ah! I remember—remember well. But methought thou wert long ago in thy native country beyond the seas, Juan—in Ireland."

"I would have been," answered the other, as he commented, after gaining the ledge, breaking off a long branch of the tree. "I would have been there, but that my father was killed in battle about a year ago, and his barony given away to another. So you see there was nothing left for me but to follow the tuck of King Philip's drums as a soldier like thyself.* Here, catch this!" continued he, as he reached out the broken branch to Cervantes, "catch a firm hold and I will draw thee in."

In a few moments Cervantes was safe on the ledge, and clasping with a warm pressure the hand of his friend. They then ascended to their original station overhead, and sitting down side by side, commenced a new attack on the contents of the wallet.

"What brings thee here?" queried Cervantes, after taking a draught of wine to refresh himself.

"Love!" answered his companion, curtly.

"Love! I' faith thou hast come a far way to find out an idol for thy heart."

* At this time great numbers of the Irish went over to Spain and fought under the banners of King Philip.

"Dost see that guitar?" said De Burgo, pointing to the instrument which lay on the grass beside him. "Dost think I would wander about like a troubadour, with that at my back, were it not for love, and to strum up a serenade in honour of her bright eyes? Three months ago," continued he, warming to his subject; "three months ago, we met, and loved, Miguel. She is the kindest, loveliest, best, and most faithful maiden in all Italy, and her name—I may tell it to thee, Cervantes—is Maria de Mondella!"

"Ha!" exclaimed Cervantes, "the daughter of Don Atilano, the proud old captain of musqueteers. In good faith, Juan, you will have a troublous love-story, for she is both beloved by, and betrothed to, the Signor Antonio, the old magistrate of Calaro, yonder!"

"I know it," answered De Burgo; "but she hath vowed eternal constancy to me. What, therefore, do I care for father or lover—the latter being of an age fit for her grandfather. I will pursue it out to the last, Miguel, come what may."

"Let me picture to you what will hap," said Cervantes. "The Signor Antonio is old, it is true, but, then, he hath abundance of money with which to pay a bravo, to put half a foot of steel or more into thy back, some night that thou art strumming thy guitar before her window. So beware, I tell thee, Juan, or thou mayest never return when the trumpet of war is again sounded."

"Come," answered his companion, arising and taking his guitar, "I will play a serenade to-night, before her window, whatever hap. Let us go, for I am impatient to reach Calaro, and be near her once more."

Cervantes stood up, and arranging his wallet, with his comrade took the path that led down by the wild stream towards Calaro, which place they reached early that evening. They put up at the only hostelry in the village, intending to remain there for a day or more, according as fortune frowned at or favoured the love affair of the warm-hearted Hibernian.

That night when the villagers had retired to rest, and when the moon silvered the waveless expanse of the sea, the gay notes of a guitar might have been heard echoing through a scentful orange grove that bloomed before a beautifully built cottage in the village of Calaro, and if any curious inquirer stole upon the scene, he would have observed the worthy Juan standing under the casement of young Maria de Mondella, and singing to the accompaniment of his instrument a serenade that would have melted a heart far more obdurate than that of his lady-love. Bye-and-bye the casement opened gently, and a beautiful head, and a pair of the brightest eyes imaginable, appeared in the moonlight, and there and then ensued a conversation too long and sweet to recount within the limits of this veritable history. Next night the same scene was repeated. On the third night Cervantes sat in the hostel waiting for his comrade, but Juan did not return at the usual time. It was a calm beautiful night, and Cervantes feeling uneasy, at length wrapped his cloak around him, took his sword, and leaving the hostel, strolled up the village towards the residence of Maria de Mondella. Taking a path that led through the orange grove, he soon came in sight of the house, and there saw his comrade, with his hat and sword thrown beside him, and his guitar in hand, warbling away a farewell serenade in praise of the bright eyes of Maria. As Cervantes looked upon this scene, a man glided suddenly out behind his unwary friend, from between the trunks of two aged trees, and ere there was time for a call or shout of warning, the long dagger of the bravo—for he was one—was buried in the back of poor Juan de Burgo, who, dropping his instrument, fell with a groan upon the pavement. Cervantes rushed out, sword in hand, from his hiding place, but before he had gained the scene of the catastrophe, the bravo was gone—gone too, as Cervantes was well aware, beyond pursuit. The end of it was that Juan, all but mortally wounded, was borne into the dwelling of Don Atilano, Maria's father, where, after a day or so, he recovered his senses sufficiently to recognise his friend. Cervantes wanted to remove Juan to the hostel, but Don Atilano, who was a blunt and rather eccentric old soldier, refused, and insisted on the wounded man being left in his house till his recovery. He, however, prohibited Maria from seeing Juan, but she contrived to see him nevertheless, and her renewed vows of constancy had more effect in his recovery than the ministrations of the village doctor, who attended daily.

One day, when his friend had just recovered, Cervantes strolled out into the village, and there saw on every corner a proclamation posted up, commanding every soldier of King Philip to return to head quarters. The two comrades did return, but not before De Burgo had again seen Maria, when both once more vowed to be eternally true to one another, despite Signor Antonio and all. And they were true, as after events justly showed.

Stirring times followed the departure of the two comrades from Calaro. At the battle of Lepanto, where Don Juan of Austria with his fleet encountered the Turks and defeated them, the two fought gallantly side by side, and there it was that the future author of the immortal Don Quixote lost his left hand. After that memorable engagement Cervantes, on his return to Spain, was taken prisoner by a band of Algerine pirates, and sold as a slave. His many adventures afterwards, and his final escape and return to Spain, are matters of literary history into the particulars of which it is unnecessary to enter here.

De Burgo was more fortunate. He returned to Italy, wandered away again to Calaro, and found Maria de Mondella still true to her vows. During his absence his ancient rival, Signor Antonio, had died, and now returning as Juan was with well acquired glory from the wars, there was no bar to his marriage with Maria. They were wedded, and in after years, spent happily, Juan de Burgo rose, step by step, till he became one of the bravest generals of King Philip the Second. Whether he ever again met his comrade, Miguel de Cervantes, is unknown.

DONEGAL CASTLE.

HE venerable ruins of Donegal Castle are situated on the north bank of the little river Esaky, at the extremity of the town to which, as well as the county, it has given its name. The title literally signifies the Dun or Fort of the stranger—Dun-na-Gall. According to the "Annals of the Four Masters," a fortalice was first erected here by Hugh Roe O'Donnell, in the year 1474, from which period it became the chief residence of the chiefs of Tirconnell. In 1601, this castle having been surrendered to the forces of Queen Elizabeth, through the instrumentality of Niall Garve O'Donnell, it was besieged and taken by the famous Red Hugh O'Donnell, who reduced it to a ruined pile. Dr. Petrie is of opinion that the present edifice was erected by Sir Basil Brooke, a scion of the family of Brooke, of Norton, in Cheshire, to whom a grant of the Castle was made by patent, dated the 16th of November, 1610. During the troubles of 1641, the castle was garrisoned for the King by Sir Henry Brooke, Sir Basil's son, but was taken in May, 1651, by the Marquis of Clanricarde, assisted by the Ulster forces under Sir Phelim O'Neill, and the united septa of the MacMahons and O'Reillys. He abandoned it, however, upon the advance of Sir Charles Coote, into whose possession it fell. Since this time it ceased to be used as a residence.

"Oh! solitary fort, that standest yonder,
What desolation dost thou not reveal!
How tarnished is the beauty of thine aspect,
Thou mansion of the chaste and gentle melodies!"

THE BLACK DOCTOR.

CHAPTER X.

ARMAN pretended not to hear the observations of the Jew, and was about to take his departure, when Isaac got between him and the door, and throwing himself on his knees, besought the attorney to have pity on him.

"By letting you live a little longer you may be made some use of. Get up! I have a will here, duly executed, in which the sum of two thousand five hundred pounds is bequeathed to Mr. Frederick Foster, by his wife, Laura, who is now dead. I want from you now a thousand pounds on that will, and the remaining fifteen hundred when probate shall be obtained."

The Jew paused, and said, "Mr. Foster is deeply in my debt already, and suppose, good Mr. Barman, if I give you now five hundred pounds on the security of the will, you will let me have the remaining two thousand to pay me the interest on my advances and the balance due to me?"

"You can make your election between accepting my terms or going to Newgate this very night," said Barman, with an air of indifference. "Don't higgie with me, your money is safe; but mind, besides the thousand which I now demand, you must give me an acknowledgment for the balance stated in the will."

"You are too hard on me; consider what a large sum Foster owes me."

"Liar!" replied Barman. "Do you think I have no other business than to listen to your recording your many virtues. There is the will," continued Barman, throwing the document on the table.

"Give me the money and the acknowledgment, or say that you won't."

The Jew took up the will, and was proceeding to peruse it, when Barman said, "At your leisure you will find it all correct. I can wait no longer."

The Jew rose and took from his pocket a large key, and going over to an iron safe built in the wall, produced the money demanded.

"Is there a thousand here?" asked Barman, as he lifted the leather bag which the Jew placed before him.

"There is, in gold and notes," replied Isaacs, sadly, as he shook his head.

"I will take your word for it; give me the acknowledgment now and I will go," said Barman.

The Jew complied, and in a few minutes after Barman was on his way to the wretched lodgings of Mr. and Mrs. Foster.

The Jew remained wrapt in profound thought, after the attorney left. The fox had defeated the wolf.

The return of wealth to those who have become suddenly poor is received with that delightful appreciation of its value, as the gradual progress to health is esteemed by the feeble convalescent who walks out in the warm, balmy air, after having been immured for months, in pain and suffering, in a sick chamber. Poor Mr. and Mrs. Foster, what joy is on its way to your miserable home; your hours of weary want and pinching penury are at an end, at least for a season, and sunshine is coming to the shadow of your hearts, and stranger Hope again returns to you!

Barman, though his load was heavy, thought his step was never so elastic, and he felt as independent as if he owned a fourth part of the city. His heart was brim-full of exultation, and all his faults were swallowed up for the time in his good nature. In fact, he had no room for anything else, as he trudged along with his precious burden. He stopped at his office on his way, and suddenly opening the door, he discovered Quill in the centre of the floor, addressing, in a loud voice, an imaginary jury.

On observing the excited appearance of his master, and hearing the chink of gold, as Barman laid the leather bag on a table, the forensic Quill at once came to the conclusion that his employer had robbed and murdered some body.

"Was there any one looking for me here to-day, Jonas?"

"No, sir," replied Quill, "except Wisp, who said that he would call again."

"Tell him," said Barman, "to wait with you till I return. Tell me why did you not inform me of your having assisted Abraham Isaacs to commit a forgery here yesterday?"

Quill instinctively gave a whistle, as he looked with surprise at his master.

"It is no matter, now; I will be back soon," said Barman, as he hurriedly took his departure, before Quill had time to reply.

"How did he find it out so soon?" soliloquized Quill. "Could the Black Doctor have told him? No. Could Tony? No. Could Jonas Quill? No. And Abraham Isaacs did not tell him; and who told him then? said Quill, as he stopped a considerable time to consider. At length he said, "Whoever told, it is clear that this illustrious individual is in a fine scrape. If it comes to no worse, I will surely lose my present high legal appointment. But I will be tried for forgery, and so I had better rehearse the trial."

Quill descended from his stool, and, fixing his eyes on several bundles of mouldy law papers that were piled on a shelf, he said, "Gentlemen, answer to your names." The law papers having been supposed to be duly sworn, Quill placed a tin box on the mantelpiece, which he addressed as "My lord!" "Hats off!" said Quill, and, after having cried out "Silence!" several times, he said, "Put Jonas Quill forward. Are you ready for your trial?" "I am," was the reply. "Do you object to the jury?" "No," replied Quill. "I forgot," continued Quill, to ask myself "was I guilty or not guilty, but that's no matter."

"Gentlemen of the jury," said Quill, addressing the law papers on the shelf, "the prisoner at the bar stands indicted—I won't mind the indictment," said Quill, "that's the business of the clerk of the crown."

Quill then proceeded to address the jury for the prosecution. "Gentlemen of the jury, I have a most painful duty to perform—a duty rendered more irksome as the prisoner is a member of the profession to which I have the honour to belong. He had extensive practice in this very court, and bore a most amiable character.

He is descended from the old and time-honoured family of the Quills."

The further progress of Quill's oration was interrupted by the entrance of Wisp.

"The governor says that you are to stop here till he comes back," says Quill.

"Who was that you were speaking to when I came in?" asked the bailiff.

"I was only reading aloud from a favourite author. Was there anything fresh to-day?"

"No," replied the bailiff. "Didn't we manage the wake and funeral very well?"

"First rate!" replied Jonas, who entered into general conversation with the bailiff.

Barman knocked at the door of Foster's lodgings, and was admitted by Mrs. Foster.

"I have good news for you," said he, as he placed the bag containing the money on the floor at the feet of Foster, who was sitting at the fire. "In that there is a thousand pounds, the first instalment of the will."

The sudden joy seemed to be too much for Foster, who almost fainted, and his wife appeared like one bewildered, as Barman opened the bag and placed piles of gold and bank notes on the table.

"You must remove from here to-night," said Barman, who was beginning to get deeply affected at the influence which the prospect of returning fortune exercised over Frederick Foster and his wife. "You must not be seen here. When night falls get a lodging in some quiet place at the other side of the city."

"I cannot thank you now," said Foster, "my heart is too full of gratitude."

"Don't mind that part of the business, my dear fellow," said Barman. "I must be off to settle with the bailiff and the others who took part in—the recent proceedings," continued the attorney, "and for that purpose I will want about fifty pounds."

"Take as much as you require," said Foster, warmly shaking Barman by the hand.

"I have not attempted to express my gratitude to you, Mr. Barman," observed Mrs. Foster, "because I could not. The obligations we are under to you are too great."

"Had I no other reward, madam," replied Barman, "than the consciousness of having assisted in relieving you from the persecution of your enemies, it would be ample compensation for any little trouble I might have had in your affairs."

Barman having received the money he required, and after having paid his respects to Mrs. Foster, took his departure, followed by her husband.

"You remain only this night and to-morrow in Dublin," said Barman. "I will see you at my office before you leave, and we will best consider the course to be pursued."

Barman, after having bid his friend a cordial good evening, returned to his office, where Quill and Wisp were waiting for him, the former all apprehension and the latter all impatience.

When Barman entered his office he called Quill aside, and asked him if he had spoken of the Jew's forgery to any one.

Quill, who was trembling with fear, answered in the negative.

"Keep your secret," said Barman, "and speak to no person about it without my permission. Here are ten pounds for you for the part you played in the making of the will and in the wake and funeral. Wisp," continued Barman, calling the bailiff, "here are ten pounds for you; you know for what you get it. I must leave now, as I am in a hurry home."

When Barman was gone, Quill looked into the face of Wisp, and Wisp looked into the face of Quill, as if to ascertain if the surprise of one was as great as the surprise of the other. Each counted his money over and over again in silence, till at length Quill exclaimed: "Bravo! governor;" and turning to his friend, said—"Come, Wisp, time is up."

In a short time the office was closed, and the worthy pair took their departure together.

ANCIENT FORMS OF CIVILIZATION.

OUR forms of civilization, as remarked by Dr. Knox, in an able paper read before the Ethnological Society, not long since, seem to have existed in the early dawn of history, in regions of the earth, and amongst races of men remote from each other, all remarkably antagonistic of those Western races who now play so prominent a part.

These regions were Egypt, India, China, and the valley of the Euphrates and Tigris; and the civilized races occupying them were the Copt, the Mongol, the Assyrian, and the Indian or Hindû. Through thousands of years these races have invariably presented unmistakable differences in physical organization and moral character, as is proved by historical as well as sculptural evidence. The unchangeable nature of these forms of civilization is as remarkable as the constancy of their physical characters. One of these races—the Coptic—has ceased to exist as a nation, but so long as it retained the resemblance of a people, it seems never to have undergone any change. The Persian, Greek, Roman, and Saracen swept the valley of the Nile, gazing with wonder or contempt at the sublime and mysterious monuments of ancient Egypt, but these peoples made no permanent change in the morale or physique of the Copt race. What the Hindû is now his ancestors were in the days of Alexander the Great, and there is nothing to show that the Mongolian of China was ever different than at present.

It is almost certain that, although the Arab and other foreign races have displaced the native Copt from the soil of Egypt, the remains of that race, unaltered physically, still wander by the banks of the Nile. We are not aware of the existence of any pictorial remains of the ancient Celtic inhabitants of France; but it is certain that those of many parts of that country so strongly resemble those of our native Caledonians, that the identity of the race can scarcely be questioned; whilst the Basque remain an isolated people to this day. An indigenous race may be driven out by another, but even this accident, apparently so probable, seems but seldom to have happened. However, be this as it may, we have evidence of a pure Coptic race still in Egypt, while the physical characteristics of the Jew, the Gipsy, and the Parsee remaining unaltered under every circumstance and every climate, and the pictorial and sculptural remains of races whose features are still recognizable after a lapse of at least 4,600 years, prove not only the fixity of race-characters, but their persistence and antiquity. The four races referred to by Dr. Knox, differ remarkably in their physical organization and social conditions, their literature and language, architecture and fine arts, and mode of warfare. Had nothing of the Coptic race remained but their skeletons, how meagre and erroneous would be our knowledge! But in the sculpture of the tombs of Thebes, the Coptic artist of the day has handed down to us the knowledge of that exterior by which Nature distinguishes her varied productions. In the presence of these monuments the Copt ceases to be black, as was asserted by Herodotus. From them we learn that the race was peculiar; seemingly African—certainly not European. Those elongated, sleepy eyes could never have been conjectured had we possessed but the crania of the race; the enlarged nostrils, extended mouth, and tumid lips, so characteristic of the Copt, must have remained for ever unknown, but for those representations of that exterior in which resides all the remarkable distinctions.

The key to the literature of the Coptic race has been lost, and Egypt's place in history, consequently, is not yet determined. The Indian records are regarded as untrustworthy, as well as those of the Chinese. Thus, of the three most remarkable nations on the earth, the Coptic, Mongolian, and Hindû, who each invented a civilization peculiar to itself, we are unable to determine the historical relations. The history of ancient Egypt would have thrown light on that of Syria, Phœnicia, Assyria, Babylonia, Arabia, and Ethiopia. In a true history of the Phœnician race might have been found the secret of Etruria's ancient monuments; a reliable history of India might have discovered traces of the history of Central Asia, as yet unknown to us. But those records fail us at the point where they are most wanted, and thus the history of those races must be sought for in the territories they are known to have occupied.

As Dr. Knox correctly observes, the aboriginal races of Asia Minor are quite unknown to us, and have not been mentioned by any author since Homer; whilst those of the valley of the Euphrates and Tigris are only known to us through the imperfect narratives of the early Greek writers. The discoveries of Botta, Layard, and Rawlinson, show us that these races, isolated from Egypt and Syria, held in check by the natives of Asia Minor, and limited on the north and east by mountainous regions, presented a form of civilization, of art, and a written language entirely peculiar. There is another difficulty in respect to these races of the Euphrates and Tigris, who invented, or at least employed, the cuneiform letters as the medium of monumental inscription—viz; that all traces of any littoral races seem to have been lost; although it is certain such must have existed. Such a race may have stood in the same relation to the more inland races, as the Phœnician held to those around, and as the modern Basque to the Celtic race of France.

The Phœnicians sent warlike colonies to Africa and Europe, of which the African offshoot fill as bright a page in history as the Carthaginians; but this maritime people made few or no conquests, and consequently but slightly influenced the fortune of the African continent; as in like manner the maritime Basque have made no head against the Celtic races, in a conquering point of view. But it may have been otherwise with an Egyptian or African colony, landing in Southern Babylonia. Modern authors hint at this when they speak of the Egyptian or African origin of the Chaldee. The Armenian historians obscurely indicate a race entering by the valley of the Persian Gulf, and carrying to the highlands of Armenia the elements of civilization. Numerous have been the attempts of scholars to assign to these three races—the Coptic, Mongol, and Hindû—not only their respective places in history, but likewise their respective claims to the discovery of the arts; who were first civilized, and what they borrowed from each other. Dr. Knox's opinion has been long since expressed, that each created its own form of civilization, literature, language, art, and religion. Two distinct races of men are portrayed on the Coptic monuments—the Copt and the Negro; and an ancient race not now to be found anywhere is depicted on the Etrurian monuments. Others, then, are also on the Coptic relics, of which it seems impossible to define the races. They may represent some Scythian people, but they are certainly not Jews, if the Jew of that day resembled the Jew of the present.

The ancient Coptic artists have represented on their monuments a considerable number of figures, having different physiognomies; but many of these are representations of Arab tribes, inhabiting the borders of Egypt, and not at all intended to represent great original divisions of the human family. In these paintings, much was obviously left to the fancy of the artist; but from the pictorial representations, the Copt seems never to have penetrated into the land of the elephant, although this animal, the great arm of war in every age in India, abounded in Abyssinia, and, without doubt, also in Southern Libya. The absence of the elephant, the camel, and of cavalry, strikes at once at those theories which have assigned to the monarchs of Egypt a vast territory, and innumerable conquests over adjoining nations. The ancient Copts, observes Dr. Knox, made no conquests; and, what at first seems almost incredible, were not the fact proved by their own monuments, they had not, during the lapse of thousands of years, discovered the art of training the camel and the elephant to domestic or warlike purposes. The Egyptian monarchy had made no progress with Northern or Southern Libya, and the elephant was unknown to them until the time when the generals of Alexander the Great returned from India, and thus introduced the Asiatic elephant into Africa and Europe.

It is remarkable that there are amongst the Egyptian pictorial representations figures almost resembling the Chinese. If they are really such, we have then another race depicted on their ancient monuments besides the Negro and the Copt. In very remote times the Chinese had penetrated as far as the Caspian, and we see no reason to doubt that their vessels may have navigated the Red Sea. In the time of Herodotus, an African people who shaved their heads, reserving the long central lock, dwelt to the south of Egypt, in the direction of the sea-coast, and it was possibly these people which are represented. The ancient Egyptians, Persians, Medes, Assyrians, and Babylonians, seem alike to have been ignorant of the use of cavalry and of the elephant.

Dr. Knox does not wish it to be understood that in his opinion no civilized race existed anterior to the Copt, the Mongol, and the Hindú. On the contrary, he believes that there were many such, but that their monuments have disappeared. What he contends for is, the originality of the ancient forms of civilization; and as regards the Coptic, it frequently occurred to him, that Egypt, with its original population, holds relations much more intimate with Syria than with Africa. There is undoubtedly in the Coptic physiognomy something Syrian. Of the Mongolian, as represented by China, and of the Hindú, all who have studied the monumental history of these races must admit that if they borrowed their civilization from western races, the period when this happened must be infinitely remote, and that if such races existed, they and their monuments have wholly disappeared.

Subsequently to the Coptic, Mongolian, and Hindú forms of civilization, a race new to history and a new civilization appeared in the valley of the Euphrates and Tigris—viz., the Assyrian. Many are disposed to add the Babylonian or Chaldee. In physical conformation the Assyrian race were quite distinct; they were Asiatic, possessed a written language peculiar to themselves, and arts which, although in some features resembling the Coptic, yet presented striking differences. We are able to determine much of the physical organization and form of civilization of the Assyrians from their monuments; that the latter was Oriental and peculiar does not admit of a doubt.

In early times there arose by the shores of the Bosphorus and the Propontis, the Hellepont and Egean, a race of men whose destiny it was to present to mankind the highest form of civilization, and to teach them art, science, and philosophy. They likewise perceived the beautiful in Nature, and had the ability to express it in sculpture. They had penetrated, at a remote period of their history, far into Asia Minor. These Greeks mingled deeply with the Asiatic races, and were supposed by Niebuhr to have drawn much of their architectural inspiration from the Oriental mind. The contrast between the Assyrian, Coptic, and Indian sculpture with the "Elgin Marbles" and other works of Greek art, may be well studied in the British Museum. "Turn then," says Dr. Knox "for an instant from the contemplation of the dog-headed Anubis, the barbaric forms of Egypt, India, and Assyria, to the divine figures which meet the gaze in the Grecian galleries, and we shall be forced to admit that between the minds of the races which fashioned and invented these different forms of art, there is a gulf impassable by any educational bridge." That ancient Greece altogether borrowed her grand ideas of art from the East cannot, however, be conceded, when we see such distinctive features in the minds and characters of the races. We have already, in our second number, adverted to some of the most salient points in the history of Greek art.

It is a matter of surprise how it happened, that great Western races—the Scandinavian and Celtic, the Teuton and German, the Goth and Slavonian—continued in the lowest condition of barbarism, until a period which appears like yesterday, in the history of man. In forty centuries they were unable to advance a single step in the direction of true civilization. Architecture they had none, and to speak of their literature and arts would be simply ridiculous. Nor was it until returning from the East, where the Saracenic form of art had taken root, that a new order of architecture, the Gothic, arose. It was not until the discovery in Italy of the remains of Greek art, that the beautiful and true in Greek art, literature, and science were once more recognized on earth.

Central Africa is the cradle of the Negro; the Copt has never been traced to or from any other country but the valley of the Nile; in Southern Africa alone dwells the Bushman; to Eastern Asia we trace the Mongol; to the valley of the Euphrates and the Tigris, the Assyrian. The descendants of the latter still exist, in the modern Armenians, who for some thousand of years have unconsciously trodden under foot the temples and palaces of their ancestors; as for the Arab tribes they were as unconquered in the time of Augustus as they are now; Nineveh and Babylon rose and fell, leaving them free in their deserts. Brought into contact with many races, they adopted the inventions of none. They accepted fables for truth, and the Koran was their tomb of science, literature, and art. They attempted three settlements on three continents, and signally failed. Nature gave them Desert Arabia as their home, and there only do they thrive.

CURIOSITIES OF FOOD.

HE labours of modern chemistry have thrown a new light on the various races of men, inhabiting parts of the globe which are widely different from each other in their geographical and climatological relations. The substances which serve as food, or the quantity which is taken, appear to the superficial observer often of a most extraordinary nature, from the circumstances that they are apparently so heterogeneous from what we are accustomed to. We shall, therefore, proceed to notice a few of those unusual or extraordinary articles of consumption.

For some years past the southern countries of America have exported to the Continent considerable quantities of dried meat, known under the name of Assajo. It is reputed to make an excellent soup. Another sort of food prepared in Texas is the meat-biscuit, which is made of boiled beef, free from grease; the liquor is evaporated to the consistency of syrup, and this is mixed with wheaten flour in sufficient proportion to form a solid paste. This paste is then spread out by a rolling-pin, pierced with a number of minute holes, cut into the ordinary dimensions of the biscuit, and then baked and properly dried. The biscuit is eaten dry, or it may be broken and boiled in twenty or thirty times its weight in water. This biscuit resembles in appearance a light-coloured sugar-cake. It is packed in air-tight casks or tin canisters of different sizes, part of the biscuit being pulverised by grinding in a mill for the purpose, and then packed with the whole biscuit. "Jerked beef," or tasajo, as it is termed in Cuba, is imported to a large extent into that island, for feeding the slaves on the plantations. In South America jerked beef is called charqui, and when salted and smoked, or dried in the sun, sesina. The mode of preparing it in Chili is described as follows: When the horned cattle are sufficiently fat, or rather at the killing season, which is about the months of February and March, from five hundred to a thousand, according to the size of the farm, are slaughtered. The whole of the fat is separated from the meat and melted, forming a kind of lard called grasa, which is employed for domestic purposes. The process of "jerk-ing" the meat is performed by cutting the fleshy substance into slices of about a quarter of an inch thick, leaving out all the bones. The natives are so dexterous at this work that they will cut the whole of a leg, or any other large part of a bullock, into one uniformly thin piece. The meat thus cut is either dipped into a very strong solution of salt and water, or rubbed over with a small quantity of fine salt. Whichever mode is adopted, the whole of the jerked meat is put on the hide, and rolled up for ten or twelve hours. It is then hung on lines or poles to dry in the sun, which being accomplished it is made into bundles, lashed with thongs of fresh hide, forming a kind of net-work, and is ready for market. The tongue is the only part of the head that is eaten. Dried meat enters largely into consumption in several other countries. In the Cape Colony dried meat is called biltong. In the East, especially in Siam, the dried sinews of animals are considered a great delicacy; and we find dried elephant's flesh is stored up for food, under the name of pastormagh. In Asia Minor beef is preserved with garlic and pepper, and dried in the sun for winter food. Hung beef from Germany is well known at our tables.

Pemmican is an article of food much used by Arctic travellers, and the Hudson's Bay Company's traders. It is meat of any kind dried and pounded, and saturated with fat. There is, it is said, as much nourishment in one pound of pemmican, as in four pounds of ordinary meat. It may be eaten as it is, or partially cooked, and has a pleasant taste.

Sir John Richardson, who was employed by government to prepare pemmican on a large scale, for the use of the different Arctic expeditions, thus describes the process he adopted: A round of beef of the best quality, having been cut into thin steaks, from which the fat and membranous parts were pared away, was dried in a malt kiln, over an oak fire, until its moisture was entirely dissipated, and the fibre of the meat became friable. It was then ground in a malt mill, when it resembled finely grated meat. Being next mixed with nearly an equal weight of melted beef suet, or lard, the preparation of plain pemmican was complete; but to render it more agreeable to the unaccustomed palate, a proportion of the best Zante currants was added to part of it, and a part of it was sweetened with sugar. Both of these kinds were much approved of in the sequel by the consumers, but more especially that to which the sugar had been added. After the ingredients were well incorporated by stirring, they were transferred to tin canisters, capable of containing 85 lbs. each; and having been firmly rammed down and allowed to contract further by cooling, the air was completely expelled and excluded by filling the canister to the brim with melted lard, through a small hole left in the end, which was then covered with a piece of tin, and soldered up. As the meat in drying loses more than three-fourths of its original weight, the quantity required was considerable, being 35,651 lbs.—reduced by drying to about 8000 lbs.

The North American Indians dry their venison by exposing thin slices to the heat of the sun, on a stage, under which a small fire is kept, more for the purpose of driving away the flies than for promoting exsiccation; they then pound it between two stones on a bison hide. The suet of this animal is added by the traders, who complete the process by sewing up the pemmican in a bag of undressed hide, with the hairy side outwards. Each of these bags weighs ninety pounds, and is designated by the Canadian Voyageurs "un taureau." As we have already remarked in a paper on the "Curiosities of Derivation," the hunters of the wild cattle in the savannahs of Hispaniola, became known as "buccaneers," from the Carib word "boucan," applied to the hut in which they smoked the flesh of oxen.

So much for animal food, and some of the processes which the instinct and necessity of man lead him to adopt for its preservation in different climates. But what would our readers say if they were asked to partake of a fricassée of lizards? The very idea is suggestive of what were the feelings of the Glasgow Mrs. Squeezer when she found she had eaten her cat! Nevertheless, in many countries lizards are at a premium, and although not very attractive in appearance, yet their flesh by many persons is highly esteemed, being reckoned as delicate as chicken, and but little inferior to turtle in flavour. It is a species of large tree-lizard, properly termed the iguana, and is about three feet in length, from the head to the extremity of the tail, and covered with a soft skin of a bluish green colour on the back and legs. It has a pouch of loose skin under its throat of a light green; eyes black, and claws, of which there are three or five on each foot, sharply pointed. A kind of mane moves along from the head to the tail, which it erects when irritated, and will then snap hold of anything with great tenacity; but is perfectly harmless if undisturbed. This ugly-looking lizard, which looks like an alligator in miniature, is considered a great delicacy in most tropical countries. Although often roasted or fricasséed, a frequent mode of cooking the iguana is to boil it, to remove the layers of fat, which are melted and clarified, and put into a calabash or dish, into which they dip the flesh of the iguana as they eat it. The Spaniards for a long time were unable to overcome their repugnance to the iguana, regarding it with disgust as a species of serpent. They found it, however, to be highly palatable and delicate, and from that time forward, the iguana was held in repute among Spanish epicures.

There are several varieties of this reptile in Australia, but that which is most common is from four to six feet in length, and from about a foot and a half to two feet across the broadest part of the back, with a rough dark skin enlivened by yellow spots. Although perfectly harmless, as far as the human race are concerned, this huge lizard is a terrible foe to the smaller quadrupeds—opossums, bandicoots, kangaroo-rats, etc.—on which it preys. It is very destructive also among hen-roosts, and often takes up its quarters in the vicinity of a farm-house, for the convenience of supping on the hens and their eggs.

The iguana is much sought for and esteemed by the blacks as an article of food, and is frequently presented as a great delicacy to the young "gins." By the settlers it is not often eaten, owing to the natural feeling of dislike which is created by its form and habits. Those, however, who do not entertain these feelings, or are able to overcome them, find the flesh of the creature excellent. It is not unlike that of a rabbit, to which, in flavour, it is fully equal, and eats best when stewed or curried.

The iguana usually lives in trees, and, on the approach of man, it invariably makes off with great alacrity, scrambling rapidly up the nearest trunk; but it is easily brought down by a shot.

One writer tells us, that while out on a shooting excursion at Port Essington, he observed a native plucking the feathers off a goose; while so employed, his eye caught the tip-end of the tail of an iguana, an animal of the lizard kind, about four feet long, which was creeping up the opposite side of a tree. He tossed the goose, without further preparation, on the fire, and ascended the tree as easily as Jack would run up the well-rattled rigging of a man-of-war. He almost immediately returned with the poor animal struggling in his scientific grasp. It was the work of a minute to secure it to a stick of about the same length as itself to prevent its running away, when it was made to change places with the goose, which being warm through, was considered to be sufficiently done. The whole goose he devoured, making no bones, but spitting out the feathers. Then came the iguana's turn, which although less tender, was not the less relished.

Simmonds, in his work on the dainties and delicacies of different nations (to which, by the way, we must express our acknowledgments for much interesting information), believes the iguana to be the Talagowa of the natives of Ceylon—le Monitor terrestre d'Egypte of M. Cuvier. The Indian monitor, Monitor dracena, Gray, is found in great abundance in all the maritime provinces of Ceylon. The natives are partial to its flesh. Dr. Kelaart states that he once tasted some excellent soup made from a tender iguana, which was not unlike hare-soup. At Trincomalee they are hunted down by dogs, and sold in the market for sixpence each. They feed on the smaller reptiles and insects, and measure, when large, four feet five inches. Despite its repulsive appearance, the iguana is eagerly hunted for food by the natives of Africa, Australia, America, and Asia.

The egg of the iguana is another article deserving the attention of gourmands. One of these lizards sometimes contains as many as four score eggs. These are about the size of a pigeon's egg, with a very soft shell, containing but a small quantity of the albumen. The yolk, unlike that of other eggs, does not become hard and dry when boiled, but is soft and melting as marrow.

To our taste, the pie made by Mr. Tartan from the remains of the Glasgow Mrs. Squeezer's cat, does not suffer by comparison with a "lizard fricassée," or the "grimalkin steaks," "bow-wow pies," and "rat-filied stews" alluded to in our paper on "Chinese Delicacies."

PHILOSOPHY OF RAIN.—To understand the philosophy of this beautiful and often sublime phenomenon, so often witnessed since creation, and essential to the very existence of animals, a few facts derived from observations and a long train of experiments must be observed. Were the atmosphere, everywhere, at all times, at an uniform temperature, we should never have rain, or hail, or snow. The water absorbed by its evaporation from the sea and the earth's surface would descend in an imperceptible vapour, or cease to be absorbed by the air when once fully saturated. The absorbing power of the atmosphere, and consequently its capability to retain humidity, is proportionately greater in cold than in warm weather. The air near the surface of the earth is warmer than in the region of the clouds. The higher we ascend from the earth the colder do we find the atmosphere. Now, when from continual evaporation the air is highly saturated with vapour, though it be invisible, and the sky cloudless, if its temperature is suddenly reduced by cold currents of air rushing from a higher to a lower latitude, its capacity to retain moisture is diminished, clouds are formed, and the result is rain.

CHEAP LITERATURE.

O great and singular a revolution is the world of journalism and general literature at present undergoing, that we think a few pertinent observations on the subject, suggested by a leader in the columns of a clever contemporary (the "Saturday Review"), will not be out of place in these pages. Every alteration in the law which in any way affects the press, or the publication of cheap books and magazines, has always produced important, and in many instances unexpected results; but no innovation ever equalled in its effects those which were expected from the abolition of the Paper Duty. Almost every day there is an announcement of some new publication, or of a reduction in the price of an old one. A tumultuous scramble is taking place for the coveted prize of public favour. The wildest competition has been raging during the last month, and we are told of newspaper proprietors who are content, not only to throw away the fair and legitimate profit they have been earning, but also to submit to a heavy loss, week after week—for no other purpose, apparently, than to see which can beggar the other first. The day is probably not far distant when the public will discover that this rivalry is by no means designed for their advantage, though they may at present reap some slight benefit from a contest which is only intended to crush the weakest, and to build up a monopoly. It is not straightforward trading to sell an article below its cost price; and no one can suppose that a system based on such a principle can be permanent. This question, however, is one in which it cannot be expected that the public will concern themselves. An issue of much greater moment than the success or failure of a few speculators is raised by the events now taking place around us. Is there any risk of that class of literature which appeals to the "masses" being reduced to a lower standard? Will the undertakings of certain publishers tend to debase or to elevate the popular taste? In short, will the abolition of the Paper Duty lead to an advance or to a retrogression in letters? These are questions that may be discussed quite independently of any special publication or project, and undoubtedly they must possess great interest for all who attentively consider the circumstances which influence, for good or evil, our social life.

An examination of the current numbers of any of the halfpenny or penny magazines will show that what is called "sensational" writing is the thing chiefly aimed at. If we turn to the cheap press the indications we discern are not exclusively of an encouraging character. We have no desire to underrate the enterprise and perseverance which have been devoted to some of these journals, but it cannot be denied that they too often lose sight of the fact that their proper calling is to guide and direct opinion. Instead of aiming to afford information, or to lead their readers to think, they habitually indulge in violent, reckless writing. Under such a system how is it possible that the great questions of the day can be considered in a calm, rational spirit of inquiry? One journal bids against another for a rapid and rancorous writer, and forthwith we have followers in the steps of the successful man, filling our journals with crude opinions, founded upon thoughtless prejudice. It is not deemed necessary to prove anything. A statesman is assailed with scurrility because it has been the fashion to attack him, or a government is condemned because the journalist will not take the trouble to make himself acquainted with its policy. His object is simply to write a "blazing leader." He delights in "cutting up" measures and men, in heaping abuse indiscriminately, in retailing and furbishing up old scandals, in mentioning half a dozen famous names in a single paragraph, only to heap contumely upon them, and in giving as much offence and causing as much pain as possible. Nothing can be more easy than for a man of average powers to pen such articles, if he be willing to degrade his gifts for the purpose. There need be no time given to thought—no trouble taken to seek for information. A pitiful reckauffé of passages in modern history, a free use of proper names, and some obscure allusions to old events, dressed up in tinsel, and "spiced" with a certain degree of bitterness—and the "leader" is complete. The process may be repeated day after day without exhausting the brain, for the brain is not employed at all. The vocabulary need but to be frequently replenished, and there are books enough to help the lame over this stile. The article thus produced has its brief day, and perishes as it deserves to perish. It has given no material for reflection. It has taught nothing, for the writer was himself ignorant. But it has done its work in misleading public opinion, and in corrupting public taste.

THE GRIEVANCE PAPERS.

CHAPTER IX.

CONTINUATION OF THE DINNER GRIEVANCE.

N the investigation of the interesting and delicate inquiry which has occupied us, courteous reader, for some weeks past, I lately entered, as you may perhaps remember, upon what I think I may fairly call the "Dinner Grievance." I spoke at some little length on the annoyance to which I had, through Mrs. Squeezer's perversity, been exposed, when endeavouring to mix in those entertainments which are familiarly known as dinner parties. I had previously given my own idea of a real dinner party, or, to speak more correctly, my idea of what a dinner party ought to be. Hence, the reflections which I threw out in my last paper, and which, with your permission, I will now pursue, had reference to dinner parties, not as they ought to be, but as they are. For example, and to render the matter still more clear, Strailace and Mrs. S., of course, come to the conclusion that it would be a very proper and becoming thing to give a dinner party. The Jenkinses are always giving dinner parties, and the neighbourhood in which they reside is kept in continual hot water, so to speak, by the perpetual rolling of carriage wheels, and the thundering double knocks of the respective "Johns" and "Jeameses" pertaining to said carriages. A poor inoffensive old gentleman of my acquaintance, and a confirmed bachelor, had resided for years in peace and quietness in ——— Square. He was the very incarnation of quietness, and did no harm to any one, although, I am bound to add, that I am not in a position to justify me in saying that he did much good either. Of course any gentleman who has dealings, on however limited a scale, with butchers, bakers, grocers, wine merchants, etc., and who contributes his fair share to the taxes, which it is our privilege to be allowed to pay, must do a certain amount of good, and be of a certain use. This old gentleman of whom I speak was to this extent, I have no doubt, a useful member of society; but I am quite sure that the sphere of his usefulness was of no wider range. He took his own dinner, but he never called his friends to take their places at his festive board (the recognized and correct expression, I beg to say). He drank his glass of wine, how many I am not able to say, but he was not in the habit of filling glasses for his friends to imbibe. He took his daily walk around the square, wind and weather permitting, and retired peaceably to his couch about 8 p.m., at least, so I have been credibly informed. Well, this inoffensive old gentleman, after vegetating for so many years in peaceful quietness in ——— Square, was suddenly thrown into a state of the utmost consternation and alarm by the intelligence that the house adjoining his own had been taken by a dashing young couple, who were expected to render ——— Square somewhat more lively than it had been for a good many years past. This was no other than Jenkins and his amiable and accomplished lady, (you see, dear reader, how conscientiously I award her the prefixes which I found to her name in the daily paper which announced her union with Jenkins, although she did stigmatize me as a nasty, dissipated fellow.) After the usual amount of painting, paper hanging, and general upholstery, Jenkins and his amiable lady took possession of their new abode, and thereupon ensued such a ceaseless rolling of carriage wheels, and thundering double knocks next door, that this poor old gentleman was driven nearly frantic. For some short time his poor old nightcapped head used to be protruded from the window of the second floor front, at all kinds of unseasonable hours, and vigorous remonstrances and expostulations were addressed to the "Johns" and "Jeameses" already alluded to; but these unfeeling wretches, in place of sympathy or condolence, merely responded by "chaff," and double knocks intensified to a fearful degree. The end of it was, that the poor old gentleman was obliged to leave the house which he had inhabited before Mrs. Jenkins was born, and retire to a more secluded neighbourhood, somewhere in the vicinity of Drumcondra, I believe, and it certainly is quiet enough to satisfy the most exigent requirements in this way—where I hope, and have little reason to doubt, that he will be able to spend the remainder of his days in such quietness and peace as may satisfy even him.

But I digress. The Jenkinsses are always giving dinner parties—reason Straitlace and his wife—nay, even those Joneses, and we all know how badly they are off, and how ill they can afford it—sometimes entertain their friends, and why shouldn't we provide an entertainment, and invite our friends to smile upon our festive board? So Mrs. S. elegantly puts it to Straitlace, who strokes his whiskers, and responds approvingly. Whereupon Straitlace and Mrs. S. determine to give a dinner party.

Now, so far so good; and as regards the general principle, I have no desire to do anything but express my entire approbation of it. But it is as regards the application of this principle that I beg to express my emphatic disapproval of the proceeding. Having determined upon giving a dinner party, of course, one of the most essential considerations is the list of guests to be invited; and here it is precisely that Straitlace ceases to act like a reasonable being, as he shows himself to be in all ordinary matters, and involves himself in a perfect labyrinth of absurdities, which are enough to make an unprejudiced observer's hair stand stiff with horror on his head. Instead of considering whether his intended guests are of such a similarity of taste and congenial feeling that he can reasonably conclude that they will enjoy one another's company, he throws this first and most obvious consideration overboard altogether, and only considers whether he can, by hook or by crook, as they say, manage to get together some people who have long-sounding names which will look well in print, (if he be so far fashionable as to be favoured by having his parties published,) and who possess titles, which will fill the neighbourhood with rage and envy.

Oh! if Straitlace and Mrs. S. could only see and hear themselves in council, as others see and hear them, how fully they would appreciate the ridiculous appearance which they present! Listen to them as they go over the list of names! "We must ask Lady Standoff, dear," suggests Mrs. S., in her softest voice. "Pon my word," answers Straitlace, bristling up ever such a little, "pon my word, I don't see why we should ask that old woman. She is a regular fright in her old crimson gown, and her yellow turban, and the last time she was here she was scarcely civil to me, to say nothing of my guests. 'Pon my word, I don't see why we should ask her, and I won't do it either—hang me if I do!"

Straitlace seems as if he had made up his mind, but Mrs. S. knows well enough how to turn him round her finger, and she returns again to the charge, having, like a skilful general, somewhat varied her tactics.

"Not ask Lady Standoff, dear," puts in Mrs. S. "Oh, you know we must do it. I confess that I don't like her a bit better than you do, George; but then we must ask her"—(I don't answer for Mrs. S.'s logic, I beg to say). "She will expect it; we have always asked her; and if she finds that we have had a party without inviting her, she will never have done talking about us, and she will do us no end of harm among her friends. Besides, you know, dear, how well her name sounds," urges Mrs. S., in her most coaxing way. "The Right Honourable Dowager Lady Standoff—only listen to that!"

Straitlace scowls and pulls his whiskers savagely, and is by no means convinced, but of course he gives in, and so my Lady Standoff receives her invitation.

"Not invite Miss Fadedflower," puts in Mrs. S., as George protests still more vigorously against the Honourable Lucretia. "Oh! we must invite her, at all events. (That terrible must—there is no resisting it) What will the Stoneybatters say if they hear that we have slighted one of the family? and you know, George, that Tom is growing up, and we must begin to look out for something or other for him; and didn't you yourself tell me only the other day, that a change of ministry is almost inevitable, and when there is a change, you said that the Earl of Stoneybatter is very likely to be made a Lord of the Treasury, and there is no knowing what he may not do for dear Tom; get him into the Post Office, or the Customs. Oh! we must invite Miss Fadedflower," concludes Mrs. S., and so Miss Fadedflower receives her invitation.

Then Mrs. S. carries her list through, and then George commences with his.

"Ask old Taylor," remonstrate Mrs. S. indignantly. "Why, George, do remember, he is actually in the leather line, and how can we ask Lady Standoff to sit at the same table with a leather merchant. It would be a gross insult. 'You don't care about the insult, but you must look after your own interests! It would be a good many hundreds a year out of your pocket to offend old Taylor?' Are you certain of that? 'You haven't the slightest doubt about it!' Well, that does make a difference, to be sure, and after all, Mr. Taylor is a respectable-looking old gentleman, and perhaps Lady Standoff won't perceive the smell of leather about him; only those nasty tanyards are so strong, and do leave such an unpleasant flavour about every one connected with them. However, dear, as you are positive, I suppose it must be, and we can only hope for the best." And so, Straitlace goes through his list, until he comes to a certain humble name, very far down on it, to wit, Mr. Incog.

I don't wish, for obvious reasons, to chronicle the conversation which, no doubt, took place on the merits of the humble individual in question. It might be unpleasant to place on record that Mrs. S. objected that I was "nobody;" that they were under no obligation to me, and that she always considered me a very conceited little fellow; neither might it be flattering to have to admit that Straitlace carried his point on the plea, that I was an old friend of his at school; that I am only one, and being rather small, shall not occupy much space, whilst on account of my dressing well, and looking smart and genteel, I shall be useful in taking somebody down to dinner, and they are a gentleman short. I say that I do not wish to record the conversation, which I know very well is held upon my claim to occupy a chair at Straitlace's crowded table. You see, when the auspicious day arrives, and I, arrayed in my best, make my way into Straitlace's drawing-room, I have to take it for granted, that I am perfectly welcome, and that Mrs. S.'s gracious smile to me is quite sincere; and all this might look very like hypocrisy on Mrs. S.'s part if her previous remarks on me had been made public, and I should be from subjecting any lady to even the shadow of such an imputation.

Straitlace having followed this absurd line of conduct in the issuing of his invitations, is it any wonder that when we assemble in his dining-room, Lady Standoff turns up her nose at poor old Taylor, and the Honourable Lucretia regards me as so much dirt, only fit to be trodden under her feet. But at length we get down to the dining-room, and oh, what pen can describe the stupidity and slowness of these fearful dinners! I am quite certain that my humble quill, (or I ought to say pen, for I use steel), cannot do it. Once or twice it was my lot to sit next to the Honourable Miss Fadedflower. If I ventured on an inoffensive remark about the weather, she turned slowly round, and fixing her eyes upon me, gazed at me with a look of ineffable astonishment at my audacity in presuming to speak to her; and, of course, I was completely and effectually silenced. Several times I found myself inextricably mixed up with old Taylor, and a party of gentlemen, who, like himself, are in the "leather line." Straitlace doesn't deal in leather himself, he is a kind of broker and commission agent, but I fancy his business lies principally amongst gents, whose energies are devoted to this interesting article. At all events, whenever I dined at Straitlace's table, I always found that "the leather interest" mustered very strong. As I have just said, I several times found myself inextricably mixed up with a party of these gentlemen, and it will require a very lively imagination, indeed, to picture the pleasant evenings which I spent in their society. My knowledge on the subject of leather is, I frankly confess, very limited. I know that my boots are made of leather, and I know that boots manufactured of French leather, cost more than when they are made of home material; and with these facts, I may say, that my information on the article of leather terminates. I certainly have no interest in leather, beyond the interest which inseparably attaches to my boots. Fancy me, then, surrounded for hours by a party of middle-aged and elderly gentlemen, who haven't an idea amongst them which doesn't smell of the tan-pit, whose conversation is in all truth of leather, leathery. Leather! Leather! Leather!!! I have often heard that there is nothing like leather, but I must say, that I never fully realized the significance of this expression until I met these gentlemen at Straitlace's table. It was, as well as I recollect, during the year 1860, when there was a great depression in the leather line, and when leather was looking "down;" and there I must sit, perforce, listening to the doleful account of how Mr. Poleakin, the great leatherman, had that day been "Gazetted," and how it was generally believed that the dividend wouldn't be much more than five-eighths of a farthing in the pound; etc., etc., until I was sick to death of leather and of leathermen. I don't complain that these gentlemen felt a natural interest in leather, and all its concernings; but what I complain of is, that they couldn't leave the "shop" at home, and not bore me to death with their business connections. Mr. Taylor's tanyard would have been a very becoming place for their conversation; but they had certainly no right to bring it to Straitlace's table, and force it down the throats of those who couldn't reasonably be expected to feel any interest in it. I remember once, as I was walking down Sackville-street, keeping a sharp eye on the varied developments of human nature, with which one is sure to meet in the streets of a large city, that I observed a small knot of persons gathered round the base of Nelson's pillar. I drew near to see what was the matter, and discovered that an oldish-looking man, evidently a regular old gossip, was "spinning a yarn" to the knot of listeners whom he had collected round him. I imagine that the story was of a somewhat wonderful character, to judge from the mouths of most of the spectators, which were considerably wider open than is allowed by the ordinary rules of politeness. Among the listeners I observed particularly a young urchin, a precocious young "gamin," whose bump of veneration was, I am afraid, but very imperfectly developed. When the old gossip was in the very midst of his story, and had just made one of his most telling points, this audacious young vagabond, having first carefully seen that a way of retreat was open to him, suddenly raised his voice, and cried out, "I say, Governor, that'll do now. Shut up!" and down Talbot-street he went with the fleetness of a hound. The remark, I admit, was rude, but it was decidedly expressive, and I can't say how often I have been grievously tempted to roar out to old Taylor and his friends, when engaged in their dissertations on leather, to "shut up!"

Then, again, to think of the dreary stories which one is bound to listen to at these entertainments. There is one old gentleman whom I used frequently to meet when I was in the habit of frequenting these festive meetings. I suppose I did not meet him at dinner less than twenty times, and I never heard him tell but one story; but he told that story every time I had the pleasure to meet him. Some one meaning no harm, would give utterance to quite an ordinary expression, which would serve this imbecile old gent for a peg on which to hang his inevitable tale. I have seen him waiting for hours for this opportunity, his poor old face puffed out with anxiety and expectation. At last the remark for which he has been so anxiously waiting is unconsciously made by some one in the company, and then out it comes. "Ah! yes," says he, "dear me, how remarkable. That just reminds me of a wonderful occurrence," and then, having the ear of the house, as they say in parliament, for politeness compels us to listen, this foolish old man bores us to death with his foolish old story, which we have all heard twenty times before, and which, although he takes half an hour to tell it, is all about nothing when it's told. Now, what I want to know is, why doesn't this venerable old (humbug, I was going to say, but the term is offensive, and so I suppress it) gentleman "shut up," and why does society and the rules to which we must all submit, prevent me from telling him to "shut up," when his own intellectual perceptions have become so dim as not to suggest to him the propriety of doing so. I hold that all this denotes a false state of things. Straitlace thinks that he honours me when he sends me an invitation to one of those dreary banquets, and he doesn't speak to me now, because, having suffered the infliction as long as nature could support it, I felt myself compelled to send a polite excuse, or refusal if you will, to one of his invitations. Straitlace ought to have considered before he invited me, at least so I think, that I couldn't be expected to fraternize with old Lady Standoff, or become suddenly seized with a vivid interest in "leather;" and if these, and the other conditions which you, dear reader, can easily form for yourself, could not be expected to have place, what right had he to ask me to his table, or to be offended because I did not go? Yes, I say again, as I have already said, that I consider such dinners as these, in the light of a "real grievance." Mrs. Squeezer subjected me to this ordeal for several years through her manoeuvres and perversity, and it is one of those matters for which, indeed, I may forgive Mrs. Squeezer, but which I can never forget. I would rather dine at home every day in the week, and spend my post-prandial leisure in surveying myself in Mrs. Squeezer's dingy mirror, than be condemned to take down the Hon. Miss Fadedflower, and sit next her for three or four hours, or listen to Mr. Taylor and his friends who are in the "leather line." And what makes all this infinitely more annoying is the fact that it is all quite unnecessary. If Straitlace would only use a little of the common sense of which, as I have said, he is by no means deficient, and not ask me on the day he asks Lady Standoff, or Mr. Taylor, how much more more pleasant he might make it for all parties—the dinner would cost no more, whilst it would be eaten with a much greater relish; Straitlace would form for himself many real friends, and would spare those who accept his invitation from much real annoyance, as he would certainly spare himself the mortification of having his entertainment described under the head of a "real grievance." Moreover, I am quite confident, that both Straitlace and Mrs. S. would be compelled to confess, if they would only be candid and speak out, that their famous dinners, which gave them so much anxiety, and cost them so much money, were, for all practical purposes either of amusement or utility, perfect failures, and all this for want of a little common sense.

But, I am becoming severe, and, so courteous reader, I, too, perhaps had better "shut up" of my own accord, before I am favoured with an intimation to do so, which it might be as unpleasant for me to receive, as I am quite certain it would be painful for you to administer.

FAVERSHAM ON HIS WAY TO FAME.

BY BLANCHARD JERROLD.

CHAPTER IV.

FAVERSHAM, poor fellow, fell ill a few days after his return to London. How he caught that violent cold, which developed rather alarming symptoms at last, is a matter which Nam-by and Clifton could best explain.

To be ill in chambers—with an old, dirty, disagreeable laundress to attend upon you, is not one of the advantages of single life. Faversham, who was naturally very dull when alone; who hated all kinds of shifts; who was, in short, as his sisters persisted in informing him, made to toast muffins while his wife brewed the tea; was compelled to lie in his bed, with all kinds of books and newspapers at his feet, listening for the welcome kick or knock of a friend. His door was left ajar when Jack Ashby was out, so that the invalid should not be compelled to get out of bed. This happy expedient enabled his long list of friends to pass in review before him; to smoke clay pipes upon the foot of his bed—to tell him the last anecdotes—to agree with him that the doctor was a muff—and to advise him often, not to obey the old boy's solemn directions.

Poor Faversham! He was the picture of misery, as he lay there in bed; his moustache out of order, and his hair clinging in uncombed and flattened clumps, about his head. To every friend he declared that, when he was well, he would be at home every night at eleven o'clock, that he would never smoke again; that henceforth he and the whiskey keg of the Scotch Stores were strangers.

"Faversham, my boy!" said Jack Ashby, one morning early, bouncing into the invalid's room, in his shirt-sleeves, and with his coat and brush in his hand, "the Jamaica Lodge people have sent a hamper of delicacies for that very interesting patient, yourself! Such jellies! I know!"

"I am sure I am extremely obliged to them, Jack," Faversham replied, really touched by the attention. "It is deuced attentive."

"By George! yea, my boy; it's more than they would do for your humble servant. Shall I open the hamper?"

"Do, Jack; bring it in here," said Faversham, raising himself in the bed, in a highly excited state.

Mr. Ashby tossed his brush and comb upon the sick bed, and went to fetch the Jamaica Lodge contribution.

"Hang it!" exclaimed this gentleman, as he dragged in the basket, "they might have paid the carriage, I think."

"Don't be disgusting, Jack, open it," replied Faversham.

Mr. Ashby lost no time in rummaging some portly jellies and blanc-manges along the dressing table; a light cake he threw upon the bed. A little basket of grapes found a place upon a chair at the bed side.

"Literature too, by George!" said the explorer, as he gathered up a heap of pamphlets from the bottom of the hamper. Glancing at them one by one, he read, 'Thoughts for a Sick Bed,' 'A Serious Word,' 'Aids to Charity,' 'The Power of Pence,' etc.

"These, of course, are from Saint Araminta," said Jack, throwing them upon the bed. "Never mind, Faversham, here is plenty of jelly to take those few powders in."

Faversham was not inclined to be jocular. He took up the tracts, and for the first time for many days past, there was a light colour upon his cheeks. He thought of the prettiest little bigot in the world, and of her serious marble face, as it was turned to him, more than once, when the moon had cast her wealth of silver upon the sea.

"Take those jellies away, and this cake, Jack; but leave me the grapes—there's a good fellow. Tell the Wretch to get me some tea at once."

Jack—he was a good-natured fellow—served his chum faithfully. The Wretch was summoned to prepare tea. The jellies and cake were removed from the bed-room, and Faversham was left to turn over the pages of the tracts at his leisure.

Miss Ashby had marked passages calculated to touch Faversham; but I fear the pencil mark was more attractive to the patient than the sentiment or advice it emphasized. Thinking often of the pretty eyes that had wandered over these pages of pious precept before him, Faversham found them not unpleasant reading. There were, too, here and there, noble sentiments that honestly touched his heart; but there were also evidences of sectarian rancour (and some of these were graced with Miss Ashby's pencil mark), which shocked him. He turned from the tracts, it is to be feared, little improved; that is to say, in the way Miss Ashby evidently intended to improve him.

But he was disturbed by the attention which had been paid him. He felt its kindness. He took up the tracts—threw them down again—picked a few grapes—turned about in his bed—wondering and speculating. Why did Miss Ashby think of him? He had frequently contradicted her; they had seldom agreed upon a single point; she thought him on the high road to atheism; while he had very clearly defined, for her information, the qualities of a bigot. Two people more dissimilar in taste and feeling he could not conceive. As Faversham slowly recovered from his illness, he thought this point over frequently. He ate the jellies, he consumed the cake; other jellies and cakes followed in due course from the same kind family; and each time the Parcels' Delivery Company's cart deposited a little hamper in Faversham's passage, he grew more nervous than he had been before.

He was sitting before his fire one day, his slippers almost touching the bars—the long-dismissed breakfast apparatus still upon the table; the sun endeavouring to get at him through the dense carbonaceous crust upon his chamber windows, when his attention was diverted from a comic article in a new comic journal, chiefly supported (both in circulation and contribution) by Namby, by a lighter tap than he was accustomed to hear at his outer door. The sound of suppressed laughter, the gender of which was unmistakable, confused him. He had no collar on; his hair displayed but the faintest track of parting. A second knock, at once sharp and light, left him no time to deliberate. He put his tobacco-jar and pipes into the cupboard—threw Jack Ashby's empty soda-water bottle under the sofa, and went to admit his visitors.

When the door opened there was a great rustling of silk; much kissing; and presently the close atmosphere of the rooms seemed to be revived with fresh air, imported direct from the country. Faversham, protesting that these laughing girls were very wrong and imprudent, ushered his sisters into his sitting-room. Their fresh faces, fresh ribbons, fresh gloves, all appeared in strong contrast with the chambers. Ashby said, afterwards, when he heard of the visit, the ladies were two roses that had tumbled into a cobweb. They were hearty, merry girls. Clara, the elder of the two, was handsome. She had a tall, fine figure. Her head moved gracefully—imperiously—upon her neck. Her eyes had expressive glances—because they were shaded with long, dark lashes; but nobody who ever looked resolutely beneath these lashes thought the pupil deep or lustrous. The forehead, nose, and mouth of this young lady were exquisitely feminine. Miss Faversham's manners, however, were the horror of her brother. She professed an entire disregard of the forms of society; she made rude speeches to men, which speeches her indulgent friends laughed at as wit; she carried out her own notions in dress, disdainful to follow the fashion; and she talked of gentlemen by their nicknames. She was conspicuous and courted wherever she appeared. She accepted compliments as slight instalments of the praise due to her; and was not extremely fond of female society.

His sister Ada was a little creature with kind eyes, and a sweet smile. She was only the satellite of the splendid Clara. Ada loved Clara devotedly; thought her very clever; never had an idea of rivalling her popularity; followed her in some of her wild excursions—but timidly, and with an ever-present fear that they were encountering the rude remarks of the world. Ada did not pretend to be intellectual herself, but she thought highly of the talents of her sister—and more especially of those enjoyed by her brother. She listened to Faversham's lessons; to his shrewd views of the world; to his delicate—his fine perception of woman's place and duties; she felt the justice of his censures, when he addressed Clara; and she loved him more and more for the softness of his heart and the manliness of his soul.

Ladies are highly amusing when they suddenly penetrate into the bachelor homes of their relations. They laugh at the way in which the cloth is laid, at the unpolished stove, at the uncleared windows, at the awful quantity of tea-leaves in the tea-pot, at the clothes' and hat brushes, and boot-hooks which lie upon the breakfast-table; at the pile of books upon the sofa, and at the flower vase upon the mantel-piece filled with spills. Faversham's sisters thoroughly enjoyed their visit to the Temple. They explored the contents of his cupboard; made him ring the bell that they might see what his landlady (the Wretch) was like; insisted upon re-arranging his window-curtains; marvelled at the ingenious contrivance by means of which he toasted his bacon; and tasted his bread and honey. All this time poor Faversham was very nervous. He was glad to see them, but he asserted that ladies should never enter the Inner Temple. Clara enjoyed his scruples as evidences of absurd punctilio, and openly declared she hoped some of his Temple friends would call.

"Well," said Miss Faversham, having completed her survey of the rooms, "of all the miserable places I have ever stepped into, this is the worst. Why, no wonder you have been ill, Henry."

"I find them very comfortable," said Faversham, "but they were not contrived for the thousand and one wants of ladies."

"But don't you find it awkward, Henry dear, pouring out the tea yourself. I should like to see you," said Miss Ada.

"Well," continued Miss Faversham, (but all her male friends call her Clara, so why should not we?)—"well, papa has sent us to say that he shall expect you at the Grove, as soon as you are able to move out. We are going back, I'm afraid, next week; you might be attentive, if you can make it convenient."

"Very clever as usual, I see, Clara."

"Of course Henry will, if business will allow him," Ada interrupted: "How provoking you are, Clara."

"I know you're on thorns all the time we're here, Henry," pursued the lively young lady. "Well, you have not told us who sent you all that jelly—and those grapes."

"They did not come from the Grove."

"We were not at home, you know, Henry," Ada interposed; and although there would have been small chance of this attention from the quarter in question, even had the young ladies been at home, this allusion to a carelessness which the sister felt to be unkind, wounded her a little.

"What do men want with jellies," suggested Clara; "the Spartans never ate blanc-mange!"

"Nor did their wives use bandoline!" Faversham retorted, to the great amusement of his sister Ada, who had crept to his side, and was playing with his hand.

Before Faversham cleared his room of petticoats, he had promised to go to a party to be given by the Mellons, on the following evening. His sisters were staying at the Mellon establishment,—in Temple phrase,—they were "vulturising" there.

The Mellons lived at Bayswater; in one of those many dapper little band-box houses, with green shutters, stucco porticoes, a front garden—somewhat larger than a dining-table, and a back garden a trifle more extensive than such a table at its full length. Nine years had the Mellons inhabited this suburban box, and each year had the difficulties of residence increased; for six times, in those nine years had Susan, the maid, appeared at the street door, when she took in the milk, armed with a white glove, and a bit of pale ribbon, to gag the knocker. Joshua Mellon, Esquire, could strike his hands deep into his capacious pockets, and declare that he had done the state some service; if, indeed, the little Mellons tumbling about him, and destroying everything in his way, could be of service to any country. These contributions to the Imperial census, are little details to be passed by with the fewest possible words. They enjoyed the maternal solicitude of a most intellectual mother, —a mother who was versed in the various theories of education, whose awful tongue lisped even Latin occasionally, and who wrote poetry; they were therefore brought up "with every advantage." Whether they turned these advantages to proper account,—whether in course of time the girls became suburban blues, and the boys senior wranglers, are points in the Mellon history into which I have not inquired. At the period when Faversham saw them, they were very pert,—very self-possessed—repulsively clever children.

The eldest son was in the rule of three, at an age when ordinary children are painfully puzzled with simple addition; the eldest girl played the "Shower of Pearls," before schoolfellows of her own age had mastered the preliminary difficulties of "Away with Melancholy." The last I ever heard of the heir to the Mellon property, was on an occasion when having, at the early age of sixteen, suffered the return of an article which he had addressed to a popular magazine, edited by a well-known novelist, he was heard to say, he had learned that the editor "never inserted articles above his own calibre." I thought this promising.

Faversham arrived late at the Mellon party, in company with Mr. Clifton, whom he had coaxed into evening dress. Clifton felt ill at ease in the glare of a white cravat and white gloves; he hated the kind of business. Mrs. Mellon very graciously received Faversham and his friend, and pointed them out to a lean lady at her side, who looked on at the amusements of the evening over her spectacles, as two very intellectual young men. The Misses Faversham were in black. Clara had a red rose in her dark hair, while the fairer hues of Ada were relieved by a white rose. When Faversham arrived, Clara was encompassed by a laughing audience of three or four young men; Ada was talking in a corner to grand-mamma Mellon.

Clifton at once desired to be introduced to the elder sister. When Clara Faversham and Mr. Clifton stiffly, quietly, almost carelessly bowed to each other for the first time—when coldly, their eyes first met—when the common-place small change about the heat of the room, the voice of the last public singer, and the success of the entertainment, was banded to and fro, how strong was the iron clasp that closed the book in which the story of their destiny was written! "Good-looking—but uncultivated," was the verdict the lady pronounced, when Faversham asked her opinion of his friend.

"I wish, Clara, you could be less cultivated," the brother retorted.

Clifton sat next to Clara at the supper-table, quite accidentally, according to his own statement; but I am afraid that an attraction, the power of which was yet too weak to be perceptible, had even now sufficient force to lure him to the lady's side. Clifton was never more angry at his own awkwardness than when he dropped a spoon-full of lobster-salad near Miss Faversham's plate.

"You men are so awkward," observed Miss Clara as Clifton offered a confused apology.

Presently Miss Faversham remarked to Clifton, that "she had not noticed him in any of the dances." Clifton replied, that "he very seldom danced." Whereupon the lady added:

"Why, you are quite a barbarian!"

This speech was given in a tone that, by its intimacy, was freed from rudeness. Clifton did not know that this tone was habitual to Miss Faversham. It enchanted him. He at once became voluble; his eyes brightened, and he said shrewd, sharp things, which pleased his listener. He had never felt perfectly at his ease before, in the presence of a strange lady. He was mortified, however, when suddenly, a light, stupid-looking boy of nineteen, his hair parted like a woman's, and his shirt worked like that of a most fanciful young lady, came up to Miss Faversham, claimed her, pertly, for a waltz, and in another moment had his arm round her waist, in a circle of human teetotums.

Clifton mechanically found a seat, and kept his eyes fixed upon the dancers. Mrs. Mellon approached presently, and introduced him to Miss Barnaby, the celebrated authoress of "The Destiny of Woman." Miss Barnaby was the lean lady who wore spectacles. She had the weakest voice imaginable, but then she had the strongest mind imaginable. No subject was too deep, no question too intricate for that clear head, adorned by faded hair which could not possibly develop more than two ringlets on each side. She simpered and skidded into a seat near Clifton.

"I think you will agree very well together," said the intellectual hostess, as she retired to resume her conversation with Faversham, on the ideal.

After two or three preliminary feints, Miss Barnaby plunged into deep water with the following startling question:

"Pray, Mr. Clifton, what is your opinion on Capital Punishment?" Little grey eyes peered over silver spectacles very seriously into his eyes, or Clifton would have laughed.

"It is a very serious question, Miss Barnaby," Clifton replied.

The dance was over, and Clifton started from his chair with remarkable agility, to offer it to the first blue muslin, or white muslin, that might approach. He left a laughing, hoydenish girl near Miss Barnaby—a girl who would have shivered with fright at the question which had startled even Clifton.

Miss Faversham took no further notice of Clifton. She was surrounded with petitioners for her company through the dances to come; and she dismissed one after another with an imperial air, before which they patiently bowed. She told one gentleman that he could not dance; another that she had danced with him already. After a severe struggle, Clifton, very red about the ears, mustered courage to place himself on the list of petitioners. He was—for Miss Faversham—very graciously received. She said, afterwards, that his handsome, awkward figure amused her.

"I thought, Mr. Clifton, you never danced?"

"Very seldom, it is true; but it is not often that I am so tempted," replied the young democrat, with an air almost courtly.

"Very well, with pleasure," replied Miss Faversham—"the next polka."

"Make it the quadrille, if you please," Clifton anxiously suggested. The lady complied, and with a laugh, bade the gentleman hope. Clifton danced with Miss Faversham, and was pronounced to be the "most amusing bear in the world" by this young lady.

Late in the evening, a young officer entered the ball-room—from that moment Clifton never had a chance, while the party lasted, of saying a word to Clara Faversham. The last he saw of the young lady was, when she was sitting in the passage, outside the ball-room, suffering the young officer to fan her.

Clifton consoled himself a little in Mr. Mellon's smoking-room. Here he found a selection of the host's male circle. It did not include many imaginative men; it consisted chiefly of practical, business loving fellows, shrewd enough at the profitable contortions of capital, excellent arithmeticians, condescending jurors in matters literary. These gentlemen were not favourites with Mrs. Mellon; she found that they were vulgar, common-minded—but, unfortunately, they suited her husband. For Mrs. Mellon hinted to all her intellectual friends, (and she prided herself upon the intellect she won to her drawing-room) that she had been misunderstood all her life. The depths of her capacious mind had never been sounded. She suggested very broadly, that if Mr. Mellon had failed to find the ground of this deep intelligence, it was not that his head lacked materials for the plummet. Painfully Mrs. Mellon threw her eyes to the ceiling, and sighed when the people praised her poems, and when men stood rapturously drinking in the sweetness of her musical lip. All this poetic ability, all this music, had been given to Mellon with her hand; yet he mixed his tumbler of brandy and water when she began to read her latest effusion to him, and lit his cigar when she struck up the symphony to her first song. He was a tradesman—nothing more, she declared to people with whom she was very intimate; but in the presence of ordinary friends, she never breathed the name of the street, whence the money came to keep up the gentility of Bayswater. Sometimes Mellon gruffly alluded to the business, in company; and I think by the twinkle of his eye, that the rascal enjoyed Mrs. Mellon's most evident discomfiture. However, having the key of the wine-cellar in his pocket, he allowed Mrs. Mellon to fill her drawing-room with the dawning intellect of the time, as often as she pleased. Every night a new celebrity was introduced to him, every morning he had forgotten a celebrity's name. The young men he liked—and whom he was pleased to see, were those who occasionally followed him into the smoking-room; listened good-naturedly to his experiences "on the road," and could talk with him about boating. When Clifton entered the smoking-room, the following conversation was going forward.

"They say that Newcastle Tom will beat the Putney Bragger?"

"I doubt it. The long arms of the Bragger for my money."

"The Cambridge men are a seedy set this year?"

"But one of the best oars in the Oxford crew has lost his mother."

Clifton, who liked all manly sports, joined very well in the conversation. He knew little about boating, but he admired the manliness of the science. He was soon friends with his host, for he detected in the few remarks of this gentleman that referred to politics, a liberal spirit, and a clear practical head. When most of the company had left, Faversham joined the smokers. He also was a favourite with his host; for Faversham, although he cared very little for Mr. Mellon's society, was too good-natured to appear bored. Then, he loved a good cigar; and Mellon's cellar, when this gentleman did take the key out of his pocket, produced unexceptionable wines and spirits.

As the young men were riding back to the Temple, having given a cigar to the cabman, and directed him to drive his hardest, the party was reviewed with the usual good nature of departed guests. Faversham, as he yawned, and popped up his legs upon the opposite seat, declared that he had never before seen so complete a collection of ugly girls. Clifton selected Miss Barnaby as his pot aversion. He swore that she was the most detestable person he had ever met; the ugliest woman within twenty miles of the Post Office.

"She looks as though she had picked up her features in a scramble," suggested Faversham. "She has got Brown's eyes; the nose properly belonging to Jones, and the mouth adapted to the head of Robinson. Cover Simkins's head with Trinkins's hair, and you have a picture of her. She asked me, as we went down to supper, how much 'Blackwood' paid per sheet; and when, at the suggestion of Mrs. Mellon, I invited her to dance, she excused herself; she had been correcting proofs all the morning, and was fatigued."

"Now, Faversham, if you want to know my exact notion of a hateable woman, allow me to introduce you to Miss Barnaby."

"Diagnosing!" sympathised Faversham, "so duncedly intellectual! I told Mrs. Mellon to night that my notion of a woman was a little flaxen-haired thing, who could chatter all day long like a bird; who had not the remotest notion of making a pudding, and who spelt letter with one t. The learned lady sighed, and said that mine was the prevalent notion. Alas! men liked playthings, not companions and rivals. I agreed, and owned that I should prefer the plaything to the parlour critic, who would greet me at every turn with an opinion, and would forget to sugar my tea, in her vehemence on behalf of woman generally, and her social position. I told her I intended to have my wife painted with a tea-pot in one hand, and the sugar-tongs in the other."

Faversham presently asked his companion whether he had any sisters. Clifton replied that he was an only child.

"You're a lucky fellow!"

"Why, Faversham, you ought not to complain. Your sisters are charming persons."

"I am glad you think so, my boy. To me the elder one, Clara, is exactly the girl I dislike. One of your fast young ladies of the modern school, who prides herself upon acting unlike other girls; waltzes with anybody; cannot resist a soldier; and forgets every man's surname. But with all these faults she is a good-hearted creature."

"Your younger sister, Faversham, seems to me a most amiable girl," Clifton said, turning the subject from Clara.

"That girl, my boy, is without a fault," Faversham replied, as he fumbled in his pocket for the cab-fare.

They had arrived at the Temple gates; and as they emerged from their dusky vehicle, they were called "swells" by the men who were driving their market carts, drawn by steaming horses, to Covent Garden.

THROWING SNOWBALLS.—The following paragraph is from the "Dublin Chronicle," 27th December, 1787:—"The practice of throwing snowballs in the public streets is not less dangerous in its consequences than fatal in its effects, an instance of which occurred last Monday evening:—A gentleman passing through Marybone Lane was hit by a fellow in the face with a large snowball, upon which he immediately pulled out a pistol, pursued the man, and shot him dead. Those deluded people are therefore cautioned against such practices, as in similar circumstances they are liable, by Act of Parliament, to be shot, without any prosecution or damage accruing to the person who should fire." And these were the "good old Christmas times!"

THE LITTLE WIDOW WALSH.

WONDERFUL little woman was the Widow Walsh, hostess of the White Eagle, situated in one of the most frequented suburbs of Ballydoyle.

"And of what did your poor husband die?" I enquired. The widow put her apron to her eyes, took it away again, and looked at me with, as she doubtless wished me to understand it, the face of a sad widow. But the veil was very transparent, and the expression of good-humored resignation plainly discernible through the medium. She spoke plaintively, however, poor thing, as a bereaved widow ought to speak, as she told me that Pat, the poor fellow, had died "for want of being-shaken!"

"Lord bless me, Mrs. Walsh!" I ejaculated; "for want of being shaken?"

"Yes, ma'am, to my sorrow. My poor man—Lord rest his soul!—though not so sickly, was latterly subject to a sort of fits, and uncommon fits they were—the like of which people said they never seen before—snooring fits we used to call them—and when they came on, ma'am, the only way to cure them was to take hold of Pat's feet, and shake him as you would a bolster. My poor Pat, and 'twas you suffered well from the same fits!"

"What an extraordinary ailment!" I exclaimed. Then, as I recalled the image of the departed Pat, a long, shambling, huge-boned giant, it struck me that the process described must have been a matter of some difficulty. I remarked as much to the widow.

"Lord, no, ma'am," she replied. "You had only to take a good grip of his feet, and then to pull him down on the floor, and shake, shake, shake him, till you were out of breath. The harder you shook him, the longer it was before the fit took him again. Once, when he was worse than usual, I pulled him up the stairs, and bumped him down again, by the heels, and after that it was ever-so-long before the poor soul had any return of his wearisome complaint. Oh! if I had you back, my poor man, wouldn't I shake you! Well—indeed and I would, any time you'd want it, and why not?"

I solemnly declare that I give verbatim the widow's account of poor Pat's mysterious ailment, and its still more mysterious mode of treatment. Fancy a thin, slight morsel of a woman, four feet two at most, coolly talking of "shaking up," and bumping up and down stairs by the heels a giant of over six feet in height, weighing goodness knows how many stone! But incredulous as I certainly was at the time, I have since fully ascertained that the wonderful little woman only told me the simple truth. She really used to shake Pat up as described!

"Yes, ma'am," said the widow, dolefully; "if I had been in the way when the last fit came on, who knows but my poor man might be hale and hearty to-day, and not lying in his cold grave! But I was at a country wedding, and though they sent off for me at once, I was back too late. There he was, getting worse and worse, with red-hot knitting-needles running through his poor legs, and pins sticking him all over, and his head splitting off, and no one to help him. 'For God's sake,' says the poor creature, 'let some of you grab me by the heels and shake me as hard as you can!' 'He's clean crazed, poor man!' says one. 'Lord love him!' says another; 'is it a bottle of physic he thinks he is?' 'His poor head is gone, sure enough,' says a third; and so they left him to die; and when I got home, 'twas to find my Pat as dead as mutton, and I myself a lone, deserted widow, without a living man upon the floor!"

So poor Pat, you see, really died for want of being shaken up! Doctors, pray make a note on it!

It was only a figure of speech of the little woman to describe herself as "a lone, deserted widow." Not she, indeed! She had a merry little daughter to keep her company, and quite a mob of acquaintances and cronies besides. And whenever she wanted especial advice, she could consult her old friend, Farmer Heraghty, whose clear head was always at her service in that way. But, to be sure, she lost him after a while, for as times were bad in the old country, Daniel Heraghty thought that even at his age he would have a better chance of getting on in America. The little widow missed him, to be sure, but in one way was his departure rather an advantage, since it completely silenced the busy tongues that had sometimes hinted at the likelihood of the little woman becoming Mrs. Heraghty. No! The Widow Walsh a widow would remain; she had made up her mind on it.

It was no secret that the thrifty little woman had laid by a pretty penny as a fortune for her daughter Nelly, who in course of time would also succeed to the proprietorship of the inn, and the good farm a mile beyond the town. Little Miss Nelly had plenty of lovers, but the suitor favoured by the mother was Anthony Murphy, a wealthy young farmer, well made, and tolerably good-looking. As far as the mother was concerned, Anthony could not complain of want of encouragement, but as it was the daughter he wished to marry, why his course of love was not as smooth as he could have desired. But Anthony Murphy was not one to give up in a hurry; not he indeed.

Now, I dare say you want to know what kind of girl this Miss Nelly was. Well, like her mother, she was quite a morsel of woman-kind, but unlike her mother, she had a round, fresh face; rosy, dimpled cheeks; abundance of soft, silky hair; and the merriest and slickest pair of blue eyes ever you saw. Once upon a time Miss Nelly had been known to cry with vexation because some wag had dubbed her "the widow's mite," and it used to cause her dire mortification to be obliged to clamber on a chair to reach up to the corner cupboard in the parlour, or the shelves in the bar; or to have to mount a foot-stool when she wanted a peep into the round mirror between the windows of the best sitting-room. Now, such straits were only suggestive of blushes, smiles, and dimples, pleasing to behold. And this simply because somebody, who owned a pair of big, brown eyes, an open, honest face, and a true, manly heart, had some time since stooped down ever so low, so as to whisper softly in Miss Nelly's ear, how she, with her warm little heart, and her bright smile, and her trim little figure, just realised his life-dream of a sweet, household fairy that could shed sunshine and happiness over any man's home. And this somebody said much more that I am not going to tell you, for that would not be fair.

Unfortunately this dear somebody's course of true love threatened to be rugged indeed. There was slender hope of the thrifty widow ever bestowing her mite on him, poor fellow. No struggling mechanic for her; she preferred, as a future son-in-law, the wealthy young farmer, Anthony Murphy.

One fine Saturday morning, as Nelly Walsh was tripping off to the chapel, her mother called after her to desire her to hasten back, as she had to go out. Nelly was home before you could have thought it possible, and then her mother, putting on her cloak, drew the hood over her head, slipped a little bag containing her money into her bosom, and took her market-basket on her arm. She paused on the threshold, and looked back at Nelly.

"Be a good, steady girl while I am away," said she; "and God bless you, Nelly, agra!"

And with that, off went the Widow Walsh—and the Widow Walsh never came back!

Fact, I assure you. Dinner-hour came round; evening fell and darkened into night; the last customers departed—but the Widow Walsh came not. The nine o'clock bell rang, and no Widow Walsh appeared. Terrified out of her wits, poor Nelly sent to beg of a neighbour to come to her, and to him she told her alarm. The neighbour looked grave, the servants crowded up, terrified, and whispering their dismay. Half-past nine, ten o'clock struck, and no Widow Walsh. By this time the alarm had spread in the neighbourhood, people came flocking in, and poor Nelly, almost at her wits' end, besought of them to go and look for her mother, and could hardly be restrained from setting off herself on a like errand. The report ran from house to house; the whole town shared in the excitement. And when next day passed—and the next—and the next—and no Widow Walsh returned, the hubbub was tremendous. Inquiries instituted, the police went prowling and seeking with their noses to the ground, advertisements were published, rewards offered. In vain, the Widow Walsh never came back.

Catty Mahony, the beggarwoman, who sits to this day in a hollow of the wall in the chapel-yard, had spoken to the widow, and more token, had received the widow's charity when the widow was entering the chapel; and Catty Mahony had spoken to the widow again when she had left the chapel, and given her the full value of her charity in prayers. Catty Mahony had then seen the widow draw her hood about her face, walk quickly down the street, and mingle with the crowd. This was about one o'clock—three quarters of an hour after she had left home—and this was the last seen or known of the Widow Walsh, by neighbours, or keen-scented police, or Catty, or anyone else.

The little widow had taken with her, besides some loose change, twenty guineas in gold, the half-year's rent due to the landlord. But she had not been to the landlord's house all that day. This being the case, the general belief was, that the poor creature had been enticed somewhere and murdered, for the sake of the money she had about her. It was the only way people had of explaining the mystery, but this explanation was a misty one. There were things that no one could understand. How such a crime could have been committed in broad day light—how a woman so well known amongst the farming classes, who throng our town on market-days, could have gone anywhere without having been seen or recognised by a single person—how anyone could have known of the money about her—why she had not gone direct from the chapel to the landlord's house, close by—these were mysteries that none could fathom.

Amongst the lower orders there were some—not many, however, who hinted that the poor little widow had been spirited away by the good people! Had she not, in defiance of all tradition, spite of all opposition, caused to be levelled the green rath that stood upon her farms? She had been duly warned of the evil consequences of such an outrage, and now, might it not happen that the good people had avenged themselves by carrying off the offender bodily!

Can this be our blithesome, bright-eyed, ruddy-cheeked little Nelly Walsh? Oh dear, oh dear! What a change is here! She does not seem so plump as before the widow disappeared; the rosy cheeks are paler; the blue eyes are dimmed with tears. Just now, too, the little hands are tightly clenched, and as she sits here alone, in the fast deepening twilight, she sways her body to and fro, and moans and wails, as Irishwomen of her class will do under the pressure of calamity.

It is a chill October evening, and the wintry wind shrieks and mutters among the trees in the Deanery garden opposite. Torrents of rain fall sullenly on the low roof, and dash in fierce gusts against the little window-panes. But within no effort is made to counteract the gloomy influences of the night. No pleasant fire sparkles in the grate, no candle dispels the gathering shadows. Ghastly and dark, they creep about, and crouch in corners, and glide behind curtains, and crawl stealthily over the white walls. The air is heavy and damp; and sad, unearthly whispers seem to echo the girl's half-stifled utterance of anguish.

Ah, poor child! she has had enough to trouble her during the twelve months that have elapsed since her mother's mysterious disappearance. First, there was a wearisome illness, during which everything in the house had been in the hands of servants, and honest and attached though they truly were, the old inn had not prospered under them. When the young mistress was at last able to go about, she found many things neglected, half her customers gone, the rest dropping away. She did her best to remedy this, but the loss of the thrifty little widow was daily and hourly felt, and things did not mend much.

And now had come the climax of her troubles. The kind landlord hearing that, contrary to all expectations, not a penny had been found of the hoard attributed to the saying of the little widow, had generously remitted to the desolate girl not only the half-year's rent due, but that of the half-year to come. Poor Nelly wept bitterly when she heard of the sudden death of her kind friend, and sore cause had she for tears, as she soon found to her cost. The heir-at-law, who lived in Dublin, had appointed as his agent in Ballydoyle a low-class attorney, and the first communication Nelly received from him was a notice to pay up at once the year's rent she was in arrear, and to be prepared to pay henceforward a higher rent for her house and farm. Nelly, greatly alarmed, told the agent of the late landlord's kindness about the rent, but as she had no proof of this beyond her own word, she only got jibed at by the new agent. As to the increase of rent, however, Nelly told him that her mother, two years ago, had obtained a renewal of her lease—or rather, a written promise of renewal at any time it might be claimed. The agent shook his head—he knew nothing of this; he had no proof of the existence of such a document, but of course, if in existence it could be produced. Nelly at once searched for it where she was sure it must be—amongst other papers in her mother's trunk, up stairs. But no such document was to be found: High and low, up and down, in every nook and crevice, did Nelly search in vain. The paper had vanished as completely as the widow herself, and poor Nelly was forced to conclude that her mother must have taken it with her on the morning of her disappearance. But the agent was sure—or pretended to be so—that no such document had ever existed; and now, to end all, poor Nelly was to be sent adrift houseless.

And where, then, were Nelly's suitors? No, not faithless to her in her misfortunes, I am happy to say. Anthony Murphy she had long ago dismissed, kindly but firmly, and so as to convince him, sorely against his will, that she could never be his. And where was somebody else now? Ah! wretched little Nelly!—not an hour since had she sent him from her in sorrow and in anger. Over and over again, since her troubles commenced, had he besought of her to become his wife; to let him work for her, and care for her, and shield her, as best he might, from the world's rough trials. But Nelly was too proud to consent to this. What! she be a burden on the man she loved?—no—she would rather work as a servant all her life than be a drag on him! She would die rather than consent to that—she to keep him down in the world, indeed! And so obstinate, so proud, so immutable was she, that at length her lover, deeply pained and offended, had left her to herself. Oh, miserable little Nelly! No wonder she should moan, and sob, and rock herself, and wring her hands despairingly. To think of her having so grieved and angered him who was more to her than life itself! Oh my!—oh my! What must Tom think of her? Dear Tom, so true, so faithful, so tender of her, so good, so unselfish!

It was dark night, and through the pelting rain, and the thick gloom, came a stalwart man, and knocked at the closed door of the Eagle Inn. Strange to say, too, that though it rained as if sky and ground were meeting, and blew so that this stalwart man had to buffet his way along, not even a top coat had he to protect him from the weather. The collar of his jacket was pulled up over his ears, and held by his teeth, and his cap drawn down on his face, but the jacket was thin, and its wearer wet through by the time he reached the door of the inn and knocked. But without a moment's delay the door was opened to admit him and as speedily re-fastened behind him.

Before he had time to open his lips, the door to the left flew open; there was a joyous exclamation—and, yes, positively!—like a shaft from a bow, little Miss Nelly popped into the arms of the half-drowned new-comer, utterly unconscious for the moment of the very unpleasantly moist state of his garments, or of the shower-bath her sudden rush procured her. There she was, laughing and crying in a breath, and there was he, staring down at her, utterly bewildered, and small blame to him, I'm sure!

"Why, Nelly!" was all he could say, as he looked down at that puzzling little person, clinging to him so lovingly.

"Oh, my! oh, my!" cried Nelly; "I'm so happy! Oh, Tom, I'm so happy, happy, happy! Oh!"—becoming suddenly aware of Tom's deplorable condition, she darted out of his arms as speedily as she had shot into them.

"Goodness gracious me, Tom!" she cried remorsefully; "I ought to ask your pardon for sending for you on such a night! You're almost drowned, my poor boy! Why on earth didn't you put on your top coat coming out? Here now, take off this wet jacket as fast as you can—never mind me, you know, Tom—and come in and warm yourself." Here, having by a sudden spring triumphantly succeeded in jerking off Tom's streaming cap, she laughed gleefully, and by the way of expecting the removal of the wet garment, expended her remaining breath in a series of tugs at the cuffs and tail. Tom looked at her, too much amazed to laugh or smile, and dreamily divesting himself of his jacket, suffered her to seize his hands, pull him into the best parlour, and tyrannically push him into a big, cushioned chair beside the blazing, crackling fire. This done, she viewed him with great satisfaction, clapped her hands, and laughed.

"Am I asleep?" asked Tom, with a troubled look at the beaming face before him.

"Not a bit of it, Tom. But, oh! how good of you to come at once. I was half afraid you might refuse. Why didn't you put on your coat, though, you silly boy?"

"Because I was in such a hurry that I never thought of it," said

Tom. "I was afraid—afraid of some fresh trouble when you sent for me, so I just ran out as I was."

"My poor boy—that is so like you—never to think of your own comfort where others are concerned." She stood right before him now, and laid her hand softly on his head. "Ah! I know you so well, Tom! But now, say you have forgiven me out and out, before I tell you why I sent for you in such a hurry."

Tom was wide awake now, I fancy, for he forthwith put out his arm, and drew the speaker to his side. She nestled up to him, and laid her head on his shoulder.

"Dear Tom," she whispered, "I would not pain you for the world."

Tom's eyes sparkled, and he looked earnestly into her smiling face. That he found there nothing very disheartening may be supposed, for without further hesitation, he boldly repeated a question that had already more than once been answered in the negative. This time the reply was very different, being of a nature most satisfactory to the questioner.

"Then," said Tom, exultingly, "the sooner I get you into my charge the better, Nelly, my little darling. Halloo! what the deuce is that?"

Well might he exclaim—for from under her apron Miss Nelly had suddenly produced before his astonished eyes—the missing document of such importance!

So this was the meaning of Miss Nelly's sudden change of demeanour—of her strange joyousness—of her relenting towards himself!—Tom's face fell a little—he would rather have taken her poor, and dependent solely on him—for Tom, be it known, was proud as his lady-love, every whit. Nelly saw what was passing in his mind, so she cleverly made a diversion in his thoughts by reminding him that he had yet to hear how she had found the mysterious paper.

"And remember, Tom," she added gravely, "that is to be a secret between us two. I ought not to keep anything secret from you, though, so I sent for you to tell you the whole story—one that seems like a dream to me still."

"It's all like a dream to me!" murmured Tom, looking fondly at his promised wife—so far from him, he had thought, awhile ago.

It was a strange story, surely, and many were Tom's ejaculations of amazement as he listened. About an hour since a travelling man—a stranger—had come to the house, saying that he had a message for her. At a hotel in New York, three months since, he had fallen into conversation with the landlady, a countrywoman of his own, a little, thin, low-sized, sallow, blue-eyed woman—rather good-looking, on the whole. Having ascertained from him that he was about to return home, and would pass through Ballydoyle on his way, she begged of him to go to little Nelly Walsh of the White Eagle Inn, and tell her that if she should at any time want the written promise of a lease, given by the landlord to her mother, about two years ago, she was to lift up the third plank in the left-hand corner of the room where her poor father died, and she would find it. The stranger being anxious to get home to his wife and family in Clonmel, had refused to stay for the night; wet as it was he had hurried off after delivering his message. But from his minute description of the host and hostess of the New York Hotel, both Tom and Nelly were fully convinced that the little hostess was no other than the wonderful widow Walsh herself, transformed into the wife of the farmer, Daniel Heraghty.

But I have something else to tell you.

One fine evening, when all the fuss of the wedding was over, Nelly came up slyly to Tom's chair, and said:—

"Tom, I want to tell you something."

"Well, little wife, out with it—is it a secret?"

"No longer a secret, Tom. I found this with the paper, under the plank—only, you see, Tom, I did not want to tell you until I was sure of you."

A little green bag containing two hundred golden guineas.

Ha, ha, Tom; I think Nelly was very wise in withholding her treasure a while—otherwise, there's no knowing what a proud fellow like you might have done! But now he must just pocket his pride with his guineas.

You see the Widow Walsh was not so bad, after all.

And now I have only to add—if Tom and Nelly don't live happy, that you and I may.

F. C.

IMPRESSIONS OF SOME ODD SEALS.

ABOUT twenty years ago, by means of a paper read before the Royal Irish Academy, public attention was first attracted to a number of seals—about sixty—undeniably of Chinese manufacture, which had been discovered in various localities in Ireland. The question naturally arose how they came there, and when, and for a considerable time it was an antiquarian questio vexata whether they were genuine specimens of Celestial art or not. One writer expressed himself thus: "The paper read before the Irish Academy on the Chinese porcelain seals found in Ireland, having inscriptions in a character as old as Confucius, is evidently a hoax. The fact is, that long rectangular seals, terminating at one end in an animal, and having the name of a person or place, are in common use among the Chinese at present, and employed in stamping papers, books, chops, tradesmen's bills, etc. The inscription on the base of these seals is in the Chuentze, or seal characters, which, though invented during the period of the Chinese moralist, is in the same use at the present hour as the black letter for fancy work, titles of books, etc. Several seals of this kind of agalmatite were sold last year in London."

Mr. Edward Getty was at the trouble to write and publish a minute account of them, recording, as far as he had ascertained, in what locality and at what date each had been found, and furnishing fac-similes of their mottoes, with translations made independently by various Chinese scholars, both at home and abroad.

As regards the material and form of these seals, the writer just quoted was signally in error; they are not agalmatite (or rather, agalmatolite) steallite or soap-stone, as are those generally met with, but porcelain cast in moulds, and subjected to such an intense degree of heat, and consequent vitrification, that their substance is as perfectly imperishable as the glass and porcelain trinkets found in the mummy cases of Egypt. Neither are they long and rectangular, like those of modern importation, but each is an exact cube, with a Chinese monkey seated on it by way of a handle. They are, moreover, all so precisely similar in size and general appearance, as to be distinguished only by the character of the under or stamping surface.

It is considered possible that these interesting relics may have come from the East, together with the weapons, ornaments, and other articles of commerce which were brought by the Phœnicians, to whom the ports and harbours of Ireland were well known. Sir John Davis being applied to on the subject, stated that the characters were sufficiently ancient for any assignable date within our reach. He added, that the inscriptions were mere names, not admitting of translation, but perfectly recognisable as in the ancient seal characters of China, and often used on the seals of public and private individuals at the present day. Nevertheless, impressions having been sent to various Chinese scholars in this country and elsewhere, the answers, when compared, presented sufficient resemblance to prove that the characters conveyed pretty much the same idea to several authorities. By some it has been conjectured that these seals may have come accidentally in tea-chests, but then arises the question, how happened it that such were sent to Ireland only, for, so far as we know, these relics have as yet been only discovered there. Many, we may add, have surmised that they were brought by persons connected with Lord Macartney's embassy, but the absence of any specimens of such seals in his collection tends to render the hypothesis doubtful.

TRUE GREATNESS.

LIKE a summer's sun, should a great man's life
In its dawn, all promise be:
In its noon-tide strength, a power to bless,
To fruitage all humanity;
In the evening sink, with his work well done,
In glory tranquilly.

THE SPECTRE OF THE SWAMP,

A LEGEND, ADAPTED FROM THE GERMAN.

ANY years ago—there is no necessity to be particular as to the exact time—there resided in Germany a nobleman of a haughty and chivalrous spirit, to which indeed he was chiefly indebted for his title and estates, neither having been hereditary. At the period of which we speak the wars that had for a long time distracted Germany had ceased for a brief season, and Count Wolmar went to dwell in the retirement of a large Chateau, and ere long fell in love with the beautiful daughter of a neighbouring baron of ancient lineage. To his great mortification, however, the baron declined his proposals, and he was not long in discovering that the objection to an alliance was founded on a want of hereditary honours. He sought the fair Edith, but she declined his hand in the most decisive manner; and, to add to his mortification, informed him that her affections were already engaged.

The Count knew not how to brook the refusal, especially as he could not discover who was the favoured suitor; the old baron affirming that he was bound to secrecy, while the lady refused to answer any question on the subject. Independent, however, of this circumstance, Wolmar had a personal cause of grievance, which we will presently explain. A young officer named Von Deutzberg, of a very high family, had served in the wars under the command of Wolmar. A few days preceding the battle that, for a season at least, decided the contest between the adverse parties, Von Deutzberg was nominated to the chief command of the army, to the excessive indignation of the Count. His proud spirit chafed at the injustice, he speedily retired from the court, and betook himself, in gloomy scorn, to his Chateau.

One evening as he was wandering, in a gloomy and dissatisfied mood, through a wood attached to his Chateau, a confidential vassal came hastily to inform him that a stranger, accompanied by a large suite, had just arrived at the castle of the old baron, and that it was every where said he was the accepted lover of the Lady Edith. The Count unhesitatingly mounted his steed, and rode on unattended, to personally ascertain the exact truth of the unwelcome intelligence. It was dark when he arrived at the baron's mansion, but to his inexpressible chagrin and wrath, was denied admittance by the castellan. No entreaties could move the inflexibility of the latter, and Wolmar's cup of passion was more than full, when he learned that the violent manner in which he was treated, was due to the express orders of Baron Von Deutzberg, Lady Edith's accepted suitor. Dashing his glove in the face of the castellan he rode furiously from the gate, his exasperation against his successful rival knowing no bounds. He paced the entire night in riding round the walls of the Chateau, longing for some miraculous power to aid the direction of his threatening hand.

He was not permitted to remain long in doubt as to the effect his conduct had produced. On the afternoon of the ensuing day he received a message from Von Deutzberg, couched in the most imperious language, and commanding him not to contend in vain with his superior officer, whose rank and ancestry placed him at so great a distance above him.

On receiving this response, Wolmar hastily marshalled all his vassals, and made various preparations, so that on the very day on which it should be announced that the nuptials of Von Deutzberg with the lady Edith were to be solemnized, might be the day on which to commence a feudal war, that should only end with his own life, or that of his rival.

The day of the nuptials soon arrived, and the Count, at the head of all his vassals, and retainers, attacked the Chateau in the midst of the festivities. As the contest progressed, allies were continually made by the besieged, but Von Deutzberg was never seen in the mêlée. These allies were nearly all of them unsuccessful, and it seemed evident that Wolmar would soon possess himself of the Chateau. Matters were in this state, when on the morning of the tenth day all the batteries were suddenly manned, at an earlier hour than usual, a clarion blew its shrill blast, and just as the sun rose lustrous over the turrets, the many gates were cast open, and Von Deutzberg issued forth at the head of a chosen body, in full charge. Wolmar immediately singled out his rival; they met, but had scarcely crossed swords, when Wolmar was mysteriously struck from his horse! The astonishment of his followers at this event was quickly succeeded by a panic, and although Wolmar remounted and endeavoured to lead them on, it was all in vain.

Exasperated at the circumstance, and attributing it only to some fortuitous disaster of war—the fault he knew not how, of his steed, or the light of the sun striking in his own face, Wolmar bitterly reproached his soldiers for their flight, and exhorted them to retrieve their laurels on the following morning, and redeem themselves from a disgrace which tarnished all their previous successes. The night was passed in fresh preparations, and they again pressed forward to the attack. No sooner had the Count appeared in front of the Chateau, than the clarion echoed from the battlements, the gates flew open, and a second time Von Deutzberg issued forth at the head of his horsemen. As a falcon pounces upon his prey, so swept the form of Wolmar across the plain towards his hated rival, who in turn undauntedly spurred to meet him. Before they had exchanged a single blow, however, the steed of Wolmar became rivetted to the earth, while Von Deutzberg, wheeling round with inconceivable rapidity, dealt a blow upon Wolmar's crest that brought him senseless to the ground, his men being routed as before, but with far greater slaughter.

When the Count recovered his senses, nothing could exceed his rage and confusion. He knew not how this fresh discomfiture had occurred, unless some accursed witchcraft had been practised against him. Maddened by this overthrow, he once more rallied his men by that energy of passion from which there is no appeal, and a few days beheld him again in front of the walls that enclosed his rival, grasping his blade with clenched teeth and steady ferocity of purpose. But fate was still against him. Again Von Deutzberg sallied forth, and with a single blow of his sword a third time hurled the Count from his saddle, and galloping over him spread death among his flying followers.

It was midnight when Wolmar recovered consciousness. All was silent on the field, the dead lay in heaps around him. How it was that he should meet with these renewed disgraces, yet escape death, confounded his thoughts. "What black spell is here?" he muttered, as he slowly arose and advanced towards his steed, which stood in the same spot where he had encountered Von Deutzberg; "surely some power of darkness is leagued against me." Mounting his charger he rode leisurely to a distant eminence in front of the gates of the Chateau, and here, in the darkness of the night he remained fixed, like an equestrian statue, brooding with a soul of glowing agony on his thwarted will, and the immeasurable disgrace he had suffered at the hands of the man whom he regarded with such bitter scorn.

"O dream of vengeance," he at length ejaculated, awaking from his reverie, "no sacrifice would be too great, so thou could be realised, or I could have my will against those within yon walls!"

As he uttered these words he turned his eyes away from the Chateau, and, his gaze wandering over the plain, beheld an indistinct figure advancing across the distance with rapid movement. It looked hazy in the dim grey shades of day-break, and the body was sometimes only partially visible, being concealed by the thick rising mists of the moist fields. He at length discerned the figure to be that of an old man, who though meagre in limb progressed at a very quick pace, and soon stood along side his steed, and gazed intently in his countenance.

"Who art thou?" said Wolmar haughtily, "and what would'st thou with me, that thou approachest so familiarly?"

"I am Karl Heidschmeim," answered the old man. "I overheard what you said a little while ago, and have come to know your pleasure."

"Thou heard'st me! Why thou wert far across the fields when I spoke!"

"Only a couple of leagues! surely Count Wolmar has heard the name of Karl Heidschmeim, short a time as he has been a dweller in these parts?"

Wolmar turned pale; he had heard the names of Heidschmeim, and he gazed at the strange being before him with a shudder, but the sensation quickly changed, and a dialogue ensued between the Count and Karl, which eventuated in a covenant to which we need not here more particularly allude. Wolmar returned to his deserted Chateau, which now contained but few defenders. The thought maddened his brain, and at nightfall he sallied out by the private postern to meet Karl, according to an appointment. As he approached, the old man, who was attired in a dingy red cloak, descended from the bole of a stunted oak where he had been sitting.

"Are you resolved?" demanded he, showing a huge set of irregular fang-like teeth.

"I am," responded Wolmar, sternly, "lead on."

Heidschmeim led the way through wood and valley, till descending a long slope of thickly-set osiers, they arrived at a vast swamp. After wading through for a considerable distance they arrived at an immense flat stone of an oval shape, and standing about two feet high from the level of the dark marsh. They stepped upon it, and Karl immediately commenced a strange incantation. Three distinct shrieks issued from his haggard jaws, as he seemed to cast something, though nothing was visible in his hands, into the air, and strew it before them. And now Heidschmeim began to utter words which may not be told, till gradually the articulation merged into sounds such as convey no meaning in any language on earth. When he ceased, in the thick swamp began a slow ripple, till by degrees through the dark mire rose up the figure of a demoniac goblin, with extended arms bent submissively downwards, as in obedience to the will of his summoner. It was doubtful whether the fiend stood mid-deep in the swamp or knelt amidst it. Its body was not discoloured by the mire, except on its leathern pinions, with which it had enveloped itself like a grim chrysalis.

Mysterious but brief was the conversation which ensued, and the result was soon afterwards shown. The Count spurred homewards, burning with impatience, assembled his few remaining vassals, and once more attacked the hated Chateau. Von Deutzberg fell beneath the demon-guided sword of Wolmar, the Chateau was set on fire, and the inmates, including the old Baron and the Lady Edith, perished in the flames. That same night the charred corpse of Karl Heidschmeim was discovered in an adjacent wood, but what had caused his death was never known. After a short time the Count himself disappeared, and the legend will have it that the main cause of his untimely fate was his dark compact with the spectre of the swamp.

ORMEAU, COUNTY DOWN.

ORMEAU, the seat of the Marquis of Donegal, is situated on the east side of the river Lagan, about a mile south of Belfast. The mansion, which is an extensive pile of buildings in the Tudor style of architecture, was originally built as a cottage residence in the last century, and has since gradually approximated to its present extent and importance. The original residence of the family was situated in the town of Belfast, and was a very magnificent castellated house, erected in the reign of James I. Of this noble mansion there are no vestiges now remaining. It was burnt in the year 1706, by an accidental fire, caused by the carelessness of a female servant, on which occasion three daughters of Arthur, the third Earl of Donegal, perished in the flames. A portion of the building, which escaped destruction, was afterwards occupied for some years, the family finally removing to their present residence, its preservation being no longer necessary.

The demesne surrounding Ormeau is not of great extent, but the grounds are naturally of considerable pastoral beauty, commanding the most charming views of Belfast Lough and adjacent mountains, and have received all the improvements that could be effected by art.

As has been observed, there are many finer places to be seen in Ireland, belonging to noblemen, but there are, unfortunately, few of them in which the presence of their lordly owners is so permanently to be found, attracting the respectful attachment of the various classes of society.

THE BLACK DOCTOR.

CHAPTER XI.

It is a strange fact, but not more strange than true, that in our daily converse with life, we meet men who perform acts of the greatest benevolence and kindness, who are thoroughly devoid of moral principle and of common humanity—men who illustrate the truth of the statement, that “no man is utterly depraved.” In the most abject and degraded there is always to be found some remnant of the pristine dignity of human nature, and a virtue appearing in the fallen or abandoned becomes great by contrast, and is like the graceful ruin met by the traveller in the desert, more beautiful because of the desolation by which it is surrounded. There must be much of vice and evil example to crush out all that is good in man, however degraded, for even in his ashes, perhaps, lives a genial fire that kindness and sympathy may fan into a flame capable of giving life and heat. Men in high places have been denouncing human nature as radically wicked, because in most instances they judge of all humanity by their own experience of themselves. Amongst the thousands who write, and teach and govern, how few there are who ever consider the causes which have most promoted crime, or the means by which its influences could be checked and the offenders reformed. One half the world does not know or care how the other half lives, and still the half that does not know or care are those who have to pay the severe penalty for their own ignorance of the truth, that every man is more or less dependent on the other, and that this is “a world of compromises.” Brutus Bramble was a man full of natural goodness, and his nature leant most gracefully towards that which was weak and defenceless. Thoroughly unselfish, he would spare no pains or trouble to serve a friend—ay, even he would risk his life to promote his welfare. Prodigal of his means when he had them; self-denying and patient when in want, his worst enemy could never accuse him of meanness, and he was as physically brave as a lion. He was still what the world calls a bad man. He was utterly devoid of principle, and he would not hesitate for a moment to overstep any moral obligation to effect his purpose. The high intellectual faculties which he possessed he perverted to the worst of purposes, and the "wild justice of revenge" was with him a solemn and a binding law. His nature, like his native climate, had its hours and days of glorious sunshine, but it had also those furious outbreaks of stormy passion, and those fearful convulsions of hate that made even those who wished to be his enemy court his friendship. The paths of Brutus Bramble were not in pleasant places, and much of that which was prominently bad in his character was owing to circumstances over which he could not exercise any control. Sent amongst strangers, and all but excluded from the society in which he should have mingled, because of the prejudice against his race and colour, he had to make low connections, and to associate with the night-walker, the street-robber, and the outcast and the prodigal, because his high spirit told him that none others would regard him as aught but an intruder, or one tolerated by sufferance. Still, in the breast of Brutus Bramble beat a bold and noble heart, true to its friendships and its hates. Bold, resolute, and determined, and possessed of indomitable energy, Brutus Bramble could be made a mighty agent for good or evil.

"Tony," said Bramble, as he walked along through the dark and still silent streets, "I fear that you are badly off for sleep, but you can have rest enough at the 'Three Jolly Travellers'; as I have business of much importance to transact with John Brunt, I will remain with him the greater part of the day, so you can sleep till I call you."

"I could sleep on the top of a gate," replied Tony as he stretched out his hands, and yawned with half his face. "I have been in great practice for a walking match for the past three days, Doctor," he continued, giving evident signs of being inclined to select the first corner he met to have a doze.

The Black Doctor, who perceived the drowsy propensities of his young friend, tried to keep him in conversation until they turned into an open space, when Bramble exclaimed—

"Halloa, Tony! what fire is that?" as he pointed to volumes of black smoke, bespangled with sparks and fringed with the deep copper hue of reflected flames, as they rose into upper air.

The loud cries of "fire! fire!" soon brought forth from every lane and alley in the neighbourhood, thousands of half-naked and shivering creatures, all rushing on to where they believed the fire was raging. Some were urged on by curiosity, and others by the hope of plunder. In this tide of human wretchedness and misery Bramble and Tony forced their way along. After they had gone a considerable distance, Tony stopped and, in the greatest excitement, said,

"As I live, Doctor, it's the 'Three Jolly Travellers' is on fire."

The boy caught Bramble by the arm, as he observed, "I hope Brunt is not inside."

"Quick, Tony, quick," replied Bramble, as he ran along. "We may be in time to render some assistance."

In a few minutes the Black Doctor and the boy were in front of the "Three Jolly Travellers." The flames roared like a furnace through the lower part of the house, and shut out all means of escape for any person inside by the doors. The dry timber crackled as it blazed, and the heat of the walls turned the hoar frost on their outsides into steam. The flames now burst from the drawing-room windows, and crept like serpents round the wooden sills until they devoured them. Men asked men, was there anybody in the house? and others asked if ladders could be obtained? as the flames raged and glutted themselves on all that could be consumed in the "Three Jolly Travellers," and illumined thousands of upturned faces of the vast crowd in the street.

Tony, who had been running about in a state of feverish excitement, went up to the Black Doctor, and said—

"I have been looking for old Brunt everywhere; he must have made his escape. Oh, I hope he has," continued poor Tony, down whose cheeks the tears were falling for one who never showed him anything but unkindness through his long and weary servitude.

"I have every reason to hope that he has got off," replied Bramble, "as he could not have gone to bed when the fire broke out."

The Black Doctor had scarcely done speaking, when John Brunt appeared at one of the upper-windows. A buzz of horror ran through the crowd, as the wretched man, flame-hunted, strove to force his way through an open sash. After much exertion he succeeded, and getting on a window-stool he sought to reach an old spout, and by that means effect his escape. The awe-stricken mob were perfectly silent while this terrible scene was being enacted, and Tony covered his eyes with his hands.

Brunt made a desperate effort to gain a grip of the spout, as the flames every moment drew nearer and nearer to him, but all was of no avail. Urged by despair he tried to gain the roof, but this was hopeless. His cries for help rose above the roar of the blaze which was now surrounding him, deprived him of the means of breathing.

The upper-floor now gave way, and as the debris fell into the place beneath, masses of lurid flames ascended and enveloped John Brunt in their terrible embrace. For a moment the outlines of his features were to be seen, as he fell into the raging furnace and disappeared for ever.

Bramble could scarcely believe that he was not dreaming, so rapid and so terrible were the events in the tragedy which he had just witnessed. He was lost in contemplation as he thought over the scenes in which he took a part in the burning house. He was aroused from his reverie by a sudden heavy crash, and the shouts of the mob. The roof of the "Three Jolly Travellers" had fallen in, and buried beneath it, the charred bones of John Brunt, and the records of many a dark and bloody deed. The smoke that issued from the smouldering timber, half buried beneath the piles of rubbish, slowly ascended into the cold morning air, as Bramble gazed on the bare gables that stood tottering, blackened and naked, like sentries guarding the place of execution of John Brunt the murderer.

Bramble sought to recover his composure, as he went in search of Tony, but a sickening feeling of disgust and horror had come over him, which no effort of his could shake off.

"Jerry the Lift and Hawkesworth, are avenged" soliloquised Bramble. "Who could this Hawkesworth have been?" continued he; "I suppose it will now and for ever remain a mystery." Long and eagerly did Bramble look for Tony, and at length he found him sitting on the steps of a doorway, with his head bent between his knees. Sorrow was big at the heart of Tony, as Bramble gently lifted him to his feet.

"Come along," said Bramble, "don't be a fool. We could not prevent what has happened. You and I will spend the day together."

Tony made no reply, but followed Bramble silently. His eyes were red and swollen from crying, and as he went his way with his head bent, the boy was reviewing the years of persecution and suffering which he had endured at the hands of John Brunt.

By one of those strange inconsistencies of our nature, misfortune or death to those from whom we have received great injustice, is in the generality of cases, calculated to give us anything but gratification; and rarely, indeed, can a man be associated for any length with a person however unworthy, and not feel a kind of regret for his loss. We seem to have more in the death of an enemy, or a persecution, than satisfaction for any wrong either might have done us; and it was for this reason, the good-natured, loyal-hearted Tony felt bitterly at the terrible fate of his former master.

Bramble, notwithstanding his great power of endurance, felt that he was overcome by the fatigue and excitement of the past three days. He proceeded to a lodging-house, where he first saw Tony placed in a comfortable bed, after which he went and sought the repose he so much stood in need of.

It was far advanced in the evening when Bramble awoke, and having directed a servant to call Tony, got ready to go out.

Tony soon made his appearance, but all his old light-heartedness and love of fun, seemed to have forsaken him. He answered every question put to him, in a quiet subdued tone, and did not speak but when addressed.

"We will go as far as Foster's," said Bramble; "and you must cheer up, and be yourself, Tony."

"Very well," replied Tony; "I will go wherever you go. I have no home now, the old 'Jolly Travellers,' is no more."

"If nothing ever happened that old den," said Bramble, "I never intended that you should go back to live there. You will never want a home or friends, Tony. Are you aware that Mrs.

"Stammers has fallen in love with you," continued Bramble playfully.

A momentary smile passed over the face of Tony, but he soon relaxed into his dejected state.

It was evident that the terrible sight which the boy had witnessed that morning had overcome him, and Bramble saw that time and quiet were the only remedies for Tony's complaint.

After a brisk walk, Bramble and Tony arrived at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Foster, just as they were preparing to set out in search of lodgings better suited to their improved circumstances.

Foster and his wife were delighted to see Bramble, and the former introduced Tony to the lady. In a few minutes Foster informed the Black Doctor, of the means adopted by Barman to obtain an advance on the will from Abraham Isaacs.

"Good," replied Bramble, as he rubbed his hands with glee. "I have a crow soon to pluck with Abraham, of which I will tell you more soon."

That night in the other extreme of the city Foster procured lodgings; and when Bramble was taking his departure with Tony, he arranged with Foster to meet him at Barman's office on the following day.

Tony and his patron retired to the lodging house in which they had been staying, and remained there till the next morning.

When Quill and Wisp had closed Barman's office, they made up their minds to have, what they called, a jolly night at the "Three Jolly Travellers." Nothing could exceed the surprise of the two legal worthies, when they discovered nothing remaining of their old haunt, but a heap of smoking ruins; and when they heard of the fate of John Brunt from a bye-stander, they looked as if thunder-struck.

"I will go home, Wisp," said Quill, "I don't feel well."

"So will I," replied the bailiff; "this is a terrible affair."

The pair shook hands, and went to their residence "sadder and wiser men," at least for that night.

In the forenoon of the next day, Bramble and Tony were to be seen at the door of Colonel Stammers in Elm-place. On knocking at the door, they were both admitted without delay, and ushered into the room where Bob Stammers was lying. He was delighted on seeing his benefactors, and having ordered breakfast, he said: "Bramble, if you were to know how much I have suffered, and what peace I at present enjoy, you could estimate the amount of services you have rendered me. If the energies of my life had no other object to accomplish, but to show my gratitude to you and Tony, they could not be engaged in a higher or a nobler ambition. Speaking of Tony, Mrs. Stammers insists that he must come to live there, and she will hear of no excuse. He shall not be treated as a servant; his education shall be attended to, and provision shall be made for his future welfare. Tony does not appear as gay as usual, has anything occurred to him?"

"Nothing," replied Bramble evasively, who did not wish to revive in the boy's mind, the fearful scene of the fire at the "Three Jolly Travellers."

"I want to tell you, Bramble," said Stammers, "that the two hundred and fifty must be paid to Abraham Isaacs upon that cursed bill."

Bramble jumped from his chair, and approached the sick man. "Are you losing your senses," said he, "are you going again to put yourself in the power of that ruthless fiend. Look here!" continued Bramble, producing the duplicate of the forged bill which the Jew had drawn up, "and when you observe it well, tell me what do you think of the wisdom of the plan which you propose?"

"This is not the original forgery," said Stammers, as he held the document in his trembling hands, and gazed upon it with amazement.

"No," said Bramble, "that is blessed Abraham's own work, got up by him to substitute the bill which is now in the possession of your wife. A mere accident placed Tony and me in a position to capture it from the old dog, who is now in my power. Give me that bill," continued Bramble, "you have seen enough of it." A scowl expressive of terrible meaning settled like a cloud on the face of the Black Doctor, as he said. "The blood-hound never hunted his quarry to the death as I will hunt Abraham Isaacs. I will make him a beggar, and the remainder of his wretched life shall be a hell for him. I will have vengeance for all the wrong, misery and death, that he has so liberally dealt out, and nothing on earth shall swerve me from my purpose."

The entrance of Mrs. Stammers put an end to the conversation, and Bramble assumed his blandest manner, as he saluted the lady.

On seeing Tony she went over to where he was sitting. "Come," said she "my young gentleman, there is a person outside who wants you particularly," as she led Tony out of the room, and transferred him to the charge of one of the servants. "Come back as soon as possible, Tony," continued the lady laughing, as she saw the boy led off captive by the domestic.

Bramble, on the return of Mrs. Stammers, said that he hoped that Miss Stammers was quite well. There was something in the manner of the Black Doctor, as he put the question, that did not escape the observation of the lady addressed.

"She is very well, thanks to you, Doctor," replied Mrs. Stammers; "she will be here presently."

The shuffling of feet in the hall, and the loud ringing joyous laugh of Charlotte Stammers, interrupted the conversation, and in a minute after, the beautiful girl pulled Tony, covered with blushes and confusion, into the room he had left a short time before.

Tony had now on a suit of new clothes, and his venerable white hat had given place to a cloth cap. He felt quite strange in his recently-assumed costume, and from time to time he would throw his eyes over the glossy surface of his garment.

"Come here, Tony," said Stammers; "well, worthy boy, you deserve to be dressed in gold."

"I am so glad to see you, Doctor Bramble," said Charlotte, as she caught his right hand and shook it heartily.

Bramble hesitated, and appeared confused, as he replied to the lady, and handed her to a chair.

The Black Doctor was head and ears in love—was his love returned? Time will tell.

"Tony will remain with us, and this shall be his home," said Mrs. Stammers.

"Not for some time at least, ma'am," replied Bramble: "Tony and I have a great deal to do."

"Surely you won't take him away, Doctor," said Charlotte; and as her eyes met those of the Black Doctor, a blush came into her cheeks, which he at once perceived.

"For the present he cannot stay, but he shall call to see you every day. Your brother will tell you that Tony is at present a principal in most important business."

"He cannot stay now, Charlotte," said Stammers. "I know his presence is required elsewhere."

Bramble and Tony took their departure, promising to return as soon as possible.

They proceeded to the office of Jacob Barman, where they were to transact business of the deepest importance to the Foster and Abraham Isaacs.

THE PRESS.—It is not indeed likely that the extension of cheap and inferior newspapers and journals providing such food for the popular appetite for news, will lessen the number of educated and intelligent people who look to some favourite journal for the expression of enlightened opinion on every public event in their own country and abroad; who are pleased to place themselves under the guidance, permanent or temporary, of thinkers of a high order of intellect and character, and who enjoy the graces of style that flow from the pen of practised writers. Though the circulation of the lower classes of periodicals may be greatly augmented, it by no means follows that they will drive out of the field of competition those first-class journals which appeal to thoughtful and educated people in literature, science, and art. For such journals there will always be an honourable place; and, though they cannot hope to attain the immense circulation of the very cheap publications that appeal to the ignorant or the half-informed; there exists, within certain limits that are easily to be calculated, the materials for their steady growth in favour and in prosperity. The old lines of social and intellectual demarcation still exist, and it will be more than ever incumbent upon those who desire that our press should continue to be the most able, the most fearless, and the most honest, and in all respects the first in the world, to support the journals that engage the highest talent in their service, and that aspire either to lead or to reflect the public opinion of the time.

STARLIGHT.

"Take the glass,
And search the skies; the opening skies pour down
Upon your gaze thick showers of sparkling fire—
Stars, crowded, thronged, in regions so remote,
That their swift beams—the swiftest things that be—
Have travelled centuries on their flight to earth.
Earth, sun, and nearer constellations! what
Are ye, and this infinite extent
And multitude of God's most infinite works?"

SOFTLY falls the starlight on the green earth; softly falls it on the eyes of man, awakening in the universal heart a love of the tender, the beseeching, and the beautiful. Far away up there they shine, each one set like an eye or a jewel in the blue brow of midnight; each one looking with angel tenderness, and seeming to weep and joy with us in a sympathy which can have no end. Beautiful is this starlight, for it tells of worlds afar—worlds greater immeasurably than our own, which the Creator has flung, like dust, into the darkness, which He has sprinkled all over the universe, each one like a perpetually-burning lamp, lighting up the streets in the city of God.

But this starlight, which inspires the emotions, and gives play to the poetic sentiment, also stimulates inquiry; and the philosopher, leaving for a time the moral meditations which their beauty has suggested, yields to the love of knowledge which their mystery inspires, and endeavours to know more of their history than the first glance conveys to him.

It has been found that if every star visible to the eye be registered, and the entire number so registered be ascertained, only one thousand stars are visible in our hemisphere; whereas, at first, these twinkling points seemed numberless before such enumerating and registering began. But, though it is easy to count the stars which are visible to the eye; when a telescope is directed towards them, the number which that keener eye discovers is so immense as to defy our arithmetic to compute them. On all hands the stars are crowded together in countless myriads, and with every increase of telescopic power, they come trooping forth from the darkness in such myriads as to be only suitably compared to the sands upon the sea-shore. Within the square of Orion, which is the five clusters observable throughout the winter, though only twenty-two stars are visible to the eye, the telescope discovers two thousand, and in the "Milky way"—which is the light, gleaming belt stretching completely round the heavens—as many as two hundred and fifty thousand stars have been counted in a space only two degrees wide, which passed over the telescope in a single hour! In fact, the telescope multiplies them in the heavens without end, each point being in all probability a sun attended by its own train of habitable worlds, where life, in all its infinite variety of forms, conditions, and emotions, may be unfolded, and where beauty, intelligence, and love may find a home.

It would be a bolder speculation, still, to measure the distances of these stars; and yet, to some extent, this has been accomplished, though by methods too elaborate to be described here in detail. It is found that the nearest of the stars is eighteen billions of miles away from us. To the star in the Swan, wherein Bessel observed a parallax of one-third of a second, a cannon ball would be 14,000,000 years travelling, though rushing along at the rate of five-hundred miles an hour; and the light which we receive from that star, and which, indeed, brings the revelation with it in its silent march through space, is at least ten years in passing, although light travels at the rate of 213,000 miles in a second of time. As a general fact, it may be stated that the brightest stars, or those of first magnitude, are between eighteen and seventy billions of miles distant, and the smallest, or those of twelfth magnitude, about twenty-three billions of miles; so that the light which excites the optic nerve, and enables man to perceive minute stars through the telescope, has left the orb from which it flows, at least four thousand years! And yet, this is nothing compared with the extent of creation; for Lord Rosse's magnificent telescope discovered stars six thousand times more remote than a star of the first magnitude, or about two hundred thousand billions of miles distant.

But the number and distance of the stars is the least part of the revelations which this starlight brings us. There are stars whose light fades out at intervals, which seem, in fact, to perish, or become extinguished, and stranger still, many of these appear again after a lapse of time, as if the Creator had relighted them. A star in the constellation Hercules, which was observed by Herschel, in 1784, disappeared nine years afterwards, and has not since been seen. Thirty stars, in different parts of the heavens, have disappeared since the time of Hipparchus, and not one of that thirty is now to be found. A star in the body of the constellation called the whale, disappears and reappears; the time of its disappearance being 331 days, 10 hours, after which time it appears, and burns as brightly as ever, until its time arrives to disappear again. Just as we have lost some stars, too, others have started into being, which had not been seen before. In the time of Tycho Brahe, 1572, a star suddenly appeared in the heavens, and burned so brightly during six months, as to be visible at noon-day.

Besides these temporary flashes of starlight, and the loss of stars which had been frequently observed, and entered in catalogue, many of the stars which appear single bodies to the eye, are found, under the telescope, to be double, triple, and quadruple, that is, composed of two, three, or more stars wedged together, and frequently these are noticed to be of different colours. The eye, indeed, may recognise some difference of colour amongst the stars; the intense whiteness of some, and the bright blue tinge of others, may easily be discovered. But when we observe them through the telescope, we note that many of the smaller single and double stars are of brilliant colours, some being as red as blood, others of a bright blue; others yellow, orange, green, and violet; so that the firmament is not merely sprinkled with golden dust, but diversified with colours, as if it were a tessellated pavement to the temple of the eternal heavens. "It may be more easily suggested in words," says Sir John Herschel, "than conceived, what variety of illumination two suns—a red and a green, or a yellow and a blue one—must afford to a planet circulating about either; and what charming contrasts and grateful vicissitudes—a red and a green day, for instance alternating with a white one, and with darkness—might arise from the presence or absence of one or both above the horizon." And yet this is only one of the many varieties into which the forms of matter creep under the guidance and volition of omnipotence.

So far, viewed as separate existences, these stars are fraught with wonder, and full of individual suggestions. Still more sublime is that view which connects them together as a whole, which gives them uniformity, and makes even their variations and changes subservient elements to the unique arrangements of the whole. By unique, we mean one-ness of existence; for mathematical astronomy has now arrived at some remarkable conclusions as to the relations which the several stars bear to each other, and the uniformity of construction under which they exist.

At first view the stars appear sprinkled at random; and to notice the variable and moving stars seems to bewilder the mind still more. For instance, many of the double stars revolve around each other, some in a few hours, some in a few days, while many require long series of years. The mathematician takes a connected view of these motions, and finds that one definite principle pervades them. He finds, by a comparison of the labours of many years, that the stars have a general and steady motion to the south: he finds that all the lesser motions are subservient to this greater and general one; and proceeding step by step in this inquiry, he soon discovers that the whole body of stars visible to the eye, and the vast horde which the telescope brings into view (excepting only those clusters termed nebulae), are all connected in a vast star system, which revolves around one centre, common to the whole. He finds further, that this centre is situated in the little cluster known as the Pleiades, a group of stars in the shoulder of the Bull. In this group of the Pleiades he finds that a minute star, Alcyone, is most likely the central sun, around which all the stars of the heavens revolve, and that one sun is in all respects a star moving with others in this great starry system, and that the stars visible every night, are suns which keep one's company in this ceaseless round, each sun, like our own, having its train of planets. Amidst the diversities of star-light he discovers uniformity, as so many atoms of golden dust, sprinkled at random through the heavens; he finds that they are suns, belted together in immense rings of light, sweeping a ceaseless march around a mighty central body, and composing in the whole an almost measureless circle, composed all through, of individual stars. The computations which led to these conclusions, also showed that the Milky Way, wherein the stars are more thickly crowded than in any other part of the heavens, is the outer belt or ring of this great astral system. Alcyone, the central sun, which appears to the eye a minute star in the cluster of the Pleiades, is situated 84,000,000 farther from our sun than our sun is from us, or a million times the distance of the planet Neptune, or about 3,386,966,400,000,000 of miles. The size of this little star, Alcyone, is 117,400,000 times that of our sun, or 93,920,000,000,000 of miles. Light will be 537 years in coming from that star; the sun will be 18,000,000 of years in traversing its vast orbit around it; and the number of bodies circulating together in the entire system exceeds seventeen millions, each of which is a sun constituted like our own, to light up habitable worlds. These stars that come forth nightly are some of the revolving suns, whose connected motions we have been describing. "Happy boon," says a modern writer, "to see these wondrous bodies with our work-a-day eyes; to need no special privilege, no mythical probation; but to go from our prosy tasks into the cool night air, and behold them spread out for the universal vision! One might think the atmosphere was made transparent with this design; to give man in the heavenly bodies the perpetual presence of the sublime. Seen in the streets of cities, how great they are! If the stars should appear but one night in a thousand years, how would men believe and adore; and preserve, for many generations, the remembrance of the city of God which had been shown; yet every night comes out these preachers of beauty, to light up the universe with their admonishing smile."

M. Liandier and the Baron Portal, who have been constant observers of the scintillations of the stars for some years, have recently made a discovery which promises to be of great value as a weather prognostic, in addition to the barometer. Taking a telescope, and turning it on a first magnitude star well above the horizon, and throwing the instrument out of focus, an amplified image of the star will be obtained; this image should be about three quarters of an inch in (apparent) diameter, and if the object glass be made of pure material and properly adjusted, the image will be perfectly round, and composed of concentric rings, the light of which, owing to the scintillation of the star, will be continually varying. On this image, as a back-ground, the appearances which constitute the indications referred to are to be observed. First, appear shadows more or less dark, which dance round the borders of the disc, and finally pass on and cross it. This appearance is caused by clouds in the vesicular state, and from the rate and direction of their passage over the image of the star, the velocity and direction of the currents of air in the higher regions of the atmosphere, more or less charged with moisture, may be learned. From time to time a black point will traverse the image; this has hitherto been regarded by telescopic observance as a sign of fatigued eye-sight; but this explanation can no longer be received, and M. Portal attributes it to the formation of drops of rain in the atmosphere previous to their fall. Thus, the prognostics to be derived from the study of what passes in the higher regions of the atmosphere are the same as those obtained from similar observations on the surface.

ELECTRICITY OF THE TORPEDO.—M. Moreau has succeeded in collecting the electricity of the torpedo by means of the gold-leaf electroscope and a condenser similar to the Leyden jar. The operation is attended with some difficulty, the electricity being rapidly re-conducted from the collecting apparatus, owing to the humidity of the torpedo's tissues; hence it is necessary to break all communication between the apparatus and the torpedo as soon as the discharge is effected. In case of the voluntary discharge of the animal, the operator is never in time to break the communication; the discharges, therefore, were induced artificially, by exciting the nervous system, and collecting the electricity by means of an arrangement which he describes at some length. On connecting the under part of the torpedo with the ground, and the upper part with the electroscope, the latter immediately becomes charged with positive electricity; if, on the other hand, the upper part of the fish is connected with the earth, negative electricity results.

SCIENTIFIC JOTTINGS.

TERRO-METALLIC ROOF TILES.

ORNAMENTAL clay tiles on the roofs of houses are certain, after a few years' standing, to present a very rugged and irregular appearance. Points and corners are broken off in most, and some are reduced to mere stumps. Some persons fancy they are blown off by the wind, or are knocked off by cats. The latter may be more numerous than pleasant in some localities, but neither the wind nor puss is blameable for this destruction. The frost is the great agent. Getting into the pores and fissures of the clay it splits and breaks away with regardless energy every winter; and this source of injury being well understood by the more intelligent makers, has given rise, of late years, to a species of metallic-looking tiles, the best class of which is known in the market as terro-metallic tiles. Some are said to be manufactured of a mixture of clay and waste filings from foundries and smiths' shops, but economic as we are in these days of commercial rivalry, it is doubtful if sufficient filings could be got for the production in quantity of even a portion of the thousands of roofing tiles and drain pipes manufactured of this class of material.

The best kinds are made in Staffordshire of the sub-soil clay of the coal and iron districts. The clay there, very dark in colour, is characterized by its highly ferruginous nature. Tiles and pipes made from it and burnt in the ordinary manner, are red and porous like ordinary earthenware, but when these objects are subjected to an intense heat, the surface is vitrified, and assumes a dark metallic lustre.

Accidents from lightning, which seem inexplicable by the current ideas of the use and properties of lightning-conductors, are constantly occurring. At Brienne, in France, a few months since, a factory was struck and fired for a length of twenty metres, although defended by no less than five conductors, the connections of which with the damp soil were unbroken. Here the lightning fell at about thirty feet only from one of the conductors; and how many similar, if not so serious cases, come within our own knowledge from time to time?

Ridge-tiles, possessing a metallic character, are referred to under the idea that it is possible there may be employed in buildings many materials besides metals which are capable of exerting an influence in the conducting of electric fluid.

When a new discovery is made, its practical importance is often over-rated or misunderstood, and the results of experience may teach us to regard it in very different lights. For years past it has been thought, as is still too generally believed, that the putting up a metallic conductor rendered a house perfectly safe from the lightning-stroke. So, undoubtedly, it would, if the lightning struck the conductor; but it is not sure to do that. There may be dozens of conductors, and yet the lightning may strike and damage the only part of the building where one is not. People used to think, and numbers do so still, that iron and steel attract lightning. They do not do any such thing. The lightning only goes to them when they form the highest and nearest point to the thunder-cloud; it would go as readily to clay or wood, or any other substance that formed the nearest point of communication—a spark flies from an electric machine as readily to the finger or a bit of wool as it does to an iron rod or a brass ball, and yet there is no comparison between their conducting powers. The lightning strikes a tree, and spares the zinc chimney-cowls on the mansion. It strikes the ship's mast, the church-steeple, and the bare ground on the hill-top. It used to be thought that an iron or copper conductor would conduce to the safety of every object within some thirty yards around; but Sir Snow Harris, our best authority, has clearly shown that metals do not attract. Their efficacy and value depends on their conductiveness. A copper wire will conduct as much electricity as a much thicker iron rod; and, therefore, if metals possessed attraction, copper ought, one would presume, to possess that quality to a greater extent than iron, and should therefore be preferable to that metal or steel for the points of conductors. We do not find it practically applied in this way. Copper is often used to conduct over iron, but then the qualification is evidently seen to be its conductiveness. And so in every other case, the conductiveness of metals is the one quality that renders them useful in the protection of property. We have been led to these remarks by many objects which daily we see before our eyes, placed in positions where they cannot be harmless—since chimney-pots, galvanized iron roofs, metallic gutters, flag-staffs, and telegraph-poles.

Do we put these things on our highest pinnacles with impunity? If we connect them with a metallic conductor to the earth sufficiently deep to communicate with the damp soil, when the lightning strikes no harm occurs—the dangerous fluid is conveyed harmlessly away. But that result by no means proves such objects, so placed, to be innocuous in themselves. They have been rendered so by the continuous metallic road along which the lightning travelled, as its easiest course. On the continuity of that road everything depended. Broken by a gap, of a foot in extent, destruction might have followed. The first burst of a storm is always most dangerous, for it happens when the materials of houses and other objects are dry. It is then that the lightning, if it strikes, tests the conductiveness of the substances it encounters. When the heavy rain has fallen, every wet surface becomes a broad and facial medium of rapid conduction. It is before the shower-fall that houses may be fired and the greatest damage done. Ought we not, then, to be careful how we place conducting materials on our house-tops? Flagstaffs and poles, are, like chimney-pots, only dangerous on account of their altitude; and all other things being equal, if the lightning did strike any of them, the position of danger to the residents would only be in the direct line of the lightning's passage to the earth. But the other things are not equal, when different materials are used in the construction of the building. If any of these are metallic, or present metallic surfaces, they become dangerous in the case of a lightning stroke if they conduct, so to speak, nowhere. Take, for example, the metallic ornaments on the apices of the roofs of some of our suburban villas. If the lightning strike the wooden gable-spire at one end, this row of ridge-ornaments will do what?—conduct it to the other end of the building, to do the mischief there which it would otherwise have committed at the end where it first struck.

The danger thus involved is plain and intelligible to ordinary builders in the case of metals. But there are other substances besides pure metals which are conductors, not so good nor so powerful, but which the lightning would prefer to more earthy or carbonaceous substances.

Amongst such, are not the terra-metallic ridge lines to be classed? On many houses is to be seen a line of these ornamental tiles. They are not only very slightly in connection with slate, the most commonly used of all roofing materials, but, being impervious to wet, and not liable to be clipped off, like ordinary clay tiles, by the frost, they are likely to be very largely used in future constructions, and it will, therefore, be well worth while to be sure that they are not used in any dangerous manner. Whether their capacity for conduction is dependant on their superficial coating, which we presume to be a silicate of iron, and is thus a surface conduction only, or whether they are conductors in the entirety of their mass, is immaterial in the results they would produce in the case of a lightning stroke. At any rate they do conduct sufficiently freely to make them objects of attention; they exert a comparatively rapid and marked influence on the electroscopes, and electricity passes to them from a rotatory electrical machine in continuous threads. Moreover, any one may be satisfied of their possessing metallic properties by bringing one near to the needle of an ordinary pocket compass. We do not wish to say that the material of these tiles is dangerous, any more than we would say that zinc, iron, or copper are dangerous. The danger is not in the material employed, but in the way of using it. The conductiveness of these tiles must be very considerably greater than that of any of the other substances which would ordinarily be offered to the lightning on striking a roof, but their known earthy origin might leave them unsuspected of being an insidious means of destruction.

Ballads are the gipsy children of song, born under green hedges, in the leafy lanes and by-paths of literature, in the genial summer-time.

THE GRIEVANCE PAPERS.

CHAPTER X.

NARRATES A TOUCHING INSTANCE OF AFFECTION AND FRATERNAL CHARITY, WITH A FURTHER DEVELOPMENT OF "THE DINNER GRIEVANCE," AS EXEMPLIFIED BY A HORRIBLE ACCIDENT WHICH HAPPENED TO AN INOFFENSIVE OLD LADY, AS HEREIN RELATED.

HAVE still a few words more to say with your kind permission, courteous reader, on what I have named the "Dinner Grievance." I thought to have concluded my remarks on this subject in my last paper, but it is one of those themes which grow upon us, and develop into wider limits than we had at all anticipated when we began to treat them, and so, I must beg your kind attention for a brief space longer, promising that I will do my best to despatch the matter with as much brevity and conciseness as the importance of the matter which we treat will permit.

I began my remarks, as you may perhaps remember, by giving my own idea of what a dinner really ought to be, in order to be an entertainment at which one can assist with pleasure and satisfaction. I then passed on, by a very natural, and, I think, I may presume to say, orderly transition, from dinners as they ought to be, to dinners as, in nine cases out of ten, they are; and I expressed, as well as I was able, but, I trust, with all due calmness and forbearance, some of those mistakes which legitimately tend to bring dinner parties under the head of "Grievances." I did not spare my friend, Straitlace, in my last paper, but boldly and unflinchingly exposed what I considered his want of common sense in the selection of his guests, and his want of tact in endeavouring to extract anything like harmony and enjoyment from such discordant elements as the Dowager Lady Standoff, Mr. Taylor the leather man, and myself. I know very well that there will not be wanting many mutual friends to innuendate that I spoke thus harshly of Straitlace, because he and I have quarrelled, and I am now never invited to dine at his table. The charity of one's friends, and the lively interest which they take in our affairs, nay, even in the very least thing that concerns us, is quite overpowering now-a-days. Just listen. Scroggins has met Jenkins in the street, and they have scarcely shaken hands before Jenkins begins: "Capital joke," sniggers Jenkins. "Have you heard of it?" "No, indeed, what's it all about?" inquires Scroggins. "Oh! the row between Inoog and Straitlace—never heard a better in your life—almost died of laughing when I heard of it," and Jenkins begins to haw-haw in the open street, like an idiot, and to the astonishment of several decent people who are passing at the time, and who naturally enough are altogether unprepared for such a demonstration on the part of a respectable-looking individual like Jenkins. "Aw, now," draws Scroggins, "do tell me all about it, and don't keep me in suspense, that's a good fellow. I'm absolutely dying with curiosity." "Oh, didn't you hear of Inoog's attack upon Straitlace's dinner party," rejoins Jenkins, when he has got through his haw haw performance. "Why, all our friends are talking about it: Thought you must have heard of it." "Oh, is that all," answers Scroggins (you must, yourself, if you please, dear reader, supply the "aws" and other interjectional embellishments, with which exquisites of Scroggins's class are wont to adorn, or, at all events, prolong their conversation; for, although I am well acquainted with every variety of them, I have not as yet learnt how to write them). "Is that all? I heard of that to be sure, but there is nothing astonishing in that, for Straitlace's dinners are, I must say, the most stupid affairs in creation, and I don't wonder at a fellow's protesting against them, although"—Scroggins takes over charitably to put in—"of course the protest would have come with a better grace from some fellow who hasn't eaten so many of them as Inoog." "Oh, that isn't the joke at all," puts in Jenkins quickly, and with an anxiety which does him infinite credit, lest the same lost point of the story should be lost. "That isn't the joke at all. Do you know why Inoog has made such an attack upon Straitlace's dinner parties? that's the joke." "Why, I suppose because he finds them such a confounded bore," naturally answers Scroggins. "Oh, not at all; he's never invited now; so our grapes you know, haw! haw!" and Jenkins digs Scroggins in the ribs, and Scroggins responds with his own peculiar rendering of the haw! haw! and the two friends, both of whom you will remember are mutual friends of mine, shake hands and part in the greatest good humour, quite anxious to meet some other mutual friend to whom they may repeat "that capital story" about Straitlace and Inoog. As I have said above, I am quite prepared for insinuations of this nature, and I am thankful to be able to say that I can treat them with silent contempt, only I will remind Jenkins, as I know that he would be greatly troubled and annoyed to think that he had in any way exaggerated or misrepresented the little misunderstanding between Straitlace and myself, that we quarrelled on account of my having declined one of his invitations, and that this is the reason why I am not now invited to his festive board; and I think the acute intellect of my dear friend Jenkins will at once perceive that this circumstance places our quarrel in rather a different light from the one in which he represented it. I feel equally certain that Jenkins will immediately take a cab, and drive round to the houses of all our mutual friends to whom he has repeated the story. That universal charity, forbearance, absence of back-biting, and freedom from malicious and spicy remarks about one's friends, which is so distinguishing a characteristic of this present nineteenth century, compels me to come to this conclusion: for surely this age is one of love and universal charity; and now-a-days, at least, nobody ever ruins anybody else's character, or breathes a word against his fair fame—now-a-days nobody ever speaks unkindly of anybody else, or exaggerates his little failings and defects—now-a-days nobody ever makes mischief between friends, whatever may have been the custom in the dark ages, from which we have so happily emerged. Oh, no! We are all brethren now-a-days. Our popular songs and our popular toasts are all about brotherhood, and, of course, we all live together like brothers—of course—deny it who can. No doubt there is a good deal of murdering and spilling of one another's blood going on in various parts of the earth. To judge from the newspapers, there is amongst us brothers of the nineteenth century a very fair amount of assault and battery—both physical, in the shape of heavy blows, and moral, in the more harmless and playful form of libelling, continually going on. A good many of our brothers, in some parts even of this United Kingdom, as I read in the same newspapers, are accused of trampling on their wives, and of exhibiting other little playful developments of character. A considerable number, too, of our brethren are being separated from the society which they were supposed to adorn and maintain, and are hidden from our brotherly gaze by strong stone walls and iron-grated windows, whilst the dress with which their brotherhood clothes them is, to say the least of it, as singular as the employment with which they are provided, for brotherly purposes, no doubt, is out of the common way. I don't hear that the gentlemen of the long robe are labouring under any very great depression of spirits, occasioned by the falling off of business, or that they are at all disposed to give up the legal profession in order to devote their energies to other and more profitable pursuits; neither is it considered at all possible, so far as I can learn, that the Four Courts and the other halls where justice sits enshrined (with a bandage over her eyes, of course) will be converted into Corn Exchanges, or places of public amusement, just at present. But, what matter; we are all brothers, and, no doubt, all these little matters can be easily reconciled with the principles of universal charity and brotherhood. I frankly confess that I can't do it, but then I am quite sure that there are those, for example Jenkins himself, who can. I know very well that the next time I meet Jenkins, he will take me by the hand, and greet me quite as warmly as if he hadn't been occupied for the whole of last week in retailing the story of my "sour grapes" to all our mutual friends; and, as I am perfectly certain that the dear fellow will be delighted to show me how all this is perfectly reconcilable with the purest charity and brotherly love, I am quite determined to ask such explanation at his hands.

But to return from this long digression, (which I hadn't the least intention of making, and for which I very humbly beg your pardon, dear reader,) to the question of the "Dinner Grievance." I quarrelled with Straitlace on account of the want of common sense which he exhibited in the selection of his guests. I had no complaint to make, either as regards the dinner which was provided, or the manner in which it was served. In these regards his dinner was all that could be desired, and no reasonable complaint could be found with it; neither was Straitlace exactly to be blamed, because old Taylor and the rest of the leathermen "cliqued" together, and, talked "shop" the whole evening. If, in despite of all the laws of politeness, in this case laid down and provided, clergymen will talk theology, lawyers law, and doctors physic, without regard to those whom the same code of politeness obliges to listen to them, I don't see that the blame of this is to be thrown on the shoulders of the host. It would doubtless be a very great convenience, if the laws of politeness permitted the host to mingle up and down amongst his guests, and when he discovered three or four gentlemen engaged on a purely professional topic in a mixed company, authorized him to break in upon them with a bland smile, and the expression of the mystic word, "Shop." But the laws of politeness don't allow either the host, or the unwilling listener to such conversations, to interpose with any allusion, however delicately framed, to "shop;" but they oblige you, on the contrary, to listen with a bland smile upon your countenance, and an appearance of interest which of course you don't feel, whilst in your heart you are wishing the doctor with his talk of physic, the lawyer with his prate of law, or, old Taylor with his speculations on the probable fluctuations and fate of leather, at, well, let us say, Jericho. No, if good sense don't dictate to people not to talk "shop" in mixed society, there is no other remedy for it, and the host is not to be blamed, and I have never attacked Straitlace on this account, neither do I now intend to do so.

I have pointed out where I considered that Straitlace made a mistake in one direction. I am now about to make a few remarks on another of my friends, who gave a dinner party, and who, also by another mistake, although under a different point of view, also exposed his dinner to be considered in the light of a "grievance."

Some time ago, in the days when I was striving to kill the melancholy which enveloped me in Mrs. Squeezer's apartments, by sometimes dining out, I received an invitation to dine from a certain friend of mine, whom we will, with your permission, name Johnson. Johnson has a nice little place out in the country, but it is a little place, and consequently, when on the day appointed, I duly presented myself at Rose Cottage, I was considerably astonished to find rather a large party assembled, larger I knew very well than could be conveniently accommodated in Johnson's little dining-room. After the usual delay, dinner was announced, and down we went, I wondering all the while where we should all find seats. Johnson's dining room is calculated to accommodate, I should say, about a dozen with ease and comfort, whilst we numbered at least thirty. My speculations were, of course, set at rest on entering the room. Instead of the ordinary table in the middle of the room, with a passage for the servants all round it, they had arranged two tables, one on each side of the room close to the wall—so close, that there was no possibility of servants getting to the backs of the guests to wait on them. The only sphere of operation left to the domestics was the space in the middle of the room between the two tables; hence there was no way of attending to those guests who were sitting with their backs to the wall, except by reaching over the table to them, to the evident annoyance of those who faced them; and just mark the absurdity of this proceeding! After some little time we contrived to settle down into our respective places, but, I assure you that it was such a tight fit, that it did take some time before we were able to do so. As it was, there was hardly space enough to move one's arms, and really I scarcely ever witnessed a more painful, and at the same time, more ridiculous spectacle, than that presented by some stout old gentlemen who were endeavouring to carve with ease and dignity, under these adverse circumstances. For my own part, I was just beginning to take my soup, and had a spoonful in my hand, when a sudden bump at my elbow deprived me of all control over the article in question, and half the soup was jerked down the inside of my neck-tie, scalding my chest like boiling oil, whilst the remainder was deposited on my shirt-front, and my clean white waistcoat. I need hardly say that I turned fiercely round, and discovered, as I might have expected, that this very unpleasant accident had been occasioned by a servant, who was striving to hand a plate of soup over my head to the gentleman who sat on the opposite side of the table.

I was in a raging passion, but I could not in justice turn upon the servant, who was standing aghast at the mischief which he had occasioned,—for, how could he help it under the circumstances? I looked savagely down the table at Johnson, who, from the steady and systematic way in which he avoided my glance, had, I am quite certain, perceived the accident. I therefore endeavoured, as well as I could, to sop up the soup with my handkerchief; but, what between the hot and greasy liquid inside of my shirt front, and the disgraceful appearance presented by the exterior of that article of dress, to say nothing at all about my waistcoat, I need scarcely say that my peace of mind, together with all chance of enjoyment for the rest of the evening, was irrevocably gone. I was, of course, ashamed to ask any one to dance with me, considering the disgraceful plight my clothes were in, and I slunk home as soon as ever I could, cursing Johnson and his dinner most heartily. However, this was but a mere trifle compared with what happened to an aged lady, of very large dimensions, who sat near to me. This old lady carried on her head one of the most elaborate and complicated pieces of millinery which it has ever been my lot to behold. She had flowers enough in her cap, if they had only been real instead of artificial, to stock a small garden; and if she had walked abroad on a fine spring day in this elaborate cap of hers, I should have been as little surprised to have seen the bees and the butterflies fluttering round it, as I should have been prepared to witness a pair of innocent redbreasts proceeding to build their nest somewhere within its ample folds. Under this most elaborate cap there was—must I say it—a most elaborate wig. This lady occupied the next chair to mine, and as she took up a good deal more than her fair share of space, I of course was crushed within the smallest possible limit. However, to the point. When dinner was about half over, I remarked a pale, quiet-looking little gentleman, who had had nothing on his plate for some time, directing a hungry glance towards the turkey which Johnson was carving at the bottom of the table. I summoned a servant to his assistance, and despatched him for some turkey for this hungry little gent. “John” returned in due time with the turkey on a plate. The next question was how to convey it to the gent who was anxiously awaiting its advent. There was no way of doing this, except, of course, by handing it over our heads, to the opposite side of the table. I don’t know whether “John” missed his footing, or, whether not being accustomed to wait at table under such difficult circumstances, he miscalculated his distances, but, at all events, in his endeavours to hand the plate of turkey to the gent for whom it was intended, his body came into violent collision with the old lady’s cap, and the whole fabric of lace, marabout feathers, flowers, and, oh, ye little fishes, the wig beneath, were all dislodged at one fell swoop from the legitimate position which they were intended at once to cover and adorn, and were lodged on the plate from which their owner but a moment before had been complacently taking her dinner. There was one loud scream of horror and dismay from this injured and insulted old lady; one frantic effort to replace the wig and its appurtenances, which now of course included the contents of the plate on which it had fallen, upon the bald and uncovered poll, and then she was led from the table by myself and another gent, in a state of mind which I shrink from endeavouring to portray, and which I leave to the vivid imaginations of the readers of this journal to picture to themselves. Mrs. Johnson, of course, hurried after the lady to whom this deplorable accident had occurred, and began to heap excuse upon excuse, and condolence upon condolence, but all in vain, for, I must say, that I never in all my life, and my experience is somewhat extensive, heard any one, not even excepting Mrs. Squeezer herself, “let out” in such style as this old lady “let out” upon poor Mrs. Johnson. Compromise was out of the question; the old lady was injured and degraded beyond all possibility of reparation, and haughtily rejecting all proffers of assistance to rearrange her disordered head-dress, she summoned her carriage, and drove away, after a parting shot at Mrs. Johnson, which sent that poor little woman back to the rest of her guests with her cheeks crimson with shame, and her eyes running over with tears.

These were not the only accidents which occurred during that most painful evening, but they are quite sufficient to justify me in putting down Johnson’s dinner as a decided “grievance;” and, if the remembrance of that unlucky night be not quite sufficient to do so, I trust that the remarks which I have here made will effectually prevent him from ever again attempting to pack into his dining-room twice the number of guests whom it will comfortably accommodate. I can’t conceive how it is, or how sensible people can so far forget themselves, as to endeavour to cram more people into a room than it was ever intended to hold. There is in such a proceeding a total disregard of first principles, which it is perfectly appalling to think of in these days of universal enlightenment and progress. No, in the name of goodness, my dear Mr. Johnson, if the dining room of Rose Cottage will only hold twenty people, don’t, when you give a dinner party, try and stuff it with forty, and think that you are justified in this insane proceeding from the fact, that you only give a party now and then, and must invite all your friends. Do not think that your friends are at all obliged to you for inviting them to an entertainment where they are liable to be parboiled from the soup which is spilled over them, or to have the artificial head of hair, with which they strive to hide the ravages of Time, precipitated by your servants into the middle of the table, where it forms anything but an appropriate centre-piece? Do you suppose, I again ask you, that they consider it any compliment to be invited to mingle in an entertainment, where they are exposed to such casualties as these? If you do so delude yourself, get rid of the delusion as quickly as possible. If we are obliged to wear wigs, and, I have yet to learn that there is any disgrace in wearing this most ornamental article, we wish to do so with comparative security, and not to have our baldness exposed to the sight of an unfeeling and unsympathizing crowd of lookers on; for in all accidents of the nature of those to which I have alluded, I am quite convinced that, as I once heard an old-fashioned friend of mine phrase it: “There are more laughers than weepers.” No, Johnson, old fellow, when I can dine with you in peace and comfort—when I have room for the free play of my elbows—and am not in dread and bodily fear for my waistcoat and shirt front, I shall be always happy to take my place at your festive board; but so long as you continue, in defiance of common sense, to invite me to entertainments like the one which I have just endeavoured to describe; but of which, I must say, that I have not narrated one tithe of the atrocious inconveniences and annoyances with which it was surrounded; so long, however painful it may be to my feelings, and however repugnant to the gentler instincts of my nature, I shall not desist from exposing you and your dinners, in the hope, of course, of inducing you to embrace a line of conduct which will in the end be most satisfactory to yourself, as it will be infinitely more pleasant to your friends. You have already converted the stout old lady into a bitter enemy, and she blackens you wherever she goes; and, really, taking human nature as it is, who can be surprised at this, after the indignity to which she was subjected at your table? I am afraid that your entertainments may have the same effect upon the rest of your friends, and as I wish to save you from such a very unpleasant circumstance, I have spoken thus freely upon this subject, but always for your good. Remember that, Johnson—always for your good!

MIKE DRISCOLL AND THE FAIRIES.

THE picturesque village of Castleconnell lies on the banks of the Shannon, about six miles above Limerick. A lovelier habitation could scarcely be chosen by the most enthusiastic admirer of decaying Art and perennial Nature. The surrounding district is thickly strewn with the remains of castles, fortresses, and churches, each shrined in the mellow twilight of its own legend; whilst the gently undulating country is belted and darkened with fragments of forest, and overtopped by the bluest of mountains. The nobler river itself flows past the village, a quarter mile in breadth, by quaintly-mossed and water-stained weirs, over which the salmon leaps, at times, high in the air, like a sudden gust of jewels; by conical-roofed, old-fashioned mills, whose crooked windows and high gables blend in marvellous harmony with the character of the surrounding landscape; and by pleasant cottages, where peasant girls still sit and sing at the threshold, and the spinning-wheel hums flaxen-toned ditties in the summer weather.

Leaving the village, the mighty stream sweeps, with a curved rush around the gentle promontory on whose height the castle of the O'Briens still stands in desolate magnificence; and thence, with many a bend, round green elbows of scented woodland and pastoral peninsulas, dotted with dreamy Cuyp-like cattle, towards Doonas. The fall in the bed of the river at this point is considerable. The narrow channel is nearly blocked up by huge boulders, overgrown with citrol-coloured flora, from whose fissures spring the slender hazel and the flowering elder; and over and around them rushes the great torrent of waters, churning itself into vast cauldrons of boiling foam and clouds of mist; subsiding here and there into weltering pools of flaky emerald. To the right, the bank rises to the height of seventy feet; and, viewed from this elevation, the spectacle presented by the Falls is one of terrific beauty. Right and left, as far as the eye can penetrate, the river appears to be lashed into a white fury, and sends up a roar which may be heard at a distance of six miles in calm weather. The low shores at the opposite side are buried in the thickest foliage, whilst if the spectator lean over the cliff on which he stands, he sees but a precipitous wall of rock, which falls with plummet-like sheerness into the raging torrent beneath. The spot has many associations. Some years ago, a lady of high rank attempted to cross the Falls at midnight, in order to be present at a ball given at the residence of a gentleman of fortune on the other side. A brave fisherman undertook to convey her across; but he and his fair charge perished in the perilous enterprise. A month after the tragic occurrence, her body was discovered floating some miles further down the river, the bracelets on her wrists and the jewels of her hair matted with water-weeds. The peasantry assert, that on the anniversary of her death, wailing voices ascend from the Falls, and a spectral lady is seen drifting seaward with the current. On the highest part of the bank are the ruins of a castle, evidently of modern erection. It is stated that the building was burned, by orders of its owner, for the express purpose of heightening the poetical character of the scenery, by adding a picturesque ruin to its other attractions. Then there is an ancient well, enclosed in an oblong of Druidical oaks; and there are raths, and nine-men-morris circles, where the lustre flourishes, and the gentia fairies of the place dance jocund measures in the blinking starlight.
